He has never sought to establish auxiliaries, or other subordinate organizations. His treasury receives the free will offerings (amounting to not quite $5,000 a year,) of all such persons as see fit to make use of this channel to send the Gospel to the heathen; and that is the whole story. To those who go forth from under his care he makes no pledges. They must trust in God. "I promise you nothing," he says; "you must go in faith. And if you cannot go in faith, you had better not go at all." Those whom he accounts suitable persons to preach the Gospel, he ordains prior to their departure. He was once asked if he had the right to ordain. His reply was, "Not for Germany, but I have for the heathen." None of his missionaries have received any other ordination.

From the January number of the "Biene auf dem Missionsfeld," it appears that the receipts of this society during 1853 were 5,308 Thl.; and that the disbursements amounted to 4,871 Thl. Four missionaries were sent forth for the first time, two to the stations on the Ganges, and two to the Celebes.—See Missionary Herald, June, 1852.

GREECE is situated between the 36th and 40th degrees north latitude, and the 20th and 24th degrees east longitude. It is bounded on the north by Macedonia and Albania proper, on the east by the Ægean sea, on the south by the Mediterranean, and on the west by the Ionian sea. The length of Greece proper is not more than 250 miles, and its mean breadth is about 150 miles. It contains a little more than 23,000 square miles, exclusive of Macedonia, Albania, and the Islands. But notwithstanding the narrow limits of Greece, it has attracted more attention than almost any other country for three thousand years, and its poets, orators, sculptors and architects, have been the admiration of the world. By her mental superiority Greece became mistress of nations, and by her own degeneracy she was precipitated from this proud eminence. But this is so familiar a portion of ancient history that the facts need not be repeated here.

At the time of the birth of Christ, Greece had lost her liberties entirely, and was of no importance in the political world. But in the time of the apostles and soon after, the nation was converted to Christianity, and this has been a principal means of preserving its language and of keeping it distinct from other nations. Passing on to the 9th century, we find the Greek or Romish Churches engaged in a fierce controversy, the Pope excommunicating the Grand Patriarch of Constantinople, the acknowledged head of the Greek Church, and the Patriarch thundering bulls of excommunication against the Pope. From this period historians date the separation of the Christian world into the Romish and Greek Churches, —a separation which has ever since been widening.

Some of the points of difference between the Romish and Greek Churches are the following: The Greeks deny the supremacy and infallibility of the Pope of Rome, but regard their Patriarch as head of the true Catholic Church. The Greek Church condemns as idolatrous the use of images, as practised in the Romish Church; but for images it substitutes pictures. It does not condemn its priests to celibacy, but no priest can marry a second time, nor can any married priest rise to the rank of bishop. It rejects the doctrine of purgatory, but orders masses for the souls of the dead. Unlike the Romish Church, it does not condemn the people to an ignorance of the Scriptures. But the invocation of the saints and the worship of the Virgin Mary, is carried to as great an extent in the Greek as in the Romish Church.

For several centuries the Greeks were subject to various masters, by all of whom they were harshly treated. Their last oppressors were the Turks, from whose yoke they freed themselves by the revolution which terminated successfully in 1830, and which was followed by the acknowledged independence of the Greek nation.

The geographical situation of Greece is most favorable, being situated in a central position between Europe, Asia and Africa; her climate is delightful without being enervating; her vegetable and mineral productions are various and inexhaustible; her people enterprising, industrious, and intelligent; and only the prevalence of a pure

Christianity is needed to give her again the high relative position which she once held.

MISSIONS.

THE AMERICAN BOARD entered upon its mission to Greece in 1830, by the appointment of Rev. Jonas King as missionary to that country. He commenced his labors in the island of Tenos, where, during the first year, he had under his care a female school of thirty or forty pupils. At the same time he employed himself in distributing Bibles and tracts, and in selling a Greek Spelling Book, prepared by Rev. Mr. Temple, and issued from the Mission press of the Board at Malta. Mr. King's school was established in the principal town in Tenos, where had been built a modern church called the Evangelistria, the most magnificent edifice in Greece, and to which hundreds of pilgrims resorted every year, chiefly the lame, the sick, and the lunatic, brought there to be miraculously healed of their maladies. It was the central point of superstition in Greece; and yet the principal men in the place sent their daughters to Mr. King's school. Scarcely a year had passed, however, before opposition was made by the Romish bishop, to whose authority a third of the inhabitants were subject, some of the books used were denounced as heretical, and the school became the subject of opprobrious remark through the town. Still Mr. King held on his way, having usually over fifty scholars present; and just at this time, as if to rebuke the Romish opposition, the government sent him a box of ancient Greek books, and the government gazette published an expression of gratitude to the Americans for the books they were furnishing to the Greeks, at the same time highly commending Mr. King's school and the general course of instruction pursued in it. From this time the opposition ceased. In the autumn of 1830 the Greek School Committee of New York forwarded to the President of Greece, through Mr. King, a box containing 3,456 slates and 74,000 pencils, at the same time placing at the disposal of Mr. King $335 for the purchase at Malta of elementary school books in modern Greek. The slates and pencils were gratefully acknowledged in the official gazettes of Greece.

But Mr. King had been desirous from the first of making Athens the centre of his operations, and in the spring of 1831 he removed to that place. He immediately opened a Lancasterian school, at the head of which he placed a distinguished Greek scholar, and in one month the school contained 176 scholars of both sexes. He soon divided his school into two, one for boys and another for girls, and established a third in a neighboring village. He also maintained a regular Greek service on the Sabbath in his principal school, besides a regular preaching service in his own house.

In January, 1833, Mr. Elias Riggs, a graduate of Amherst College and a thorough scholar, arrived in Athens, and became associated with Mr. King in the work of the mission. One month after his arrival the new king Otho, with the regency, reached the country, and Greece became free from Turkish rule. The new government was soon organized, and the Greek church was made the established religion of the kingdom. The highest ecclesiastical authority was vested, under the king, in a permanent council, bearing the name of the "Holy Council of the Kingdom of Greece." This Council was required to watch diligently over the doctrines of the Greek Church, and especially over the contents of books designed for the youth and the clergy, and treating of religious subjects; and whenever they were assured that any man was endeavoring to disturb the established church by false doctrine, by proselyting, or by any other means, they were required to call upon the secular power to apply a remedy to the evil. The laws respecting common schools were liberal, and designed to extend the benefits of education to all the people. On the whole, the missionaries apprehended more embarrassment in the prosecution of their efforts in the kingdom of Greece, than they had experienced under the Turkish government.

In the autumn of this year, Messrs. King and Riggs spent a month in visiting the islands of Syra, Hydra and Spetsæ; and Napoli and Corinth in the Peloponnessus. Another month Mr. Riggs spent in traversing the Peloponnessus, with a view to determining upon the most eligible place for his future residence, as he had resolved upon removing from Athens. But at home or abroad their main objects were kept in view, and within a few months they distributed gratuitously 8,251 school books and tracts in modern Greek, 226 Testaments and Psalters, 19 copies of the Pentateuch and book of Joshua, and one Turkish Bible and one Turkish Testament.

The schools at Athens were at this time less in number, but of a higher order, than a year or two previous. The higher school, called the "Evangelical Gymnasium," planned by Messrs. King and Riggs with reference to a systematic course of instruction, was noticed in a Greek newspaper called "The Minerva," which, in publishing the plan of the Gymnasium, prefaced it with the following editorial remarks, which it is pleasing at this date to recur to. The following is an exact copy of the remarks:

"The venerable Mr. Jonas King, known for his charities and beneficence to almost all the sufferers in the time of our struggle, and, since the settlement of the affairs of our nation, devoted to the work of enlightening it, has sent us the new organization of his gymnasium at Athens, which we hasten to publish in our paper, that the public may see how well the sincere friends of humanity know what are the best means of benefiting it, and bringing it to its true happiness. Far from attributing to the venerable King, or others, any designs of proselytism, which designs, did they exist, would in the nineteenth century be rather ridiculous than worthy of regard, we cannot but express the gratitude of our nation to Americans who have set such a worthy example, while we would also proclaim the virtues of the venerable King, especially the diligence and assiduity which he, as well as his colleagues, exhibit for our illumination."

One month after this the Gymnasium contained sixty-six scholars, and the preparatory school seventy-six. Mr. Riggs gave a course of lessons on the evidences of Christianity, and went through with an epitome of the Old Testament history, besides conducting a Sabbath school composed of members of the preparatory school; and Mr. King gave lessons twice a week, once on the historical parts of the Old Testament, and once on the doctrinal parts of the New. His Greek preaching in his own house, on the Sabbath, was also continued.

In June, 1834, Mr. Riggs took up his residence in the renowned city of Argos. He immediately opened a school for females, assisted by his wife, and in a month or two they had 40 scholars. During the year 1835, the Scriptures were very extensively diffused among the Greeks. Mr. King alone distributed by sale and gratuitously, 2,656 copies of the New Testament, and parts of the Old, in modern Greek, and 25,896 school books and religious tracts. These were distributed in the Peloponnessus, in continental Greece, Thessaly, Macedonia, and the islands; and he could have disposed of many more, had not his stock been exhausted. Mr. King also continued his Gymnasium, and in this year four of his most advanced pupils came to this country to complete their education. Mr. Riggs, besides continuing his school at Argos, prepared a series of questions in modern Greek on Genesis, and also a series of maps in Greek, illustrating the science of geography. About this time King Otho issued a decree authorizing the establishment of a national bookstore, connected with the royal printing-press, which was to furnish all books on education to be used in the schools within the kingdom. A Greek paper, printed at Athens, boldly took the ground that this was the first systematic attempt to shut out all light from Greece, and that it was a measure which the Greeks could not and would not endure.

In November, 1836, Rev. Nathan Benjamin and wife arrived at Argos as missionaries of the Board. They had begun now to encounter increasing jealousy and opposition, and to increase this feeling a tract was published against the Americans, which meant all missionaries and Bible agents from whatever quarter they had come. Still Dr. King had his usual number of hearers on the Sabbath, and during the year 1836, he distributed nearly 5,000 copies of the New Testament in modern Greek, and over 4,000 school books and religious tracts. Mr. Riggs also distributed 1,600 copies of Scriptures and tracts.

In 1837, Dr. King discontinued his Gymnasium, the government having established a Gymnasium and University at Athens. During this year 24,736 books were distributed, of which 4,432 were new Testaments. On one day Dr. King had 45 Greek soldiers call on him for books. In May of this year, Rev. Messrs. Samuel R. Houston and George W. Leyburn and their wives, arrived at Areopolis, the chief town of the province of Laconia. They immediately commenced the erection of a Lancasterian school-house, large enough to accommodate 200 scholars, and also took measures for the establishment of two other schools, one for boys, and one exclusively for females.

In 1838 the station at Argos was discontinued, and Mr. Riggs removed to Smyrna, and Mr. Benjamin to Athens. The books sold and distributed this year at the depot established by Dr. King at Athens, amounted to 32,410 copies. Not less than 20,000 copies of the Scriptures, or parts of them, were distributed in Greece during the year. Of Areopolis and its Spartan population, Mr. Houston writes at this time:—"They seem never to have been either a commercial, a manufacturing, or an agricultural people. All their buildings, their roads, many articles of their household furniture and their dress, have been evidently designed for a state of war. Their implements of husbandry are of the most ancient and rude methods of construction. The hand-mill, turned by women, is used in most of their villages. Saddles and bridles are unknown, as well as wagons and carriages of every kind. Bedsteads, tables, chairs, knives and forks, are very rare. At the bishop's house myself and two muleteers dined out of the same dish, all sitting cross-legged on the floor. The inhabitants are all Greeks. No Catholics, Jews, Armenians, or Turks are to be found among them."

Early in 1839 the government allowed a teacher to be procured for the Gymnasium at Areopolis, and soon that school contained 170 pupils. In July of this year, Dr. King began to preach in the new chapel, which had been finished through the liberality of friends in the city of New York. The whole number of copies of books and tracts distributed from the depository at Athens this year was 52,285. The printing executed at Athens was 26,800 copies of books, making 1,413,400 pages, all in modern Greek. Among the books printed was Baxter's Saint's Rest, translated by Dr. King.

The year 1840 witnessed the translation of Barnes' Notes on the Gospel of Matthew, the Youth's Book of Natural Theology, and a book of Scripture Stories, by the brethren at Areopolis. The printing at Athens this year amounted to 2,880,000 pages. A society was formed this year called the Education Society, designed to provide a juvenile literature, and the missionaries were recognized as fellow-laborers in this work.

In 1841 the government required that one of the catechisms used in the Greek church should be introduced into the school supported by the Board at Areopolis. This catechism taught the worship of pictures, with other superstitions, which could not be countenanced; and as the government would not yield the point, the station at Areopolis had to be abandoned. Mr. Houston joined the mission to the Nestorians in Persia, and Mr. Benjamin joined Mr. King at Athens. The schools at Athens having been given up, the missionaries employed themselves in preaching, translating, and the circulation of books and tracts. Among the translations were Dr. Beecher's sermons on temperance. The abandonment of the station at Areopolis, for the reason assigned, was a testimony against the errors of the Greek Church, of the most public and decisive character, and was regarded as honest and consistent by the Greeks themselves.

Nothing unusual occurred in 1842. In 1843, Mr. Benjamin closed his connection with this mission and removed to Trebizond, and Dr. King alone remained at Athens. The reasons for this change may be found in a long article written by Dr. King, setting forth the peculiar obstacles in the way of a successful mission among the Greeks, and published in the Annual Report of the Board for 1844.

In the early part of 1844, the enemies of the truth made an attempt to oblige Dr. King to retire from the field. This brought him into controversy in one of the principal newspapers of Athens, on the dearest of all the superstitions of the Greeks—the worship of the Virgin Mary—and his opponents were perplexed by the proofs then given that one of the saints of their own calendar, Epiphanius, had taught the same doctrine with the missionary on this subject. Dr. King published also this year a volume entitled the "Prayers of the Saints," a collection of prayers from the Bible, and appended "Directions with regard to Prayer," consisting of passages from the Bible, showing to whom prayer should be offered, and through what mediation. He had other works in view, but was interrupted by the passage of a law designed to secure the Greek Church against danger from this quarter. Just before the passage of this law, Dr. King wrote thus :

"The Greeks, though manacled and bound for ages, were not made for slaves. The Greek mind will be free, and being free it will act, and its action will be felt in Europe, Asia, and Africa. Only think of twenty-five newspapers in Athens, a Constitution, freedom of the press, a University, Gymnasium, and many schools both for males and females; and I, a stranger, permitted to make a defence, which, in Spain or Italy, would have consigned me to the Inquisition. And in the midst of all the attacks which have been so furiously made upon me, I have still continued my regular services on the Lord's day, and have been surprised to see that so many dared to attend."

This language was too complimentary, as it soon appeared, for Dr. King was subjected to prosecution in the courts of Greece, for his work on the worship of the Virgin Mary, and that notwithstanding he had drawn entirely from the writings of some of the most approved saints in the Greek Calendar, in the form of extracts from Epiphanius, Chrysostom, Basil, Irenæus, Clemens, Eusebius, Pamphili, &c. This book, a duodecimo of 220 pages, received the most pointed condemnation of the Greek Synod, in August 1845, which Synod "excommunicated as blasphemous and impious, the defence of the Calvinist and Nestorian Jonas King, and prohibited to every orthodox Christian the reading of it, and called upon one and all to deliver it immediately to the fire." It prohibited also "all and every kind of connection with this most impious heretic," such as saluting or greeting him in the street, entering his dwelling, or eating, or drinking with him. And the Synod, not content with this, demanded that the author be prosecuted by the Government. He was accordingly prosecuted, and the case went against him in three successive trials, the last of which was before the Areopagus, or highest court of appeal. The effect of these judgments was to pass Dr. King over to the Criminal Court for trial as to the truth of the charges, and the infliction of punishment. This trial was to take place at Syra, and to that place Dr. King repaired, with the two Greek lawyers who had nobly and ably defended him before the Areopagus. But before landing it was ascertained that Dr. King's life would be in danger, and accordingly a postponement of the trial was secured, and he returned to Athens.

Arriving at this place in July 1846, he at once received the generous offer of British protection from the Ambassador, Sir Edmund Lyons; and the American Consul also, Mr. Mulligan, kindly interfered in his behalf. Dr. King now resumed the preaching service in his own house, which was attended by about thirty persons.

For a little time this persecuted missionary pursued his work, subject to frequent abuse, and threats, and violence; and on learning that the "Minister of the Interior" had the power and had expressed a willingness to banish him from Athens and from Greece, he determined, with the advice of his lawyers and other friends, to depart voluntarily, in which case he could return at any time without a permit. He accordingly set out for Geneva, where he arrived August 25, 1847. From Geneva he proceeded to Malta, where he arrived November 1st; and in June 1848, he returned again with his family to Athens. His letter to the Committee of the Board on this occasion, announcing his arrival and reception, his reasons for returning at that time, the course of the press, and the probable result of his trial, is a document of extraordinary interest, but it cannot be inserted in this work. It may be found in the Report of the Board for 1848.

Dr. King did not for some months resume religious services in his chapel on the Sabbath; but his book depository was opened, and Bibles, Testaments, and religious books of various kinds were in demand.

In January 1848, six months after his return, he had printed one thousand copies of the "Prayers of the Saints;" 6,410 copies of the Decalogue; and 2,000 copies of the "Dialogue between the Bible and a Sinner;" amounting in all to 593,510 pages. On the 18th of February he commenced preaching publicly, and one of his hearers was a military officer, and brother of the King's attorney. He continued preaching in his chapel through the year without molestation.

In the spring of 1850, the Government took measures for a second prosecution against Dr. King, on the ground of proselytism; and in May he was called to appear before a judge to answer to this charge. The examination at this trial was in the form of question and answer between the judge and the accused, and sets the great prudence and wisdom of the latter in a strong light. See report of the Board for 1851.

Dr. King met with no serious interruption in his labors until September 1851, when he received an order from the Council of Judges in the Criminal Court of Athens, to submit to trial as one guilty of having preached in his own house doctrines, principles, and opinions, contrary to the basis of the religion of the Oriental Church. From this Court he appealed to the higher Court of the Areopagus. The Areopagus decided that the penal law forbidding the expression of sentiments and opinions contrary to the basis of religion and morals, did not apply in the case of Dr. King. Notwithstanding this, the Criminal Court, to which the case was remanded for trial, declared him guilty of this very offence against that law, and condemned him to imprisonment, and after that had expired, to banishment from the kingdom.

In these circumstances Dr. King enjoyed the friendly interference of our government, as well as the sympathy of a large number of able lawyers and other distinguished gentlemen in Athens. The sentence was not enforced to its full extent, and the persecuted missionary continued his labors, distributing during the year 1852 the Scriptures and other useful books to the amount of nearly half a million of pages.

The Herald for May 1854, announced that Dr. King had been formally notified by the Greek government, that he was free "from the penalty of exile imposed on him by the decision of the Criminal Court of Athens." He therefore continues his labors, preaching and distributing the Scriptures, besides printing and circulating large numbers of tracts and other books. The United States Government has taken up his grievances, of which a full investigation has been made by its representative, Hon. Mr. Marsh, who has made an able report to his government, favorable to Dr. King; but the final settlement of the case has not yet transpired.—
REV. E. D. MOORE.

AMERICAN EPISCOPAL BOARD.—The mission of this Board to Greece was preceded by an exploring tour by Dr. Robertson. In the fall of 1830, the mission was commenced by him and Rev. Mr. Hill, at Tenos, but was afterwards removed to Athens. They took with them two printing presses, under the superintendence of Mr. Bingham, which were usefully employed in issuing such publications as circumstances called for. They were successful also in collecting poor children into schools, who were instructed in the word of God. This small beginning grew into a large establishment, and in 1834, it was recognized as the Government Seminary for the instruction of female teachers. In 1836, it numbered between 600 and 700 scholars. This mission, with its schools, has continued to prosper to the present time, though, on several occasions, a storm of opposition was raised, which threatened its destruction. Yet, by the good hand of God upon them, Mr. Hill and his associates have been able to maintain their ground, with increasing prospects of usefulness. The committee in their report for 1853, say that the mission continues to be an object of regard with the people; and that it is quietly, yet efficiently, doing a work which must exercise an important influence upon the spiritual welfare of those among whom it is conducted. Dr. Hill says, "Our schools are quite full. We are obliged every day to refuse the most pressing applications. Our pupils are from five to fifteen years of age, and from every class of society, from the daughter of the Prime Minister down to the poorest. The greater part of them are able to read the word of God; and not a week passes without the whole having learned some portion of it, and without, at least, some important truth having been taught them. I have lately received a very flattering testimonial of the favor in which our mission is held by the Greek Government. The Minister of the Interior has sent me a large and elegantly executed map of Greece, accompanied by an official note, in which he says, 'For the use of the Institution, which is so admirably conducted under your direction, and as a mark of the estimation in which it is held by us, we have the pleasure of offering, Reverend Sir, a copy of the new map of the kingdom of Greece.'"

With reference to the general state of the missionary work, Dr. Hill remarks: "While the influence of our missionary operations is every where felt, we are happy to find that God is raising up among the clergy of the Greek Church those who agree with us in making His word the all-important means of salvation." And he quotes from a lecture recently delivered by one of the educated clergy of the Greek Church, who has recently been appointed by the Government as public preacher in the capital, to a Bible Class of young females in one of the public schools, which is replete with evangelical sentiments.

Stations were also commenced and maintained for some time at Syra and Crete; but they have since been abandoned.

AMERICAN BAPTIST MISSIONARY UNION.—The mission of the American Baptist Union in Greece, had its origin in the sympathies which had been awakened in the United States in behalf of a people, whose ancient splendor and power present a striking contrast to their present feebleness and insignificance—a people to the genius of whose ancestors the civilized world with one accord acknowledges its unceasing obligations. The Protestant denominations had already established missions in the country, when in the summer of 1836, the Baptist Board of Missions appointed Messrs. Cephas Pasco and Horace T. Love missionaries in Greece. They were ordained in September of that year, and sailing soon afterwards, they arrived at Patras in the following December. The place at which the mission was to be established, had not been determined by the managers, and the missionaries at first fixed their residence at Patras, a town in the kingdom of Greece containing at that time about 7,000 inhabitants. So soon as their acquaintance with the language would allow, they opened a school with the sanction of the government, which was soon attended by 40 scholars, and also devoted themselves to the circulation of the Scriptures and tracts. They were required to report all their proceedings to the government, and the Holy Synod of the Greek Church, finding that the Scriptures which they circulated were not of the authorized version, soon issued a decree forbidding them to be read, and commanding them to be burned wherever they might be found. The decree, however, was but little regarded, save by a few of the priests, who alone attempted its enforcement. But the attempt was futile, and served only to stimulate a curiosity which before was latent among the people.

In July, 1839, Mrs. Harriet E. Dickson was appointed a teacher in the mission, and went to reside at Patras. She was a Scottish lady who had resided several years in Greece, where, with her husband, now deceased, she had been connected with the government school in the island of Corfu. Mr. Pasco having returned to the United States in consequence of ill-health, the operations of the mission were confined to Patras and its neighborhood, until April, 1840, when Mr. Love was obliged by the unfriendly climate of that place to remove with his family to Corfu, which, for several years, became the principal seat of the mission. Corfu is the capital of the Ionian Republic, and contains a population of upwards of 25,000, of whom perhaps 10,000 are English, Italians and Jews. In August, 1840, Mr. Love baptized the first Greek convert, who, being a person of superior intelligence, soon became an assistant in the mission, and was appointed to resume its operations at Patras, where he labored among his countrymen for several years with commendable fidelity. In the summer of 1841 Mr. and Mrs. Buel were sent by the managers to join the mission at Corfu—the former being already ordained as a minister of the Gospel, while the latter, a lady of superior cultivation, was appointed to teach in the mission schools. Mr. Love preached to such congregations of Greeks as he was able to gather, and Mr. Buel commenced a service in English for the English residents of the island, and also distributed tracts among the native population. In consequence of this latter work in which he was engaged, a report was set on foot that the tracts were against the religion of the country, especially against their favorite Saint Speiridion, and on the day preceding Christmas, 1841, the festal day of the Saint, Mr. Buel having become an object of popular jealousy, was insulted by the mob, and at length attacked with open violence and driven to his own house. Hither he was pursued by the mob, who broke into the house and destroyed the bibles, tracts and other books, as well as much of the furniture which it contained. Mr. Buel and the members of his family were rescued from the peril to which they were exposed, only by the interposition of the commander of the British garrison, who escorted them with a strong guard, to the castle. So intense was the excitement among the people that a few days afterward it gave rise to a collision between them and some soldiers of the garrison, which was brought to a close only after the destruction of several lives. The affair was, on subsequent inquiry, found to have its origin in false and exciting reports which had been circulated respecting Mr. Buel and the character of his tracts. Though the other missionaries were not molested, it was deemed prudent that he should withdraw for a period from active participation in the mission. He accordingly passed the two following years at Malta. Mr. Love, in addition to preaching, had devoted much of his time to the preparation of evangelical tracts and the translation of several of the most approved school books, especially relating to Christian morals and kindred subjects, some of which the Commissioner of Instruction allowed to be introduced into the schools of the island. They were also introduced into many of the schools of Patras in the kingdom of Greece. The assistant, whose name was Apostolos, was here still engaged in prosecuting the labors of the mission. He entered with ability and zeal into the plan of introducing the new books into the schools, and in the winter of 1842 brought to Mr. Love at Corfu, two converts who professed to have received the Gospel, and who now solicited baptism at the hands of the missionary. They were soon baptized, but on their return to Patras, they found their countrymen so excited against them, because they had become Americans, as was said, that, together with Apostolos, they withdrew to Athens, and the mission at Patras was henceforth discontinued.

The health of Mr. Love had long been declining in the climate of Greece, and early in 1843 he was compelled to return to the United States, and here, after waiting for two years in the hope of a return to the mission, he withdrew from the service of the Board. The school at Corfu was continued by Mrs. Dickson. In 1843 the kingdom of Greece was convulsed with a political revolution which had long been threatening. It resulted in the establishment of a freer constitution, which, however, though it contained provision for religious freedom, also specially prohibited all attempts at proselyting. Its operation has been such that, while every man is allowed to exercise the religious faith which he already professes, no one is allowed to persuade another to change his faith. But as in all other countries, the actual freedom of religion has been found to depend rather on the spirit of the government and the people, than on any specific provisions of the constitution, and though Protestant missionaries are always restricted in Greece, they yet encounter but few obstacles which prudence and address may not remove or overcome. On the establishment of the new constitution, Mr. Buel returned to Greece and went to reside at the Piræus, where Apostolos had for some time been living. He immediately engaged in revising the translations already made by Mr. Love, of books for schools and popular reading. Of these the principal was President Wayland's "Elements of Moral Science," a work which has since passed quite beyond the sphere of missionary influence, and has been received with unusual favor by teachers, professors in the university, and scholars of every degree. It has been adopted as a text-book in the Gymnasia and Hellenic schools both of Greece proper and the Ionian Islands, and has become a common authority in morals among the people, often with the avowed approval of the ecclesiastics themselves.

In February, 1844, the mission was reinforced by the arrival of Rev. Albert N. Arnold and Mrs. Arnold and Miss S. E. Waldo, who had been appointed by the managers. The ladies immediately associated themselves with Mrs. Dickson in the management of the schools. Mr. Arnold, while acquiring the language, commenced a service in English for the benefit of the English regiments stationed at Corfu. Several other philanthropic and religious labors which had hitherto been performed by Rev. Mr. Lowndes, an English clergyman of the Island, were now in consequence of his removal devolved on Mr. Arnold. To these his attention was of necessity mainly confined for a considerable period after his arrival, and in the unsettled condition of the republic at that time, the question of discontinuing the mission was seriously entertained by the managers. At their meeting in May, 1845, they referred the matter to the Executive Committee or Acting Board, as it was then styled, with the authority to discontinue the mission so soon as might be deemed expedient. The correspondence which ensued, however, determined the committee to continue the mission for the present till other events should enable them to decide more confidently respecting its final issue. This experiment has been in progress ever since, and has perhaps exerted an unfriendly influence on the spirit and labors of the missionaries. The question has been considered an open one whether the mission would survive the changes of a few years, and no reinforcements have been sent to strengthen it. Its members, however, have prosecuted their work with steadiness and fidelity, though with a measure of success so small as to afford but little encouragement to their hopes and plans. In 1846 Mr. Arnold began to preach in the Greek language to a small assembly of Greeks, numbering usually from thirty to forty, while still continuing his other labors among the English population and the regiments of Corfu. The school of Mrs. Dickson also continued to prosper, and awakened a wide interest both among the philanthropic residents of the island and Christian friends in England and Scotland. Mr. Buel continued to preach and prosecute other labors at the Piræus, where the mission was, in many respects, more advantageously situated than it could be at Corfu, or in any part of the Ionian Republic. Its influences here were directed to the people of Greece—the descendants of those whose genius once filled the world with its renown, and who still cherish the memories and traditions of their ancient sires. In one respect, however, the mission has encountered greater obstacles here than in the Republic, and this is in the constitution and power of the "Eastern Orthodox Church," as it is styled, which holds the consciences of men beneath its sway, and tolerates no dissent from the dogmas of its established faith. It controls the authority of the civil magistrate, directs the influence of the press, and even holds the courts of law in bondage to its spiritual despotism. The power of this corrupt combination of priestly bigotry and aristocratic pride has often been brought to bear on those who have sought the instructions of the American missionaries in Greece, and in some instances even upon the missionaries themselves. This remark finds its most prominent illustration in the violent and inquisitorial proceedings against Doctor King, one of the missionaries of the American Board of Commissioners, and is verified by the attempt made in 1847 to extinguish the Baptist Mission at the Piræus. Mr. Buel was suddenly ordered by the Demarch of the city "to dismiss the school illegally taught in his house." The order was complied with, but the missionary still continued his Bible class and preaching on Sunday. A few weeks afterwards he was summoned before the Court of Magistrates and fined 50 drachmas for teaching the Sacred Scriptures without a license. The case, however, was carried before the Court of Appeals at Athens, and ably argued by gentlemen ardently devoted to the interests of religious freedom, and the sentence was reversed. It was regarded as a signal triumph of free principles, and has exerted an influence highly favorable to the independence of Protestant missionaries residing in the country. They have since been molested less frequently than before, though by no means even now exempt from liability to annoyance both from government and people.

In October, 1851, Mr. Arnold removed from Corfu to Athens. This step was taken in accordance with the direction of the Executive Committee, on account of an impression which had long prevailed that the kingdom of Greece, invested with independence and nationality as it is, offered by far the more inviting field for missionary labor. Mrs. Dickson remained to carry on her flourishing and useful school at Corfu, which she still continues to superintend and instruct. But with this exception, the entire mission since the autumn of 1851 has been confined to Athens and the neighboring city of Piræus. Its members have here continued their accustomed labors with comparatively few and feeble religious results, but to the general spread of intelligence and of liberal sentiments they have undoubtedly contributed an important part. The native converts have at no period numbered more than seven, but these, in one of their communications to the Board of Managers, claim to be the most numerous Protestant communion in Greece. Amid the changes which are now going on both in the kingdom and the republic of Greece, the missionaries still cling to the hope that new opportunities may be presented for bringing the simple doctrines of the Gospel in contact with the minds of the nation. There is said to be a growing dissatisfaction with the prevailing faith and mode of worship, and an indication that the beginning of a Protestant reformation may not be distant. Meanwhile the missionaries prosecuting such labors as their hands find to do, are waiting to take advantage of every change that may favor the dissemination of the Gospel of Christ in its purity among the people of the country. Statistics of the Mission for 1854.—Stations, 3; Missionaries, 2; Female assistants, 3; Native preacher, 1; Churches, 1; Communicants, 10; Schools, 1; Pupils, 52.

GREEN-KEY: A station of the Moravians on the island of St. Thomas, W. I.

GREENLAND: (See Labrador and Greenland.)

GRENADA: One of the West India Islands, about 20 miles in length and 10 in breadth. A station of the Wesleyans, also of the Propagation Society.

GREEGREE: A charm worn by the natives of Africa, as a protection against evil spirits. These charms are of various kinds and forms, according with the stupid notions of a fetish religion.

GRIQUA TOWN: Station of the London Missionary Society in South Africa, 530 miles north-east of Cape Town, with 8 out-stations.

GROENCKLOOF: A station of the United Brethren, in South Africa, 40 miles north of Cape Town.

GUANGA: A station of the Wesleyans in Kaffraria, S. Africa.

GUIANA: (See British Guiana and West Indies.)

GUNGREE: A station of the London Missionary Society in Hindostan.

GUY'S HILL: A station of the Wesleyans in Jamaica, W. I.

HADGEE, or HADJI: The title of a Mohammedan who performs a pilgrimage to Mecca.

HANA: A station of the American Board in the Sandwich Islands, on Maui. It is situated in a beautiful locality, the whole country being crowned with the richest verdure. In front of the mission house is an immense bluff, with a precipice 400 feet high, in which are two caves, in one of which tradition says Kaahumanu was born, and in the other nursed.

HANKEY: A station of the London Missionary Society in South Africa, near Gamtoos, with an out-station at Kruis Fontein, commenced in 1825. The site of this station is on a dry, barren land, near the Gamtoos river, surrounded by hills, rendering it unfit for sustaining a large population. Here the genius and activity of the missionary have, by much perseverance, triumphed over the obstacles of nature, in making a tunnel through one of these hills, leading the waters of the Gamtoos over a large tract of land, thus giving the people labor, and affording the means of support and comfort.

HARMATTAN: A dry easterly wind in Africa, which destroys vegetation.

HASTINGS: A town of liberated Africans, in the River District, Sierra Leone, West Africa, near Regent's Town: Church Missionary Society.

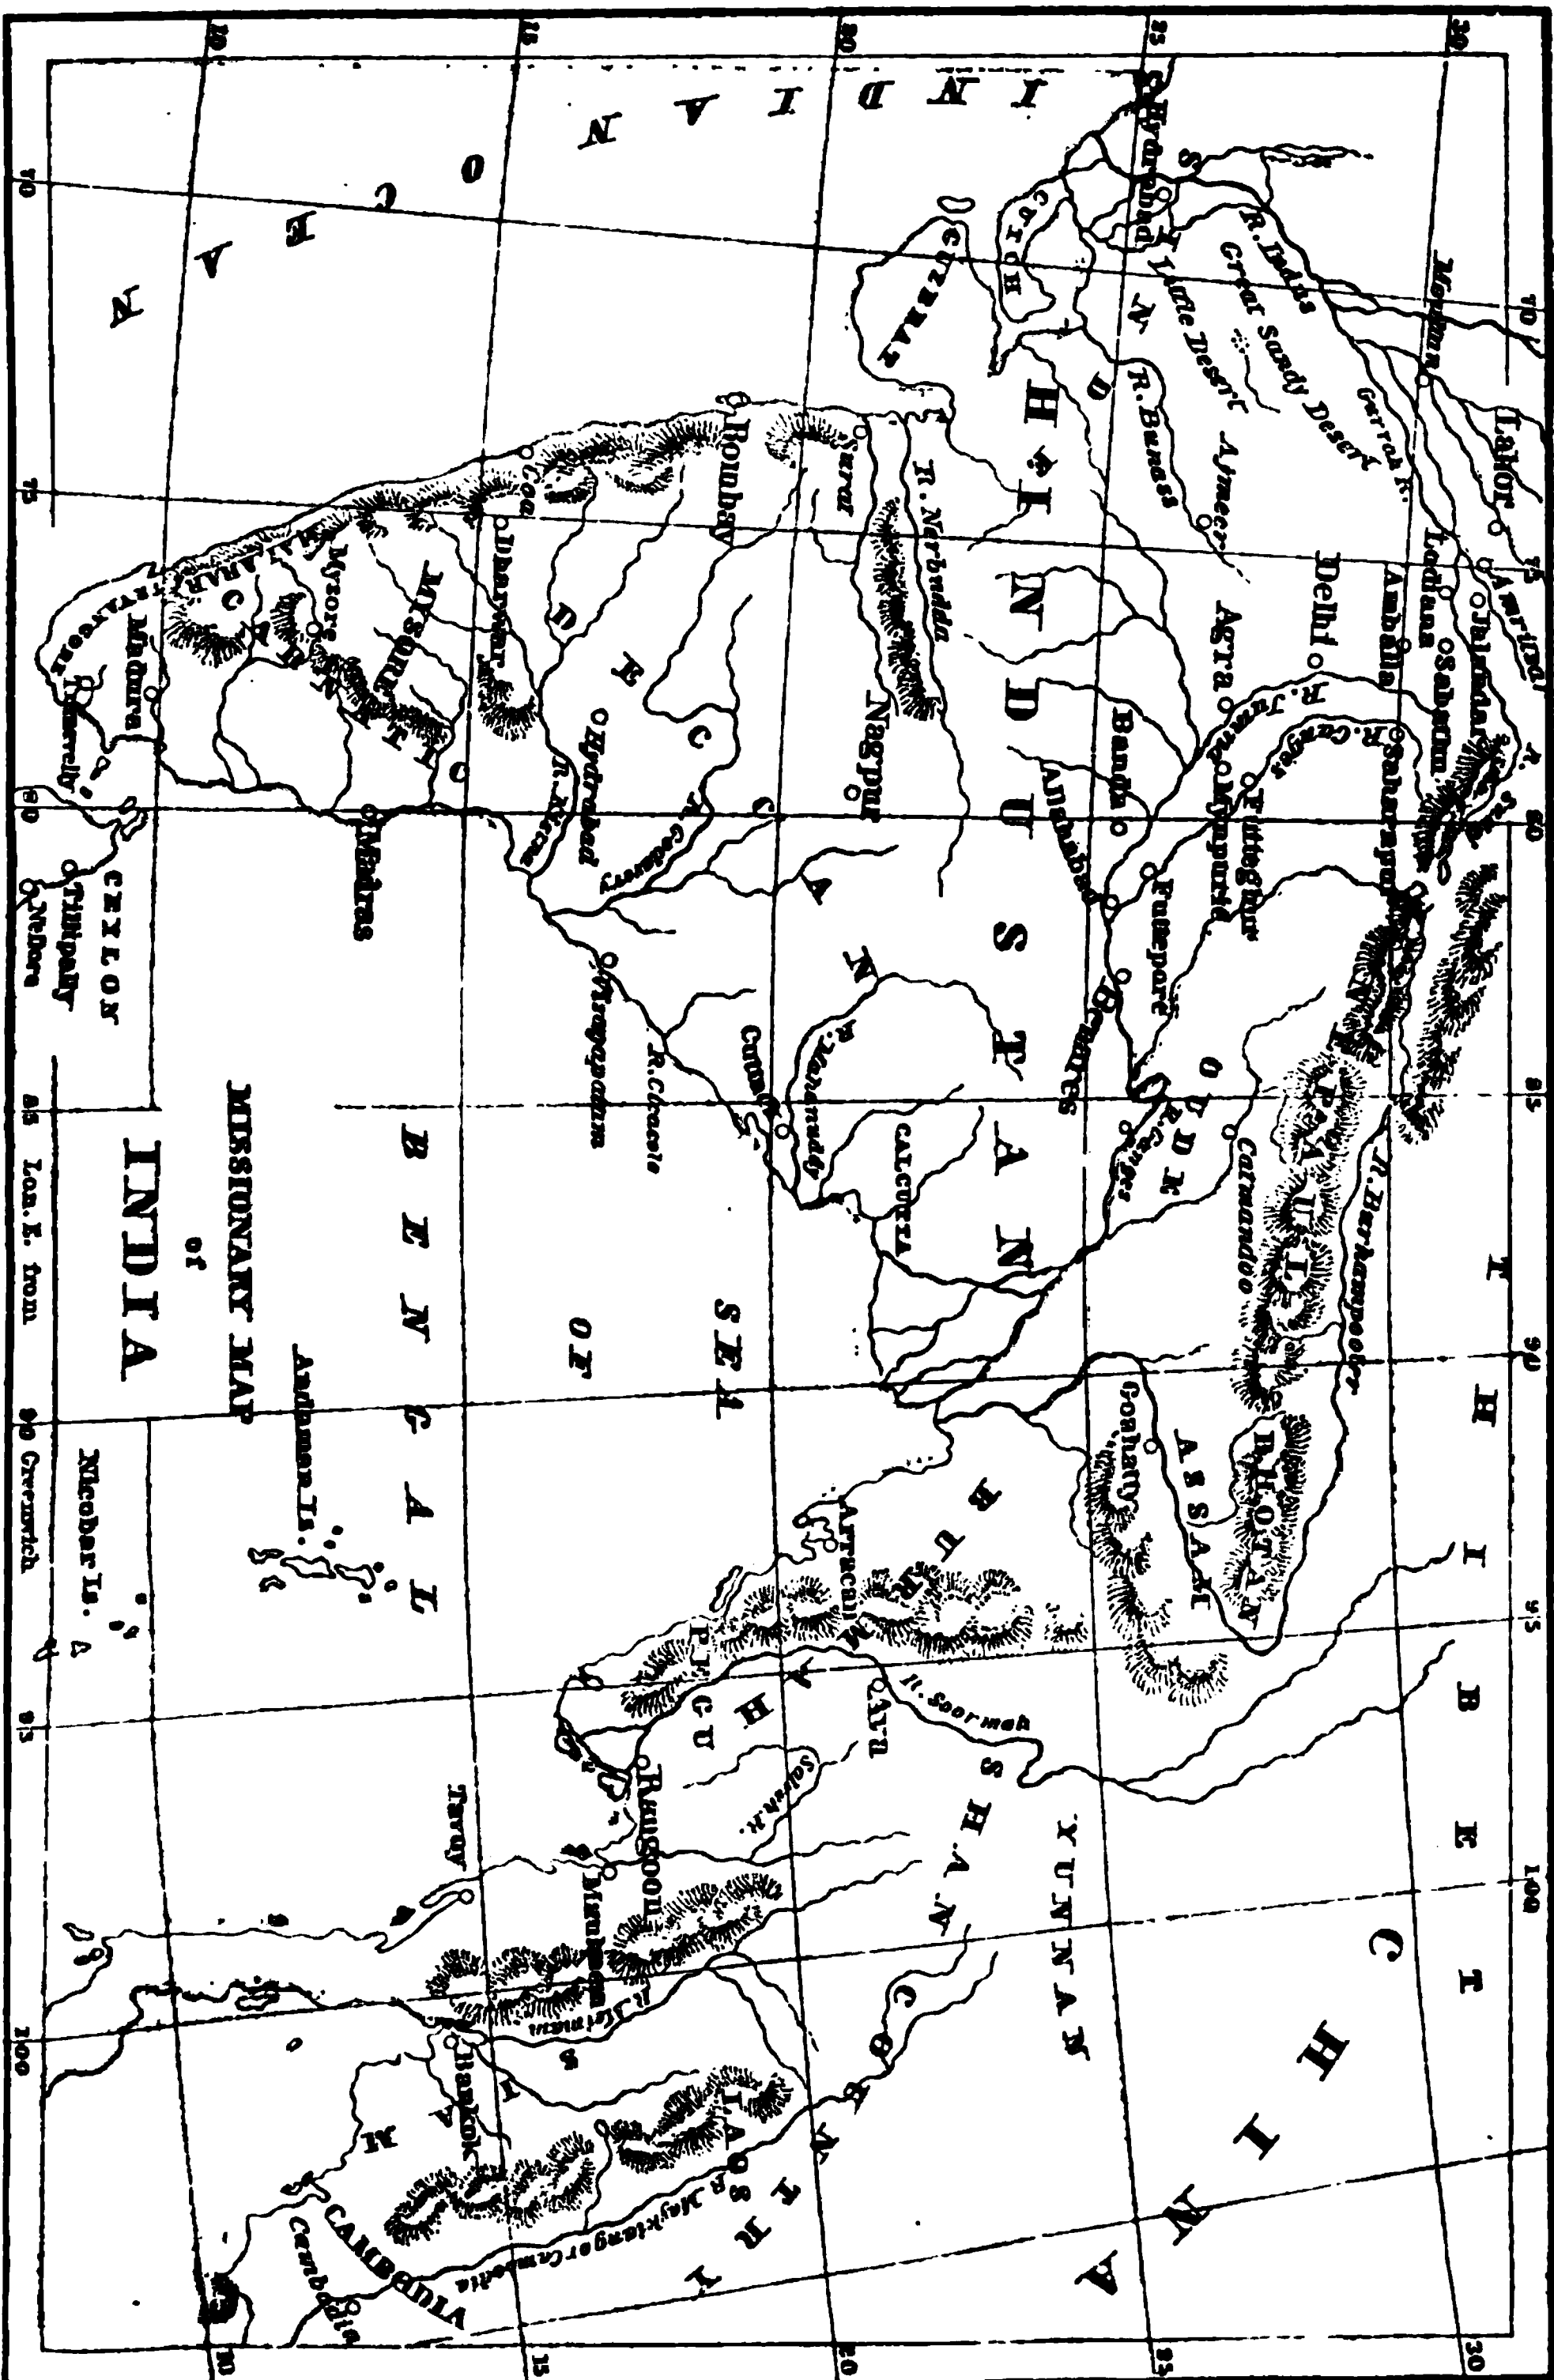

HAURAKI: A district in New Zealand, containing four tribes of natives, among whom the Church Missionary Society have a mission.

HAWAII: The largest of the Sandwich Island group, being 97 miles in length and 78 in breadth, 280 in circumference, containing a surface of 4,000 square miles. The greater part of the cultivated land is near the sea-shore, along which the towns and villages of the natives are thickly scattered. A gradual and unbroken ascent leads from the sea-shore to the summits of three mountains which enclose a central valley, the crater of an immense volcano, called Mauna Loa. The American Board have 6 stations on this island.

HAYTI: See West Indies.

HENTHADA: A large town in southern Burmah on the Irrawaddy, 120 miles from Rangoon. A station of the mission of the Am. Baptist Missionary Union in Burmah.

HERVEY ISLANDS: A group of islands in the Southern Pacific, situated between lat. 19° and 21° S., and long. 156° and 161° West. It embraces Mangaia, Atiu, Aitutaki, Mauke, Mitiaro, and Hervey's Island. Population, 7,000.

HIERARCHY: An ecclesiastical system, comprehending different orders of clergy.

HILO: A district on the western coast of the island of Hawaii, forming, in connection with Puna, the parish of Rev. Mr. Coan, formerly a missionary of the American Board, now pastor of the native church, from whom he receives his support.

HINDOSTAN: Boundaries and Surface.—The name Hindustan, was given to the southern portion of India by the Persians, and signifies, literally, "negro" and "negroland." But as now used, to designate the entire country south of the Himalaya mountains, the term is of European origin. The vast triangular country, called Hindostan, lies between the 8th and 35th degrees of north latitude. It is bounded on the north by the Himalaya mountains, the highest in the world, on the N. E. and N. W., by the rivers Brahmaputra and the Indus, and on every other side by the ocean. It comprises an area of over 1,200,000 square miles, or about one-third part of the estimated area of Europe. The proportion of solid land is even greater than this, on account of the absence of inland waters. The surface of the country is of a very marked character. In the northern portion are three great ranges of mountains, rising, one higher than the other, as we proceed northward, with elevated valleys between. These valleys, themselves, are from 2,000 to 4,000 feet above the level of the sea. The east and west Ghauts are also noted ranges, some of their granite peaks rising to the height of 8,000 feet. The great coal field, which is a distinguishing feature of this country, is 65 miles in length and 12 in breadth, running on both sides of the river Damoda. Three pits only have been sunk to the depth of 90 feet. The coal is largely consumed in Calcutta for forges and steam navigation. The geology of Hindostan is very simple, compared with that of European countries, consisting of only four classes of rocks, viz.: the granite, the sand-stone and clay slate, the trap, and the alluvial.

Rivers and Lakes.—The rivers of this country have their sources either in the Himalaya mountains, or within the great central table-land. The principal of these are the Brahmaputra and the Ganges. The first of these, from its source to the Bay of Bengal, is about 350 miles. Having a rapid current, and passing generally through a wild and inhospitable country, it is of but little use for purposes of navigation. The Ganges has its source in about 20 degrees N. lat., and runs 1,350 miles, emptying into the Bay of Bengal, a few miles from the Brahmaputra.

The Ganges has several important branches, as the Soane, the Hoogly, the Jumna, &c. Hindostan contains no lakes of importance, either of salt or fresh water, at least none that can be compared with those of N. America, or even of Switzerland or Scotland.

Coast and Climate.—The coast of Hindostan is very little broken by inlets of the sea. The only gulfs of importance are those of Cutch and Cambay. The only good harbor is that of Bombay. The climate of the country is greatly diversified, owing in part to its alternation of lofty mountain ranges and deep valleys; partly, also, to the monsoons, which, as a general rule, blow from the N. E. during the serene temperate months of winter, and from the S. W. during the tempestuous and hot or rainy months of summer. The year has been generally divided into three well-defined seasons, viz., the hot, the wet, and the cold. The mean temperature of Bombay is 82° Fah. At Madras the mean temperature is 84° , and at Dawar, on the table-land, it is 75° . At Calcutta it is 79° . In May, the hottest month, the thermometer rises at Calcutta, to 100° , and in winter it falls nearly to the freezing point.

Native Population.—The number of aboriginal races in Hindostan, differing in language, manners, &c., is very great. Of these races, eight have been considered as distinguished from the rest by a degree of superiority in civilization, the arts, language, literature, and the richer and more extensive territories which they occupy. These are the Bengalee, Oriya, Mahratta, Gujratee, Telinga, Tamil, Karnata, and Hindi, or Hindostanee. The Bengalee nation occupies above 80,000 square miles of fertile land, chiefly within the delta of the Ganges, and comprises a population of nearly 25,000,000. The Tamil nation occupies 56,000 square miles, at the southern extremity of the peninsula, with a population of nearly 7,000,000. The Telinga people occupy 100,000 square miles of the N. E. portion of the peninsula, and number probably 7,000,000 or 8,000,000. The Oriya nation, covering 17,000 square miles of the low land which connects the delta of the Ganges with the south peninsula, numbers about 4,000,000. The Mahratta nation extends over nearly 200,000 square miles, between the 22d and 23d degrees of N. lat., and its population is estimated at about 12,000,000 of people. The Karnata, or Canara nation, numbers about 5,000,000, and are found upon the extensive table-land south of the 18th deg., N. lat. The people speaking the Hindostanee language, occupy the upper portion of the valley of the Ganges, and number about 20,000,000. The most enterprising of these nations, it is to be observed, have occasionally passed either as conquerors or colonists, into the territories of each other, or of their neighbors. Thus we find colonies of the Tamils settled in the Malayalim, of Telingas in Karnata and the Tamil country, of Mahrattas in the Telinga, Tamil, and Karnata countries, &c. These colonies not unfrequently preserve their national language, their original manners, and their purity of descent, in their adopted countries. The barbarous and savage tribes of India are to be found in the recesses of mountains, never in the fertile plains or extensive table-lands. These barbarous tribes are considered aboriginal, in common with others of the plains, and their savage character is ascribed to their unfavorable situation, and the hostility of the powerful occupants of the lower and more fertile regions.

Foreign Settlers.—Besides the original and peculiar inhabitants of Hindostan, a crowd of foreign colonists or settlers of different nations, form a considerable portion of the present population of the country. They are confined to particular spots, or scattered indiscriminately over the country, according to the place of their arrival, or other causes. These several classes of foreign population, following the order of their supposed arrival, are as follows, viz.: Jews, Syrian Christians, Arabs, Armenians, Parsees, Persians, Afghans, Tartars, Turks, Abyssinians, Portuguese, English, Dutch, French, Danes, and Chinese.

Religions.—The principal religion of the 160,000,000 of Hindostan—about one-half the population of Europe—is Brahminism, (which see.) The other forms of religion are the Jain, Buddhist, Seik, Mohammedan, and Christian. The first of these forms of religion prevails chiefly in the great provinces of Gujrat and Talawa, on the western shore of India, but more or less of it is found scattered throughout the country. The Buddhist religion is supposed to have originated in Bahar, within the great plain of the Ganges; but though so prevalent in Ceylon, and in countries to the E. and N., it is nearly extinct in Hindostan. The Seik form of religion was originated by Nanak, in 1419, and is confined to the N. W. part of Hindostan. The Mohammedan religion appeared in India about the beginning of the 11th century, and its adherents are supposed, for all India, to amount to about one-seventh of the entire population. The Christians abound most in the southern portion of the country. The greater number are Nestorians, who are supposed to have embraced Christianity through the labors of Greek missionaries from Syria, as early as the 2d and 3d centuries. Most of the remainder are Catholics, the descendants of the Portuguese and persons converted by Portuguese missionaries.

Languages.—There are more than fifty native languages spoken throughout Hindostan. Some Hindoos of the northern portion of the country are acquainted with three dead languages, viz.: the Sanscrit, the Saraswatty or Pracrit, and the Pali. Of these three, the Sanscrit contains internal evidence of being the oldest. It was the language of a people who, according to a very probable Hindoo tradition, occupied the Jumna, a little to the N. W. of Delhi, and with it probably originated the Brahminical religion, and the first dawn of Hindoo civilization. The Pracrit was the language that succeeded it in the same country, and it seems to bear the same sort of relation to it that the Italian does to the Latin. The Pali is a language that sprung up in the province of Bahar. Of this also, the Sanscrit forms the ground-work. With the people speaking the Pali language sprung up the religion of Budha; and the Pali is to this day the sacred language of all the Asiatic nations who have Buddhism for their national worship. The existence of these three languages, that have necessarily ceased to be spoken, affords evidence of the great antiquity of Hindoo civilization. One or other of the languages in question, is more or less mixed up, not only with every language of Hindostan, but also with the languages of most of the neighboring countries. To the north they form the ground-work of these languages, as Latin does of Italian; to the south they are engrafted on the language somewhat as the French is on our Saxon tongue. The literary Hindoos reckon that there are ten cultivated languages, having a written character and a literature. The enumeration of these languages, however, is not very distinct as applicable to the present times. The Hindee is the most cultivated and generally spoken of all the native languages of Hindostan. Besides the local language of each district, the Hindee is commonly spoken by all persons of education, throughout all parts of India. Of the dead languages the Sanscrit is as much studied in India as the Latin is in Europe. Then there are eight languages spoken by a very numerous population, twenty spoken by a people less numerous but still civilized, and at least thirty spoken by rude tribes; making in all fifty-eight living languages. This may be taken as conclusive evidence that all India was never subject to one government, and never thoroughly united in large masses. To the native languages above enumerated, must be added the Persian, as much used as Latin is in Europe; the Arabic, often studied from religious motives; the Portuguese, a good deal spoken in some parts of the maritime coast; and the English, which is making considerable progress.

Literature.—The largest portion of Hindoo literature is contained in the dead Sanscrit, that which is found in the living languages being little else than translations, or paraphrases from it. To Hindoo literature in any language, prose composition is hardly known. Every thing is in verse, even works on astronomy, medicine, and grammar. These facts are evidence of great antiquity and rudeness, and they also show that for 2,000 or 3,000 years at least, native literature has made little progress. The two most celebrated works of Hindoo literature are the Mahabarat and the Ramayana; the one giving an account of the wars of Bharat, and the other, the adventures of Rama, king of Ayndhya, a supposed incarnation of Vishnu, the "Preserver of the Hindoo Triad." These fictions are considered not only extravagant and contradictory to all the physical laws of the globe, but prolix, trifling and childish to the last degree.

Science.—Hindoo science is confined chiefly to arithmetic, algebra, geometry, and astronomy. They are allowed to be the inventors of the system of notation, which the Arabs borrowed from them and we from the Arabs. In the science of geography, medicine, botany, &c., the Hindoos are extremely ignorant. In grammar they have made large pretensions, and they have constructed a very valuable grammar of the Tamil, and the Sanscrit has been thoroughly subjected to rules. In astronomy the Hindoos pride themselves, but in this they can lay no claim to originality; neither have they ever applied it to any practical purposes, except in a very imperfect manner, to reckoning time.

Arts and Agriculture.—The arts in which the Hindoos have made the greatest progress are agriculture, weaving, dyeing, and architecture. Their agricultural implements are simple and rude, and their mode of using them equally so. Their greatest skill in agriculture has been displayed in works of irrigation, consisting of embankments, reservoirs or tanks, and wells. The reservoirs are often of vast extent, and capable of converting 4,000 or 5,000 acres of dreary, sandy desert, into productive corn-fields. Their wells are often sunk to the depth of 300 feet. The articles cultivated by the Hindoos from very early times are wheat, barley, rice, millet, pulse, sugar-cane, mustard—the cocoa, areca, and other palms—cardamoms, black-pepper, cotton, the mulberry, indigo, madder, and the banana—also many other productions common to the climate. The ox, horse, hog, buffalo, elephant, dog, sheep, and goat, have been domesticated and used by the Hindoos from the earliest antiquity. The common poultry is of equal antiquity among them.

In the art of weaving the Hindoos were skilled at a very early period, particularly in the weaving of cotton, silk, and the hair of the Thibetian goat. The cotton plant is grown almost every where in Hindostan. Their silk weaving has never equaled that of China, the raw material being inferior.

The Cashmerians, the manufacturers of the well known shawls which bear their name, are descended from the genuine Hindoos, who were the nearest neighbors to the rude tribes to whom the shawl goat belonged. The invention of the shawl manufacture may therefore be fairly ascribed to the Hindoos. Their architecture is of the simplest kind, except that which is dedicated to religion. Their temples, however, are alike distinguished for their magnitude and durability, and for their grandeur and beauty. The Mohammedans introduced a much higher order of architecture, in the construction of their mosques and mausoleums. In useful architecture, such as dwelling houses, bridges, roads, &c., the Hindoos have made very little progress.

Physical and Intellectual Character.—In respect to race, the Hindoos have been regarded by naturalists as belonging to what they call the Caucasian or European; but this is proved by the best modern writers to be untrue. The European is white, the Hindoo black, or nearly so. The European has an endless variety in the color of the hair and of the eye, while with the Hindoo the hair is always black, and the eye a dark brown. In physical force, the Hindoo is below not only the European, but even the Arab, the Persian, and the Chinese. The intellectual character of the Hindoos corresponds to their physical. They have subtlety, but not much originality or practical good sense. In vigor and manliness of mind they are below the Arabs and Persians. In moral character the Hindoos rank extremely low. Candor, integrity, and ingenuousness of mind, cannot be said to exist among them. Judicial perjury is said to be practiced in Hindostan on a wider scale than in any other country. The Hindoos are generally credited with frugality, patience, docility, and even industry; but their frugality is akin to avarice, and their docility to passiveness. They about as readily submit to wrong and oppression, as make an effort to improve their condition.

British Rule.—The great body of the Hindoos had, for six centuries before the commencement of the British government, been under the dominion of foreigners, and of foreigners more energetic than themselves, if not more civilized. Their conquerors were Asiatics, with complexion, manners, customs, &c., approaching to the natives, with whom they to a considerable extent associated. Even in matters of religion, where the difference was widest, a good degree of toleration was allowed, and the Hindoo converts to Mohammedanism were admissible to the highest offices of state. So that, on the whole, the Hindoos were rather gainers by their subjection to a foreign dominion.

British rule may be considered as having been practically established in India for a period of about 90 years. This government, in its practical operation, may be regarded as an enlightened despotism; a good deal controlled by the public opinion of Englishmen on the spot, and to a much smaller extent by Parliament and public opinion in England. The British Government in India has been divided into three periods, the last of which commenced in 1814, and comes down to the present time. The influx of Europeans into India since 1814, has resulted in something like a public and independent opinion at the principal seats of commerce, which serves to modify the despotic character of the government. The press of India, which was formerly under a rigorous censorship, is now thrown open, and employs itself in redressing public and private wrongs. The government which England administers in India is in many respects oppressive, and liable to great abuses. An English writer says, "It is not a national government, nor is it as yet a government carried on by conquerors who have made the slightest progress towards naturalization or amalgamation with the party governed. We are aliens in blood, in manners, in language, and in religion, carrying on the administration of 80,000,000 of people, and exercising a control over 50,000,000 more, at a distance of 12,000 miles. The local government is purely vicarial, and the essential administration rests with men residing at a vast distance, who never saw the country, and who have no actual knowledge of its manners and institutions. These men themselves are perpetually changing, and look upon Indian affairs as matters of very secondary importance to domestic and European politics. The local governments, instead of being responsible to the parties whose administration they conduct, are only amenable for their acts to their political friends in Europe, while the affairs of India are too complex, too extensive, and too remote, to be understood by, or for the most part, to excite any interest in, the people and Parliament of England. In India, generally, the acts of the local government are secretly prepared without consulting or attempting to conciliate the parties for whom the laws are made."

However true and just these statements may be, there is another side to the picture, which it is more pleasing to contemplate. With evident candor and fairness, the Committee of the American Board, in their report for 1846, say:

"It is a deeply interesting fact that the British government in India is almost every year assuming a more Christian character, and adopting a more humane and liberal policy. The declaration of the government now is, that it is not pledged to the support or countenance of Hindooism, that the principle which guides it is, that all religions professed by its subjects shall be equally tolerated and protected; and that, contrary to what has till recently been the law of the land, the Hindoo may embrace Christianity and break caste without the forfeiture of property, or any other of his civil rights and immunities. On this principle the government is going steadily forward, suppressing those disgusting and inhuman rites connected with Hindooism which war upon society, correcting the abuses which have grown up under the unnatural state of things which has long prevailed in India, encouraging education, the arts and usages of more enlightened nations, and giving Christian truth free scope to exert its purifying and elevating power over the public mind. In this manner God is breaking down barriers and opening the way for the spread of the Gospel in India."

This view of the nature and influence of British rule in India, corresponds with the still more recent statements of the missionaries, and will be regarded as more than sufficient to counterbalance the temporal and incidental evils resulting from the administration of the government.

MISSIONS

AMERICAN BOARD.—The missions of the American Board in Hindostan, or India, have been of long standing, and have been eminently successful. They now occupy Bombay, Ahmednuggur, Satara, Kolapur, Madura, Arcot, and Madras. Of the work accomplished at each of these places only a comprehensive view can be given, and this will be best done by noticing each field separately, as far as practicable.

Bombay.—The first missionaries of the Board to India arrived at Calcutta in June 1812, and were followed by others in August. These brethren all received their instructions from the Board at Salem, Feb. 7, 1812, and as this was the first foreign missionary enterprise of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and these its first missionaries, their names may properly be given. They were, Rev. Messrs. Adoniram Judson, Samuel Nott, Samuel Newell, Gordon Hall, and Luther Rice. On reaching Calcutta, they found the country so embroiled in war, that to enter upon a mission there was impossible, and after a little delay, Messrs. Hall and Nott proceeded to Bombay. (For a description of the place, see article, Bombay.) Mr. Judson and Mr. Rice, soon after reaching Calcutta, changed their sentiments and joined the Baptist mission. Mr. Newell spent some time in visiting the Isle of France and Ceylon, before going to Bombay. It was left to Messrs. Hall & Nott, therefore, to commence the first mission of the Board in India. At first they were embarrassed by the opposition of the government, and it was not till early in the year 1814 that the missionaries "were fairly settled in their work." Never did men show a more earnest, self-sacrificing devotion to their Master. In a letter dated September, 1815, the missionaries say: "We have made so much proficiency in the Mahratta language as to be able to enter upon the great work of preaching the Gospel to the heathen. We have also commenced the work of translating the Scriptures into the Mahratta language." Two months later they say: "We have translated a Harmony of the Gospels and several tracts, copies of which are now in circulation among the heathen." In November, 1816, Mr. Bardwell and his wife reached Bombay, and joined the mission. In March of this year, the first printing-press at Bombay went into operation, and 1,500 copies of a Scripture tract of eight pages were issued. During this year also, the establishment and care of schools was entered upon. Thus, in three years from the time of entering this field, these devoted servants of Christ were preaching the Gospel to the benighted Hindoos in their native tongue, circulating, from their own press, translations of the Scriptures and of tracts, and gathering heathen children and youth into the mission schools. In 1818 they had eleven schools, and six hundred boys under instruction. In view of so important a fact the missionaries say: "In these schools we seem to see a thousand Hindoo hands at work, from year to year, in undermining the fabric of Hindoo idolatry."

In 1818 the mission reported three stations,—one the seat of the mission, in the "great native town of Bombay;" one at Mahim, about six miles north, with a population of about twenty thousand; and a third at Tannah, the chief town of Salsette, distant from Bombay about twenty-five miles, and separated only by a narrow strait from a dense and wide spread population on the continent. Messrs. Nichols and Graves occupied the out-stations. During this year, Caranja, an island near Bombay, containing 10,000 inhabitants, was explored; and also Choule, a place upon the coast thirty miles south of Bombay. Places still farther distant were also visited, and their population and condition ascertained. The schools had now increased to twenty-five, with 1200 heathen children and a hundred Jewish, and as many more of occasional attendants; and meanwhile the mission press was constantly turning off portions of Scripture, tracts, and elementary school books. Thus rapidly did the field whiten under their labors.

In November, 1821, Mr. Bardwell arrived at Boston with his wife and child, he having been compelled to leave the mission on account of declining health. Four months after the departure of Mr. Bardwell, the mission sustained another severe loss in the death of Mr. Newell, who, as has been stated, was one of the four young men who first offered themselves to the Board as missionaries to any part of the heathen world. He fell a victim to cholera morbus. In 1822 a mission chapel was erected at Bombay, at an expense of about $4,500, $1,700 of which was subscribed in Bombay and Calcutta, and the rest in this country. The dedication of this first Christian temple on the western side of the Indian peninsula, took place on the 12th of May, 1823, and was a memorable event. The dedication services, with the exception of one English hymn, were all in the Mahratta language. In the following June the observance of the monthly concert was commenced in this chapel.

Near the close of 1822, the missionaries sent out two Jewish schoolmasters, with 6,000 copies of extracts from the Scriptures, and numerous tracts, in the Mahratta language, for distribution among the people. They had scattered about 2,000 copies, when they were arrested by the local authorities and sent back with their books to Bombay, the Governor in Council saying that books exposing the corruptions of heathenism would endanger the public tranquillity. In 1824 the mission was strengthened by the arrival of Mr. Frost and Mrs. Graves; but it was visited with sore bereavement soon after, in the death of Mr. Nichols of the Tannah station, who had been seven years among the heathen, most of the time preaching to them in their native language.

In 1825 a society was formed at Bombay, under the auspices of the English Governor, called the Bombay Native School Book and School Society, designed to promote the education of Hindoo children. At this period the missionaries were able to report very gratifying progress in the education of heathen girls, in spite of the strong native prejudices, 75 being under instruction. The whole number of children in the schools was 1,750, 133 of them of Jewish parentage.

On the 20th of March, 1826, the mission suffered a severe loss in the death of Mr. Hall, one of the two by whom the mission of the Board at Bombay was established. He was seized with the cholera, while on a preaching tour on the Continent, and died in eight or nine hours. One of his last efforts was, an appeal to American Christians in behalf of the 12,000,000 of people who speak the Mahratta language, and on whom the Bombay mission might be brought to bear. Just before the death of Mr. Hall, an important event occurred, viz.: the formation of the "Bombay Missionary Union," an association of missionaries of the London, the Church, and the Scottish Missionary Societies, which had stations in various parts of India, and those of the American Board. The members of these missions all united on the basis of the distinguishing doctrines of the Reformation, and for their common benefit. It presented a pleasing instance of mutual charity and affection, among those who were striving alike for the evangelization of the heathen. Soon after the death of Mr. Hall, the stations at Makim and Tannah were given up, and in 1826 Mr. Graves was the only missionary of the Board at Bombay.

In 1827, Rev. Messrs. Cyrus Stone and D. O. Allen joined the mission, having embarked at Boston in June of that year. During this year the Missionary Union, just named, formed a "General Tract Society," to aid Christians of all denominations in their efforts to benefit the people of the East. In their report for 1828, the missionaries state that there were at that time about 18,000 Catholics in Bombay, most of them of Hindoo origin, whose ancestors were converted to the Romish Church some two centuries before, when Bombay was a Portuguese colony. The Catholics, however, were found to be in the same state of superstition and idolatry as the other natives, and just as much in need of the Gospel.

In 1830 three more missionaries arrived at Bombay, viz.: Rev. Messrs. Ramsey, Hervey and Reed. In July, 1831, Mr. Garrett, for ten years the faithful printer to the mission, died, and soon after Mrs. Allen and Mrs. Hervey were called from their earthly labors. During this year the mission received $5,600 from the American Bible and Tract Societies, for the publication of the Scriptures and of tracts, and a legacy of $3,000 from an inhabitant of Bombay, deceased, for the support of public worship in the Mission Chapel. Several Hindoo converts were received to the Mission Church this year, and the Christian marriage of a Brahmin was celebrated.

In 1832, twenty years after the commencement of the Bombay mission, there were twelve schools exclusively for females, containing 320 pupils; and eighteen other schools, containing 63 girls and 1,322 boys, making a total of 30 schools, and 1,705 scholars. Such an advance, especially in female education, must be considered quite wonderful, in view of the total darkness which rested upon the native mind when the work commenced. "There is no doubt," say the Missionaries at this period, "but Hindoo girls are capable of a high degree of improvement in all the departments of knowledge which are appropriate to their station in life."

During these 20 years, the amount of Mahratta printing had been 13,000,000 of pages, including a Mahratta version of the New Testament; five natives had been received to the Mission Church; and the Gospel had been preached to many thousands in the streets and market places of Bombay and on the continent. A native temperance society was also formed in 1832, on the principle of total abstinence from the use of ardent spirits, opium, tobacco, and other intoxicating drugs.

Ahmednuggur was first occupied as a station in December, 1831. It is on the Continent, 175 miles north-east from Bombay; and Messrs. Read and Boggs were the first missionaries to this field. In describing the place, they say: "There are at least fifty villages within twenty miles of Ahmednuggur. Short tours have been made through most of these villages, and some thousands of religious books and tracts have been distributed. The Hindoos have received them with avidity." A number of English gentlemen residing at Ahmednuggur opened an asylum in 1832 for the infirm poor, and placed it under the superintendence of Mr. Read. It was recorded as an encouraging fact, that within one year, and on the very day appointed by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church and other religious bodies in America, for prayer for the conversion of the world, a spirit of inquiry was awakened in this asylum, and nearly half of the inmates, who numbered about forty in all, were led to ask, "What shall we do to be saved?"

A Presbyterian Church was organized at Ahmednuggur on the 4th of March, 1832 consisting of fourteen members, ten of whom were Hindoos. Babajee, the Brahminic convert from the Church of Bombay, was ordained elder, and Dajeeba, also from the Bombay church, deacon. The members of the church soon formed themselves into a society for promoting temperance and Christian morals in general, and 24 rules were drawn up by Babajee himself. Considering their source, and how lately their author was a blind and degraded Brahmin, they form a document of very great interest. (See Annual Report of the Board for 1833).

In January, 1833, 20 natives requested baptism, one of whom was the aged mother of Dajeeba, who was strongly opposed to Christianity for some time after the conversion of her son, but who finally yielded and gave up her last idol to the missionary.

Babajee died of cholera, in April, 1833. His death was felt to be a very great loss to the mission and to the cause of Christianity, in India. Although he had become an outcast by renouncing Hindooism, he was much respected by all classes. His memoir, in two volumes, written by one of the missionaries, may be found in the Library of the American Board. The mission at Bombay was also afflicted by the death of Mrs. Stone, in August, 1833, after an illness of twelve days. About this time it was remarked by the Board, that of the nine adults, missionaries and assistant missionaries, from this country, who had died in India, only two had died of the peculiar diseases of the climate. A reinforcement of five missionaries and assistants reached Bombay in September, 1834. A charity school for native orphan girls was opened at Bombay this year, thus affording another illustration of the spirit and influence of Christianity in its relation to the woes even of this life.

Itinerating was found to be not only one of the most important means of access to the heathen, but favorable also to the health of the missionaries. They therefore pursued it very extensively. Mr. Read alone traveled not less than 1,100 miles in his excursions into the country around Ahmednuggur, between October, 1833, and August, 1834. It is remarked also that he traveled without arms or a guard, the mode of traveling best becoming missionaries of the Gospel of peace, and that he never met with either insult or harm. After all, but a small proportion of the population could be reached, even by the tracts and portions of Scripture that were scattered by tens of thousands; for the missionaries had before them the appalling and affecting fact that they were almost the only laborers in a field 800 by 1,000 miles in extent, containing not less than 2,000 towns and villages, and a population of 40,000,000.

Malcolm Peth, on the Mahaburlishwur Hills, was occupied as a temporary health station in 1835. In 1836, Alibag was also made a centre of operations. It is in the Concan, the maritime portion of the Mahratta country, and mission schools had for some time been supported there. About the same time a missionary was placed at Jalna, in the dominions of the Nizam, or native Prince, 120 miles north-west of Ahmednuggur.

Rev. Messrs. Ebenezer Burgess, Ozro French, and R. W. Hume, with their wives, and Miss Cynthia Farrar, sailed for Bombay in April, 1838, and arrived there in the following August. In 1839 a boarding school had been established at Jalna, containing 19 boys; and one at Malcolm Peth for girls, containing 30 pupils.

The year 1839 was one of extraordinary interest to the Bombay mission, not so much on account of any remarkable progress made, as for the opposition awakened in the minds of the natives. The immediate occasion of the opposition was, the public profession of Christianity made by two Parsee young men named Narayan and Harripunt. They were baptized by Dr. Wilson, of the Church of Scotland's mission at Bombay, and were supposed to be the first proselytes from the religion of Zoroaster in modern times. Their Parsee friends became much enraged, and would have laid violent hands on them, but they had taken refuge with the missionaries. A legal process was instituted against the missionaries, but in vain. They then attempted to break up the schools by threats against the parents, and succeeded to some extent. They published a tract in defence of Hindooism, petitioned the Government for protection against the influence of the missionaries, &c., but all with very little effect, except to show that the progress of the Gospel had begun to be such as to disturb the native conscience, and awaken their fears for the safety of their ancient system of idolatry. One year later the missionaries say, "The events of the last year have done much, we think, to spread the knowledge of the Gospel in Ahmednuggur and the villages around. People now understand that there is something in the Christian religion which is powerful to the conversion of men, and they are afraid to come into contact with it. Formerly very few in this place knew the object for which we came here. Now the great mass know that it is our aim to lead men from the worship of idols to the worship of the one living and true God, and to a belief in his Son Jesus Christ. Formerly the people here were not afraid to enter into argument with us, thinking that their religion rested on a sure foundation; now they are unwilling to argue when the subject is proposed." Narayan and Harripunt now appeared among the people with entire safety, the natives simply telling them it was wrong for any one to forsake his religion. At this period the Prudential Committee of the Board in their annual report say, "Those who have attended to the history of this first mission of the Board,—this earliest of the foreign missions of the American churches, from the beginning, must perceive that the Mahrattas, as a people, stand related to the Christian religion very differently from what they did in 1814. Much unavoidable, preliminary ground has been gone over, and the truth is nearer the great mass of the native intellect and heart."

In 1841, the Bombay and Ahmednuggur stations, comprising what was called the mission to the Mahrattas, were divided into two, to be known henceforth as the Bombay and Ahmednuggur missions. These places were so far apart that it became inconvenient and expensive for the missionaries to meet for business, and hence the division. The two missions date their separate existence from the 1st of January, 1842, and from this period will receive a separate notice. The station at Malcolm Peth belonged to Bombay. Mr. Graves, of this station, died in December, 1843. He embarked on his mission in 1817, and had been 25 years in the service of the Board.

The opposition to Christianity took quite a new turn at Bombay in 1843, when the more wealthy Hindoos commenced printing by subscription, a series of their most popular religious books in monthly numbers. None of these books had ever before been printed, and the manuscripts were scarce and costly, but in the printed form they were afforded at little cost. A Hindoo at Bombay expended nearly $1,800 in printing and circulating one of the sacred books of his religion. Thus, a new and extraordinary effort to sustain idolatry, showed that the presence and power of Christianity were beginning to be felt. This was still further manifested a year later, when the periodical press was for the first time brought to the aid of the tottering system of Hindooism. Three weekly newspapers and one monthly magazine, all in the Mahratta language, and bitterly opposed to Christianity, were published at Bombay. A paper was also issued at Poona, a little to the south-east of Bombay, and a monthly journal and three weeklies in the Goozerattee language, spoken by seven or eight millions in the region north of Bombay, besides two papers printed in the Persian language. The Goozerattee papers especially attempted to refute Christianity by quotations from the writings of Paine, Voltaire, and other infidels. Thus ten newspapers and magazines in and around Bombay, armed not only with all that heathen learning could furnish, but with the most approved weapons of infidelity, were brought to bear against the religion taught by the missionaries, and of course the tendency was most injurious. But meanwhile the mission press at Bombay was never more efficient. It had the means of issuing periodicals, tracts, and portions of Scripture, in English, Sanscrit, Mahratta, Goozerattee, Hindostanee, Persian, Arabic, &c., and thus the issues of the idolatrous and infidel presses were met face to face, and their influence in great measure counteracted. It was with great joy and thankfulness that the missionaries at Bombay were able to say, in 1845, "Thirty-three years ago the doctrine of Christ crucified was unknown to the people of the Mahratta country. No portion of the Sacred Scriptures had been given to them in their own language. Not a single tract from which they could learn the way of salvation, was in existence. Unbroken unmixed darkness covered the land. Now the sound of the Gospel has gone out into all the land. The people of the most distant villages have heard, at least, that "there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we can be saved, but the name of Jesus."

The year 1847 was marked by an event of great importance, viz : the translation of the entire Scriptures into the Mahratta language, thus rendering the whole volume of inspiration accessible to a numerous people in western India. In noticing this fact, the Prudential Committee say, "It may be stated as a fact of some interest to the friends of missions in this country, that all the Scriptures which have been printed in Mahratta, except one of the Gospels, have issued from the mission press." For a history of this great work they refer to the following statement, by one of the missionaries, Mr. Allen :

"The Gospel of Matthew was printed in 1817. The translation of the New Testament was not completed and printed till 1826 ; though, meanwhile, some of the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles had been printed several times. In 1830 a second and revised edition of the New Testament was printed. The original translation and the revised edition were both made by our mission. Since then all the New Testament has been printed once, and some parts of it several times, by the Bible Society, as altered and revised by its translation committee. Of this committee I have been a member for nearly fifteen years."

Mr. Allen proceeds to explain the reasons which had delayed the translation and publication of the Old Testament till the above date, and adds that the whole Bible has been published, not only in the Mahratta, but also in the Goozerattee language, the two principal languages spoken on the western side of India.

Amid some discouragements, especially the fact that the number of converts was comparatively small, the missionaries had ground for saying, in 1848, "Truth is gradually making an impression upon the public mind, and gradually changing the views prevalent in the community. Hindooism is losing its hold upon the people, and the Hindooism of the rising generation will be a very different thing from that of their fathers. Christian ideas, and Christian doctrines, are quietly gaining an influence over the minds of many. There is a Christianizing, so to speak, of the ideas and even the language of the people."

Satara was occupied as a missionary station in 1848. It is about 170 miles south-east of Bombay, and is situated in a very populous and fertile district. The size of the place, which is about equal to Ahmednuggur, and the numerous villages around it, seemed to point it out as a very important station, as it has proved to be.

The custom recently adopted by the missionaries of selling tracts and books, instead of distributing them gratuitously, was found to work admirably, and it strikingly illustrated the increasing desire of the natives to read and learn. "The readiness to purchase Christian tracts and books," says one of the missionaries in 1849, "is without a parallel in any part of the heathen world. The fact that we have, in a single year, sold 9,000 of these publications, is full of encouragement." A further proof of the waking up of the heathen mind was found in the fact, that the paper issued from the mission press called the Dnyanadaya, was widely circulated and much read by the natives. In 1849 two prize essays on the Holee, a shameful feast observed among the Hindoos, were published in this paper, and read by great numbers of the Mahrattas, and one of them was copied into the native papers, and translated into the languages of upper India. About the same date the missionaries speak of very interesting discussions with the Parsees. The scene of debate was the sea-side, where the Parsees assembled to worship the sea or the setting sun; and the disputants were accustomed to sit down on the sand, the auditors, to the number of several hundreds, standing around. The fact that these discussions lasted sometimes till two hours after dark, and that the crowds listened with untiring interest to the end, indicated a spirit of inquiry, and a deep solicitude among the people to know the difference between heathenism and Christianity. In these debates the works of Paine, Voltaire, and other infidels, were brought forward with great skill and familiarity by the Parsees.

An event of deep interest to the missions and to the cause of Christianity in India, in 1849, was the passage of a law by the government, giving equal rights to all its subjects. Up to this time, in western and southern India, there had been no special law for the protection of converts to Christianity, who were tried by heathen laws and subjected to every indignity, with confiscation of goods. After various efforts of Christians in India, they at length succeeded in getting a repeal of the old laws, and the passage of an act protecting converts against all civil disabilities and forfeiture of rights. Thus one of the most serious obstacles in the way of the progress of Christianity in India was removed.

The influence of Christianity and its missions in the education and elevation of females, has ever been regarded as one of its most interesting features; and on this point the missionaries at Bombay are very explicit and satisfactory in their report for 1850. At first there was an extreme jealousy on this subject, but a gradual change was wrought, the wealthiest natives began to send their daughters to the mission schools, and at the above date thousands of females in various parts of India, of all castes, were acquiring the rudiments of an education. It had been proved, the missionaries say, that native females were not wanting in capacity, and the way had been prepared for the establishment of female schools by the natives themselves, and by the government. The Governor-General of India, this year, issued a very important declaration, requesting that the Council of Education would consider its functions as comprising the superintendence of native female education; and that wherever any disposition was shown by the natives to establish female schools, said Council would give them all possible encouragement.

During the years 1850 and 1851, Mr. Allen had devoted himself to the work of revising the Mahratta Scriptures. A complete translation had been made, as before noticed, but different books had been issued at different times, in differing type and style, and the effort now was to correct the translation, give uniformity to the style, and put the whole into one octavo volume. This work would not be completed, Mr. Allen thought, till the spring of 1855. While the press was thus at work, doing more, it was believed, in various ways, to make known Christ among the people than ten men could do faithfully preaching daily in the streets and bazaars of the city, the direct business of preaching was by no means neglected. At the close of 1851 there were three stated places for preaching in the city of Bombay, besides which "touring among the villages" occupied a considerable portion of each year.

Among the interesting events of 1852, was a series of public lectures in the mission chapel, followed by a free discussion, in which the natives present were allowed to make inquiries and to state objections. The discussions were in the Mahratta language, but were reported in the religious paper of the mission in both Mahratta and English, and their influence was very extensive. The Native Missionary Society also held meetings on the first Monday of each month, for the communication of intelligence, prayer, &c., and they were among the most interesting of the Mahratta meetings. About $70 was collected, and appropriated to the erection of another place of preaching in a native city. Another occurrence of special interest this year, was the publication of a work entitled "Principles of Hindooism," written by an educated Brahmin, to explain and defend his religion. He admits that the missionaries have turned the minds of many from Hindooism to Christianity, that a large portion of those educated in the schools abandon and seek to destroy their ancestral faith, that they deny the divine appointment of caste, &c., and adds: filled with dismay at finding that there is also treason within. No wonder that the venerable structure is already nodding to its fall. I, by means of this little book, seek to prop up the building; but when its size and its ruinous state are considered, what hope is there that such a feeble prop can prevent its falling?"

The year 1853 was marked by no peculiar changes in the mission, yet an event occurred that will be celebrated in the annals of Hindostan, and so nearly related to the cause of Christianity as to be entitled to a notice here. It was the opening, on the 16th of April of that year, of the first Asiatic railway connecting Bombay and Tannah, a distance of twenty-four miles. One of the missionaries, Mr. Hume, in describing this event says, "Great was the interest excited in the minds of assembled thousands, as the first train of ponderous cars, with 400 passengers, hasted away, moved by some mysterious agency. From the neighboring heights, at the various crossings, and for a considerable distance along the line of the road, multitudes gazed with astonishment and delight at this triumph of science and skill. New and more vivid impressions regarding the immense superiority of the Christian nations of the West, were unconsciously received by those living masses. Many of them must have felt, as they never felt before, that Hindooism is in conflict with the spirit of the age, and that its days must ere long be numbered."

Dating the commencement of the Bombay mission in 1812, the whole period thus briefly reviewed is forty-one years. The general view taken is sufficient to show that during this period changes of immense importance have been wrought, and an incalculable amount of good accomplished. For general remarks and statistics the reader is referred to the close of the article on missions in Hindostan. Also for a more particular account of Bombay—its various classes, religions, commercial importance, &c., see article under that head.

Ahmednuggur.—Previous to 1831, Ahmednuggur was simply a station of the Bombay mission, and was noticed in that connection. In December of that year it became a distinct mission, and from that date the present account commences. At this period there were three missionaries here, viz: Messrs. Graves, Hervey, and Read. Mr. Hervey died very suddenly, of cholera, in the following May. The mission church at Ahmednuggur was formed in March, 1833, with 14 members, and public worship and preaching were regularly maintained, with from forty to sixty hearers, though they had no chapel, and were obliged to meet in a temporary building, "a sort of shed." Preaching tours in the surrounding villages were also extensively maintained. The system of education was nearly the same as that at Bombay, and at the close of 1835 there were 9 schools and 422 scholars. The establishment of free schools in the neighboring villages, twenty or thirty miles around Ahmednuggur, was also a favorite and successful method of doing good. In 1837 a substantial house had been erected for the seminary, which contained fifty boys, all taken from respectable castes, and the same house was used also for a chapel. A boarding school for girls was also in successful operation.

Seroor, 28 miles from Ahmednuggur, was occupied as a station in 1841. At this period the missionaries, after describing a preaching excursion, say: "We hope to be able to adopt this plan more than we have done,—to occupy a village for some days, having as much intercourse with the people of the village as possible, and making excursions to the small villages in its vicinity as may be convenient." The plan thus proposed was carried out very successfully. In their labors in and around Ahmednuggur, the missionaries came much in contact with a class of Hindoos called Mahars, who, they say, "are thought to be the original inhabitants of the country." They are a low caste, and the more intelligent of them discard idolatry, and maintain the doctrine of one invisible God. They adhere but slightly to the rules of caste, are free from bigotry, manifest a desire to know the truth, and exhibit none of that wrangling and angry disputation which are so common among the Brahmins." It was among them that the missionaries, in 1842, found a remarkable spirit of inquiry into the Christian religion, and in their excursions through not less than a hundred villages, they had access to crowds of eager listeners. During this year seventeen natives were received to the Ahmednuggur church, one of whom had been a robber and murderer by profession. The number of church members was thus more than doubled. In 1843 twelve more were added, and five in the beginning of the year 1844, making the whole number of members 48.

The importance of this field, and the increasing interest felt in it, may be gathered from the fact, stated in 1844, that "within a distance of fifteen miles around Ahmednuggur there are more than one hundred villages, the population of which, including Ahmednuggur itself, amounts to more than one hundred thousand souls. The distinctions of caste are numerous, amounting to 60 in Ahmednuggur, and varying from ten to thirty in the villages." It was to such a people that the missionaries were carrying the Gospel as they went out from their respective stations. In their report for 1844 they say: "These excursions are becoming more and more interesting in consequence of the increased knowledge of Christianity which we find among the people, and of their increased acquaintance with us and our native converts, and also in consequence of the confidence which many of them have learnt to place in us, and in the doctrines which we preach." In the same report they say: "Women of all castes had the opportunity of learning the way of salvation through Jesus Christ. In some places which we visited, nearly all the women of the village came out to see us and to hear the message of mercy." This work was prosecuted during 1845 with increasing interest.

In 1846 this mission was strengthened by the arrival of two new missionaries, and the return of Mr. Burgess, whose health had been improved by a short residence in this country. At this period a new station was formed at Bhingar, a large town of 4,000 inhabitants, two miles east of Ahmednuggur. Early in this year peculiar religious interest began to be manifested in the seminary for boys, and a little band were in the habit of meeting together for prayer, and of visiting the house of their teacher for religious conversation and worship. At length one of the company, named Rama, the most advanced boy in the seminary, determined to confess Christ, and to request baptism. This he did in spite of the opposition and entreaties of his mother and brothers. At the same time another boy in the seminary, named Sudoo, professed his faith in Christ. This seminary, under the care of Mr. Burgess, was considered of very great importance to the missionary work.

Two out-stations were formed in 1845, one at Wudaley, about forty miles north of Ahmednuggur; and the other at Wadagaum, a village about 30 miles south of Ahmednuggur. At the former place the Mahars were favorable to Christianity and very desirous of a station among them, and one of them gave land for a chapel, with a written guaranty that it should remain the property of the mission. This chapel was opened in February, 1846, at which time ten adults were admitted to Christian fellowship. Others were admitted subsequently, so that the whole number of church members connected with this out-station in January, 1847, was twenty-one. Not long after eleven children were baptized, and one adult was examined for admission to the church. These fruits were the more remarkable, as this station did not enjoy the labors of a missionary, but was under the care of a native catechist, Dajeeba. An interesting account of the opposition he met with, and the numerous obstacles overcome in erecting a chapel at that station, will be found in the annual report of the Board for 1847. In the same report will be found an account of Ha-ripunt, the native catechist at Wudaley, who was forcibly ejected from a temple, in consequence of which the important decision was obtained from a magistrate, that native Christians were entitled to the same privileges at the temples and rest houses, as are conceded to Mohammedans. This decision indicated the determination of the government that no one should be deprived of his rights merely because he professed his faith in Christ.

The toilsome and ceaseless efforts of the missionaries in this field, so noticeable at every step, are indicated again by the fact, that in 1848 one of them made a preaching circuit of 122 days, traveling 912 miles and visiting 509 towns. In many places he was heard gladly, crowds, especially of the working people, flocking to his tent and listening attentively till late hours at night. Ten persons, three males and seven females, were received to the Ahmednuggur church this year. Four were also added to the church at Seroor.

In 1849 a new station was established at Newasse. In accomplishing this object great opposition and even danger were encountered, an account of which will be found in the Missionary Herald for August, 1850. The effort was successful, however, and in 1852 there was a school in Newasse of fifty scholars. In the report of the Board for 1853, the interesting fact is stated, that the number of baptized children was 159, and it is added, "The families of the church members form a most interesting field of labor, and one which promises the richest fruits. As the children of our converts grow up, they exhibit an interest in religious things which encourages us much; and the number of those of this class who have been already received into the church, or are now candidates for church membership, shows that God is faithful to his covenant, and willing to bless the instructions and prayers of parents to the conversion of their offspring, as well as our efforts in their behalf." In the same report a preaching tour of Mr. Munger is described, in which he traveled over a thousand miles in 135 days, and preached in 400 towns and villages. He found everywhere "an open door," and an increasing conviction in many minds, that they were the dupes of Brahmin cupidity and selfishness.

In the city of Ahmednuggur there was at this period, a growing disposition among an interesting and increasing class of young men, to inquire into the truth of Christianity. Some of them were teachers in government schools, and writers in the public offices. They held the absurd superstitions of Hindooism in utter contempt, but inclined to deistical opinions, and were not prepared to receive Christianity, though they approved of some of its doctrines. This class of young men had formed a society, the object of which was to discuss subjects connected with morals and religion, and in these discussions the truths of Christianity were ably maintained by two native converts, members of the mission church. (See Herald for June, 1853.)

The printing for this station is done at Bombay, and is included in the report of that mission. A condensed view of the churches and schools will be found in the table at the close of this article. From what has been presented, it is apparent that Ahmednuggur and the country around it, afford an extensive and most important field of missionary labor, and that it has been cultivated with great diligence and most encouraging success, affording reasonable ground for the hope, that still greater and more rapid changes will ere long be witnessed.

Satara.—This was a station of the Bombay mission until 1851, when, in connection with Mahabulishwar, it became a distinct mission, and was occupied by Messrs. Burgess and Wood. Schools were already established there, and also a church, with nine native members. In 1852 this mission experienced a severe bereavement, in the death of both Mrs. Wood and Mrs. Burgess.

The first native who embraced Christianity at Satara, was Krishana Row, a Brahmin, and his case excited extraordinary interest in the minds of the people. "For some days after his baptism hundreds came to see him and his wife. Some even came from distant villages to behold the great wonder of a Brahmin become a Christian." The excitement was attended with an unusual degree of calm inquiry.

Another event of interest at this time, was the discovery of a secret society among the educated Hindoos, the object of which was to make war upon some of the more flagrant absurdities of their religious system, such as the distinction of caste, and the prejudice against the remarrying of widows and female education. This society numbered nearly one hundred, and had several branches. Its members were educated in the missionary and government schools, chiefly the latter, and while many of them only sought to reform Hindooism, others exposed its utter worthlessness, and advocated the peculiar claims of Christianity.

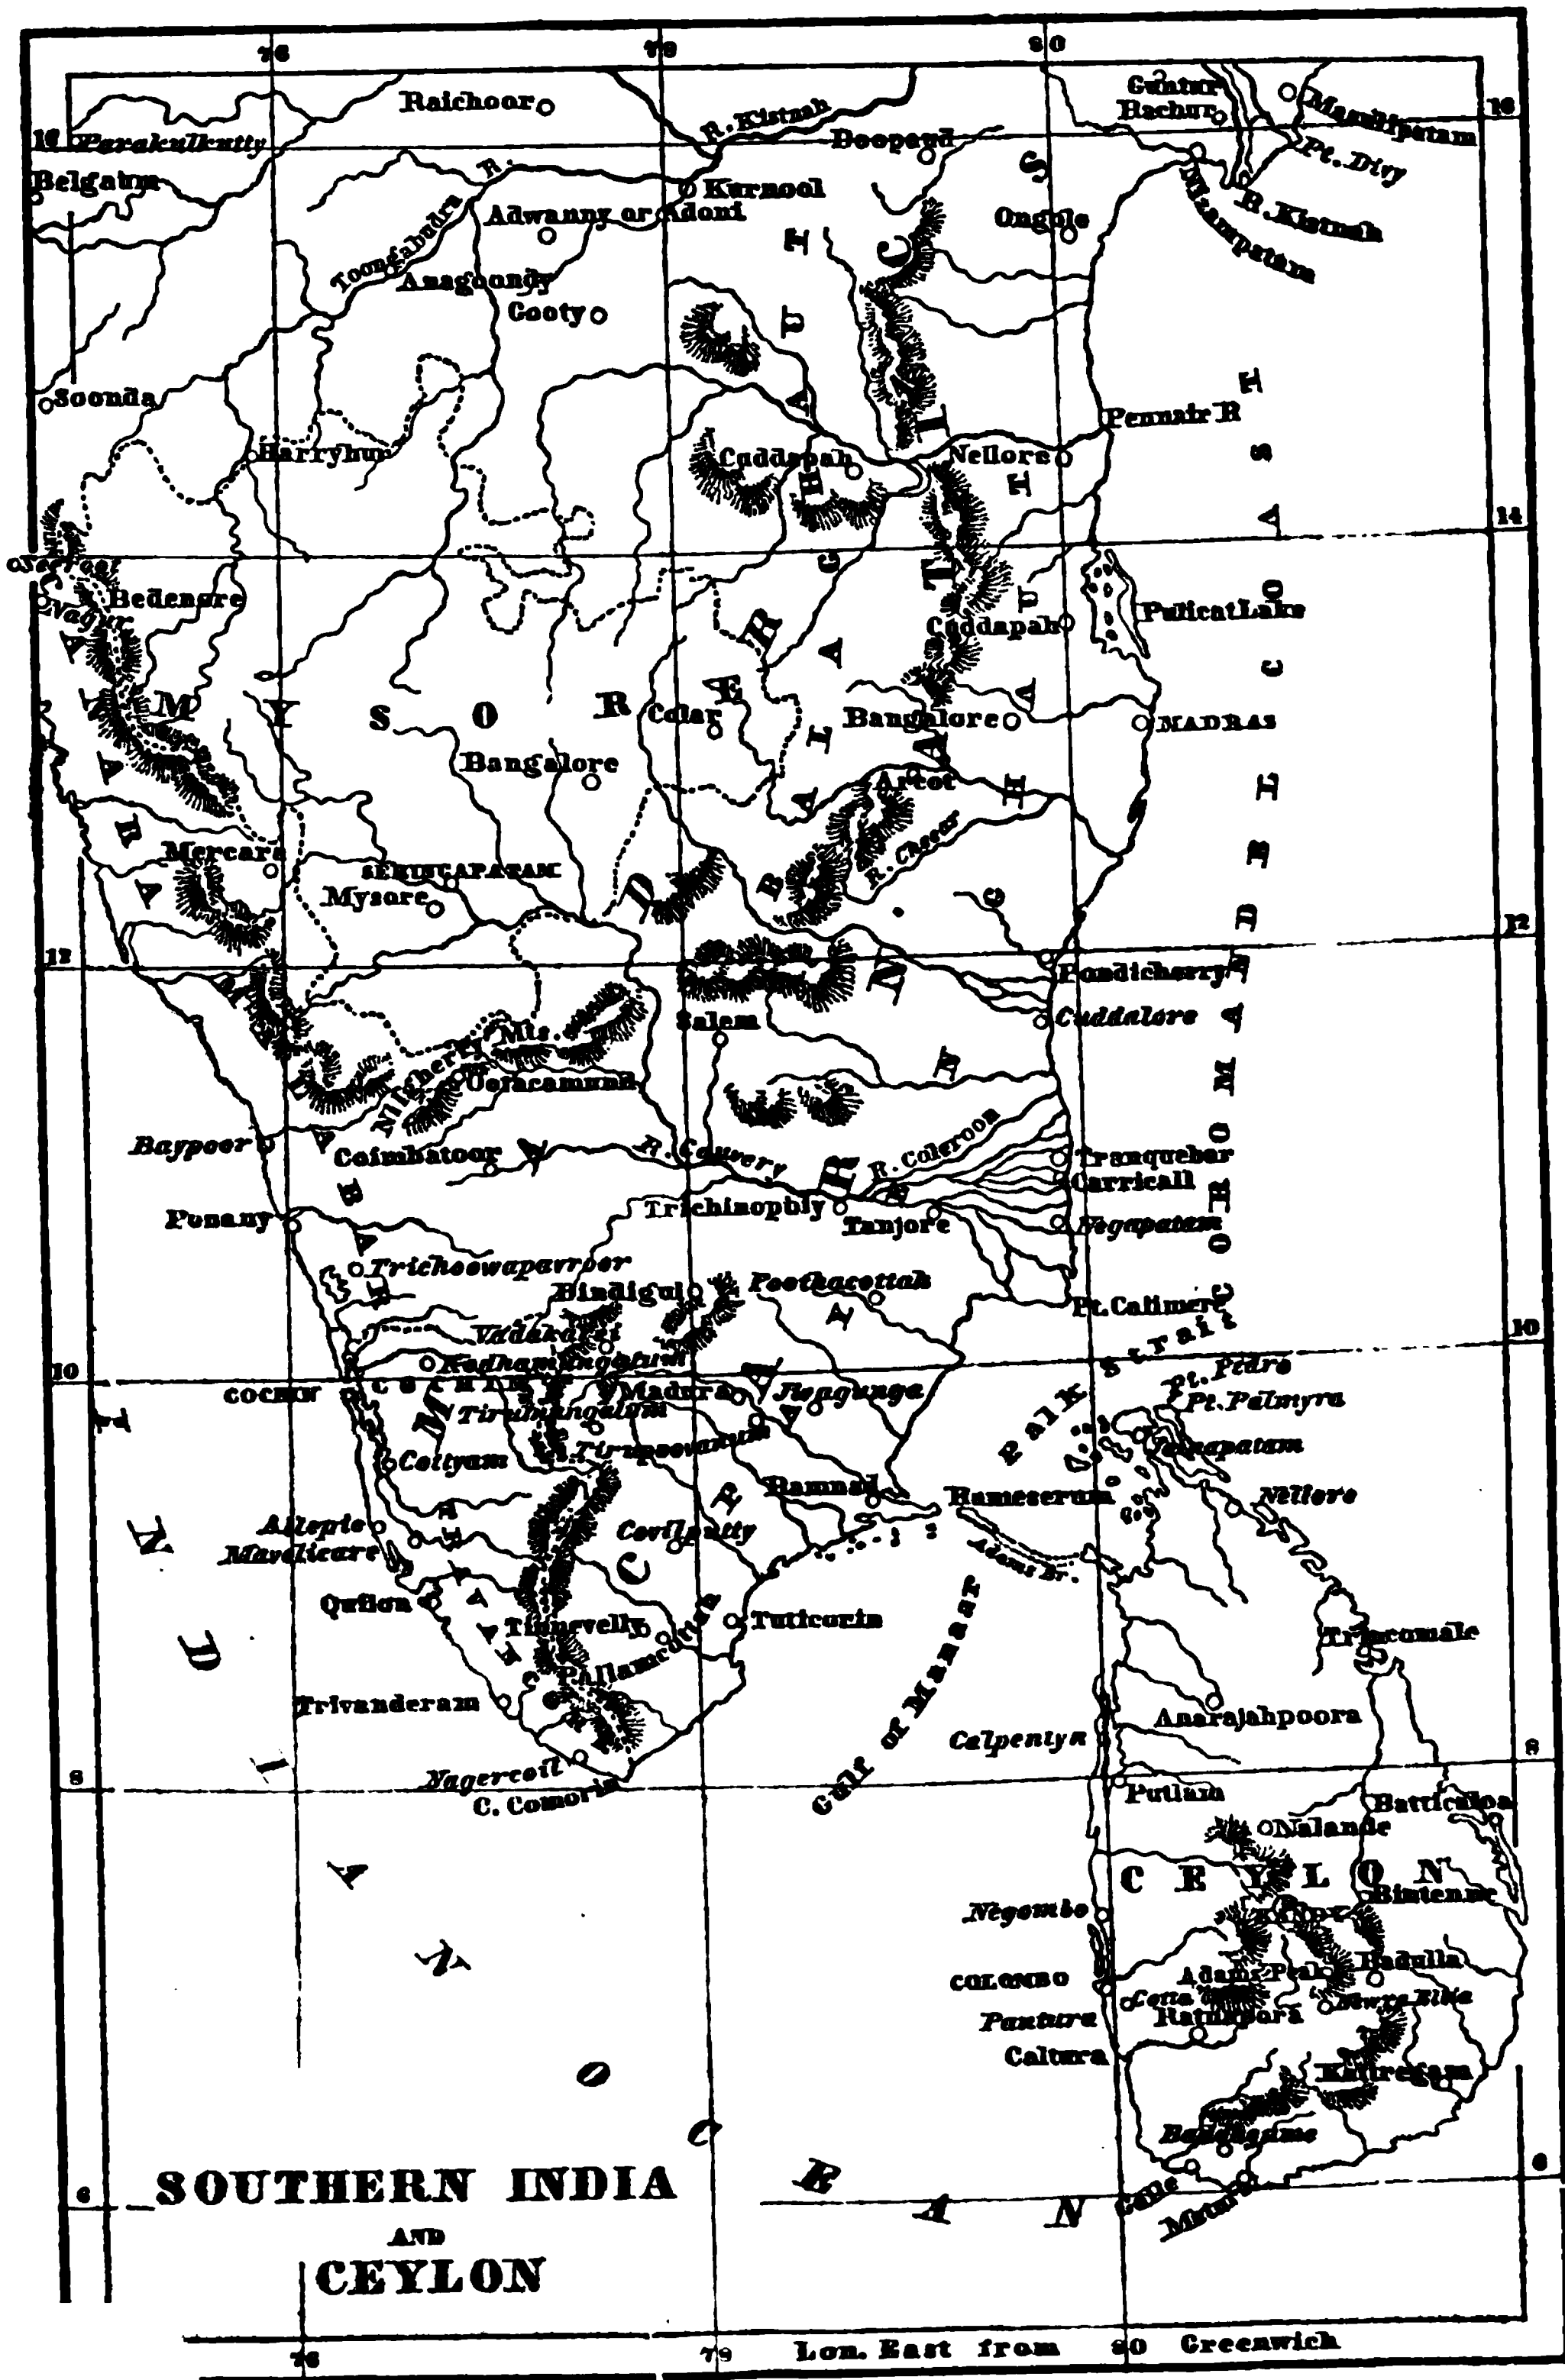

A small chapel was completed by this mission in 1852, and regular preaching exercises were commenced. The exercises took the form of a discussion generally, and Mr. Burgess, alluding to this fact, says: "I doubt if any other mission in India can present such well maintained religious discussions, attended with continued interest on the part of the people. Certainly I never had such opportunities for preaching to the masses of the people as I enjoy at Satara. At the latest dates from this mission a larger chapel was about to be erected, and the villages around presented an inviting field of labor. Two boys' schools and two girls' schools were in successful operation, and there was also what was called a "parochial school," with from fifteen to twenty pupils, taught in the yard of the mission house by a son of a native Christian. About 5,000 books, tracts and portions of Scripture were sold by the mission during the year 1852. A reinforcement has sailed for this mission, but no returns have been received.

Kolapoor.—The mission at this place is of quite recent date, having been commenced in 1852. It is about 130 miles distant from Ahmednuggur, nearly south, and contains a population of some 44,000. No missionary labor had ever been performed here before, and the people were entirely unacquainted with the Gospel. On the arrival of the missionary, Mr. Wilder, the people sent a remonstrance to the King and to the political superintendent, against his being allowed to remain; but they soon became acquainted with him, and the opposition died away. Kolapoor is the centre of a population of 550,000 souls, and presents an immense field for missionary operations.

Madura.—The mission at Madura was commenced in July, 1834. A tour of observation was previously made by Mr. Spaulding, of the Ceylon mission, accompanied by three native helpers, and after visiting various places, this was decided upon as the most desirable and important in that part of India for a missionary station.

Madura is in the southern part of Hindostan, and is the city of the ancient Tamil kings and the seat of Brahminical pride in that quarter. It has a population of about 50,000, and the district bearing the same name contains 1,300,000 souls. Several large villages lie within fifteen or twenty miles of the city. As the result of their observations concerning the country itself, the missionaries say: "Southern India has no vast alluvial plains, like the deltas of the Ganges, the Jumna, and the Burrampootur, nor is its coast marshy, like those of Cuttack, Bengal, and Arracan. Beheld from the sea, it appears mountainous down to the beach. But along the eastern shore for more than 500 miles from Cape Comorin, there is a strip of sandy waste extending three or four miles from the sea; when the land rises into detached hills, and farther back into mountains, till at length the scenery combines the magnificent with the beautiful. The mountains assume every varied form, and are clothed with extensive forests, while the smaller hills, which skirt the plain, are here and there graced with temples and choultries, exhibiting exquisite specimens of architecture. Winding streams flow from every hill, and the soft and lovely valleys are in striking contrast with the dark and mighty forests which overcap them." Among these hills and valleys dwell that portion of the Tamil people on the continent, for whose immediate benefit the mission was commenced.

In July, 1834, Messrs. Todd and Hoisington removed from Ceylon to Madura, accompanied by three interesting young natives who had been connected with the boarding school and seminary at Ceylon almost from their commencement. It will be seen, therefore, that a very intimate relation subsisted between the Ceylon and Madura missions; and this will be still better understood by quoting the preamble and resolutions adopted by the brethren at Ceylon. They were as follows:

"Whereas, it is considered very desirable that the missionaries from America stationed in Jaffna and on the neighboring continent, be on the most intimate terms, not only because they are connected with the same Board, are situated among a people of the same language and religion, and are dependent, at least for the present, on the productions of the same press; but because a mutual exchange of counsel and help, and sometimes an exchange of labors either for the promotion of health, or for the advancement of the cause generally, may be most salutary; therefore resolved, "1. That the American mission in Jaffna and that about to be established on the continent of India, be associated missions.

"2. That the mission on the continent have equal power with the mission in Jaffna in all secular and ecclesiastical concerns; such as the erection of all necessary buildings for themselves and families; the establishment of schools; the mode and extent of church discipline; the employment of such native helpers as they may consider necessary and expedient for the furtherance of the cause of Christ in that place; and the general management of the mission in all its bearings.

"3. That each mission exchange copies of all its official communications to the Board, journals excepted.

"4. That in case of any serious difficulty in either mission, either the majority or the minority may apply to the other mission for advice."

In Feb., 1835, Mr. Eckard and his wife left Jaffnapatam to connect themselves with the Madura mission; and in the May following he makes some statements which are important, as showing the nature of the field into which he and his brethren had entered. He speaks of Madura as a city where idolatry has peculiar power, an intense sanctity, a numerous priesthood; and a place into which, at certain seasons of the year, tens of thousands of votaries crowd to worship, they know not what. "Heathenish abominations reign here," he says, "in full malignity; and the people are generally capacious and careless respecting any religion other than their own." Their principal temple, that of Meen Aatche, he describes as of vast dimensions, there being no building in the United States that can compare with it in size. This temple is almost completely covered over with images of human and superhuman beings, executed in plaster. Most of the houses in Madura are of mud, one story high, covered with leaves and straw; but there are a few really good dwellings, in oriental style.

In planning the Madura mission the design was to make it a large central station, while single families and schools should be established in each of the surrounding villages, so that the whole mass of the community should be brought under the influence of Christian truth, and united and concentrated action secured. Soon after entering upon the mission, Mr. Eckard commenced a school upon the Lancasterian plan, similar to the one in Calcutta, which had been conducted with eminent success. Instruction was given chiefly in English, and Mr. E. himself assumed the duties of teacher, believing, as he said, that "no English school taught by a native could compare with one taught by an educated missionary." He began with eighteen boys, some of them of high caste, and all were required to attend public worship on the Sabbath. Preaching was added to teaching, and besides these labors in the city, an effort was soon made to reach the surrounding villages. "There are two of us," said Mr. Eckard, "and our immediate circle of influence sweeps in about 100,000 souls. I mean by this, that if our bodily strength did not fail we might reside at Madura and be sensibly felt by one hundred thousand people in the city and adjoining villages."

Mr. and Mrs. Poor left Ceylon and joined the Madura mission in 1836. At the close of this year there were in connection with the mission thirty-five schools, containing 1,149 boys and 65 girls. Nine of these schools were in the city, and the others in the neighboring villages. Books and tracts were also freely distributed.

In general the most intimate and reliable knowledge of heathen countries is derived from the missionaries, and comes to us after they have been upon the field a sufficient time to make investigations. Hence the necessity of interrupting the missionary narrative by the introduction of important historical facts illustrative of the character of the field, and essential to a correct understanding of the responsibilities and trials of the missionary. In regard to that section of Hindostan now under review, the missionaries say, in 1836, "The region inhabited by those who speak Tamil on the continent, is bounded on the north by a line which we may suppose to be drawn from Madras towards the west. It extends from this limit to Cape Comorin, at the extreme south of Hindostan, from the sea shore on the east to the western branches of the southern Ghaut mountains on the west. This space comprises an area of from 75,000 to 100,000 square miles. The population has been variously estimated at from 3,000,000 to 10,000,000. Perhaps 6,000,000 or 8,000,000 approximates most nearly to the truth. Comparatively few of the Tamil people dwell among the mountains on the west. They reside chiefly in the wide plains which extend to the sea, and which are known as the Carnatic. There are more than twenty cities within the limits above described, inhabited in whole or in part by Tamil people; and there are probably 500 towns of from 50 to 1,000 people each."

Passing on to 1838, we find four stations around Madura, viz.: Dindigul, 40 miles north-west of Madura; Sevagunga, 25 miles east, Teroopoovanum, 12 miles south-east, and Teroomungalum, 12 miles north-west. At each of these places there was a missionary, and in some instances two, with schools, and other means of systematic effort. The whole number of schools connected with the mission at this period was 66, and of scholars 1866.

In 1840 the work had progressed so that there were in all the schools of the mission a total of 3,316 scholars. About 1,000 of the pupils in the native free schools could read, and nearly the whole number had committed to memory the ten commandments, the Lord's prayer, and a small catechism. There were 12 additions during the year to the four native churches. Mr. Spaulding made a second visit to the Tamil district this year, it being just seven years since his first exploring tour, previous to the establishment of the mission. Of the changes which had occurred he speaks in very strong terms. The roads had been improved, bridges had been constructed, numerous shade trees had been planted, the tanks, from which the cultivated lands were irrigated, had been repaired, and the revenue in some parts of the district had been more than doubled. "When I went over before, our boat was blown out of its course by the strong wind, and Mr. Harrington and myself were obliged to walk about 70 miles in the sun by day, and with no rest house by night. Now we had good conveyances and good rest houses and mission houses and pleasant gardens through our whole tour. Then there was no missionary station nor Christian teacher within the district.

Now there are five stations and nine missionaries, who have under their care about eighty native free schools and four English boarding schools, all of which are in a very interesting and flourishing state, and fifteen or twenty native assistants of very good promise."

The increasing importance of this field, and the opportunities offered for enlarging the operations of the mission, induced the brethren in 1841 to make an urgent appeal to the Board for twenty additional missionaries. But instead of such a reinforcement, or even one additional missionary, the mission was weakened and severely tried by the removal of Mr. Poor to Ceylon, a change which his health rendered indispensable. The appropriations for the schools also fell short this year, and there appeared to be a painful necessity of disbanding some of them, but on submitting the matter to the native teachers they said, "You must not discharge us; we will take what you have to give." In another instance, after a consultation among the teachers, one of them reported to the missionary in behalf of the others, "If a father have ten sons, and unfortunately loses half his property, will his sons allow him to turn away five of their number to starve, while the rest are supported in comfort? No! These sons will consent to live on less and to have the parent divide the amount equally among them. This is our decision. We are each of us willing to live on rice congee rather than to have any of our number dismissed." The schools were accordingly continued as usual.

An event of great importance, about this time, was an act dissolving all connection between idolatry and the government of British India. This act threw upon the heathen themselves the whole expense of building and repairing their temples. By another act, passed the same year, simple affirmation in the name of the living and true God was made binding on all as an oath, instead of the former swearing on the sacred waters of the Ganges and on the Koran. In this also the missionaries had occasion greatly to rejoice, as the land would no longer mourn because of the swearing by false gods and a lie. These great changes resulted in no small degree from the steady operation of Christian missions upon the public conscience, and the value and power of such missions as reformatory agencies are thus placed in a very strong light.

In 1843 the mission was called to a severe trial. Mr. Poor had already been removed to Ceylon, and Dr. Steele had died in 1842, and this year Mr. Ward was transferred to Madras, besides which, the cholera made its appearance, mowing down great numbers of the native inhabitants, and not entirely exempting the mission families. Rev. Mr. Dwight, Mrs. North, and Mrs. Cherry, within eleven days of each other, were carried from one house to the silent tomb. Other missionaries however soon arrived, and the work suffered but a temporary interruption.

It is recorded as a fact worthy of special notice during this year, that the Papists residing in three distant villages, amounting to twenty-five families, and numbering 106 individuals, were received under the spiritual care and instruction of the mission. And further, whole communities, villages, and hamlets, applied to be acknowledged as no longer pagans or Roman Catholics, but as Christians and Protestants. In one village three families, in another four, and in another forty families, entered into an agreement, either by their head men or over their own signatures, to renounce idolatry and receive the Gospel, or else refund the expense the missionaries should incur to meet their wishes. For copies of some of these agreements, see annual report of the Board for 1844. Many interesting features in the progress of the Madura mission during the years 1844 and 1845 must be passed over. In 1846 the native churches received an accession of ninety-seven members. At this date the villages are spoken of as not only all open, but more than open, as they not only would receive the missionaries, but come to them. Fifteen or twenty companies, from villages thirty and forty miles distant, and where the missionaries had never been, visited them for tracts and instruction, and some of them manifested great anxiety for the salvation of their souls. Dr. Scudder removed to Madura with his family, in 1847, thus supplying the want of a physician, which had been deeply felt.

It was in the year 1847 that the mission entered upon a formal and uncompromising conflict with caste, which, the missionaries at this date say, "has existed to the present time, with various degrees of strength in the churches established by Schwartz and his devoted fellow laborers, as well as in those of more modern date." The missionaries of the Board were at length determined to free the Church of Christ from "a foe most insidious as well as powerful," and seventy-two were suspended from church fellowship on account of their adherence to this sin. At the same time many left the seminary on account of the encroachments made upon the rules of caste. The results, however, showed the wisdom of the measure, and proved that the time had fully come for so decisive a step. It should be stated, however, that caste has never been tolerated in the churches planted by the missionaries of the Board. Rev. Dr. Allen, who has been for more than a quarter of a century a missionary of the Board in India, says :

"The Missionaries of the American Board in India and Ceylon have always required a renunciation of caste, just as much as of idolatry, and other parts of heathenism, of all converts before they were baptized. No arrangements, nor accommodations, nor changes have ever been made in the seats, or in the sitting in the churches, or in the administration of the ordinances on account of caste. Caste was in no respect recognized. All were treated as of one class, as much as Christians in this country are so treated.

"It would naturally be expected that such a public renunciation of caste, and such subsequent treatment of it, would be sufficient to extinguish it in the church. But experience has shown that it was not sufficient. Caste has been found to be surprisingly insidious in its influence; and to be capable of assuming almost any complexion and shape, suited to the native character and their circumstances."

Passing on to 1851, we find the Committee of the Board drawing a new and more modern sketch of this great field, and one which sets in a striking light both the astonishing changes which had been wrought and the immense labors devolved upon the missionaries. After alluding to the fact that in 1836 this mission had only one station at Madura, and that all the schools were in its immediate vicinity, they proceed to say that now they have extended their operations till they have ten stations, one of which is more than thirty miles south, and another about the same distance north; one about twenty-five miles east and another forty north-west from Madura; with families under their care associated in the form of village congregations in about 100 villages, scattered singly or in clusters through a populous region, extending in length more than 100 miles from south-east to north-west, and more than sixty miles in breadth. This field, thus in some measure taken possession of by our missionaries, has been almost wholly left to them by the missionaries of other societies laboring in adjoining districts in India, and it seems fitting that it should be fully occupied by this Board. It is larger than the State of Massachusetts, and has a population, as is supposed, of 1,500,000. It has become one of great interest and great promise, and the labor demanded in it has obviously increased much beyond the ability of the present band of laborers. Hitherto the natural growth of the mission has been one of expansion, but there is now a call for more thorough culture."

The year 1852 was one of great favor to this mission, 72 having been received to the churches at the different stations, fifty-six of whom were adults. There were now nine churches in all, and 335 members in good standing. The system of education had been gradually changed, and, say the missionaries at this period, "We can have but little to do hereafter with the general desire of the heathen to have their children receive from us an English and Tamil education. The Lord in his providence has given us a people to educate for him. Among the members of our congregations we have 1,588 children, of whom 647 are studying in our free schools. From these it is easy to make a selection for our own boarding schools." It is the main design of the boarding schools and of the seminary to raise up an educated and efficient class of helpers for the missionary work, and it is considered a great advantage that the pupils can now be taken from families connected with the mission and nominally Christians.

Madras.—The mission at Madras was commenced in 1836, with a special view to forming there a printing establishment for printing the Scriptures and religious tracts in the Tamil language. But in order to the successful execution of this plan, it was deemed necessary to establish there a distinct, efficient, and responsible mission; and with this view, Mr. Winslow and Dr. Scudder removed to this new field. Madras is on the eastern side of Southern India, and the population of the city and suburbs is estimated at 416,000. It was intended to establish the press at Chintadrepettah, a suburb southwesterly of the walled town, and at this place Dr. Scudder took up his residence, while Mr. Winslow resided at Royapooram, a little north of the town. They immediately found the demand for Tamil books and tracts to be very great, and expressed the wish that they had 25,000 copies of the New Testament to distribute within a year. Schools and preaching stations were immediately established, and a mission church was formed in 1837, and one native was admitted on profession of his faith in Christ.

In 1838 the mission came into possession of a large printing establishment which had belonged to the Church Missionary Society. It comprised eighteen printing presses, besides a lithographic and hydraulic press, fifteen fonts of type, English, Tamil, and Teloo-goo, together with a type foundry and book bindery. This enabled the mission to enter vigorously upon the work for which it was chiefly commenced. In one year from this date there had been printed 3,500,000 octavo pages of Scripture, and 2,500,000 duodecimo pages of tracts, making 6,000,000 pages in all. In 1840 the printing in Tamil amounted to 11,660,700 pages, over nine millions of which were octavo pages of Scripture. At this period there were also in existence sixteen schools, comprising 485 scholars.

Important tours for preaching and distributing books were made by Messrs. Scudder and Winslow in 1840. One of these tours was to Conjevezam, a sacred place 46 miles south-west of Madras, during which they preached the Gospel to numerous small companies of people, and distributed over 4,000 books and tracts. Dr. Scudder also journeyed 200 miles south, into the Cuddalore and Tanjore districts, taking with him 6,000 copies of one of the Gospels, and 11,500 tracts. Mr. Winslow, for the special benefit of his wife and child, went west 200 miles, into the Mysore district, which he describes as an immense terrace of table land, elevated about 3,000 feet above the level of the sea, and altogether a splendid country, well watered, fertile, populous, and promising as a field of missionary labor. In all their visits to the sacred places, Messrs. Scudder and Winslow found a great falling off in the number of attendants upon idolatrous festivals.

In 1841 the mission had four places of stated preaching, and the aggregate of the congregations was 550. A piece of land was bought this year at Royapooram for a chapel, and $1,500 subscribed for its erection. At this place Mr. Winslow established an evening meeting, in a bungalow on the premises of a very respectable native merchant, and upon this a persecution arose, in describing which Mr. Winslow says, "The Romanists immediately began to annoy us, and to send letters threatening our lives. They threw stones, both in times of meeting and at other times, at the family, set up a noisy meeting in the adjoining house, and disturbed us by offensive smelling lights and fire works, as well as by the noise of bells and various instruments; and when this was stopped by the authorities, they burnt the bungalow with the furniture it contained." The native merchant however, remained firm, and the persecution failed entirely of its object.

In their report in 1843 the Board take occasion to remark, that the Madras, Madura, and Ceylon missions are all to a people alike in religion, language, manners, and customs. The station at Madras being intended to do the principal part of the printing for all these missions, it was not intended to enlarge it beyond what was necessary for this purpose. The Madura mission has never had a printing press within its bounds, and that at Jaffna has done much less work than the one at Madras.

In 1845 the missionaries found that caste was exerting an undue control over the minds of the native church members, and wishing to see how far this unchristian feeling would be carried, they took measures to test it. The result was that five were suspended; but their Christian principles prevailed, and in a few months they all came back, made a full and humble confession, and promised to conform to the rules of the church respecting caste.

A prospectus for a railroad from Madras to Arcot, sixty miles, issued in 1846, gives the population of Madras in 1842, as upwards of 900,000, an increase of more than 200,000 since 1822. This increase was supposed to be owing chiefly to political causes, tending to centralize the population in the cities of the coast.

This vast community is distinctly spoken of in 1846, as showing signs of the wide spread and powerful working of the truth, and the organized opposition made to the Gospel was one evidence of this fact. An anti-missionary society existed among the natives of Madras, which employed a press in printing small tracts and a newspaper, and the same society established several opposition free schools, employed tract distributors and declaimers against Christianity, and sent out agents into the country for similar purposes. The people were thus mightily stirred up, and on one occasion 8,000 people assembled to see if measures could not be devised to prevent the spread of Christianity. Say the missionaries, "Now, light and truth have so far gone forth that the bearings of missionary operations on caste, custom, and idolatry, begin to be manifest. The Brahmins and head men begin to feel that their craft is in danger. They are therefore bestirring themselves." They proceeded even so far as to seize and forcibly carry off several hopeful converts, and one of them was put in irons and threatened with death. All this however, while it showed that the pillars of superstition had been shaken, occasioned no permanent interruption to the mission. In the autumn of this year Dr. Scudder, who had been spending a few years in his native country, greatly to the edification and quickening of the churches, returned to his chosen field of labor. Instead, however, of remaining at Madras, he was persuaded, by the urgent want of a physician at Madura, to resume his labors at that place.

The opposition continued to be very bitter and violent in 1847, and on one occasion Mr. Scudder, son of Dr. Scudder, was openly assailed in the streets. In defiance of the popular rage however, the women came, at a communion season, and sat down with the men at the table, with their husbands, a thing which they had never done before. The most serious troubles were occasioned by the spirit of caste, and Mr. Scudder is led to remark, "If I were asked to tell in one breath what I thought the mightiest present obstacle to the onward course of the Gospel in India, I should unhesitatingly say, caste. It is a monster that defies description. Idolatry in no way compares with it, as to its grasp on the people."

Dr. Scudder returned to Madras in 1848, and in the following year he was called to mourn the death of his wife, Mrs. Harriet M. Scudder. She commenced her labors in connection with the Ceylon mission in 1819. In November, 1850, Mr. Winslow announced that the printing of the new version of the Tamil Bible was completed. It had been in hand three years, and for two years the united labors of Messrs Percival and Spaulding of Jaffna, Brotherton of the Church of England, and Winslow in Madras, had been devoted to it, most of the time daily except on the Sabbath. In point of accuracy, conciseness, elegance, and idiomatic correctness, it was thought to be far in advance of any previous work of the kind. Another interesting event of this year was the meeting of all the members of the church except four, with the mission families, on the evening preceding the annual meeting, which was held in connection with the Board. It is described as an interesting sight. "Husbands and wives, little accustomed to eat together, high caste and low caste, and no caste, brethren and sisters in Christ, thus acknowledging their unity in him as members of the same body."

During the years 1851 and 1852, the press at Madras continued its operations, and the mission moved on without any very marked changes. The whole amount of printing at this place since the establishment of the press, is 219,408,221 pages.

Arcot.—This city is seventy miles from Madras, on the road to Bangalore, and is the centre of a very populous and destitute district. At this place Mr. H. M. Scudder commenced a mission in March, 1850. Having already become quite distinguished for his medical and surgical skill, his services were in immediate demand, from forty to fifty visiting him daily. His custom was to meet his patients in the morning, read and explain a passage of Scripture, and pray with them, after which he attended to their maladies. Through his medical labors he gained access to many Hindoo women, who could not have been reached in any other way. A regular dispensary was established, and Mrs. Scudder, who could speak Tamil fluently, visited it daily to converse with the patients.

In 1852, Henry M. Scudder, William Scudder, and Joseph Scudder, all sons of the venerable Dr. Scudder, and all born in India, were laboring as missionaries at the Arcot station. In the report of the Board for 1853, will be found a very interesting account of the conversion of a Teloo-goo Brahmin, at Arcot. In addition to the labors of the dispensary, the Gospel was preached "in towns and villages, in streets and by-ways, in choultries and under green trees." The mission however is of too recent a date to exhibit any very marked results, or to require an extended notice.

The statistics of the missions of the American Board in Hindostan are given below, as far as it was practicable to arrange them in a tabular form :

In the above table, assistant missionaries and native helpers are all included under the head of assistants. The summary of schools also embraces those of every description. The printing for the Mahratta people, it will be seen, has all been done at Bombay, and for the Tamil people at Madras and Ceylon.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The Church Missionary Society commenced its labors in Hindostan in 1815. Beginning at Madras and South India, they subsequently extended their labors to Calcutta, and to Bombay, and at each of these places they have now a diocese embracing many towns and villages within its sphere of effort. Adopting the chronological order, we begin with Madras.—The first missionaries of the Society to this field were Rev. Messrs. Schnarré and Rhenius. At the end of their first year, they reported themselves as comfortably settled in Madras, as having acquired the Tamil language sufficiently to compose, converse, and publicly read in it, and also as having formed a Missionary Committee, and raised a small missionary fund.

It should be observed here, that although this society had no regular station in India previous to 1815, they had promoted missions in various places much earlier, through English chaplains, and in connection with what is termed the oldest Protestant mission in India, the Danish mission. Thus, Messrs. Schnarré and Rhenius had been laboring for some time in Tranquebar, more than a hundred miles south of Madras, partly in aid of the schools established there by the Royal Danish Mission College, and partly for the acquisition of the Tamil language. About this time the Danish mission was obliged to withdraw its patronage from these school establishments, and the care of them was assumed by the Church Missionary Society. To Tranquebar and its schools frequent allusion will be made.

In the early journals of this society much is also said of Abdool Mesech, a Christian reader. He was a Mohammedan by birth, named Sheikh Salih, born in Delhi, and received his first Christian instruction from that devoted missionary, Henry Martyn. He was baptised in the "Old Church," Calcutta, in 1811, by the name Abdool Mesech, which signifies "Servant of Christ." At the close of 1812 he left Calcutta and proceeded to Agra, 800 miles north-west of Calcutta, in company with Mr. Corrie, chaplain of the East India Company at that station. There he sustained the office of reader and catechist with wonderful fidelity and success, and his journals fill a large space in the Church Missionary Society's publications.

To return to Madras, we find at an early date the reasons stated for choosing this as the seat of the mission in Southern India; and they may be noticed with the more propriety because, although the American Board preceded the Church Missionary Society by several years in India, they were twenty-one years later than that society at Madras. Consequently many facts of interest belong to a period over which the mission of the Board does not extend.

The choice of the Corresponding Committee fell upon Madras for the following reasons: "Its high consideration as head of the whole peninsula, the desire for Christian knowledge which appeared to prevail therein, the frequent demands for the Scriptures in three or four languages, the existence of a Malabar congregation—a secession from the Roman Catholics, and a translated liturgy of the Church of England just completed for this congregation, by Rev. Dr. Rottler, chaplain of the E. I. Company." To enter into these labors, keep open the Tamil Chapel, provide against the failure of the venerable Dr. Rottler, and build upon his foundations, though limited, seemed very important; and further, the society would thus commence its career in the South of India, at the seat and within the eye of the English government.

Attention was early given to schools, and the distribution of tracts. The latter, however, were difficult to obtain, as the mission had at this period no means of printing. To supply this deficiency as well as they could, one of the best school boys was employed at certain hours in writing, and thus two books were prepared for the English Tamil school, with a dictionary affixed appropriate to them. These books consisted of small portions of the Scriptures. At the close of one year there were two schools in Madras, but the want of funds and of teachers prevented an immediate enlargement of the system of education. A seminary for the education of native missionaries was a favorite idea from the first; but it was encumbered with many difficulties, and the project could not be entered upon at once.

Much interest was awakened, near the close of the first year, by the conversion of a native, who called himself a Christian, and who, without any suggestion from the missionaries, entered at once upon the business of reading from house to house. His book was the New Testament. He began by the request of a single heathen neighbor, who saw him much devoted to this book, and by this his own soul was stirred up to read the word of God daily to the perishing around him.

It is worthy of note, that the missionaries of the Church Society at Madras, from the very start, excluded caste from their schools. No little surprise and opposition were awakened, but the truly scriptural and sensible answer was, that "the caste of the natives is not at all compatible with true Christianity; because a man cannot be meek, humble, and loving, in the manner in which our Lord Jesus has set us an example, and as the Holy Spirit works within the heart, and, at the same time keep up his notions of caste; in which the station, or rank, or esteem of any or every person is determined by birth alone, and not by intrinsic worth and dignity of mind."

Such were the labors of the first year,—two missionaries able to preach the Gospel in Tamil; two schools in successful operation, without the least encouragement of caste; a native Christian reader, sufficiently informed to be listened to with attention by respectable natives; and a general spirit of inquiry awakened among the people.

In 1816, the mission received a reinforcement, and at the same time Mr. Schnarré returned to Tranquebar to take the entire care of the school establishments in that place. On the first of January 1817, Mr. Rhenius formed a regular congregation in Madras, consisting of the mission servants and their families, and a few converts received the previous year. That more were not received from the heathen, is accounted for in a manner most creditable to the character and principles of this mission, when Mr. Rhenius says, "If I had thought it any advantage to the Christian church, or any honor to our Lord Jesus Christ, to pay persons for becoming Christians, I should have had already the pleasure of reporting hundreds, yea, thousands, that would have embraced Christianity." During this year, schools were established at Vadadelli, about 30 miles north-west of Madras, through the agency of the native Christian Sandappen, residing at that place. Other native converts were employed in a similar manner, in different directions.

In the autumn of 1818, the cholera broke out with great violence in this part of Hindostan, and the natives in their consternation attributed it to the anger of an idol, which for forty years had been locked up by public authority, on account of the dissensions which occurred at one of her festivals. The idol was therefore brought out, and a human sacrifice—an idiot boy, was offered to appease her rage. Only one member of the mission—a catechist—died of the epidemic. But the mission property was much damaged by a whirlwind which occurred about the same time—all the school-houses, and many other buildings, having been completely prostrated.

An important branch of this mission, was that among the Syrian Christians, in Travancore, at the southern extremity of Hindostan, on the Malabar coast. The history of these Syrians, and the manner in which they came to be residents in this quarter, are fully stated in the Report of the Missionary Society for 1818. There were then not less than 50,000 of these Christians, with churches, a ministry (exceedingly licentious) and a form of worship resembling that of the Roman Catholics. So deep was the interest felt in this particular department, that in 1820 a three-fold division was made of the work, the instruction of the Syrian clergy being assigned to one missionary, the college and higher schools to another, while a third took charge of the schools intended for the great body of the people. The clergy were regarded as the first and most important branch of this mission. They are described at this period as a numerous body, and deplorably degraded. A total disregard of the Sabbath, profanation of the name of God, drunkenness, and adultery, were their prevailing crimes. Yet, in this degenerated condition they were considerably above the other castes. They did not justify their crimes, but tried to conceal them, and exhibited considerable moral sense. They accepted most gratefully the services of the missionaries, and concurred in all their plans. The metropolitan even remarked, that he did not expect much improvement among his people "till the Bible was circulated."

The college, at Cotym, had, in 1820, forty-two students. Some of them could read English well, understood the simple rules of arithmetic, and had considerable knowledge of the Malay and Sanscrit languages. The method of teaching the Syriac was found very defective, and a more thorough system was entered upon. The third object of attention, that of schools, embraced the establishment of a school for the preparation of native schoolmasters, the gradual promotion of schools for general instruction, the superintendence of these schools by personal visits, and the compiling of small tracts for their use. The establishment of parochial schools to be attached to every church under the jurisdiction of the metropolitan, was an object much desired, and at the above date ten of these schools existed, embracing 253 children.

The mission at Madras and South India had now become systematized, and was annually reported under the following heads, viz.: Madras and its vicinity; Tranquebar; Tinnevelly, lying south of Tranquebar, and not far from Cape Comorin; and Travancore, which included Cotym, Cochin, and Aleppi; Cannanore and Tellicherry, on the western side of southern India, and considerably north of Travancore; and Vizagapatam, north of Madras, on the eastern coast. At all these places the usual missionary operations were carried on with zeal and marked success. But it is impossible in so brief a space to notice each of them in the annual progress of the work, and many facts worthy of record are omitted, with a simple reference to the Missionary Register, the very ably conducted monthly journal of the Church Missionary Society, and to their annual reports.

In 1824, a new mission was established in the Nellore district, where the Teloo-goo or Gentoo language was vernacular. The reasons which determined the Corresponding Committee to occupy this field were, the vast extent of country throughout which the above language was spoken, the limited efforts hitherto made for the enlightenment of that people, and the circumstance of the Madras printing-press being now furnished with Teloo-goo types, so as to give speedy circulation to school books, tracts, and portions of the Scriptures, in that language.

In 1825, ten years having elapsed since the society commenced its labors in Hindostan, with two Lutheran clergymen, designed simply for the charge of the Tranquebar schools, their report presented nine stations, with eleven European missionaries, and one on his passage; 117 boys' schools and 101 girls' schools, with an aggregate of 4,585 scholars; five seminaries for the training of natives on a more liberal scale, with a view to their becoming teachers and missionaries among their countrymen; besides a vast work accomplished through the mission press, congregations gathered, houses of worship erected, &c.

During the next ten years there was considerable opposition, and even bitter persecution, from the natives, especially at Tinnevelly; yet the mission was at no time essentially interrupted. One or two new stations were added during this period, and the spirit of inquiry among the Syrian Christians was greatly increased. In 1838, the missionary at Tinnevelly reported a remarkable case of the effect of the Gospel upon a whole village, which had then lately occurred. The Shanar village of Pragasa-pooram, became entirely Christian; and the people, who had been ten or more years under instruction, and had made great progress in Christian knowledge, became very anxious to see a Christian church in the village, which should not only last their lifetime, but stand and testify to their children's children, the sincerity of their religious profession. Accordingly a subscription was set on foot among themselves, and the mission added a sum equal to what they could raise, and the object was accomplished. It was in this year that the mission at Aleppie reported an extraordinary effort of the Papacy to establish itself in that place. A large number of priests from Ireland, with their bishop, arrived, and began putting forth every effort by preaching, opening a college, seminary, &c.

Although the work at Tinnevelly was considered of a diffusive character, extending to different villages through a wide district, so that nothing more was expected than to see here and there a few embracing the truth; yet, to the surprise of all, whole villages, as in the case just noticed, were found embracing Christianity. The bishop of Madras, in 1842, says, "Among many sources of comfort during my journey through Tinnevelly, one of the greatest has been a sight, for which, I candidly confess, I was not prepared—the sight of WHOLE CHRISTIAN VILLAGES. He alone who has passed some time in a heathen land, engaged in the work of the ministry, can understand the delight which I felt at finding myself met, welcomed, and surrounded by crowds of native professing Christians, whose countenances spoke a most intelligible welcome." Some idea of the extent of the mission at Tinnevelly may be gathered from the fact, that at this period the field was divided into six districts, each containing from 50 to 90 villages, and each district having a missionary, with from 40 to 70 catechists and schoolmasters under his superintendence. A very remarkable occurrence is recorded in 1841, in one of the Tinnevelly districts, and should be repeated as an evidence of the divine blessing upon this mission. At a village in the Palamcottah district, south of Tinnevelly, belonging to a respectable Brahmin, a number of families applied to a catechist for instruction. The Brahmin, hearing of it, assembled the whole of the villagers, and addressed them as follows: "I hear that some of you have determined to learn the Vedam (Christian religion.) Now, I don't want any divisions and quarrels in my village, nor shall there be two parties here; therefore, all of you either remain in a body in your old religion, or else all of you in a body join the new. If you like to embrace Christianity, do so; I will make no opposition. You may turn your temple into a prayer-house if you like, only all be of the same mind; and if you do not act justly towards me, I shall look to the missionaries to see me righted." The result was, that they all put themselves under Christian instruction, demolished their idols, and converted their devil temple into a temple of the living God. The evidence that real Christianity prevailed along with these outward forms of it, was most satisfactory, and one proof of this was found in the constancy with which the native Christians bore persecution. In one instance, when compelled to flee from their native village, they said to the catechist, "We might escape all these troubles by denying Christ, and returning to our former ways, as most of our relations have done; but we cannot do so; and as the Lord has said, when they persecute you in this city, flee ye into another, we will avail ourselves of his permission." As a further evidence of genuine Christianity among these converts, it is added, that they formed religious and benevolent societies among themselves, thus supporting the widows of catechists, relieving the sick and indigent of their own number, and sustaining Christian readers, who traveled about making known the Gospel. They also established a Church building fund, on the principle that every person in the district capable of working, should give the best day's income of the whole year to the fund, with as much more as they liked. Besides these evidences of the reality of the work of grace among the converts of Tinnevelley, there were many bright examples of Christian faith and hope at the hour of death.

Particular instances of conversion and Christian fidelity might also be given, illustrating the success of the missionaries at the four stations in Travancore. One is that of a Syrian convert, who was reclaimed from a most degraded course of life, and who soon commenced preaching the Gospel with a zeal and boldness seldom witnessed in a native. He went from place to place, and on one occasion as he was preaching, a Syrian became so incensed that he went out, and, procuring a knife, returned and stabbed the preacher (Curiathe) to the heart. Curiathe put up a prayer to God not to lay this sin to the charge of the murderer, and fell down lifeless.

In 1844, the mission at Tinnevelly was further subdivided, so as to make eight districts, each having a faithful missionary. In addition to the seminary in the Palamcottah district, for the superior instruction of promising youths from all the district schools, there was also established this year a normal school, for the instruction of native children in the English language, and upon Christian principles; and also a normal female school, under the care of two English ladies. Measures were also taken for the establishment of a printing-press for the use of the mission, thus rendering the mission complete in all its departments.

The missionary in one of these districts mentions this year the case of a school girl, who labored unweariedly to bring her father and mother to the mission church. They allowed her to come into their house, without persecution, and to pray with them, and after more than a year of such effort, her mother, and then her father, came to hear the missionary, renounced heathenism, and were regular attendants on the preached word. In another Tinnevelly district twenty-five families, all that remained in heathenism, gave up their devil temple, and came in a body, and placed themselves under Christian instruction; thus leaving not one idolator in the district. The zeal of the people of these districts to erect substantial houses of worship in their villages, afforded pleasing evidence of the progress of the Gospel among them. The one day's earnings which they had formerly contributed did not satisfy them, and they made quite large subscriptions in money to this object. In regard to real spiritual progress, in connection with these wonderful outward developments, the missionaries spoke favorably from time to time, as they saw the converts abounding in labors, in sacrifices, and in efforts to bring their relatives to renounce idolatry and embrace Christianity.

An out-station was commenced this year about 12 miles from Trichoor, a station in Travancore, among a class of heathens called Nayards, the very lowest class of natives, who lived by begging, and were extremely ignorant. Several dwelling houses were erected for them, schools were opened, and within a year as many as sixty of them were under instruction, both in religion and in habits of industry.

Madras had not, for several years, received its proportionate share of attention, the interest having been concentrated more upon the southern portion of the field, particularly Tinnevelly and Travancore. The consequence was, that in 1845, thirty years from the commencement of the mission, there were but three congregations in Madras, and these not so large as at an earlier period. An urgent appeal was made for more missionaries, but the society could not respond favorably, as they had no more men to send. Two years later, however, more missionaries arrived, and the mission was much strengthened and revived.

The Tinnevelly mission was again subdivided in 1845, making 11 districts, with 14 missionary clergymen. The number of persons under Christian instruction at this period, in these eleven districts, amounted to 23,868, and in January 1846, they had increased to 30,698. The number of baptized converts was now 12,525. A similar success attended the labors of the "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," occupying in some measure the same field, and of which fraternal mention is made by the missionaries of the Church Society. But while Christianity was thus advancing, and whole villages were demolishing their idols and embracing the Gospel, a spirit of violent persecution was rising. In one district, several houses of worship were destroyed, converts were handled with violence, and many were falsely accused; but in spite of all this, 1402 souls embraced the Christian religion in that very district, within six months. In the latter part of this year (1845) the persecution became more systematic and violent. A mob of more than 3,000 attacked some Christian villages, robbed the people of all their goods, and beat them in the most cruel manner. The destruction of property was great. A civil force at length interfered, and put an end to the disturbance. Some of the converts were led, through fear, to renounce Christianity, but the great body of them remained firm, and one of the missionaries wrote, a few months later, "I have often been surprised at the unshaken and uncompromising attachment which, during this trying season, these poor people have manifested. They, as well as some of the catechists, have worked night and day to support the Christian cause, and with an alacrity and zeal which have often revived my own. Had it not been for this, I do not know what, at times, I should have done. I know also, that some of them have resisted temptations which an English Christian is little prepared to resist,—bribes, and such things."

The Bishop of Madras visited the Tinnevely missions in 1845, and in his report he says, "More than 18,000 souls have renounced idolatry and placed themselves under Christian instruction, since January 1841, when I last visited these missions. Thus, in four years and a half, the Christian community in Tinnevely has doubled itself—the increase during that period being equal to the total increase of the fifty-four years which preceded it."

Many of the chief actors in the persecutions were, in the following year, tried and punished, but some escaped altogether; and it was found that the Christian congregations had some of them considerably diminished. But this did not hinder others, in great numbers, from coming forward to fill their places. About this time the subject of caste was taken up by the missionaries in Tinnevely, and a declaration was drawn up, condemning it in the severest terms, with a solemn pledge forever to renounce it, and to discourage it both by word and example. This protest and pledge every native teacher was required to sign, before he could become a candidate for holy orders.

The most diligent attention continued to be bestowed upon the Syrian population, in the Travancore district. While the progress here was slow, compared with that in Tinnevely, the missionaries still felt justified in saying that there was a shaking among the Syrians—a state of great disorganization in their church, and a general dissatisfaction with their religion and a willingness to receive the truth. Two years later (1851) a missionary remarks, that although the Syrians hold many doctrines in common with the Roman Catholics, yet there is this wide essential difference between the two churches, viz.: that the Syrians do not disallow the perusal of the Scriptures, and neither do they mutilate the sacred text, like the Roman Catholics, to suit their own interpretation; but the authorized version is acknowledged by them, and they profess to draw their doctrines from thence. Still a year later, the same missionary says, "Some great crisis is probably at hand, with regard to the Syrian church in this place. The whole Syrian community is in a most divided state, and many are anxious to be joined to a purer faith." This missionary had widely distributed the word of God among the 12,000 Syrians of his district, when a Romish priest ordered the people to bring all these books to his church, on pain of excommunication; and, as soon as they were collected they were publicly burnt. Opposition of this nature from the Catholics, was among the most serious hindrances to the progress of the mission among the Syrian people.

Slavery is spoken of as prevailing extensively in Travancore, the slaves numbering about one-sixth of the whole population. They are an extremely degraded class, being regarded by the higher classes, and even by the laborers, as utterly unclean and polluting. "Their persons are entirely at the disposal of their masters, by whom they are bought and sold like cattle, and are often worse treated." Yet even these slaves were often reached, and brought under Christian influences.

The intelligence from the Madras and South India missions is to the close of 1852. Much that is of special interest might be added to the foregoing statements, particularly in regard to the Tinnevely and Teeloo missions, but it is necessary to omit further details. It has been seen that this branch of the Church of England mission, extending over a period of 48 years, has been conducted on a very broad scale, and upon principles as enlightened and philanthropic as they have been Christian. For learning, practical wisdom, and sincere and unremitting exertions for the temporal and spiritual elevation of the heathen, the missionaries of this society in Southern India have been distinguished, not less, certainly, than those in any other field. The results of these labors appear in a table at the end of the article on the Church of England missions in Hindostan.

Bombay.—The Church of England commenced its mission in Bombay in 1820, under the labors of Rev. Mr. Kenney. Although it was not a new field, the American Board having had an efficient mission there for eight years, yet Mr. Kenney occupied a separate and independent station, and had the Mahratta language to learn. After laboring with great zeal and success for five years, his return to England was rendered necessary by the health of his family, and he was succeeded by Rev. Messrs. Mitchell and Steward. Mr. Kenney had established three schools for boys, with 113 scholars, but no school for girls had yet been opened. Mrs. Steward soon died, and Mr. Steward left for another field. Other laborers succeeded from time to time, but for fifteen years or more the operations of the Church Missionary Society in Bombay and Western India were quite limited. They had however established a mission at Nassuck, 100 miles east of Bombay, and at both these places they had opened schools for both boys and girls, and had preached the Gospel to multitudes of people, and the Arch-Deacon of Bombay was led to remark that "much precious seed was vegetating in the hearts of natives, though little appeared externally." For the last few years more visible fruits have appeared, at Bombay and at Nassuck. The latter place has a population of 30,000, and is the resort of numerous pilgrims, and the seat and centre of Brahminism in Western India. Here the missionaries have had to encounter very fierce opposition, the Brahmins having become enraged at the weakened influence of Hindooism on the minds of those who have received instruction in the mission schools, and particularly on account of the relinquishment of caste by two Brahmin youths. The Brahmins even expressed the belief that they should be able to expel the missionaries, who, nevertheless, went steadily on with their labors. Considerable attention was bestowed upon the translation of the Scriptures into Mahratta, and preaching tours were frequently performed into the neighboring towns and villages. In the Society's report for 1852, they say, "The missionaries at Bombay and Nassuck are persevering in their patient and faithful labors, though they have hitherto reaped but little fruit, and can scarcely discern its promise. The advantages which have been gained have been chiefly the formation of schools, the translation of the Holy Scriptures and of tracts, and that increased respect and attention to Christian truth which form an important vantage ground for future operations."

In 1843 mention is made of an Asylum at Nassuck for poor and destitute natives, supported by the alms of the benevolent; and here the missionaries were accustomed to give instruction to the inmates, some of whom received the Gospel and were baptized. The last notice of this mission is in the Church Missionary Record for May, 1853, in which the missionaries say, "There are no great achievements to tell of—no brilliant successes to call forth acclamations. Our pages contain nought but the record of humble, patient and persevering labors, carried on amid much natural discouragement, but sustained by the gracious assurance that they who are called to do the work of the Lord shall find that their labor is not in vain." The native congregation at Bombay, at this period, numbered 56, of whom 22 were communicants. There was also a divinity class of four students, and a "Money Institution," so called, containing in the English department 230, and in the Marathi department 175 pupils. The vernacular schools were eighteen in number, eight for girls and ten for boys, the former containing 362 pupils, and the latter 630. At Nassuck there was one English school, containing 20 boys, four Marathi schools with 272 boys, and one Hindostanee school with 16 pupils. At Junin, east of Bombay about 100 miles, little had been done, the station having been occupied only a short time. The Sindh mission was commenced as late as 1850, and presents no facts of importance. A complete summary of the six stations of the Church of England mission in Western India, will be found in the statistical table.

Calcutta and North India.—The Church Society's mission in Calcutta, was commenced in 1816, by Rev. Mr. Jetter. Early attention was paid to schools, and to printing and circulating religious tracts. Success attended these labors, and in 1824 the number of schools reported was 22, and the number of scholars 500, a large number of whom were females. Great interest was awakened on the subject of female education in India, and a "Ladies' Society" for this purpose was formed, under the patronage of Lady Amherst. At an examination of female schools in February, 1825, out of 323 girls, in eleven schools, 292 came together. They were examined in Watts' Catechism and the New Testament, to the gratification and surprise of all present.

The death of Bishop Heber, in 1827, was an afflictive event to the Calcutta mission. He had been in India but little more than two years, and in that short period had visited almost every station where a Christian church could be assembled, performing not only the higher duties of his office, but the more humble and laborious duties of an ordinary pastor. He had thus become known to all his clergy and people, in the plains and mountains of Hindostan, in the wilder tracts of Central India, in the stations of Guzerat, the Deccan, and the Western Coast, in the hills and valleys of Ceylon, and in the southern provinces of India, the scene of his last labors, and henceforth of his dearest memory." The Bishop on coming in from a laborious tour, in which he had confirmed a large number of persons, went to the bath as usual, and in a few moments was found dead beneath the water.

The missions at Calcutta were not at any time conducted upon so liberal a scale as in some other places, and yet there is evidence of great fidelity on the part of the missionaries and teachers, who from time to time were called to labor here. In the report for 1852, the number of native Christians under the missionaries in Calcutta and its neighborhood, was stated at 230. Services were held in the mission chapel, both in Bengali and Hindostanee, and preaching to the heathen was regularly kept up, in the vernacular languages, both at out-stations and in the public thoroughfares.

Throughout the entire history of this mission, schools of various grades and departments have been maintained. In 1853 the boys' boarding school embraced 28 pupils, and a similar school for girls had 30 pupils. The vernacular schools connected with the mission had an average attendance of 660 boys. At an out-station a little distance from Calcutta, there was, at the above date, a boys' school containing 87 pupils, and also a school for girls with 25 pupils. These were taught not only in books, but in needle-work, cooking, &c. The English school contained 350 pupils.

The native press in Calcutta has been conducted with much energy, though not entirely under missionary control. Rev. J. Long, who at the last accounts had a connection with this department, writes, "Calcutta sends out from native presses, annually, not less than 30,000 volumes in Bengali. Among these are more than twelve newspapers and periodicals. Some forty native presses furnish a supply of intellectual food, much of which is anything but favorable to Christianity. Calcutta is, in this respect, a very important sphere, and I have given to it as much time as I could spare."

At a little earlier period Mr. Long gives a view of Calcutta as a missionary field, which is so comprehensive and satisfactory that parts of it may with propriety be quoted: "In the city is a population of at least 500,000, and within a radius of fifteen miles a population of more than 2,000,000. It is the centre of missionary operations from North India—the heart of Bengal. All translations of the Scriptures, rules for their circulating, the translation of tracts, the printing of Christian school books, the machinery of missions,—all are managed by committees in Calcutta, and chiefly by the extra labors of missionaries; for were it not for the exertions of missionaries, all these committees would languish, or perhaps become defunct. Many benevolent European gentlemen in Calcutta, who are brought into connection with the missionaries, have their attention directed to certain branches of missionary work, which they support very liberally."

"Calcutta, as far as regards education, in some respects resembles Cambridge or Oxford. Thousands of youths come and lodge in Calcutta for the sole purpose of their education. Of my scholars—150 in number—who study the Bible, Horne's Evidences of Christianity, Milton, and Natural Philosophy, through the medium of the English language, four-fifths merely take lodgings in Calcutta, while their parents live fifty or a hundred miles in the country. Educational labors afford a great field here. There are more than 100,000 boys in Calcutta, of whom not more than 10,000 attend school. * * What a scene for missionary labors. Besides, it is generally admitted that Calcutta missionaries do twice as much work as those in the country. Their sphere of labor is near them; they have not to exhaust their physical energies in traveling, &c. All the labor connected with translations, a native Christian literature, &c., is performed almost entirely by Calcutta missionaries; and yet the Church Missionary Society has always been weak in Calcutta. The Scotch Missionary Society have five laborers, the London Missionary Society five, the Baptist Missionary Society six, while our Society have only Mr. Sandys and myself. I may be mistaken, but I have long been of opinion that Calcutta is the Waterloo of India,—the depot where the grand battle between Christianity and Hindooism will be fought. The English language is sweeping away as with the besom of destruction, any lingering attachment that may remain to Brahminism, in the minds of youth, and now is the glorious era to control the storm, and direct the mental energies into the path of salvation."

Since the above was written another missionary, Mr. Bost, has arrived in Calcutta. In other respects Mr. Long's remarks apply to the present state of that mission.

Benares.—This is a city of great importance, and is about 500 miles north-west of Calcutta. The mission here was commenced in 1817, by Rev. Messrs. Morris and Adlington, successively schoolmaster, catechist, and preacher; but of their labors little is recorded. They were succeeded by other laborers, who remained but a short time, and for many years there was a great deficiency of systematic effort. Gradually however, a change took place, and for the last ten or fifteen years this has been one of the most important of the Church Society's missions in North India.

The mission premises are situated about a mile and a half south-east of the cantonments, at a village called Sigra. The enclosure contains about five acres of ground. The situation is airy, healthy, and quiet, with three large and one small bungalows (houses), the former designed for the residence of ordained missionaries, and the latter for European schoolmasters. There is another building devoted to the use of Christian orphan boys, who form a very interesting part of the mission; and not far distant is the school establishment for the native girls. In the city of Benares, and connected with the mission, there is a large school for native boys, founded by a native, named Jai Nairain, who left at his death two bungalows, the rent of which should apply to its support, and also a large building to be used as a school house and residence. Government added a liberal monthly donation, and this has been one of the most important institutions connected with the mission. It is called "Jai Nairain's College," and has at present about 500 students, which is as many as the building will accommodate. At the last dates, an enlargement of the premises had been commenced. The Brahmin boys outnumber those of any other caste. The usual schools for boys and girls have been maintained for many years with increasing interest. A pleasing fact is mentioned in the Record for November, 1853, by Mrs. Smith, teacher of the "heathen girls' school," viz.: that during the whole year the school had not been once closed on account of a heathen festival. She had told the girls that she desired their attendance on those days especially, that their minds might not be contaminated by the ceremonies practiced.

The native Christian congregation at Benares numbers 314 individuals. The missionaries, of whom there are five, devote much time to itinerating among the surrounding towns and villages, and they usually have no lack of hearers and disputers.

Birdwan.—At the close of the year 1816, the corresponding committee received a communication from Lieutenant Stewart, stationed at Birdwan, 40 miles above Calcutta, proposing an extensive plan of native schools at and near that place. This proposal was adopted, and in a short time ten schools were established, one at Birdwan, and the others in places not far distant. Within a year from their commencement there were 1,000 children in these schools, all taught in the Bengalee language. The number of schools was subsequently increased, but disbanded again for the want of means to sustain so many. The present number is ten, and in the last report—1853—the missionary says, "The number of heathen children who enjoy plain education, founded on the Christian religion, is about 500. In these schools you meet the proud Brahmin sitting at the side of, or below, the Sudra, in harmony and love, deriving the same instruction. The fear of having youths taught in mission schools has, in this neighborhood, almost passed away." Particular mention is made in the circular of the Board for October of last year, of the orphan girls' school, with 150 orphans, upwards of 30 of whom had died while receiving their education, some of them very happily. "This," says the teacher, Mrs. Weitbrecht, "has been one of the most pleasing and encouraging branches of our work in this mission, and has often sustained our spirits when all besides has been dark and trying."

Krishnagur.—This station is a little to the north-west of Calcutta, and was commenced in 1831. The work was continued in the usual way, instruction being given in schools, chapels, and by the distribution of the Scriptures and tracts, till 1835, when a bitter persecution arose against a sect composed partly of Hindoos and partly of Mussulmans, called "Kurta Bhoja," worshipers of the Creator. They worshiped one God, had nothing to do with idols, and believed that God would come into the world in human form. They bore persecution with great patience, and the missionary, Mr. Deerr, on visiting them, was convinced of their sincerity, and was led to admire especially the great love and affection which they bore one to another. In 1836, Mr. Deerr renewed his visit, and was received with increased cordiality. He established public worship among them, in which they united with much joy; and upon this a more rigorous persecution commenced against them. They were treated as out of the pale of heathenism, their caste was gone, and their wives and children were taken from them, and only restored by an order from the magistrate. In 1838, the leading men in ten villages belonging to this sect, avowed their belief in the Gospel, and after instruction, were baptized into the Christian faith. They straightway confessed Christ before the heathen, and established public worship in their villages. This created great excitement, and a still more violent opposition was the result. But the truth spread, the Christians were more in earnest, inquirers were multiplied, and the Word of God prevailed.

At the request of the Corresponding Committee, the Bishop of Calcutta made a careful and thorough investigation into the facts, and made a written report, from which the following is extracted :

"It appears that between fifty-five and sixty villages are thirsting for the waters of life, in a greater or less degree. They stretch to the north and north-east of Krishnagur to the distance of forty or fifty miles, and to the south-west fifteen or twenty. The numbers described as prepared for baptism, in various measures of course, is between 3,000 and 3,500. The Arch-Deacon assisted himself at the reception of about 500 souls, including women and children, into the Christian Church, and there seems the fairest prospect, if we can but enter the wide and effectual door in time, that not only these three or four thousand, but the whole population of the fifty or sixty villages, may receive the Christian faith. Such a glorious scene has never before been presented to our longing eyes in Bengal; and after making all deductions for overstatements, sanguine hopes, &c., it appears that a mighty work of divine grace is begun,—a work wide and permanent, as we trust,—a work for which our fathers in India, Brown, Buchanan, Martyn, Thomason, and Bps. Corrie, Middleton, and Heber, would have blessed and praised God in the loudest strains of gratitude and joy."

Archdeacon Dealtry, who visited the district, and made very diligent and patient investigations as to the origin and history of the sect, says :

"It appears that they have been about sixty years settled on the banks of Jellingha, (a branch of the Ganges). They called themselves 'Kurta Bhoja,' worshipers of the Creator. They had some connection with the sect of Dervishes, supposed to abound in Persia. They had a firm notion of one Supreme Being, rejected with abhorrence all idolatry, held very slightly if at all by caste, and considered the test of proselytism, not eating, but praying to the one true God. They showed an acquaintance generally with the lost estate and sinful nature of man, with the incarnation and holy life of Christ, with the atonement, justification, and sanctification, in their substantial import, and with the necessity of following Christ's example. Jesus Christ was the beginning and end of their religion, and prayer to him was the test of discipleship. They had learnt the ten commandments, the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and Dr. Watts' Catechism. It appeared further, as far as could be ascertained, that they were willing to forsake all for Christ, and endure whatever persecutions might come upon them."

The result was, that the Archdeacon said to the missionaries, "Can any forbid water, that these should not be baptized, who have received the Holy Ghost, in his sanctifying influences, as well as we?" And upon their unanimous vote, baptism was administered to them in separate companies, and from village to village, to the number of over 1,000. In 1841, the Bishop of Calcutta visited the Krishnagur district in person, and after surveying the villages and conversing with the Christians, he said, "I have not a word to retract on reading over my communications of 1839. Time has only developed and confirmed the statements then made."

In 1845, the Papists made an incursion into these Christian villages, under the lead of a Spanish Jesuit Priest, with a view to seduce to Popery the numerous converts from heathenism. They came with large charitable funds, and secured an extensive piece of ground in the centre of the chief station, with a view to erect thereon a church, dwelling house, school, &c. With much force and justice do the society, in their report, speak of the Church of Rome as "turning aside from the 130 millions of heathen in India, to address its labors to a few recent Christian converts who had been taught and fostered by the care of others, thus seeking to enlarge its borders, according to its ancient character, foreshown in the word of God, through the apostasy of Christians rather than through the conversion of the heathen." For a time the efforts of this Jesuit appeared successful, but after two years it is recorded, that "the priest who had intruded upon our work and led astray many of our converts to his errors, has been arrested in his career, and has evidently failed of his designs. Most of his converts are very anxious to be re-admitted into our communion."

Although there were many apostasies from time to time, of those who "did run well," yet a favorable account is given of the stability and Christian consistency of a large number of the professed converts, and in very few instances has there been a more signal display of the grace of God among the heathen, than at Krishnagur. In 1848, the missionaries say, "Seventeen years ago the name of Krishnagur first appeared in the records of our society, as an out-station to Birdwan. This was the first attempt of the missionary to disturb the unbroken heathenism of the district. Now, Mr. Cuthbert, one of the missionaries, reports missions and mission work as rooted and settled in the land as firmly as the English people are in India, and more so." Seven stations were occupied, substantial and durable churches, school houses and dwelling houses, had been built, neat and convenient cottages had sprung up in all the Christian villages, and the labors of the missionaries and school teachers were attended with the most gratilying success. Were there space for it, it would be gratifying to present much more full details of the revival in this district, and of its results; but the narrative must be closed, with a reference to the Church Missionary Record for 1837, and onward, for a complete history of the work.

Chunar.—This station is near Benares, far to the north-west of Calcutta, and its missionary operations date a little earlier than those of Benares. But it has seldom, if at any time, had more than one missionary, and less has been expended upon it than upon almost any other station of the Church Society, of so long continuance. The most recent report says, "This station cannot be continued much longer on the Society's list, being only occasionally visited by a missionary, and the native Christian flock consisting of persons connected with the cantonment, and therefore properly belonging to the ministerial charge of the chaplain of the station."

Mirut.—The first missionary to this station, which is about 32 miles north-east of Delhi, and near the Ganges, arrived in 1815. It was considered an important position, and for fifteen years or more the mission was conducted with ordinary zeal and success, though the number of laborers was never great. In 1842 the station was left without a missionary, only the Government chaplain being on the ground. In his appeal for help, he says, "There is still a native flock of 32 Christians, without a pastor, and altogether depending on the care of a native reader. The widowed state of the mission is a constant source of grief to the local committee." At the same time the Bishop of Calcutta speaks of this mission as one of the oldest in that part of India, and now in danger of becoming entirely extinct—a mission with all the heavy external apparatus complete—a mission which possesses a mission residence, with alms-houses for native Christians when destitute—a mission in one of the largest stations, and most healthy, in all India, and where almost unlimited funds might be raised if it were vigorously sustained. In 1846, after four years' suspension of operations, a missionary, Rev. Mr. Lamb, was provided for this station, and its prospects brightened. During the four years preceding 1850, eleven adults were baptized, and have given satisfactory evidence of sincerity. The latest account is contained in the Record for November, 1853, when the congregation of native worshipers numbered 150, the English school contained about fifty boys, houses had been built for widows, and the Christian village was extending its limits. Mirut is memorable as the place where the distinguished native catechist, Anund Messeeh, was baptized, in 1816, and where he commenced those labors which have been of such signal service to the cause of missions in India.

Delhi.—For several years Delhi was the seat of an interesting mission, chiefly under the care of Anund Messeeh, the distinguished native catechist and reader. He had been for some time a teacher at Mirut, not far distant, and his first visit to Delhi after his conversion appears to have been in 1818, his wife, a brother and two sisters being there, and some hope of their conversion being entertained. While there a report was in circulation, that a number of strangers from several villages to the west of Delhi had assembled together, nobody knew why, in a place near the imperial city, and were busily employed in friendly conversation, and in reading some books in their possession, which induced them to renounce their caste, to bind themselves to love and to associate with one another, and intermarry only among their own sect, and to lead a strict and holy life. Anund immediately set off for the place of rendezvous, and found about 500 people, men, women, and children, seated under the shade of the trees, and employed in reading and conversation. On further inquiry it turned out that these people belonged to a sect of native Christians, called Saadhs, and that the book they had was the New Testament. Many copies of it were in the possession of the party, some printed, in the Hindostanee tongue, and some written. They professed great love for this book, called it the book of God, and said that the written copies they wrote themselves, having no other means of obtaining a supply. Subsequent investigations led to the discovery, that these poor strangers had existed as a distinct sect for 5 or 6 years, having separated themselves from the authority and control of the Brahmins, both in temporal and spiritual things, being disgusted by their tyranny and extortion, as well as determined to exercise their own judgment more freely in matters of religion. Before this general secession of the Saadhs, the Brahmins, it is said, had hated them, and subjected them to such exorbitant exactions as to cause general misery and discontent. When once the leaven of their discontent began to work, their numbers increased daily, and their tenets continued to spread. The particular tract of country occupied by the Saadhs, lay to the north-west and west of Delhi, some fifty miles. They had five villages, in one of which was found ten copies of the Gospel, which they accounted more precious than gold, and would give any thing for a larger supply.

In his tour among these villages, Anund Messeeh was received with great reverence, and would have been almost worshiped had he not rebuked such a tendency. At the principal village, the people gathered together every night, for worship, each praying extemporaneously, and blessing and praising the one true God for all his mercies.

It was with particular reference to the care and instruction of these people, that Messee, about this time, was stationed at Delhi, for there the Saadhs could visit him, and he in turn could visit them at their houses, so that they would be sure of religious instruction. It is supposed that the copies of the Gospel in their possession were those distributed by a missionary, Mr. Chamberlain, while on an exploring tour in that quarter. Favorable accounts continued to be received of Anund's labors, until 1827, when he was removed from Delhi to another station, and subsequently to this the intelligence respecting the Saadhs is very imperfect. A full account of them may be seen in the Missionary Register, for 1818, pp. 17, and 203.

Agra.—Incipient missionary labors appear to have been commenced at Agra, some 50 miles south of Delhi, as early as 1815. The mission was for some time under the care of the Rev. Mr. Corrie, chaplain at this station, assisted by a native Christian, Abdool Messee, whose character and labors are spoken of in terms of high commendation. An institution for orphan children was an object of special care at this place, and in the calamitous famine of 1838, when 300 children were preserved from starvation by the benevolence of the Christian public, these children were all received by the committee of the Orphan Institution, and provided with a home and suitable instruction. Agra has been provided with schools of various grades, and with missionaries, so as to render it one of the most efficient and important of the Church Society in northern India. A new building for the high school, or college, had been completed, in 1853, and 200 boys were under instruction in this institution. This mission has had the advantage of a printing press, and many of the orphan boys have labored in connection with it so as to provide for their own support.

Jaunpore.—This was an extension of the Benares mission, effected in 1838. The missionary was soon removed, however, and for four years this station was without a missionary. But the Record for November, 1853, says, "This station has once more a resident missionary, and a small Christian flock, numbering about 30 individuals."

Gorruckpore.—This place, at a considerable distance north-west of Calcutta, was visited from Benares in 1823, and a mission was commenced which has been continued to the present time. It has now one missionary, two native congregations, a large English school, orphan schools, and a vernacular school.

Bhagulpur.—The mission at this place was commenced in 1850, and at the last accounts there had been 41 baptisms. The hill tribes around this mission are said to have no caste, and no antiquated system of religion, and are regarded therefore as more likely to receive the Gospel freely and at once.

Himalaya.—This mission was commenced in 1844. Its labors consisted for a time in the establishment of small village schools, and itinerating among the population of the mountains, but it became a very important mission, and is still so regarded. Being in the mountain regions in the north of Hindostan, and among a people little known before, some notice of their character, religion, &c., may be expected.

The principal station of the mission is Kot-gurh, situated 7,000 feet above the level of the sea, and 100 miles from the plains of India. It is the key of central Asia, and the granary of all the countries to the north and east. The missionary, Rev. J. D. Prochnow, describes the country, the influence of the Sikh war, and the various means by which this vast field had been opened to missionary labor; and then proceeds to give a description of the people themselves. They consist of three classes:

"First, the Hill people, who are all Hindoos, though their ways of living and of worship are very different from those of the plains. In their rites, they bear a great resemblance to the Jews of old. They carry their Deotas—wooden chairs dressed up, with human faces fixed to them—on their shoulders, and dance before them in a peculiar manner, as the Jews of old before the ark. In their music, their observances of the new moon, fasting, and many other things, they also resemble the Jews; but more than any thing else, in their sacrifices to atone the wrath of the Deota, viz.: the sprinkling of blood on the posts and doors of the temple and houses. All this shows that the hill tribes of the Himalaya mission at Kot-gurh, are far from being in a savage and entirely uncivilized state. They understand all the terms of our religion. I never found the least difficulty in making them, even the women, understand the great truths of the Gospel, if only brought before them in simple language. To the Hindoo mountaineers, as we have been without assistance, our labors have hitherto been chiefly confined."

"The second class are the wandering Tartars, or the Buddhist mountaineers of the higher hills. These people are very peculiar every way, in their habits, religion, language, &c. They come down from the high tablelands by thousands, to spend the winter months in the valleys, all divided into small families, bringing their sheep and goats along with them, together with the produce of their country,—raisins, borax, wool, dried apricots, silk, precious stones, &c. These they dispose of during the winter months, feeding their flocks in the valleys of the rivers, for they would find no food for them in their own country at this season ; and in May all these families move again towards their native hills, with their bags filled with grain. So they avoid the rainy season of the lower hills, and enjoy the fine summer of the higher hills. These wandering tribes alone form a very interesting field of labor. Their religion is Buddhism, and there are plenty of monks and nuns among them."

"The third class is the Sikhs. They are all of one caste, and are readily influenced by the preaching of the missionaries. Those of them who have been converted to Christianity at Caunpore and Benares are very highly spoken of, as being far superior to the Hindoo converts."

As to the success of this mission, Mr.

Procknow says, "I must confess with deep humiliation, visible fruits have been few ; but considering all the difficulties which have beset us from our very first beginning until now, I am by no means discouraged. The seed has fallen into good ground ; it will spring up in God's own time." The greatest difficulty in the way of giving success to this, and many other new and important missions, the committee say, is the "paucity of missionary laborers."

The Punjaub.—The mission to the Punjaub was commenced in 1852, and has two missionaries, assisted by three native catechists and readers. Portions of Scripture, books and tracts, in Punjaub, Urdu, and Hindi, have been put into circulation. A school has been commenced, with 50 scholars, half of whom are Sikhs, and the rest Hindoos and Mussulmans. For a fuller account of the Punjaub mission, see Missionary Intelligencer for May and November, 1852.

SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL.—This society commenced its operations in Hindostan in 1818, not long after the arrival of Bishop Middleton, the first bishop of Calcutta. He was at this time devising a plan for the foundation at Calcutta of a missionary college, but as the Society's funds were pledged to already existing missions in the western world, no resource was left except in vigorous efforts for the augmentation of its income. Accordingly a memorial was presented to the Prince Regent, praying that a royal letter, authorizing a general collection, might, as in former reigns, be issued ; and an appeal was made to the public for the means of entering upon that new sphere of labor which the establishment of the Episcopate in India had opened.

Bishop's College.—The first great work, therefore, to which the Society, under the advice of the Bishop, gave itself in India, was the foundation of a Missionary College near Calcutta. To this the proceeds of the royal letter of 1819, amounting altogether to £45,747, were devoted. The college was designed on a scale to meet not merely the present wants of the missions, but such as would be required by a growing church. The plan combined chapel, hall, library, and printing-press; and the establishment was meant to afford instruction, not only in the sacred and classical languages, but also in the principal languages and dialects of India. Accommodation was to be provided for three professors and twenty students. A most eligible site, about four miles below Calcutta, and on the opposite side of the Hoogley, was presented by the Honorable East India Company.

The original object of the college was the education of native, East Indian, and European youth, for the service of the church; but the college was some years afterwards enlarged for the reception of law students. Another purpose was the translation of the Holy Scriptures and of the Liturgy into the native languages of India. The Rev. W. H. Mill, fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, was appointed the first Principal, and embarked, in company with Rev. J. H. Alt, of Pembroke Hall, as Professor, in August, 1820. It was a considerable time, however, before the necessary buildings were completed; and the actual work of education did not commence till March, 1824, which was after the death of Bishop Middleton, to whom the College owed its foundation, and who had done much more than provide for the erection of the material fabric. He had suggested that a connection should be established between Bishop's College and the "School for the Orphans of Clergy," in St. John's Wood, which might generally be looked to as a nursery of lads who might afterwards be transplanted to Calcutta, and be there educated for the same ministry as that in which their fathers had served, though it was to be exercised in a far distant land. This suggestion, which met with the cordial and unanimous approval of the Society, received also the approbation of the governors of the Clergy Orphan School. Three boys were, with the full consent of their guardians, at once dedicated to the missionary service. This connection, however, between the Orphan School and the College, was not long continued.

As soon as the college began to send out its alumni, missions were established in some of the more important villages to the south of Calcutta. The first ones formed were at Cossipore, Tallygunge, Howrah, and Barripûr; and no sooner had the laborers entered into the harvest than fruit was gathered in. Each year's report contains the account of many baptisms of infants, and not a few conversions of adults. Substantial stone churches, which had been erected at great cost, at Barripûr and Mogra Hât, were consecrated toward the end of 1846; and at the same time eighty persons from those two districts were admitted to the rite of confirmation. The last report which has been received from Calcutta contains the following gratifying notices: "In the missions of Tallygunge and Barripûr the converts continue steadfast, and numerous accessions to the household of faith are taking place, but have ceased to attract persecution or obtain notice." In the circle of Mogra Hât and Dhanghatta, the congregations have continued steadily to increase, and other adjoining hamlets now contain believers. The missions extend over an area of forty miles north to south, by from twelve to twenty miles east to west. In the summer of 1850, they embraced 113 villages, 26 chapels, 7 schools, 55 readers and schoolmasters, 1,127 communicants, 2,459 baptized persons, and 1,215 catechumens.

Cawnpore.—The mission of Cawnpore, a large city about 600 miles north-west from Calcutta, with a population of 100,000, and an important military post, was established in 1841. In 1845 the Society, in compliance with the earnest recommendations of the Bishop of Calcutta, voted the sum of £700 for the erection of substantial missionary buildings. The two first missionaries, Rev. Messrs. Perkins and Schleicher, are still on the ground, and besides the ordinary duties of preaching they superintend a school for boys, and an asylum for orphan girls, which has been the means of training several Christian girls for the duties of life, and preparing others to meet an early death.

Madras.—The missions in the south of India, which had originally been founded by Frederic IV., King of Denmark, in 1705, and which had afterwards passed into the hands of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, were by them consigned to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, in 1825. (See p. 328). There were then in the Madras presidency, in connection with that society, only nine missionary stations and seven missionaries—all of them German.

The interruption and discouragement of missionary work occasioned by the death, in quick succession, of four bishops of Calcutta,—Middleton in 1822, Heber in 1826, James in 1829, and Turner in 1831,—tended grievously to retard the progress of the Society's operations in India, and though during this period name after name was added to the missionary roll, no remarkable advance was made till after the subdivision of the diocese of Calcutta, by the erection of the See of Madras, in 1835. Even up to that time, the number of missionaries in that part of India had not been raised beyond nine; but in 1836 four were added, and in the following year the total number was sixteen. Bishop Corrie was removed by death, only a little more than a year after his return to Madras as bishop, and again the active direction of the missions of Southern India was suspended. Since that period, however, they have been abundantly blessed, more especially those in the district of Tinnevely. This district had, for missionary purposes, been for a long time dependent on the mission of Tanjore, and all the missions in the South had for many years been sustained by the interest of the munificent legacy of £10,000, which the devoted Swartz had bequeathed to them.

Tinnevely.—The first resident missionary for Tinnevely was appointed in 1829; a second was sent in 1834; and a third in 1843. It was in the next year, 1844, that the very remarkable movement towards Christianity took place in the mission of Sawyerpuram. Many villages expressed their desire of Christian instruction, and many hundred natives were at once admitted as catechumens.

Another mission in which wonderful progress has been made of late years, is Edeyenkoody. For two or three years little appears to have been effected, but from 1844 to the present time, the progress of the work has been very observable. The number of persons under Christian instruction is 2,054. From 1844 to 1849 inclusive, twenty adults, on an average, were baptized each year. During the year 1850, though the same strict system of examination was maintained, 75 adults were admitted to baptism, of whom 70 were baptized in one day, in the presence of a congregation of 800 native Christians.

Another mission, Christianagram, was opened about the same time as Sawyerpuram, and in 1849 there were 1,579 persons under Christian instruction.

The mission of Nazareth has also been a very flourishing one. At the beginning of 1850 there were 2,292 baptized persons, and 1,563 more under Christian instruction. Much has been done of late to raise the qualifications and increase the efficiency of the catechists and native readers. The seminaries at Sawyerpuram, Vediapuram, and Vepery, serve for the education of missionaries, while a school for the boarding and education of native girls has forty-four pupils under instruction. A seminary for theological students, and such as may be candidates for the office of catechist, has been formed at Madras.

Bombay.—In the year 1839, a mission was commenced in Bombay, and a substantial chapel and school-houses were erected.—Each school comprised one department for day scholars and one for boarders. The latter has been made the means of rescuing many orphan and other poor children from destitution.

Guzerat.—The mission in the province of Guzerat was first established in 1830, but it met with a sad check in the early death of its first missionary, Rev. Mr. Pettinger. Years elapsed before his place was filled, but at length two missionaries were sent to Ahmedabad, the chief city of Guzerat. But subsequent removals weakened the mission, and in 1850 it was transferred to the Bombay Diocesan Committee.

ENGLISH BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—(For an account of the origin of this Society and of its mission to India, see Baptist Missionary Society.) In March, 1793, Messrs. Carey and Thomas attended a farewell service of great solemnity at Leicester, and soon afterwards proceeded to Ryde, in the Isle of Wight, and embarked on board a ship for India. The Captain, however, was informed that he must not proceed with ministers who were unlicensed by the East India Company, and he returned to the shore. Mr. Carey hastened to London in the deepest distress and even Andrew Fuller quailed at the news, and said, "We are all undone." Mr. Thomas was more hopeful and cheerful. The interval before the sailing of another vessel was employed in renewed efforts to persuade Mrs. Carey to accompany her husband (she having steadily refused,) and with success. This joyful result indicated to Mr. Carey the design of Providence in their disappointment.

In June, 1793, they all embarked in the Kron Princessa Maria, a Danish East India-man, and on the morning of sailing one of them addressed a London minister, saying, "The ship is come, the signal made, the guns are fired, and we are going with a fine fair wind. Farewell, my dear brethren and sisters, farewell. May the God of Jacob be ours and yours, by sea and land, for time and eternity. Most affectionately adieu." They had a prosperous voyage of about five months, and arrived in Balasore roads on the 7th of November, and on the 10th went on shore.

After the arrival of the missionaries in Bengal, they were much perplexed respecting a place of residence, and after three weeks they proceeded to Bandell, a Portuguese settlement about thirty miles from Calcutta. Not finding it expedient to remain long here, Mr. Carey, with only his own family and a native guide, removed to a considerable distance into the interior, and found a resting place and a field of labor at Collahtullah. Here he erected an humble dwelling, and entered upon the work of teaching a wild and fierce people, from whom, and from the tigers and other wild animals that roamed through those forests, the rest of the population had fled to a distance. But this proved to be but a temporary field, for another call, which to the mind of Mr. Carey was imperative, invited him to a place called Mudnabatty, about 260 miles north of Calcutta. Owing to unavoidable causes, the investment of money taken out for Mr. Carey's immediate support was lost, and he was left in a strange land with no means of subsistence: added to this was personal illness, the sickness of his family, and the irreligion of the Europeans by whom he was surrounded, all which pressed heavily upon his spirits. In this condition, early in 1794, a gentleman who afterwards filled some of the most important stations in the government of India, offered to Messrs. Carey and Thomas the superintendence of two indigo factories, which he was about to establish in the vicinity of Malda. This opened the way for the removal of all pecuniary difficulties, and also promised the most beneficial results by placing each of the missionaries in the midst of more than a thousand people to whom they would have access. They therefore accepted the proposal, and Mr. Carey fixed his residence at Mudnabatty, about thirty miles from Malda, and Mr. Thomas settled at Moy-pauldiggy, sixteen miles further north. Soon after reaching his new home Mr. Carey was visited with affliction, in the death of one of his children. Of this event Mr. Carey writes, January, 1795: "When my dear boy died, I could not prevail upon any one to make him a coffin, though we had carpenters in our own employ: and it was with difficulty that I engaged four Mussulmen to dig a grave for him. We went seven or eight miles for two persons to carry the body to the place of interment, but in vain, and my wife and I had agreed to do it ourselves, when a lad who had lost caste, and our mater (servant), who performed the most servile offices, were induced to relieve us of this most painful service." The four Mussulmen lost caste, and all the people in the village were forbidden to eat, drink, or smoke with them.

On the 1st of November, 1795, the missionaries formed a church at Mudnabatty, consisting of themselves and two Englishmen. In 1796, Mr. John Fountain was sent out to reinforce the mission. In the early part of 1797, Messrs. Carey and Thomas made an excursion to Bootan, preaching Christ in many places where his name had never before been heard. During the year 1798 a school was established, and a printing-press was set up at Mudnabatty for the printing of the Scriptures, the translation of which was nearly completed.

In April, 1799, four missionaries, Messrs. Ward, Brunsdon, Grant, and Marshman, sailed for India, where they arrived on the 12th of the following October. They proceeded to Serampore, a village on the banks of the Hoogly, fifteen miles from Calcutta, described by Mr. Grant as "a beautiful little town, and esteemed the most healthy in all India." It was a Danish settlement, and very much the resort of decayed tradesmen, and gentlemen who had been unsuccessful in business at Calcutta. It contained about 50 English houses, and was inhabited by Danes, English, Scots, Germans, Greeks, Armenians, Irish, Bengalees, and Portuguese. They waited at an inn a few days, expecting the arrival of Mr. Carey, when one of their number, Mr. Grant, suddenly sickened and died. In November, Messrs. Ward and Fountain went to Mudnabatty, to consult with Mr. Carey respecting the removal of the whole mission family to Serampore. The factory at Mudnabatty had declined, and added to this were other considerations of great force, and the removal was determined upon.

Mr. Carey arrived at Serampore on the 10th of January, 1800, and was kindly received by the Governor. They purchased a large house in the middle of the town, situated by the river side, with a large piece of ground walled round, a garden at the bottom and a pool of water in the centre.

On the 17th of March, 1800, is recorded at Serampore: "On this memorable day, the first page of the New Testament was composed for printing in Bengalee." Immediately upon their settlement at this place, they commenced a system of itineracy, and going out, generally two and two, they preached and held discussions with the natives. On the 24th of April, the missionaries united together as a church, Carey being chosen pastor, and Fountain and Marshman deacons. May 26, they began to print the first sheet of the New Testament; 1700 copies were printed on Patna paper, and 300 on English. A Bengalese school of 40 children was also in operation.

In June, this missionary circle were called to a severe affliction in the death of Mr. Fountain. He died at Dinagapore, at the age of thirty-three. About the same time Mr. Thomas fell into a state of temporary insanity, which deprived the mission for a time of his services. On the 22d of December, five individuals, four natives and a son of Mr. Carey, appeared for baptism and church communion, and on the 29th Mr. Carey writes, "Yesterday was a day of great joy. I had the happiness to desecrate the Gunga, by baptizing the first Hindoo, Krishno, and my son Felix." In January, 1801, two other natives were baptized and received to the church. The 7th of February was observed as a day of thanksgiving, it being the day on which they finished the composition of the New Testament, which had occupied nine months. About this time, Krishno, self-moved, erected a house for God opposite his own, and Mr. Carey preached in it to about twenty natives. This was the first native place of worship in Bengal.

In the spring of this year, Serampore, which had been under the Danish government, quietly passed into the hands of the English, without the firing of a gun. Mr. Carey writes, "Serampore is in the hands of the English, but we have nothing to fear. I was appointed Bengalee and Sanscrit professor in the college of Fort William, by Lord Wellesley, expressly under the character of a missionary. I have now gone through one term." The year 1801 was mournfully distinguished by the death of two more of the missionaries—Mr. Brunsdon, at the age of 23, and Mr. Thomas, the early coadjutor of Carey.

In May, 1802, Rev. John Chamberlain sailed for India, with his wife, by way of America, and reached Serampore on the 27th of January, 1803. He added great strength to the mission, both by his pious zeal and his learning. His progress in acquiring the language was so rapid, that in one year he could speak the Bengalee with a facility and accuracy that equaled any of his cotemporaries.

The English Baptist Mission in India is now brought down to the early part of 1804, a period of ten years from its commencement. During this time, amid many changes, sorrows, and discouragements, the missionaries had penetrated the regions of idolatry, and gained a footing for the Gospel by the breaking of caste; they had obtained a victory almost as great over the language, and had produced the New Testament in Bengalee; they had established a printing-press, by which the translations were capable of indefinite multiplication, and by means of which, also, tracts or other works could be put into the most extensive circulation; they had secured the conversion of many natives, some of whom were becoming valuable helpers in the diffusion of the Gospel; they had opened schools for native youth of both sexes; and finally, they had, by their letters and journals, given a powerful impulse to the spirit of missions at home. In view of these results, and the fact, also, that this mission was prior to any other, either English or American, in India, it will be admitted that a degree of success had been realized far beyond what could have been reasonably anticipated.

On the 9th of January, 1804, Mr. Chamberlain left Serampore to visit Saugur Island, whither thousands were daily flocking to their annual poojah, or festival. He was accompanied in this important journey by Felix Carey, Krishna, and another convert named Bhyrub. Some details in regard to the island in question will shed light both upon the shocking and degrading customs of the Hindoos, and upon the obstacles which the Gospel had to encounter in that quarter.

The island of Gunga Saugur is situated at the extreme point of land where the great western, or holiest branch of the Ganges unites its waters with those of the Indian Ocean; and is so called from the Sanscrit appellation sagor, or sea, and ganga, or river, the latter term being emphatically applied to denote the Ganges, the chief of rivers. The island is a flat, swampy, and cheerless shore, but it is the scene of one of the most celebrated places of pilgrimage in India. Its peculiar sanctity arises from its situation at the junction, or point of confluence of the Ganges and the ocean, where the purifying virtue of the waters is believed to be mightily increased. Here there is a ruinous temple, erected in honor of the great sage of Kapila, the founder of one of the chief schools of Indian philosophy, who is here revered as a god. Twice in the year, vast crowds of Hindoos resort to this temple and neighborhood, to perform obsequies for the good of their deceased ancestors, and to practice various ablutions in the waters of such efficacy. "The reverence with which the Ganges is regarded," says Dr. Duff, "almost exceeds imagination. At the January festival at Gunga Saugur, hundreds of mothers were accustomed to throw their unconscious infants into the turbid waters; and they bewailed the sacrifice as lost and the gods unpropitiated, if they commissioned not the sharks and other monsters of the deep to crush and devour them before their eyes." Mr. Chamberlain says, Jan. 13th, 1804, "Words fail to give a true description of this scene. Here an immensely populous city has been raised in a very few days, full of streets, lanes, bazaars, &c., and crowds upon crowds of men, women, and children, high and low, rich and poor, are seen bathing in the water, and worshipping Gunga. The mud and water of this place are esteemed very holy, and are taken hundreds of miles on the shoulders of men. The lowest computation of the people here is one lac, or 100,000, and perhaps two lacs is nearer the truth." To these deluded multitudes Mr. Chamberlain preached the Gospel, and gave books and tracts as opportunities occurred.

In the spring of this year Mr. Chamberlain was stationed at Cutwa, seventy-five miles north of Calcutta. His wife was his only companion in this dark region, and of her he was bereaved in the following November. Fourteen months later he married Mrs. Grant, widow of that lamented missionary. But she also died in a few months, and he was left to mourn under a second bereavement. But notwithstanding his trials, he pursued his work with unremitting diligence. In reviewing his labors, Mr. Chamberlain says, "It is now five years since Providence fixed my lot here. What can I write of the works of God? Millions of the heathen have heard the glorious report, either from preaching, or from the distribution of upwards of one hundred thousand tracts, and many hundreds of the Scriptures. Some read the Scriptures, some the tracts, many converse on these things. The heaven is at work, though as yet its operations are in silence. At present converts are few." Amid all his other labors Mr. Chamberlain kept an occasional school of about 40 scholars, for whose benefit he had translated Dr. Watts's Catechism and a few hymns. He also made several visits to Berhampore, a military station 45 miles from Cutwa, preaching the Gospel to the soldiers with so much success that he gathered a church there of twenty-four members.

In September, 1809, Mr. Chamberlain was married to his third wife, Miss Underwood, with whom he had been acquainted in England, and who was one of the first to direct his mind to the missionary service. About this time, by advice of his brethren, he removed to Agra. On account of his facility in acquiring languages, his acquaintance with the original Scriptures, especially the Hebrew, and his tried zeal and experience in the missionary work, they considered him as exceedingly suited to engage in a mission where at least two versions of the Scriptures, the Hindoo and the Sikh, would require to be carefully examined and improved.

During the five years through which we have followed Mr. Chamberlain, the brethren had been steadily pursuing their work at Serampore and other places. In the early part of 1805, four additional missionaries from England arrived in Bengal, having sailed by way of America. In January of this year a new place of worship was opened at Calcutta, 4,800 rupees having been contributed for the purpose. In June following they built a new printing office, with room for three presses and a bindery. During this year fifteen natives were added to the church, and some Europeans. Some idea may be formed of the labors of the indefatigable Carey, from a letter of his to a friend in England, in which he says, "You may perhaps wonder that I write no more letters, but when you see what I am engaged in you will cease to wonder. I translate into Bengalee; and from Sanscrit into English. Every proof sheet of the Bengalee and Mahratta Scriptures, the Sanscrit Grammar, and the Ramayunee, must go three times at least through my hands. A dictionary of the Sanscrit goes once, at least, through my hands. I have written and printed a second edition of my Bengalee grammar, wholly worked over and greatly enlarged, and a Mahratta grammar; and collected materials for a Mahratta dictionary. Besides this, I preach twice a week, frequently thrice, and attend upon collegiate duties. I do not mention this because I think my work a burthen,—it is a real pleasure,—but to show that my not writing many letters is not because I neglect my brethren, or wish them to cease writing to me."

In the missionary journals of this period particular mention is made of the death of two native converts of distinction,—Petumber Shingee, and Krishno Presaud; and deeply interesting obituary notices are given.

In 1806, and onward for two or three years, the missionaries experienced severe trials from the opposition of the Indo-British government, which was determined to conciliate the Hindoos by protecting their idolatrous forms of worship against all interference from the missionaries. Prejudiced and infidel Europeans circulated the most false and injurious reports, and kindled in Britain the fire of hatred to the missionary enterprise, on the ground that it was fraught with danger to their eastern possessions. Rev. Andrew Fuller was at once looked to as the most suitable person, from his station, talent, and familiarity with the subject, to repel these assaults, and with characteristic zeal and power he met the exigency. His first production was "An Apology for the late Christian Missions to India, in three parts." The first section was issued separately in 1807, and so nearly did its work that the court at the India House dismissed the complaints, and refused to interfere with the propagation of Christianity in India. The two other sections followed in quick succession, and so thoroughly silenced the adversaries of missions, that no effective opposition was ever afterwards made. The Quarterly Review, in this controversy, rendered valuable assistance to the missionary cause.

At the close of 1809, Mr. Ward remarks, in a review of the mission, "that from the year 1788, when Thomas began to converse with the natives in Bengalee, to the end of 1800, when Krishno was baptized, the work of God in Bengal made but little apparent progress. Much preparatory work, however, was performed; but from the time when this, the first native who had ever publicly renounced caste in Bengal, entered the church, the word of the Lord seemed to have a more free course, and was glorified. The church at Serampore had now received 190 members, by the various modes of admission, in its two branches of Serampore and Calcutta. The number baptized in all the churches in 1809, amounted to sixty-seven; two or three only having been suspended or excluded. The cost of the chapel at Calcutta, amounting to about 30,000 rupees, was nearly paid; several native itinerants had been sent forth, and a valuable mission property had been created. Besides the labors of brethren at Cutwa, Berhampore, &c., a door of entrance had

The state of the translations at this date—1809—is given by Mr. Ward as follows: "In Bengalee, the whole Bible was printed and published in five volumes. In Sanscrit, the New Testament was published, and part of the Pentateuch printed. In Orissa, the New Testament and the practical books were printed and published, and a considerable part of the prophetic books printed. In Hindostanee, the New Testament was printed to the end of Romans. In Mahratta, the New Testament was finished as far as the middle of Acts. In the Sikh language, the New Testament was put to press. Besides the progress at press, the greater part of the whole Bible was translated into Hindostanee, the New Testament and part of the Pentateuch into the Sikh, the New Testament and nearly all the practical books into the Mahratta; the New Testament and part of the Pentateuch into the Kurnata and Telinga; and the blocks for nearly the whole of Matthew were cut and some sheets of the first part thrown off for revision, in Chinese." "Thus," continues Mr. Ward, "mountains of difficulty, common to first efforts, have been removed; formidable attempts to overturn the work have been rendered abortive; facilities of the most important nature opened to us; a number of persons acquainted with the languages have been raised up, and are at their posts; access to the people of Bengal, Bootan, Orissa, Burmah, and China, obtained by a knowledge of their languages; the Holy Scriptures are distributing or are to be distributed among all these, and other nations, in their own tongue; the printing office belonging to the mission contains Sanscrit, Hindostanee, Arabic, Persian, Bengalee, Orissa, Telinga, Sikh, Mahratta, Greek, Hebrew, and English types, besides presses, and every other article necessary for printing the sacred volume. And now, brethren, has not God completely refuted the notion that all attempts to promote the Gospel among the Hindoos are vain? This happy degree of success, which surprises even us who are on the ground, has been gained within the space of nine years, for it is no more since the baptism of the first Hindoo."

In 1810 the missionaries arranged their labors under the specific designation of "The United Missionaries in India," comprehending the Bengal, the Burman, the Orissa, the Bootan, and the Hindostan. This afforded a convenient method of keeping in distinct view the information they communicated respecting their diversified operations.

The Bengal mission included five stations, Serampore and Calcutta being considered one, Dinagepore and Saddamahl another, Goamalty the third, Cutwa the fourth, and Jessore the fifth. Dinagepore is about 260 miles north of Calcutta; Cutwa 75 miles north north-west; and Jessore, 60 miles north; Goamalty was soon abandoned for a more eligible station, called English-bazar, in the Poorniya district.

The Burman mission had not yet made any considerable advances, the labors being of a preparatory kind. The same was true of the Orissa and Bootan missions.

The Hindostanee mission consisted of two stations, Patna and Agra. The former is a large city, 300 miles north-west of Calcutta, and the latter is reached by a journey of a thousand miles up the Ganges. The missionaries, Chamberlain and Peacock, reached this place in May 1811. Mr. Chamberlain was soon called to great affliction in the death of two daughters, one of whom could read and converse in three languages, and gave decided evidences of piety. A few months later he was called to part with his only remaining child.

In 1811 the number of members in all the churches exceeded 300, one-third of whom had been added within little more than a year; and among these it was said that the proportion of members who were qualified for public labor, was much greater than the average in the British churches. Fifteen years before this time the church in Bengal numbered four members, and it had doubled six times, or once in three years.

On the 11th of March, 1812, the mission printing house was entirely destroyed by fire. The building, which was 200 feet long, was a total loss; and the articles consumed were, upwards 1,400 reams of English paper; 4,460 pounds of English types; a double font of Greek, and a small one of Hebrew; twelve fonts of types in the different languages of India, among which were a font of Persian, worth 3,000 rupees, a valuable font of Arabic, and a double font of Nagree, containing 1,600 lbs. weight; all the cases, frames, and other printing utensils; books in various languages, to the amount of 5,000 rupees; manuscripts to the value of 7,000 rupees, among which were a Sanscrit dictionary, in five folio volumes, and the materials for a Polyglot dictionary of all the languages derived from the Sanscrit. There were burnt also more than fifty-five thousand sheets printed off but not folded, among which were seven sheets, of a thousand copies each, of Mr. Martyn's Hindostanee New Testament in the Persian character; five sheets, five thousand each, of the Tamil New Testament; four sheets of the Calcutta Bible Society's Report, &c. A paper mill, and some presses and materials in a building adjoining the printing office, were saved. The loss amounted to nearly £10,000, no part of which was insured. But they recovered from the ruins the punches and melted metal, and immediately commenced recasting the type, and in about a fortnight, with the presses they had saved, were able to renew the work of printing in one language. In a month or two the fonts were so far restored that the printing of the Scriptures was resumed on a large scale, and the presses were going day and night. This sudden rising from what seemed an overwhelming misfortune, occasioned the remark in a Calcutta paper, that "zeal and perseverance are qualities that happily distinguish the character of the missionaries; their ardor, instead of being repressed, derives a new impulse from difficulties and misfortunes."

No sooner did the sad intelligence of the fire at Serampore arrive in England, than the Christian public hastened to repair the loss. "A strong sensation," writes Mr. Fuller, "was felt throughout the kingdom, not only in our own denomination, but among Christians of every name, each vieing with the other to repair the loss." The entire sum required was raised in the short space of fifty days, and even after this contributions continued with unabated liberality. But the greatest advantage was the powerful impulse given to the mission, by rendering it more generally known, and producing a simultaneous feeling of interest in all denominations.

In October, seven months after the conflagration, Mr. Carey writes to Mr. Fuller, that though his manuscript of the Sanscrit translation had been destroyed, yet he had re-translated the whole of it, and had begun new translations in the Nepalese; the Push-too, or that of the Affghans; the Biblochee, which was spoken on the west shore of the Indus, towards Persia; and the Maldivo Islands. Mr. Chamberlain had also translated the Gospels into Brij-Bhasha. Such was the surprising courage and energy of these men.

At the close of 1812, the general state of the mission was encouraging. A work of grace was proceeding in the 24th regiment, then in the fort at Calcutta, from which eleven had made a public profession of religion during the year. Nearly seventy had been added to the church at Serampore and Calcutta during the same time, and nearly every native capable of speaking, itinerated on the Sabbath through the neighboring towns. About this time Mr. (now Dr.) Carey, wrote to Mr. Fuller, that there was a general spirit of inquiry about the Gospel throughout the country, and that Christians, either Europeans or natives, were to be found in every direction. He mentioned five natives of high caste, near Serampore, who had recently been baptized, but who had come to the knowledge of the truth without any communication with the missionaries. The Bibles and tracts with which they had met, had been the instruments of their conversion.

Early in 1813, there was a demonstration of hostility from the government, and several of the missionaries were threatened with expulsion. One was actually compelled to leave in haste for England. But the evil was of very limited extent, and the scene of the persecution, Calcutta and the vicinity, "blossomed like the garden of the Lord." In Calcutta there was a congregation of 120 attentive hearers. Thirty had joined the church, and many others were about to do so, from the 24th regiment. In the schools there were 353 boys and 117 girls, making a total of 470. This year Dr. Carey was permitted to rejoice over the conversion of his third son, Jabez, who at once devoted himself to the missionary work; so that now he had three sons, Felix, William, and Jabez, engaged in preaching the Gospel to the heathen. In regard to the translations at this time, Dr. Carey writes, "We are engaged in translating the Bible into twenty-one languages, including the Bengalee, which is finished. We have obtained a person to assist in the translation of the Scriptures into the Kassai language. This is an independent nation of mountaineers, lying between the eastern border of Bengal and the northern border of the Burman dominions. We have also obtained help for the Sindh and Wuch languages. The country of Sindh lies on the east bank of the Indus, from the sea about 500 miles; Wuch then continues along the same shore, till it joins the Punjaub. I believe we have now all the languages in that part, except that of Kutch, which I hope will soon be within our reach. We have not yet been able to secure the languages of Nepala, Bootan, Munipoora, and Siam, and about five or six tribes of mountaineers; besides these I am not acquainted with any language on the continent of India into which the word of God is not under translation."

At the public disputation of the students of the college of Fort William, before the Right Honorable Lord Minto, in Sept., 1813, that gentleman after alluding to the literary labors of the missionaries, concludes by saying, "I profess a very sincere pleasure in bringing the literary merits of Mr. Marshman and the other reverend members of the Serampore mission, to the notice of the public, and in bearing my testimony to the great and extraordinary labors which constancy and energy in their numerous and various occupations, have enabled this modest and respectable community to accomplish. I am not less gratified by the opportunity which their literary achievements afford, of expressing my regard for the exemplary worth of their lives, and the beneficent principle which distinguishes and presides in the various useful establishments which they have formed, and which are conducted by themselves."

The mission of the English Baptists in India now comprehended ten stations in Bengal; three in the northern part—Goamalty or Malda, Dinagepore, and Silhet; five in the middle—Berhampore, Cutwa, Vans-variya, Serampore, and Calcutta, and two in the south-east—Jessore and Chittagong. Employed in these twenty stations there were twelve missionaries who had been sent from Europe, twelve who were Europeans by birth, and thirteen who were descendants of Europeans, and others who conversed in English. Adding to these the native laborers, made the aggregate number sixty-three. They preached in ten languages, and were preparing the Scriptures in many more. Of the number of churches exceeding twenty members, there were eight in all; and of the smaller churches, thirteen.

During this year, 1813, the question of the renewal of the charter of the East India Company came up in England, which gave occasion for the friends of missions to apply for a clause to be inserted in the charter, tolerating and protecting Christian missionaries. This object called into action the powerful pens of Robert Hall and Andrew Fuller, and the effort was successful, though not to the full extent desired.

The year 1814 was saddened by the death of Mr. Fuller. He had been the first officer, the earliest and best advocate, and the main pillar of the Society, for more than twenty-two years, and his loss was deeply felt by the friends of missions in England and in India.

During the years 1815, 1816, and 1817, upwards of four hundred persons were introduced into the mission churches in India. Adding these to previous accessions, the number of baptized individuals at the different stations in seventeen years, the first one having been baptized in 1800, amounted to nearly twelve hundred. And besides these, not less than 10,000 children, of all descriptions, had been in some way brought under Christian instruction. About this time, the mission was strengthened by a fresh accession of laborers from England, among whom were Mr. William Yates, Eustice Carey, (nephew of the venerable doctor,) Mr. Lawson, and Messrs. Randall and Penney, with their wives.

About eight miles north-west of Calcutta was the military station of Dum Dum. A neat place of worship was erected there, and a distinguished native, Ram Mohun, preached in Bengalee and Hindoo. Success attended this effort, and in the course of 1817 nine were baptized, six natives and three English soldiers, and added to the little church, then amounting to fourteen members. The system of itinerating at Cutwa was conducted on a large scale. Fourteen natives were employed, some to preach, others to read and distribute the Scriptures.

In 1818 was begun the erection of a college at Serampore, on a scale of great magnificence. The buildings were designed to cover eight acres of ground, and to cost £10,000. The plan of such a literary institution, however, was deemed by some impracticable, and its ultimate failure justified their apprehensions. A much better and more approved object was the establishment of a savings' bank at Serampore; and about the same time the formation of an agricultural and horticultural society, which was patronized by the governor-general and most of the opulent natives.

The period from 1818 to 1827, although filled up with arduous and successful labors, is marked by no events which appear to require an extended notice. One of the severest afflictions to which the mission was called during this time, was the death of Mr. Chamberlain. Having declined in health, he sailed for England with the hope of recovery, but died on the passage.

It was during the period now under notice, that a controversy arose between the Serampore mission and the parent society, which resulted in placing the two upon a separate and independent basis. The nature and grounds of this separation will be understood from the following "Agreement," which was published March 23, 1827.

"Several years ago, it was officially announced, that as the missionaries at Serampore had been enabled so far to exceed the expectations of their first supporters, as largely to promote the propagation of the Gospel by funds which they had themselves originated, a material change had resulted in relation to the society from which they sprang; in consequence of which the brethren of that station acted independently in the management of their concerns. Subsequent experience has shown that the continued operation of the cause alluded to, has occasioned considerable embarrassment in the practical arrangements of the Society and their brethren at Serampore. The means of obviating this difficulty have been seriously considered in a special meeting of the committee assembled to confer with Dr. Marshman on the subject, which has terminated in the full conviction that in present circumstances it is most expedient that the Society at home and the missionaries at Serampore, should be publicly understood to be two distinct and independent missionary bodies."

The simple fact to be gathered from the foregoing statement, is, that the missionaries at Serampore, holding and using as they did, in the mission service, a large amount of property which they had accumulated without the aid of friends at home, refused to render to the parent society a strict account of their pecuniary transactions.—Hence the necessity of a friendly agreement to become two bands.

During the next ten years, from 1827 to 1837, the Baptist Society and the Serampore mission conducted their operations separately, and they must therefore be kept distinct in the present notices.

The stations immediately connected with the Serampore mission at the commencement of this period, were, besides Serampore itself, the following nine, viz. : Jessore, Dacca, Chittagong, Arracan, Dinagepore, Benares, Allahabad, Futteghur, and Delhi. The three kinds of agency employed in connection with these stations were: 1st. Natives, through whom it was believed the Gospel would ultimately obtain its greatest diffusion; 2d. Asiatics, or those who were born in the country of European parents, at least on one side, and who could be supported with about half the sum required for a missionary from England. Of this class were Thompson, Fernandez, Smith, Mackintosh, and others. 3d. Europeans, whose knowledge and influence were of the highest importance, when exerted in connection with bands of three, four, or five Asiatic or native agents. Native schools for the instruction of boys had now been established about ten years; and recently the education of female children, hitherto supposed to be impracticable, had been introduced. In Serampore there were thirteen schools for girls, four or five at Dacca, and at least three at Chittagong. The children included the daughters of Mohammedans as well as Hindoos, who received instruction with the greatest readiness and pleasure; and in all the schools, male and female, the Scriptures were introduced.

Serampore.—At this important post were Drs. Carey and Marshman, J. C. Marshman, Mack, and Swan. During 1827, eleven persons had been received into the church. The college funds maintained 58 students at the close of the same year, and Dr. Carey lectured twice a week as theological professor. The report of the college in 1829 referred to several grounds of encouragement. A charter had been obtained; the progress of the students had been good, and several had entered on the work of imparting a knowledge of the Scriptures to the natives of India. Mr. Ward had raised a fund in Europe and America of about 50,000 rupees, and a library of nearly 5,000 volumes had been collected. It possessed a philosophical apparatus, the largest in the country.

In 1829, three new stations were entered upon, viz. : Goamalty, in Assam, 240 miles north-east of Serampore; Barripore, 31 miles south, and Burisal, 140 miles eastward of Serampore; thus making twelve stations in connection with Serampore. And it is an interesting fact, that all these stations were occupied by men who were brought to the knowledge of the truth in India itself. In May, 1831, Dr. Carey writes in an affecting strain, saying that his race was nearly run, being on the eve of seventy, and much weakened by repeated bilious attacks. He was able, however, to resume his labors again. During this year, seventeen joined the church, fifteen of whom were natives of Bengal, and five of these were members of the college. In June, 1832, Dr. Carey brought the last edition of his Bengalee Scriptures through the press. In a letter, April, 1833, one of the missionaries says, "Our venerable Dr. Carey is in excellent health, and takes his turn in all our public exercises. Just forty years ago he administered the Lord's Supper to the church in Leicester, and then started on the morrow to embark for India." The entire Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments had at this time been printed and circulated in seven different languages; the New Testament had been printed in twenty-three languages more; the Pentateuch, and other parts of the Old Testament, had been printed and circulated in several languages into which the New Testament had been completed; and portions of the Scriptures had been printed in ten others—making in all forty languages; so that upwards of 212,000 volumes of the Divine word, in forty different languages, had issued from the Serampore press during thirty years. "If," say the missionaries, "we reckon the Chinese population according to the most moderate computation, at one hundred and fifty millions, these languages embrace the vernacular tongues of two hundred and seventy millions of immortal beings." Besides the Scriptures, many other works had been printed at the Serampore press, such as grammars, dictionaries, histories, tracts, &c., so that literature as well as religion was greatly indebted to those distinguished translators.

On the 9th of June, 1834, Dr. Carey, the original mover of this vast work, closed his earthly labors, at the age of 73. In his last will was found this highly characteristic provision: "I direct, that before every other thing, all my lawful debts may be paid; that my funeral be as plain as possible; that I may be buried by the side of my second wife, Charlotte Emilia Carey; and that the following inscription, and nothing more, may be cut on the stone which commemorates her, either above or below, as there may be room, viz. :

"WILLIAM CAREY,

Born August 17, 1761, died—

• A wretched, poor, and helpless worm,
On thy kind arms I fall.' "

Jessore.—During 1827, this station was in a discouraging state, except that the schools for boys were prosperous. In 1828, there were only twenty members in the church, and every one of them were either suspended or excluded. In 1829, eight were restored, and two added. There were four schools, with an average attendance of 176 scholars. In 1832, three more were added to the church; but the mission at this place continued to be of secondary importance, except as the centre of extensive itinerant labors. The district was estimated to contain about 1,200,000 inhabitants, Mohammedans and Hindoos.

Dacca.—This station suffered a great loss in 1827, in the death of two of its missionaries, Mr. D'Cruz and Mr. Leonard. In 1828, the church was reduced to four by removals, but others were added from time to time. In 1829, the English congregation, which had almost disappeared, was formed anew. In 1830 there were six native schools, containing between five and six hundred scholars. Widows, as well as other native females, were members of these schools, and permitted to read at public examinations, instead of burning on funeral piles. This being an important military post, the officers and soldiers benefitted by the labors of the missionaries, and some of them became members of the church. The commander of a native regiment invited preaching in the hall of his own house.

Chittagong, 340 miles east of Calcutta, was occupied by a faithful missionary, Mr. Johannes, who superintended three native female schools, and supported a school himself of thirty boys. There was also a native boys' school of sixty pupils. Mr. Johannes also conducted public worship in Bengalee and English, and preached in the market-places and streets. Another female school was subsequently established, and frequent additions were made to the church. Roman Catholics often attended the English service, and gave good attention to the word, which led the missionary to say, "I have been now twelve years in Chittagong, and never felt that encouragement I do now, when I see Roman Catholics searching the Scriptures."

Arracan.—The missionary in Arracan was Mr. J. C. Fink, assisted by five native preachers. They occupied a very extensive field, on the east of the Bay of Bengal, and south of Chittagong, among a mixed population of Mugs, Mohammedans and Burmese. Two services in English were maintained on the Sabbath, and a permanent chapel was opened for the Mug congregation. Natives were from time to time added to the church, and a native Arracanese was ordained as a missionary. He had been an idolatrous priest.

Dinagapore.—The church in this place in 1827 numbered ninety-two. In 1828 a few were added, and in 1829 three whole Musulman families, consisting of seventeen persons, renounced their idols and joined the Christian church. Ignatius Fernandez died in December, 1829. He was a native preacher of great worth, and had long been the principal supporter of the mission at this place. He was born at Macao in July, 1757, and was therefore 73 years old. He came to Bengal in 1774, and of the fifty-six years which had since passed, he had spent forty-four at Dinagapore. He was the first fruit of this mission, under Carey and Thomas. As early as 1796, he built a dwelling house at Dinagapore, which he told these missionaries he intended for the worship of God, and when it was done, he invited them to preach in it, which they did. From that time till his death, 33 years, there was preaching in his house, and he was instrumental of gathering the largest church in Bengal. Dr. Carey expressed the opinion that his labors were more blessed than those of any other missionary in Northern India. Feeling himself worn down by disease and near his end, he went to Serampore, and died in the presence of his brethren. He was succeeded in the mission by Mr. Hugh Smylie, assisted by Mr. Bareiro, a student of Serampore college. These brethren suffered from repeated attacks of fever, and in 1832 were obliged to leave their stations for a considerable time.

Benares.—The Society commenced a mission here in 1817, and a church, though never large, had been sustained, and the Gospel regularly preached. In 1830 and onward, the schools were quite prosperous, under the labors of Mr. Smith, and a native preacher, Sivadas.

Allahabad.—This was an important station, being at the junction of the Ganges and Jumna, and the resort of multitudes of pilgrims who come thither to bathe in the sacred waters. Mr. L. Mackintosh was the missionary here in 1827, assisted by a native reader, Gopaul, who kept a promising school in his own house, consisting of about twenty young men.

Delhi.—The situation of this place at the confluence of the Ganges and the Jumna, renders it an important field of labor. Great numbers of pilgrims resort thither to bathe in the sacred waters, affording the missionaries opportunity to preach the Gospel to multitudes besides the permanent residents. Mr. J. T. Thompson and a native preacher were laboring here at the period under notice. Mr. Thompson traveled extensively at certain seasons of the year, distributing the Scriptures in the Vikaneer language, to the west of Delhi; in the Marwar and the Goozerattee, to the south-west; in the Napalee to the Goorkhas, on the east north-east; in the Punjabee, on the north-west; in the Pushtoo, to the Palans and Affghan horse merchants; and in the language of Cashmere, to the north of Delhi. Mr. Thompson makes particular mention of scenes witnessed at the Pyree, a far-famed bathing spot at the base of a mountain projecting towards the river, where there is room for only two persons to pass abreast. This occasions the most lamentable consequences. In 1819, four hundred and thirty persons were crushed to death, owing to a desperate rush of the pilgrims. The assembled multitude amounts to two or three thousand; but once in twelve years, when Jupiter is in Aquarius, at the time of the sun entering Aries, the number is not less than a million, and in 1819 it was estimated as high as two million. Mr. Thompson spent much time at this place at the proper seasons, and many listened with apparent seriousness to his conversation and prayers. In 1829, he mentions having circulated nearly six thousand books, pamphlets, and tracts, in Hindee, Oordoo, Sanscrit, Napalee, Punjabee, Persian, and Arabic. At the Hurdwar annual fair, in 1830, he distributed, in at least six languages, 2,200 volumes of the Gospels and other books. The word preached to the multitudes was regarded with great attention. The students of the native college of Delhi evinced great anxiety to be furnished with the Scriptures and other works in English, Hindee, and Persian. Mr. Thompson was much interested in a sect called the Sands, who reject idolatry, and regard the Ganges like any other river. They profess to believe in one invisible God, and are taught that the soul is immortal, but have no temple nor any regular priesthood. This sect is almost 200 years old.

Besides the foregoing stations in connection with Serampore, at the time of the separation from the Society, a few others of less note were formed. These were Dum-Dum, Multra, Barripore, Burisal, Cawnpore, and Assam.

During the same period, 1827 to 1837, the parent society conducted its separate operations at Calcutta, Cutwa, Digha, and Monghyn, leaving by far the largest and most important part of the field under the direction of the Serampore brethren. During this period of ten years, efforts were made to unite the two societies, but although they harmonized in their spirit and aims, the division continued.

In the spring of 1838, however, the effort at union was renewed, and resulted successfully. The particular agents or means employed in terminating the unhappy controversy, need not be specified. All were happy at length in a cessation of strife, and in joining as formerly in the glorious work of spreading the Gospel. Dr. Marshman, who had been greatly instrumental in bringing about this happy change, died almost at the moment of the termination of the negotiations.

The plan of union provided that the translations and all the public property at Serampore, should be transferred to Calcutta, which from this time becomes the centre of interest in regard to translations, printing, &c.

At the commencement of 1838, the congregations in nearly all the chapels in Calcutta and its neighborhood were increasing. Mr. Robinson, assisted by Mr. Thomas and four native preachers, occupied the Lal Bazar chapel in Calcutta, which had a church membership of nearly a hundred. In September of this year twelve Hindoos were baptized, eight of whom were in the girls' Christian boarding school, under the superintendence of Mrs. Pearce. In the beginning of 1839, Mr. Penney died of cholera, and in March 1840, Mr. Pearce died of the same disease.

The report respecting translations in 1840, embraced the following important particulars: An edition of the New Testament in Hindostanee, with marginal references, 1000 copies; another edition of the New Testament in the same language, smaller size, without references, 500 copies. Of this last edition, extra copies of the Gospels and of the Acts were printed, making an aggregate of 9,500 volumes. An edition of the Psalms in Sanscrit verse, 2,500 copies; the third edition of the New Testament in Bengalee, octavo, 1,500 copies, with 6,000 extra copies of each of the Gospels, 2,000 of the Acts, and 500 of the Gospels and Acts together, making a total of 28,000 volumes; the fourth edition of the New Testament in Bengalee, royal 12mo., 3000 copies, with 2,000 of Gospels and Acts together, making 5000 volumes; an edition of the New Testament in modern Armenian, with numerous marginal references, 6000 copies; an edition of the Gospel of Matthew in Hindee, Nagree characters, 6,000 copies.

Besides the foregoing works, which had all been completed, there were in progress 8,000 copies of the New Testament, or parts of it, in Sanscrit, and 8500 copies of the New Testament, or of the Gospels and Acts together, in Hindostanee. All this, the work of the mission press at Calcutta, and most of it within one year, show the vast amount of labor performed in this department, and its importance in diffusing the light of truth over benighted India.

Frequent mention is made in the journals of the missionaries, of the "Benevolent Institution." It was established in 1809, for the special benefit of the multitudes of children in the city who were growing up in ignorance and vice, with none to care for them. The institution was not denominational, but was common to all classes of missionaries in Calcutta, though it fell to the lot of this society to have the chief management of its concerns. For more than twenty years it was under the care of Mr. Penney, whose exertions in its behalf were unremitting. In 1842 there were 265 boys and 123 girls under instruction, the children of various sects, as follows, viz.: Roman Catholics 142, Protestants 95, Hindoos 107, Mohammedans 22, Burmese 3, Mugs 5, Armenians 4, Jews 1, Greeks 1, Chinese 7.

In 1843, 90,000 volumes of the Scriptures, in whole or in part, were printed in Sanscrit, Bengali, Hindostanee, and Hindee languages. From the country stations, during this year, favorable intelligence was received. At Delhi, Mr. Thompson baptized five persons, one of them his own daughter, the rest natives. At Patna a delightful work of grace was in progress three or four months, as the result of which eight persons were baptized, and several more stood as candidates. At Monghyr four were added to the church by baptism, at Burisal two, at Chittagong six, at Patna eight, &c.

In January, 1844, the London Society's missionaries at Calcutta published a statement, vindicating their Baptist brethren against an attack made upon them in the London Patriot, in reference to the Sanscrit version of the Scriptures, to which the Baptist translators had devoted themselves with so much zeal. In this vindication, they say that the Sanscrit language is the language of learning and religion throughout the whole of Bengal, Bombay, and considerable portions of the Madras presidency; that all Brahmins, except those wholly secularized, as soldiers or merchants, are acquainted with this language, which alone is taught in their colleges and employed in their religious ceremonies; that the highest reverence is universally felt for it, and any book written in Sanscrit will always be received with respect, and read with more acceptance than if composed in any of the vernacular dialects; that tens of thousands in all sections of the country are fully qualified to read with intelligence any ordinary composition in this language; that a translation of the Sacred Scriptures in Sanscrit was, in the opinion of the most competent judges, every way desirable, as furnishing a large Brahminical population with the only version they would probably receive, and as laying a critical foundation and furnishing a classical model for the preparation or improvement of vernacular versions; and finally, that they deem it just to their brethren of the Baptist mission to give these assurances, since, so far from sympathizing with the writer in the Patriot (who was a former missionary of the London Society in Burmah), they wholly approve of the zealous efforts of their Baptist brethren to secure a version of the sacred Scriptures in the learned language of Hindostan. These testimonials are considered of value, as showing how the Sanscrit language ranks in Hindostan, in the estimation of the most learned and competent men, after almost fifty years of experience, and as illustrating the kind and generous spirit which prevailed among missionaries of different denominations.

The annual report for 1844 gives a pleasing view of the work in most parts of India. In Calcutta there were eight churches, with 454 members, 270 of whom were natives. The baptisms during the year amounted to 32, all natives but three. The number of schools in Calcutta and its neighborhood was 14, and the number of scholars 954. At the various stations in northern India there were 16 churches, and a membership of 465. Also 19 schools, and 673 scholars. During this year, the cholera made fearful ravages, carrying off in two months between forty and fifty thousand people. The missionaries, however, were all mercifully spared. In August of this year, some interesting and valuable statements were made by a Calcutta missionary in regard to the state of society, and the spirit of love and harmony which actuated and pervaded all classes of laborers. He says, "On the bosom of the Ganges is the shipping of every nation, as may be seen in its streets the natives of every shore. In the city are splendid edifices and mud hovels; naked children and half naked adults, various and discordant sounds, mechanics at their employ, venders sitting by their goods, innumerable sledges drawn by oxen, fashionable European carriages, buggies, gazees, palankins, grooms running to clear the way, &c. Degradation and idolatry were around us, destruction and misery walked hand in hand. We passed through the crowded streets, and soon arrived at Intally, a beautiful residence, as all the dwellings of Europeans in Calcutta are. A group of Hindoos, attired in snow white muslin, and with intelligent countenances, met us as we entered the gates. Their whole contour formed a striking contrast to those we had seen previously. The explanation is simple: these were Christian Hindoos. As they uttered their salams, my eyes filled with tears. Christianity finds man every where debased—it blesses and elevates him. Next Sabbath I expect to be at Serampore, where a Carey and a Marshman found refuge, not from native violence, but from Englishmen bearing the name of Christians; where a Martyn, a Brown and a Buchanan, contemplated India's welfare; where a Chamber Iain, a Judson, and a Newell found Christian hospitality and were refreshed. The spirit that animated them still remains; we are all one here; we cannot afford to be jealous—the common foe is too strong; and the missionaries are bound together neither by creeds nor human ties, but by the fear of God and the love of Jesus.” These words are worthy of being engraven on the memory of Christians and Christian ministers every where, differing in name and often rivaling in interests, but having professedly one spirit and one purpose.

During the year ending May 1st, 1845, there had been printed at Calcutta, in Sanscrit 2,500 volumes; in Bengali 23,500; in Hindostanee 26,500; in Armenian 2,260; total, 54,760 volumes. These were all volumes of the Scriptures in some form, and the distribution kept pace with the publication. The distinguished Doctor Yates was at this date engaged in preparing for the press the Old Testament in Sanscrit, and large portions of it had already been printed. His heart's desire was to finish this work by the close of another year, and to be able to report a complete translation of the whole of the Scriptures into this, the sacred and learned language of the East. But it pleased God in a few months to call this devoted servant to his rest. By the advice of his physicians he sailed for England, and died on the passage.

In November, 1845, Serampore is brought to view again, for the first time since the “union” in 1837. More or less labor had been performed there, but for some reason no reports appeared through the regular channels. Mr. Denham, on taking charge of the station at this time, found a church of 93 members, a good congregation, and many pleasant and sacred associations. Remembering Carey and his coadjutors, he asks, “Who can recall the name of Serampore without veneration? On its sages rested a sacred pentecostal fire, and from their hands India and its hundreds of millions received the regenerating word of life.” There were also at this time in Serampore two schools for heathen boys, supported by the Ladies' Benevolent Society of that place, and a third was conducted by a European in the college. Besides these, two female schools were maintained, one for heathen children, and one for children of nominally Christian parents. The number of scholars in the various schools was over 800. There were eight sub-stations around Serampore, at which preaching was regularly maintained, and several other places that were visited periodically. In May, 1846, Mr. Denham speaks of arrangements then in progress for rendering the college buildings available to the interests of the community, and especially for training converted natives of India for missionary service. Years having passed away since the doors of the college were closed, every thing had to be done, even to the obtaining of pupils; but the effort was successful, and this institution, for a long period so vitally connected with the welfare of India, was again in a prosperous condition.

The various stations of this society having now assumed a good degree of stability and of uniformity in their progress, it is unnecessary to notice them further, except as we find them in the last report which has been received, that for 1853.

Calcutta.—Under this head is included Calcutta and its neighborhood, embracing eight churches, each of which is worthy of a brief notice. The first four are in the city proper, the others in the suburbs.

1. The Church in Circular Road. This is an English church, with 91 members in communion, and 16 non-resident members. The Sabbath-school contains 63 children. An English pastor, Mr. Leslie, has charge of the church, which supports itself without aid from the mission.

2. Church in Lal Bazar. This is a mixed church, J. Thomas pastor, with three native preachers. Number of members 137; non-resident members, 20. The venerable and distinguished native laborer, Carapeit Aratoon, continues to render important aid. Five were added to the church by baptism during the year.

3. South Colinga.—A native church, with one English and one native pastor, and a membership of 51.

4. Intally.—A native church, with 46 members. Besides the English pastor, four native preachers are constantly engaged in disseminating the word of life in and around Calcutta. Seven persons were baptized during the year.

5. Haurah and Salkiya.—A mixed church, with a pastor, T. Morgan, and a native preacher; and a membership of 20. Two day schools are maintained, having 100 children in attendance, and a Sabbath-school with 60 scholars. During the year, 4,000 copies of the Scriptures, or portions thereof, were distributed by Mr. Morgan in his itinerant labors. In his report of these labors, he states some facts of peculiar interest; and being of so recent a date, they set in a strong light the great though slow progress which the Gospel has made in that quarter since the early labors of Carey and his companions. He says, “The desire of the people to obtain the Scriptures is most intense. Imagine a large market with from one to two thousand people, myself on an elevated spot, hundreds of hands stretched out, and hundreds of tongues shouting, ‘O Sahib, a great thing, O holy incarnation, give me a book!’ Brahmins and Sudras rolling in the dust together, snatching the books from one another; respectable people with children in their hands and in their arms, imploring me to put the books into the hands of the little ones; books all gone,—missionary reeling from the effects of dust, noise, and speaking; people imploring for more books, and in some places I have been obliged to go to police offices to rest for half an hour. I have seen Brahmin lads in tears because they could not get the books, saying, 'O, Sahib, I ran when I heard you were here, and now what shall I do?' Of a cold, bitter night, I have found men at my boat, from distant places, up to their shoulders in water." Mr. Morgan speaks of another important feature in this work, viz.: that on going to a large town, if he is suspected of being a government agent, the people will not hear him, nor take a book from him; but no sooner do they learn that he is a missionary, without any connection with the government, than the whole town is at his heels, the most respectable sending for him to their houses, bringing milk to his boat, &c. This missionary concludes by saying, that it is evident that the Hindoos are dissatisfied with both their civil and religious institutions, and that while they would regard with horror any attempt on the part of the English Government to convert them, disinterested efforts they can and do appreciate.

6. Narsigdarchoke and Bishtapore.—A native church of 45 members, two missionaries, and five native preachers.

7. Khari.—A native church, with two missionaries and one native preacher, and a membership of 49. A school with 45 children is maintained.

8. Lakhyantipur.—A native church with 62 members, one missionary, two assistant missionaries, and two native preachers. In direct or indirect connection with this church, there are 74 households, comprising 84 men, 84 women, and 118 children.

9. Dum-Dum.—A native church of 13 members, one missionary, and one native preacher.

10. Malayapur.—A native church of 5 members, a pastor, and two native preachers. The Bengal Association met at this place in January, and although many were detained, the missionary brethren and delegates made up a body of nearly 500.

The work of translating and printing the Scriptures has been carried on with the usual activity and zeal during the past year. The translations have been chiefly into Sanscrit, Bengali, Hindee, and Hindostanee; and the number of Scriptures issued from the depository during the year amounted to 34,036 copies.

Stations and Churches in Bengal.—Under this head are embraced eight principal stations.

1. Serampore.—There were in the Serampore college, in 1853, eleven students, four of whom were natives. Their studies embraced theology, Christian evidences, mental and moral science, classics, and history. There were at this period two missionaries at the station, Messrs. Denham and Robinson, and four native preachers. They had preaching stations at eight villages, and the number of church members was 121. The Native Christian Asylum numbered 18 girls, one having recently died in great peace. The two schools for boys contained 327 scholars, and adding to them the schools connected with the college, the whole number of children and youth under the care of the mission would not fall much short of 600.

2. Cuttack.—This station has a missionary, four native preachers, and a church of 35 members. A day school for girls is sustained, and has ten scholars. The copies of Scriptures distributed during the year amount to 416, and of tracts to 2,780.

3. Jessore.—One missionary, eight native preachers, and 234 church members. There are seven sub-stations connected with this mission. Five boys' schools are supported, attended by about 400 children; and one boarding school attended by 14 girls.

4. Dinajpur.—One missionary, one native preacher, and 19 members. There are two day schools attended by 120 children, and a Sabbath-school with 10 scholars. In the course of a few months the missionary visited 246 villages, preaching and distributing Scriptures and tracts.

5. Dacca.—Two missionaries, four native preachers, and 36 church members. In various journeys made during the year the missionaries distributed 5,000 tracts, and 4,600 copies of portions of Scripture. They say, "We now want more preachers, for the whole of East Bengal is open; and on our last journey we often had from 400 to 600 attentive hearers of all ranks and classes."

6. Chittagong.—One missionary, eight native preachers, and 65 members. There are two day schools, attended by 23 boys, and one attended by 13 girls. Eleven persons have been baptized during the year. Says the missionary, "The heathen do not generally disregard the word now. They listen with readiness and pleasure to the news of salvation, and applications are unceasingly made for Scriptures and tracts."

7. Suri.—One missionary, four native preachers, and 37 church members. Five day schools are taught, one English, and the others Bengali. The attendance is about 220 boys and 16 girls. The Sabbath-school contains 20 scholars.

8. Burisal.—This mission has under its care ten sub-stations, and enjoys the labors of two missionaries and ten native preachers. The whole number of members is 204.

three native preachers, and a church of 42 members. Two schools are in constant operation, besides a day and evening Sabbath-school, and the Gospel is preached in the villages and at the bathing festivals.

6. Muttra.—One missionary, one assistant missionary, and three native preachers. The church has 42 members. Two schools, one native and one English, are maintained, and the system has been adopted of making all parties pay something for tuition. Tracts and Scriptures are also sold to many, while their gratuitous distribution is continued.

7. Cawnpore.—One missionary, two native preachers, and a church of 36 members.

Southern India.—The society has had a mission at Madras and Trichonopoly, in Southern India, but as the missionary there has derived none of his support from the society, and his labors are confined chiefly to the Europeans, the connection has been recently dissolved.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—This Society commenced its operations in Hindostan in 1804. In February of that year three missionaries, Rev. Messrs. Ringletaube, Cran, and Des Granges, sailed from England, with the intention of commencing a mission on the Coromandel coast, but on their arrival in the country a different course was determined upon, and Messrs. Cran and Des Granges proceeded to establish themselves at Vizagapatam, five hundred and fifty miles south-west of Calcutta, and about the same distance north-east of Madras, in the Northern Circars, a place altogether unoccupied by previous missionaries. They were received with marked kindness by the commander-in-chief of the forces at this place, and also by the judge, who had for some time been in the habit of conducting public worship in the fort on the Sabbath, with the soldiers of the garrison and such others as might wish to attend. This service however was now committed to the missionaries, with a government allowance for their labors. A piece of ground, a mile from the town, comprising about ten acres, was also granted to the missionaries, on which they erected a house and laid out a garden. They next conceived the plan of founding a charity school, towards which about 1,300 rupees were immediately contributed, and in 1806 the school was in successful operation, with suitable buildings, and between thirty and forty persons under instruction. "Among our native scholars," says the missionary, Mr. Cran, "we have all castes, from the Brahmin to the Sudra, and several of them have come from a distance of ten, twenty, and even thirty miles. They are instructed by a native schoolmaster, of Christian parents, whom we brought with us from Madras."

Near the close of 1806, the missionaries report themselves as able to read and write the Telinga language with ease, and they had translated into it some passages of the Scriptures for the use of the natives. They also about this time formed the plan of a complete translation of the Scriptures into the Telinga language, spoken by all the Hindoos in the five northern Circars, and appealed to the churches at home for aid in this great work.

In 1808, the missionaries were joined by a converted Brahmin, named Ananderayer, of whom a very interesting account is given in the Society's periodical, the Evangelical Magazine, for Feb., 1808. In Jan., 1809, the mission sustained a severe loss in the death of Mr. Cran. Two new missionaries however, Messrs. Gordon and Lee, arrived during that year, to the great joy of Mr. Des Granges, who had been left alone in this vast field.

The next year, 1810, Mr. Des Granges himself was removed by death. Just before his decease it was thought necessary to remove his wife, who was sick in an adjoining apartment, in doing which she was carried through the chamber of the dying missionary, and there they exchanged their last farewell till they should meet above. Before his death, Mr. Des Granges had translated three of the Gospels, which in 1812 were printed at Serampore by the Baptist brethren, and the surviving missionaries, Lee and Gordon, spent much time in reading and circulating these Gospels in the populous villages around them.

The mission was strengthened in 1817, by the arrival of Rev. James Dawson, from the Seminary at Gosport. In a letter dated Jan. 1817, Mr. Gordon says, "The last year has been better to me than any former one. We are out every day among the people, and I have lately held conversations with some interesting characters, whose questions were uncommonly striking. The children in the schools also perform wonders, and by interrogating them we find that they make an actual progress in divine things. Our principal school is in the very heart of the town, and open to any person who passes by."

In 1819, Mr. Pritchett, who had joined the mission, completed the translation of the New Testament into Telinga, and secured its publication at Madras, at the expense of the Calcutta Bible Society. He also translated several parts of the Old Testament, and entertained the fond hope of being able to give to the heathen around him a complete copy of the Bible, in their native tongue. But in this he was disappointed, having been called to his final reward before the close of the following year.

Twenty years after the establishment of this mission, in 1824, there were five native schools, and about 250 boys under instruction. Mr. Gordon employed his days in translating the Old Testament into the Telinga language, and his evenings in visiting the schools and the neighboring villages reading to the natives, and conversing with them on the subject of religion.

In 1827, the schools had increased to twelve, and the scholars to over 500. One of these was a girls' school, and several girls were in the schools for boys. These schools were all conducted upon strictly Christian principles, for besides writing, cyphering &c., the Scriptures were read daily, and Watts's Catechism taught. Mr. Gordon died in 1828, after having labored in India for 19 years with great fidelity and success. In the Society's report for 1832, mention is made of the translation of Pilgrim's Progress into the language of the Teloo-goos, and it is said to have been read with extreme interest and delight by intelligent natives who understand the Scriptures. Considerable interest was awakened in 1834, by the conversion of a native of high caste, residing at a considerable distance from the mission. Having met with a tract in Teloo-goo, he perused it, and kept it by him 17 months, and by this means he was enlightened and made a willing convert to the Christian religion. A report of his case says, "We see in this young man's case what Almighty grace can do, and how easy it will be for the Lord to turn this whole people to himself when he is pleased to pour out his Spirit upon them."

This mission has continued, with some interruptions by death and removal, but on the whole with pleasing success, to the present time. It has now three missionaries, Messrs. Gordon, Hay, and Johnston. The number in full communion with the church is forty, of whom twelve are natives, and the rest East Indians and Europeans. All the members meet together to partake of the Lord's Supper every Sabbath morning, after which is held a regular Teloo-goo service, and also a Sunday-school for children of European descent. A missionary association has been formed, for the two-fold purpose of contributing to the Society's funds, and of sustaining an interest in the cause of Christ throughout the world. The Native Female Orphan School is conducted with success, and the appearance of the pupils is highly creditable and gratifying. The press has been in active operation, and numerous and most encouraging are the proofs furnished, of good resulting from the circulation of tracts and portions of Scripture. In a late report one of the missionaries says, "The tracts on caste and Juggernaut, are very popular, and I should be glad of a large supply of them. I have within the last few weeks had the pleasure of baptizing a Gooroo, whose mind was first aroused and enlightened by reading the tract on caste."

Madras.—A mission was commenced here by the London Society in 1805, Rev. Mr. Loveless being the first missionary. For several years he labored with but little assistance, preaching and establishing schools as he was able, and as opportunity offered. In 1816, he was joined by Rev. Richard Knill, "whose disposition and talents were well adapted to that important post." In 1818, however, Mr. Knill's health declined, and being obliged to seek a colder climate, he was appointed to a station in Russia. Other laborers from time to time joined the Madras mission, which has been conducted with steadily increasing energy and success. The present missionaries are Rev. Messrs. Drew, Porter, and Baylis. Preaching to the heathen in the bungalow, at the gate of the mission compound, has been continued, with an increasing number of regular hearers. It has been felt to be a call for great thankfulness that these meetings have never been interrupted by the heathen.

The native evangelists, besides prosecuting their more stated labors at the various out-stations, have continued to proclaim the messages of mercy in the numerous villages around Madras. The work of education, by means of the various boarding and day schools, has been carried forward with great activity and effect. There are 14 schools for boys, with 643 scholars; and 4 for girls, with 232 scholars. There are 7 native congregations, with a total attendance of 367; and 4 native churches, with 119 communicants. In the Missionary Magazine for Sept. 1852, there is a deeply interesting account of the conversion and happy death of a native female,—Eliza,—for several years a member of the Girls' Boarding School. One feature in her death-bed experience is so remarkable and affecting, that the account, as given by the attending missionary, may with propriety be repeated in this place. It was a last struggle and conflict with Satan, and in her case a living reality, as if the great enemy of souls had been visible to her. "Two days before her death, in the evening, she became suddenly full of distress and alarm, and her body full of agitation. She cried out, 'Oh, I am afraid! I am afraid! He is standing close to my ear, and is continually saying to me, There is no salvation for you! There is no salvation for you! Oh! I am afraid; I am trembling; this is very fearful! How is this? O, Jesus! have I not believed in thee? Have I not been baptized into thy name? Have I not received the teachings of thy servants? Am I not thy child? O how is this? This is very fearful to me!' She was exhorted not to let Satan deprive her of her hope, but to abide firm in her faith. The Scriptures were read to her, and prayer was offered, and after a considerable time her mind became more calm, and her hope returned, and she offered up the following prayer: 'O sweet Jesus, I taste that thou art good. Thou hast fed me in green pastures, and hast refreshed me at the fountain of life. When we were only infants, our father and mother left us (alluding to the early orphanage of herself and another child), but even as thou hast said, 'Although a mother may forget her sucking child, I will not forget thee,' so didst thou appoint for us honored ladies and gentlemen, as fathers and mothers, to take care of us and bring us up. O sweet Jesus, for that I praise thee. Thou, for my sins, didst suffer much; thou didst shed thy precious blood, and give thy life; and thou dost now pray for me before thy Father's face. Therefore, do thou have pity on me, and wash me from my sins. Thou hast cleansed me by thy blood; thou hast made me holy by thy blood; thou hast redeemed me by thy blood; therefore I praise thy holy name. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?'"

The missionary remarks, "Such deaths as this cheer us much. They assure us that our work is real, and that God is with us." They will also assure every Christian reader, that a Gospel which can impart such light and joy, such faith in appealing to Christ against the great tempter of souls, such peace and triumph in the final hour, and that can do all this for a mind once lost in the utter darkness of heathenism, is worthy of being given with the least possible delay to the whole world.

Cuddapah.—The London Society commenced operations here in 1822. Rev. Mr. Howell, the first missionary, immediately set about the establishment of schools, both male and female, and within a year one hundred and fifty native children were gathered into these schools, all under Christian instruction. Besides these labors, Mr. Howell preached in the school room to a small congregation of natives, translated several catechisms into Teloo-goo, and distributed numerous copies of the Teloo-goo New Testament. In the following year, Mr. Howell baptized 74 men, 25 women, 40 boys, and 21 girls. These had all nominally embraced Christianity, but only ten had been formally admitted to the church, of which three natives were appointed deacons. During the second year Mr. H. made a tour of about 100 miles, preached to great multitudes, and distributed tracts extensively. In 1826, a chapel was completed, the expenses of which were defrayed by subscriptions on the spot. By the aid of a respectable European resident, a workshop was built for native Christians, affording them the means of self-support.

At Cuddapah was a settlement, called "Christian Village," which was considered the nursery of this mission. It had in 1832, 238 settlers, many of them being baptized persons, the unbaptized having gone there for the purpose of receiving Christian instruction.

During the succeeding ten years this mission exhibited no marked changes, but showed increasingly the blessing of God upon faithful missionary labor. In 1843, having made a tour through the surrounding country, the missionaries say, "During the present tour our minds have been strongly impressed with the generally necessitous condition of the province of Cuddapah. In consequence of the extensive cultivation of cotton and indigo, and the uncommon fertility of many of its valleys, it may be considered as enjoying more temporal prosperity than most other provinces in Southern India; but it would be difficult to find a district in which heathenism has been less disturbed." Yet they speak of the towns and villages as all accessible to the Gospel, and urge upon the Society the importance of sending more laborers into the field.

In 1845, still another appeal was made, accompanied with a more particular description of the extent and importance of the field. Addressing the churches of England, the missionary says, "I would call the attention of the friends of Christian missions, in the first place, to the extent and population of this hitherto much neglected province of the British possessions in India. From north to south the Cuddapah province is upwards of 170 miles, and from east to west about 120 miles—nearly half the size of England. This immense province contains a population of upwards of one million of souls." The writer proceeds to give a minute and very curious description of the omens and signs for which the people entertain a superstitious regard, and also of the doctrine of fate, to which they ascribe their most glaring sins. (See Report of the London Missionary Society for 1845.) In the same report it is stated that no other Protestant missionary society had ever made any effort for the Christian instruction of this immense population, in consequence of which the great mass were involved in all the miseries of heathenism. Self-murder prevailed to an astonishing extent. In the short space of three months, and in only one part of the district, there were 144 cases of suicide.

One of the worst features of this mission has been the difficulty of educating females. The effort, early commenced, has been constantly embarrassed by the native prejudice on this subject. In 1847, Mrs. Porter, in an appeal to the friends of female education, says, "The False Prophet of Mecca has his standard, and thousands flock around it. Brahma and Vishnu have their altars and their priests; but to which of these shall woman look for comfort or for peace? Alas! she knows too well that it is not to be found." At a later period schools for girls appear to have been maintained with more success.

In 1851, a deeply interesting account is given of the conversion of several natives, one of whom in particular came to the missionaries one morning, bringing his brass idols, and throwing them on the ground, saying, "Enough of these; I have done with them, and wish to have no more to do with them. I have read much and learnt much in my heathen books, but I have found no rest. In Christ alone is rest." He also took from his neck a silver chain bearing the name of his god, and casting it on the ground, said, "Enough! nothing but sin has cleaved to me all the while I have kept this close to me. Please, sir, take it. I know of something better—the love of Jesus. O how different to all this! I know I must be persecuted by my friends and relations, but I must not mind that." This individual, with others baptized at the same time, have persevered in their Christian course.

The mission has at present 34 church members, 6 native teachers, 9 boys and 22 girls in the orphan and boarding schools, and including the vernacular day schools and the English school, there is a total of 261 scholars.

Belgaum.—The mission was commenced here in 1820, by Rev. Mr. Taylor. In 1821, two native schools were established, and the number of boys under instruction was 120. Throughout its whole history, it has been a well conducted and successful mission. Valuable native assistants were early raised up, and of one of them, Dhondaph, very particular mention is made in 1828. The missionary, Mr. Benyon, says, "He is the most spiritually-minded native Christian I have ever conversed with. His trials and sufferings have been many and severe, and the sacrifices he has made have been of the most painful nature, and, amidst all, he has sustained a most consistent character. He has literally, for the sake of Christ, forsaken wife and children, and brethren and lands. In a conversation I had with him, on adverting to his sufferings he modestly observed, 'Yes, I have been called to endure a few trials, and my friends frequently tell me of my losses; but it is not always they tell me what I have gained by them.'"

Seasons of special encouragement were from time to time enjoyed by this mission. In 1842, one of the missionaries writes, "Among the Lingarts and other castes in the vicinity of Belgaum, strong excitement exists with reference to the faith of the Gospel. Inquiries concerning the nature and claims of the new religion, combined with a perception of its immeasurable superiority even to the purest parts of Hindooism, are rapidly spreading throughout the country." In commencing their report for 1848, the brethren say, "There is much to cheer and interest our hearts, and to call forth fresh efforts of zeal and devotedness in the glorious work in which we are engaged. We hope that the day of gracious visitation to the Canarese people is fast approaching."

No report has been received from Belgaum later than 1851. At that time there were two missionaries, Rev. Messrs. Taylor and Benyon, 31 church members; 10 vernacular schools, embracing 272 boys and 30 girls, and an English school with 60 scholars. During the year there had been distributed 30 Bibles, 42 Testaments, 324 portions of Scripture, and 5,340 tracts.

Bellary.—In the spring of 1810, Rev. John Hands entered upon a mission at this place, situated in the most northern part of the province of Mysore, and surrounded by numerous and densely populated villages. He had at first great difficulties to contend with in acquiring the native language, called the Canara, but by perseverance he not only soon collected several thousand words, which he formed into a vocabulary, but also began the preparation of a grammar. In 1811, he writes, "I now preach thrice every Lord's day to my countrymen and the Portuguese half-caste. A considerable stir begins to appear among the soldiers (it was a military station), and eight or ten seem very serious and promising. My dwelling was formerly a pagoda, but part of it will now be devoted to the worship of God. Several huge gods of stone are lying about the premises, like Dagon before the ark." In 1812, Mr. Hands opened a native school, which was soon attended by about 15 native children, and gradually increased to a larger number. In 1816, the mission was joined by Rev. Mr. Reeve. In January, 1819, a juvenile Bible society was formed, principally through the zeal of the master of the charity school. About the same time, the missionaries obtained of a native merchant a house situated at the junction of several streets, and favorable for collecting large congregations.

At the close of 1819, Mr. Reeve remarks, "During this year, the Gospel has been carried several hundred miles through the dark villages, and several thousands of tracts have been distributed. The translation and revision of the Scriptures, in Canara, have also been proceeding. A new edition of Watts's First Catechism, in that language, has been prepared for the press, and a copy of the same has been prepared in Tamil. The progress of the schools has been favorable, and several hundreds of the pupils know perfectly the First Catechism, and the greater part of the Lord's sermon on the mount." In 1825, the schools had increased to 17, and the average attendance of boys was 685. The report for 1829 mentions that there had been prepared, during the previous year, in Canarese, several tracts, among which were the "Warning Voice," a "Dialogue between a Shastre and a Christian Missionary," "Explanation of the Ten Commandments," the "Excellency of Truth," "True Wisdom," "On Idolatry," &c. In 1831, the tracts and portions of Scriptures printed were still more numerous and important.

The mission was left in a very feeble state in 1841, Rev. Mr. Reid being in January of that year removed by death, and Mr. Reeve having returned to England several years before. Very soon, however, two missionaries and their wives joined the mission, and the work went on as usual.

At the latest report, there were at Bellary three European missionaries, an assistant missionary, and a native pastor. The church members numbered 72, and in the 14 schools there were 460 scholars. An asylum for the poor was in successful operation.

Bangalore.—Rev. Messrs. Forbes and Laidler commenced the mission at this place in 1820. Its position, some 50 miles west of Madras, has rendered it an important mission, and it has been an eminently successful and useful one. The great instrumentalities adopted in carrying on the mission have been, preaching, schools, and the distribution of the Scriptures and religious tracts. While there have been, each year, developments of peculiar interest to those on the ground, there was nothing for several years so marked as to require special notice.

The itinerant labors of the missionaries were abundant. In regard to these they say, in 1843, "In visiting the towns and villages, we stay in each place one, two, or three days, according to the work offered to us. Our mode of communication is not strictly preaching, but conversation, narrative, and argument. The heathen of this country cannot follow a logical discourse." The total disregard of truth among the natives is strikingly presented in the following passage, by one of the missionaries: "One of my schoolmasters laboring in a country town lately said, 'Sir, if these people really believed that you are speaking truth, or, as he expressed it, no lies, they would instantly deify you; but they cannot believe that such a thing as sincerity is possible in any one.' This general disregard for truth has been instilled into the minds of the Hindoos by their so called sacred books, which abound in falsehoods and lying wonders. Hence the common saying we hear at every step, 'If I do not tell lies, how shall I get through the world?' And hence, also, the lamentable fact, that a Hindoo may be convinced ten times, without being brought once to act upon his convictions. Owing to this, the Brahmin does not blush in the least when we expose his falsehood and deceit, but says, with the greatest indifference, 'In this way I obtain my livelihood.'"

The various schools, Tamil and English, have well rewarded the pains bestowed upon them. In the Canarese department there are five vernacular day schools, with 100 boys and 38 girls; an orphan and boarding school, with 22 boys and 17 girls; and an English and Canarese day school with 66 scholars. In the Tamil department there are 23 pupils in the girls' boarding school, 70 boys in the English Tamil school, and in the vernacular school 30 boys.

Mysore.—Rev. O. Campbell arrived at this place in February, 1839, and commenced his labors under very favorable circumstances. In the following year, he describes Mysore as "a noble field for missionary labor," where he found constant opportunities for publicly preaching the Gospel to the people. The greater part of the people, however, as in most heathen countries, hated the light, and wilfully shut their eyes against it. Says the missionary in 1847, "The heathen often listen to the preacher with the utmost patience and politeness till they fully understand the nature of the Christian doctrine, and discover the practical effects it is intended to produce on the heart and life, and then the natural hostility of man to God immediately appears. Much that has been done at this station is regarded rather as a preparatory work, yet a chapel has been erected, a church of 13 members organized, and 112 scholars gathered into the schools."

Salem.—Rev. Henry Crisp arrived at this station in 1827. He died soon after entering upon his work, and was succeeded by other laborers. As usual, the journals of this mission furnish numerous facts illustrative of the religion of the country and the character of the natives, but such details can be wrought only very sparingly into the present work. Several seasons of spiritual refreshing have been enjoyed by this mission, particularly in 1847, when many became alarmed under the conviction of sin, and eight in one day came to the missionary with the inquiry, "What must I do to be saved?" The missionaries here add their testimony to that of others in saying that caste is a device of Satan the most adverse to Christianity; it is, they say, like a contagion, calculated, if allowed to exist in the Christian church, to destroy every spark of vital godliness. Within the last year or two the mission has experienced much opposition, and the missionary himself has been once dragged before a heathen court on some frivolous pretence. But he says, "Severe as these afflictions are, we prefer them to apathy, and would fain hope that they are tokens for good."

In the Missionary Magazine for March, 1853, the missionary, Mr. Lechler, remarks with great satisfaction upon the success of the School of Industry, which has been in operation some five years, and which has exerted a most valuable influence upon the character and habits of the native Christian community, by developing their resources, and supplying them with the means of independent support. He adds, "Our chapel, now in progress and estimated to cost £400, was built by our own people, one bricklayer excepted, and is, I believe, the first church built in India by the hands of native Christians." The district is described as full of iron ore, and through the efforts of the missionary and the School of Industry, improvements in the manufacture of iron were being introduced, the primitive method being very rude, and having been unchanged for 3000 years. Mr. Lechler, in speaking of the obstacles to the social prosperity of India, says: "It appears to me that very wrong notions are entertained in England with regard to the state of the people in India. Certainly, if one would judge from the lordly appearance of the Hon. East India Company's servants and officers, it might be concluded that the Indians, generally, are highly civilized, and in the most affluent circumstances. The nation, as such, is oppressed and ground down both by the government and higher class of natives. The soil is rich, it is true, and will produce almost any and every thing; but a native once remarked to me, 'government takes the grain, and leaves us only the straw.' It is also rich in metals and minerals, but no one teaches the natives how to make use of them. So long, therefore, as we shall have to do chiefly with the poor,—and to the poor the Gospel is preached,—we must, I feel convinced, not refuse to concern ourselves about our people's temporal affairs." There are at this station 33 church members, and 168 scholars gathered into the various schools.

Combaconum.—This was formerly an outstation of the Travancore mission; but in 1830 the directors annexed it to the Madras district, it having become the residence of the Rev. Edmund Crisp, from Madras. In 1838, there were ten Tamil schools in successful operation. A singular instance of moral impression is related in the journal of the above date, of a Brahmin, who, in proceeding to the court-house to take a false oath, passed by one of the school-rooms; the children were engaged at the time loudly repeating the ninth commandment, on hearing which the Brahmin hesitated, returned home, and such was the impression produced upon his conscience, that he relinquished his guilty intention, and refused to commit the sin of perjury, on which he had been previously determined.

In 1847, nearly all the heathen festivals were visited by the missionaries, on which occasion they preached the Gospel to the deluded multitudes as they had opportunity, and distributed large numbers of tracts and portions of Scripture. Concerning the great annual car or chariot festival, the writer says, "Five large cars were drawn by about 30,000 persons. I was greatly distressed to find the poor people actually beaten and compelled to assist in the drawing of the cars. Not a few complained to me that they were treated most cruelly, and confessed themselves heartily tired of idol worship." The number of native Christians connected with Combaconum and its affiliated out-stations, comprised, at the latest dates, a total of 207 individuals. There were also ten vernacular schools, with a total of 365 scholars.

Coimbatore.—Rev. Mr. Addis and family arrived at this station, in the Madras presidency, in October, 1830. In 1835, a Christian church was formed, and six natives participated, for the first time, in the ordinance of the Lord's Supper. In 1837, the number of native assistants had increased from two to twelve, and a class of promising young men was in a course of preparation for the work of native teachers. There were also 12 boys' schools, in an efficient state, and a female boarding school and a girls' day school, established on Christian principles. In 1840 the Roman Catholics in a neighboring village manifested an earnest spirit of religious inquiry, and a desire to be taken into connection with the mission.

In 1846, Mr. Addis speaks of the extreme indifference of the Hindoo to the truths of Revelation, and ascribes it in a great measure to his Polytheism, "which meets him with its multifarious remedies for all moral evil, and causes a deadness and sterility of feeling which nothing but power divine can effectually remove. A preacher of the Gospel in the most degraded parts of Christian lands can form but a faint conception of the difficulties which his missionary brethren in India have constantly to encounter from this source. In 1850, Mr. C. J. Addis, son of the missionary, became associated with his father in the labors of the mission.

There are now at this station 35 church members, 13 native teachers, besides 14 other native helpers, 20 children in the female boarding-school, and 971 scholars in the day schools.

South Travancore.—The London Missionary Society has four missions in South Travancore, viz.: Nagercoil, Neyoor, Quilon, and Trevandrum. The first of these stations was entered upon in 1806, the second in 1828, the third in 1821, and the fourth in 1838. These places all lie on the western coast of Southern India, at no great distance from each other, Nagercoil extending quite down to Cape Comorin. The country is divided into thirty districts, and has a population of nearly a million. The Malayalam is generally spoken.

In 1804, Rev. W. Ringletaube sailed for India, in company with Rev. Messrs. Cran and Des Granges, but not wishing to go with them to the Northern Circars, he directed his course to Tinnevelley, and subsequently entered upon his labors at Travancore. He gathered several congregations there, and baptized great numbers of the inhabitants, but the motive with many of them was worldly advantage. Alluding to the crowds of Hindoos and Mohammedans who expressed a willingness to embrace Christianity if their debts were paid, Mr. R. says: "For two hundred rupees I could have bought them all, but as I declined to pay their debts, they never called on me again."

In 1816 Mr. Ringletaube was compelled by ill-health to relinquish his mission, and for a year the London Society had no missionary in Travancore. In 1817 Rev. Charles Meade arrived, and in 1818 he was joined by Rev. Richard Knill. The outward success of the missionaries was surprisingly great. During the years 1818 and 1819, nearly three thousand of the natives of Travancore placed themselves under religious instruction, in addition to about nine hundred previously connected with the mission. It was evident, the missionaries say, that they had not renounced their former superstitions from selfish considerations.

In 1828 measures were taken for dividing the Travancore mission into two, the eastern and the western. The eastern division embraced Nagercoil and its out-stations, and the western division comprised Trevandrum, Neyoor, and Quilon, with their numerous out-stations. The work at these several places has been carried on with great vigor and success from the first, rendering it one of the most interesting and important fields occupied by the London Society in India. Particular interest has been manifested in that large and neglected-class called Parayas, most of whom are slaves, so ignorant and oppressed as to be quite unable to defend themselves, or to plead in their own behalf. A society has been formed for the special purpose of diffusing the Gospel among these people, and ten or twelve agents are stationed among them in the different districts.

In the Eastern, or Nagercoil district, there is a local tract society, which published during the year 1851, 71,600 copies of tracts, of various kinds. The church members at this station and its out-stations number, according to the latest reports, 340, and the scholars, in 57 schools, 2402. The congregations of this district, 25 in number, are spread over 70 villages, comprising 867 families, and 3333 individuals, of whom 260 have been baptized.

Neyoor, in the western division, has 42 out-stations, 953 Christian families, and 3150 individuals under instruction, of whom 185 are baptized, and 93 are in church fellowship. There are also 941 boys and 235 girls in the school.

Parechaley, a branch of the Neyoor station, has enjoyed special tokens of the divine blessing within the last two or three years. Two native theological classes have been formed and much encouragement has been derived from their progress. The most recent report gives the number of Christian families connected with the Pareychaley mission as 1197, comprising 4258 individuals. The out-stations are 71, church members 75, readers and assistants 77; boys in the day-schools 1372, girls 200; adult Bible classes 25, scholars 151; theological classes 2, students 51.

Quilon has a press in active operation, and tracts to the number of 16,600, varying from 8 to 16 pages each, were issued during the last year, to which the report extends. The number of children in the day-schools was 281.

Trevandrum has 10 village congregations, comprising about 800 people, scholars in the village schools 148. Tracts distributed during the last year, in Malayalim 10,428, Tamil, 4287.

These statements will show that the Travancore mission is very extensive, demanding an immense amount of labor for its successful prosecution, and rewarding those labors with the most gratifying and blessed results.

Calcutta.—The London Missionary Society commenced its operations in Calcutta in 1816. Rev. Messrs. Townley and Keith, the first missionaries, began at an early period to preach the Gospel in Bengalee, to establish schools, and distribute the Scriptures. In 1818 a commodious chapel was erected, called "Union Chapel," the funds for which were chiefly subscribed at Calcutta. A printing-press was established in 1820, and put under the superintendence of the Bengal Auxiliary Society. An institution called the Christian School Society was also formed at Calcutta, the object of which was to introduce Christian instruction into the native schools, under the entire management of native schoolmasters. A Bethel Society was established in the same year, at Calcutta, in connection with the Baptist brethren residing at Calcutta and Serampore. In 1823 and 1824 the labors of the missionaries were abundant and successful. Union Chapel was well attended, and a flourishing Sabbath-school was in operation. Bengalee preaching was continued at the bungalow chapel, Mirzapore, and a bungalow chapel was opened for worship in the native language, on the main road of Bhopanipore. In 1825 the mission was reinforced, and a new station was commenced. The year 1827 was marked by the baptism of a native female, who had been under serious impressions for years. The abolition of Suttee in India, by the British Government, was a memorable event of the year 1830, and proved the commencement of a brighter day for India. In 1833 mention is made of a diminution of schools, for the purpose of giving increased attention to the preaching of the Gospel. A year or two later there was a manifestation of open and decided hostility to Christianity, which was regarded as an encouraging feature, there having been before a degree of apathy to religious matters which was most trying to the patience of the missionaries. The wane of idolatry was clearly indicated in 1837, by the greatly diminished number of attendants upon the idolatrous festivals, and the disappearance of the splendor and pomp with which they were formerly celebrated. Another favorable change at this period was the absence of Europeans—the British resident gentry—from the dances given in honor of the goddess Doorga by the more wealthy natives. About this time Rev. Mr. Lacroix commenced a theological class which embraced quite a number of promising young men, and whose course of study consisted in the practical investigation of the Scriptures, systematic theology, the evidences of Christianity, and church history. They also composed short sermons, which, after the needful corrections, were preached to the natives in the presence of the missionaries.

The annual report of 1843 speaks of the previous year as a most disastrous one in a temporal point of view, the south of Calcutta having been visited by cholera, devastating storms, inundation, and famine. Many members of the Christian congregations died, the harvests were cut off, and distress and despair followed. For five months the rains continued almost without intermission. Still the work of the mission went on with encouraging signs of success. During the succeeding eight or nine years unceasing attention was given to preaching, schools, translations of the Scriptures, the publication and distribution of tracts, and itineraries through the principal villages.

There are at present five stations under the immediate care of the Calcutta mission, one of which includes two native villages, Rammakal-choke and Gungree. The church members at this station number 180, and the children in the vernacular schools 110. Mr. Lacroix, the missionary, has been much employed in conducting through the press a new edition of the Gospels of Matthew, Luke, and John, in Bengalee, for the Calcutta Bible Society; and in conjunction with Dr. Duff, has superintended the printing of the book of Isaiah, in Bengalee, for the same society.

The station of Ballia-Hati, under the care of Mr. Lacroix, has 60 professing Christians, and 171 pupils in the schools. At Cooly Bazar there is a branch missionary society, and a Sabbath-school and Bible class have recently been established. The most important educational institution is at Bowhanipore, there being in its several departments 803 pupils. At the opening of the year 1850, three college classes were formed, containing 70 students. A juvenile society and a ladies' society have contributed liberally to the funds of the mission. The Kishnapore station has connected with it about 100 native Christians. There are eight missionaries now laboring at the Calcutta stations.

Chinsurah.—Rev. Robert May commenced the mission at this place in 1813. So great was his success that in 1816 he had formed 30 schools, with 2,600 children. In 1819 these schools were reported as in a very prosperous state. They were gratuitously supplied with books by the Calcutta school Book Society, who ordered 1000 copies of a Bengalee and English Grammar to be printed at their sole expense. Religious books were also much called for, and extensively circulated. In 1820 a Bengalee chapel was erected, and in 1821 an additional native school was commenced at a village called Khonnian, the expense of which was defrayed by the Rajah of Birdwan. A native female school was also opened in a room of the fort, kindly assigned by the Dutch governor for the purpose. In 1826, great success attended the preaching of the Gospel to the Europeans at this station, many embraced religion, and a church of about twenty members was formed. The number of schools supported by the Bengal government at this station in 1828, was sixteen, in which over 2,000 boys were in a course of instruction. The mission schools were three in number, and contained 295 boys. Particular mention is made in 1834, of the free school in which English was taught to both native and Portuguese boys; but the attendance on this school was small, on account of the number of government schools in which English was taught, and the prejudices of the parents against the use of the Bible as a class-book—a prejudice tolerated in the government schools by the exclusion of the Bible. During the three or four succeeding years a spirit of earnest inquiry prevailed among the natives of high caste, some of whom abandoned Hindooism in favor of Christianity, but others were deterred by the most violent persecutions. The report for 1837 says, "The government has established a college for the education of Hindoo youths, in the immediate vicinity of the station, and the applications for admission have been very numerous." Rev. Mr. Mundy, missionary at this station, calls special attention, in 1838, to the fact, that those who become acquainted with the English language are much more favorably disposed to Christianity than those who are ignorant of it, and expresses the opinion that every college and school in the country might be conducted on Christian principles, without any objection on the part of the natives. But over this question the missionaries had no direct control, the British government being pledged not to introduce Christianity into the schools for instruction in English, nor in any way to interfere with the native religion. The mission schools were conducted upon entirely different principles, and the advancement of the pupils in Christian knowledge was very observable from year to year. The female schools, and also the infant school, under the care of Mrs. Mundy, were marked by great prosperity, and received the high commendation of the Bishop of Calcutta. But this devoted female missionary died in 1842, leaving her husband and the whole mission to mourn an irreparable loss. The next year Mr. Mundy himself was obliged, by ill-health, to abandon the field in which he had labored many years, and to return to England. He was succeeded by Rev. Mr. Bradbury, from Calcutta, and the preaching of the Gospel in Bengalee was sustained as in former years. Great eagerness to obtain and read the Scriptures was evinced, and many young men, educated in the Government colleges and schools, requested and thankfully received copies of the Bible. These and other encouraging signs led Mr. Bradbury to believe, in 1845, that this locality, one of the most educated districts in India, would soon enjoy the benefit of an extensive diffusion of divine knowledge.

Special divine favor was granted to the English female school in 1849, and cheering hopes were entertained of the conversion of several of the pupils. The number in attendance, at the latest date, was 57. The Bengalee school has 100 pupils, employed in the acquisition of general and religious knowledge. The older boys have been conducted through the Gospel of John, and the younger have learnt the First Catechism. There were 70 boys in connection with the English and vernacular school in 1847, but for want of funds this school has been suspended. Preaching to the heathen and the distribution of the Scriptures are continued with encouraging success.

Berhampore.—The operations of the London Missionary Society at this station were commenced in 1824, by Rev. Mr. Hill, who had been laboring at Calcutta. He met with opposition for a time, but succeeded at length in establishing schools for the children of Hindoos and Mohammedans. In 1828 a chapel and mission-house were erected, and a female school, under the care of Mrs. Hill and another lady, was in a prosperous condition. In 1831 an orphan asylum for native children was established, to which native orphans of both sexes were received, under the charge of two native matrons, members of the church. The girls were instructed in reading, sewing, spinning, &c.; and the boys, between school hours, were taught gardening and weaving.

In the annual report for 1837, Mr. Hill, in reviewing the work of thirteen years, says, "When I entered the country the jealousy of the government was great. A missionary could not leave Calcutta without special license, and I had to solicit from the chief secretary permission to live at Berhampore. The natives misrepresented my conduct to the civil and military authorities, and my own countrymen were hostile to me. Our schools were injured by secret combination and open hostility. For some years after my arrival at Berhampore, wherever I preached I was hooted and hissed, and men have even followed me from preaching with clubs to strike me. But things are now different. People are no longer afraid to ask for a tract, nor try to conceal it under their clothes to prevent the Brahmins from tearing it in pieces. The Brahmins themselves are as eager for tracts and Gospels as the other castes, and plead that they are Brahmins as a reason for showing them a preference. We now obtain congregations whenever and wherever we wish. In all principal thoroughfares, crossways, and markets, we never wait five minutes until a congregation assembles. The number of converts from our fellow-countrymen is not small. Of his Majesty's regiments which have been quartered here, we express with gratitude our belief that all, excepting one, included at their departure those whom the Holy Spirit had, during their residence at the station, sealed unto the day of redemption."

In 1838, after nearly 17 years of labor under a tropical climate, Mr. Hill found it necessary to seek a residence in his native country, and Rev. Mr. Lessel removed from Calcutta to supply his place. Mr. Hill returned to his field in 1842. In 1843 the mission was visited with affliction, and not a native church member, nor a native catechist, nor a child in the asylum or school, escaped the prevailing sickness. Some died, leaving the most satisfactory evidence of saving conversion. A deeply interesting account of the sickness and death of several children, appears in the report for 1847. In January of that year, Mr. and Mrs. Hill removed to Calcutta, where Mrs. Hill soon after died. Mrs. Patterson was also about this time called to her rest, and Mr. Patterson removed to England. These events left almost the whole burden of the mission on Mr. Lessel, who, accompanied by native catechists, preached to the heathen, and distributed tracts and scriptures extensively. The professing Christian community at Berhampore at the present time, comprises about 100 individuals. Impediments to female education, arising from the force of prejudice, the apathy of parents, and other causes, have been very numerous at this station; but Mrs. Bradbury, wife of one of the missionaries, has succeeded in establishing a girls' school, which contains 23 pupils, 12 of whom are day scholars, chiefly Mohammedans, and 11 boarders, consisting of orphans and the children of native Christians. They are instructed through the medium of the Bengali language, in reading, sewing and knitting, and also in the Scriptures. Five of the sons of native Christians are under the care of Mr. Lessel. Divine service in the English chapel has been conducted regularly every Sabbath evening, by the missionaries alternately. In the English boys' school the average attendance is 30.

Benares.—Mr. and Mrs. Adam were sent out to this station in 1820. Mr. Adam immediately organized a native school, which was so far successful that he opened another the following year. A chapel was opened in 1824, chiefly through the exertions of privates in the artillery. Concerning this station Mr. Adam forcibly remarks, "Benares exhibits, in full operation, some of the worst principles of Hindoo superstition." He describes the people as rich in their own eyes and in need of nothing, as already at the gate of heaven and in no want of aid; as awfully wicked in their lives, and altogether presenting formidable obstacles to missionary labor. In 1826 Rev. Mr. Robertson joined this mission, and in 1827 the native schools, three in number, contained 170 pupils. In all these schools Christian books were taught. A catechism and a Hindawee translation of scriptural lessons was prepared by Mr. Adam for the use of the schools. He also printed 1,000 copies of his tract on the ten commandments, and soon after prepared another tract entitled "Jesus the Deliverer from the Wrath of God." In 1831 the mission was strengthened by the arrival of Rev. Wm. Buyers. Mr. Crawford, at this date, had translated the minor prophets, and a consecutive version of the books of the Old Testament had been finished, as far as to the Second Book of Kings. The Psalms, Proverbs, and Isaiah, had previously been printed. The work of translation was continued in the following years, and besides the Scriptures, Pilgrim's Progress and other books were translated for the use of the natives.

In 1838 the report says: "The obstacles presented by the native language to the diffusion of religious and general knowledge have now almost disappeared, and, after much perseverance in endeavoring to simplify the style of writing and instruction so as to meet the capacities of the people generally, the missionaries, aided by the Benares Christian School Book Society, have succeeded in correcting much of the false taste formerly prevalent—a taste which was so vitiated as to prefer the absurdities of the native literature, clothed in a style of pedantic obscurity, to the plain and intelligible communication of sound and valuable instruction."

During the years 1839 and 1840, a vast number of tracts and copies of the Scriptures were put in circulation by the missionaries; but a serious obstacle to the success of such labors has been the inability of the people to read, arising partly from the peculiar and widely differing styles of printing. On this subject the missionaries, in 1840, offer the following important remarks: "Though Benares is called the Athens of India, it is astonishing to find how very few of its inhabitants can read. Most of the Brahmins who chant Sanscrit sloks, do not know the meaning of them. The greatest number of the Mussulman priests who read, or rather chant the Koran, do not understand it. But the great obstacle to education arises from the variety of characters. The Mohammedans use the Persian character, the Brahmins the Devanagati, the tradesmen the Kayathi, the bankers the Mahajani. On this account few can read any printed characters, and among these only a small number can read fluently, intelligently, and understandingly. Whenever a man takes a tract and reads it fluently, we may be almost sure that he has learned to read in a mission school. In these circumstances the education of the native youth is of the first importance.

In their report for 1851 the missionaries say that all their labors are performed with a view to increase the prosperity of the native church. "For it we translate the Scriptures and write books. We preach the Gospel to the heathen and teach it in our schools, in the hope that some may be brought into the fold of Christ. Our mission church, assembling at Salem Chapel, consists of twenty native members." Of the orphan and Christian boys, ten in number, recently under the charge of this mission, five have been removed to Mirzapore, to learn printing. Five of the orphan girls, at the latest accounts, had been married, and maintained an exemplary deportment in their new position. In connection with the mission there are four subordinate schools, containing an aggregate of 170 boys. The Bazar girls' school, under the superintendence of Mrs. Buyers, has an attendance of 33 scholars. All of these schools are represented as in a state of growing efficiency. The number of pupils in the English free school is 200.

Mirzapore.—This is a large and important inland town, about 30 miles south-west of Benares, and was occupied by the London Society in 1838. It was at that time a newly erected city, devoted to trade and commerce; and Mr. Mather, the first missionary, had to encounter obstacles of a peculiar nature, arising from the commercial character and spirit of the people. Generally speaking, however, the inhabitants were disposed to attend to the preaching of the word, and displayed much candor in judging of the conflicting claims of their own religion and that of the Bible.

One of the earliest efforts of Mr. and Mrs. Mather, was the establishment of an orphan school, to which a large number of children were immediately sent from Agra, where famine had deprived them of their parents. These children themselves were so reduced, that 14 out of 79 who left Agra, died on the way, or soon after their arrival. In 1840, Mr. Mather was joined by Mr. Glen, who directed his attention to the Mohammedan population.

The Gospel was faithfully preached, and both English and native services were regularly maintained. The native church received frequent accessions, and some of the converts were of such a character and position as to render their influence of great value to the mission. In 1843 the orphan schools had been increased, and contained 50 boys and 34 girls. But a sad mortality occurred among them about this time, and 17 of the children died. The various departments of this mission have been well sustained, and there are now at the station two missionaries and two assistant missionaries. The church has twenty-five members, of whom sixteen are natives. The free school has over 100 scholars, and the bazar schools, three in number, contain an aggregate of 70 boys. The orphan boys' school affords much encouragement; and the orphan girls' school, and also the infant school of 12 members, have been attended with gratifying results.

Surat.—The London Missionary Society commenced a station at this place in 1813, and continued it, at times with the most encouraging results, until 1845, when, "for weighty reasons," the directors decided to relinquish it. The mission was transferred to the Irish Presbyterian Missionary Society, whose missionaries were on the ground, and qualified to sustain the responsibilities of the mission.

Mahi-Kantha.—The mission at this place, situated in the Guzerat territory, about 100 miles from Surat, was commenced by Rev. Mr. Clarkson, in 1844. The site of the mission at first was Baroda, but was changed to Mahi-Kantha, on the banks of the river of that name. The plan of forming a Christian village has been prosecuted, for which purpose 60 acres of land has been procured from government, on a lease of 30 years, for cultivation by the Christian colonists, and six or seven substantial brick houses have been built. Preaching, schools, the distribution of books, and itinerant labors, have all been entered upon with vigor, and the mission promises the happiest results. A very interesting account of the conversion and baptism of a native, Patadar, will be found in the annual report of the London Missionary Society for 1850.

Almora.—This station, in Northern India, was entered upon by Rev. J. H. Budden, in 1850. It was originated, and has been chiefly sustained, by the liberality of J. H. Batten, Esq., and Capt. Ramsay, of the East India Company's service, and is at present in a prosperous condition. Schools have been established, and regular preaching services are maintained.

The following table gives an imperfect view of the London Missionary Society's operations in India, owing to the fact that in the more recent reports the number of churches and of communicants is not uniformly given; and the schools for boys and girls are not always mentioned separately. There are also many isolated facts which could not be conveniently classed; but the account given of each mission or station, it is believed, will supply these deficiencies.

FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—Rev. Alexander Duff, D. D., was designated by the Church of Scotland as its first missionary to India, early in the year 1829, and in October of the same year he sailed from Portsmouth in the Lady Holland. In February this noble ship struck on the rocks of a barren island near Cape Town, and almost everything on board, except the passengers, perished. Dr. Duff lost his whole library, consisting of over 800 different works, many of them of rare value, besides all his journals, notes, essays, &c., the fruits of many years of research and reflection. He sailed in another ship from the Cape, and in March came near being lost in another gale, and on reaching the mouth of the Ganges the vessel was driven ashore in a hurricane, amid all the horrors of a shipwreck. At length, on the 27th of May, 1830, he reached Calcutta, "more dead than alive." He soon entered upon his favorite scheme, the establishment of a collegiate institution, in which the Bible, in English, should be the principal text book; and after a year or two of trial and experiment, the institution was carried into successful operation. The history of this college need not be detailed. It has educated, on its peculiar plan, many hundreds of Hindoo young men, and the happy effects which it has produced are recognized with gratitude by nearly all classes throughout the province of Bengal. Native youths of great promise, connected with the institution, have from time to time been converted, and having renounced caste and all the forms of Hindooism, they have received baptism, and have often become most able and efficient assistants in the missionary work. Of Dr. Duff's labors in Europe and America for the last four years the Christian world is fully aware, and no particulars need be stated. Four or five other distinguished missionaries have at different periods been sent to Calcutta, one of whom, Rev. D. Sinclair, died a year or two since. There are now, in the absence of Dr. Duff, three European missionaries on the ground, assisted by several native converts of distinction. More than a dozen natives are employed as teachers in the college, having themselves been trained up in it, and become decided proficient in its various studies. Besides this institution, a female school is in successful operation at Calcutta.

The society has a branch station at Chinsurah, a little distance from Calcutta, where there is also a collegiate institution, on Dr. Duff's plan, in a very flourishing condition. It was opened in 1849, and has from seven to eight hundred pupils, all boys, and these are divided into fourteen classes, according to their age and standing. The first class, of twenty-three, are of the ages of 16 to 23 and upwards, and having been in the institution from its commencement, they are far advanced in their studies. The Old and New Testaments, as in the college at Calcutta, are leading text-books, and are systematically taught for at least one hour each day. The boys in this class, says a late report, "do not believe in idolatry now; they are full of Bible truth." Still there is no evidence that any of them have been savingly converted. A female school of much promise has been established at Chinsurah. The Calcutta mission has also branch stations a few miles distant, at Bansberiah and at Calnah, chiefly for the purposes of education.

Madras.—The society established a mission at Madras in 1835, under the labors of Rev. John Anderson, who is still at that station, with five others who have come to his aid. A prominent feature of this mission at this place, as at Calcutta and Chinsurah, is the educational institution, with the Bible for a leading text-book. There are two divisions in the school, the upper or college division being taught by the missionaries and native converts; and the lower division, both male and female, taught by an educated East Indian, with a number of native teachers. There are nearly 600 pupils in the institution, about 150 of whom are females.

Besides the institution at Madras there are four branch schools, of which the following are the statistics as furnished in the report for 1853. The figures show the actual attendance:

	Hindoo Males.	Mohammedan Males.	Hindoo Girls.	Mohammedan Girls.
Madras	276	22	203	17
Treplicane	143	32	100	15

Chingleput	269	53	61	0
Nellore	179	26	115	29
Totals	1,088	170	545	67

The blessing of God has rested upon these schools, conversions have been frequent, and numbers are in a process of training for the ministry and for teaching.

Bombay.—A mission at this place was commenced in 1828 by the Scottish Missionary Society, but has been for several years under the care of the Free Church. Rev. John Wilson, D.D., has been laboring there ever since 1829, and he has been joined from time to time by other brethren. The society has there an important high school, or collegiate institution, as at other places, and at the last accounts there were about 400 pupils in the school. In a letter of recent date Dr. Wilson says,—“We are striving with all our might not only to give large stores of knowledge to our pupils, but to qualify them by the culture of the native languages which we have extensively studied, to communicate that knowledge to their countrymen, not only by the living voice, but by the wider working press. We are raising up a body of native authors and translators.” Quite a number of the pupils are Romanists, Chaldeans, Arminians, and Protestants; and Dr. Wilson says, “It is an unspeakable advantage to them, that from the first they deal with the Bible as the word of God.”

Poonah.—This place is 100 miles S. E. of Bombay, and about 75 miles from the sea-coast, and has been emphatically termed “the native land of the Mahrattas.” It has a population of about 100,000, and is the largest military station in the Bombay presidency. The Free Church has several missionaries at this place, and besides the public preaching of the Gospel, and lectures on the evidences of Christianity, several schools, for males and females, are efficiently maintained, the total number of pupils being between five and six hundred.

Nagpoor.—This place is in the interior of northern Hindostan, several hundred miles N. E. of Bombay, and has a population of over 100,000. The Free Church had there at the latest dates, 1853, two missionaries, a small church, and English and vernacular schools containing about 500 children. During the year embraced in the last report six Hindoos had been baptized, one of whom was a Brahmin. The station at Nagpoor is regarded as a very important one, occupying as it does a vast section of country, where few, if any, Christian influences of a similar kind are brought to bear upon the native mind. But the opposition is sometimes very violent, both from men in power and from the lower orders of the people. Still the missionaries are enabled to continue their labors, and they actually sold during the last year over 5000 tracts.

The foregoing brief statements show that the Free Church Missions in India are performing a leading and most important agency in the department of education, not only by the vast number of youth, of both sexes, brought under their tuition, but especially by the position and influence given to the Bible in all their schools. More full and complete statistics of the schools and churches at these stations would be desirable, but they are not furnished in the missionary journals of the society.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—The Established

Church of Scotland has three missions in Hindostan, viz., at Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras. The mission at Bombay was founded by the Scottish Missionary Society in 1828, and transferred to the General Assembly in 1835. The general course of the mission has been prosperous. There is now at that station one European missionary, Rev. R. Miller, and two female assistants, supported by the Scottish Ladies' Association. The number of scholars in actual attendance upon the schools, is about 400. In three schools and an orphan asylum there are 100 girls.

The Calcutta mission was established in 1830, by missionaries now adhering to the Free Church. It had in 1858, two missionaries, Messrs. John Anderson and James Ogilvie, and 26 native assistants. The number of pupils in the schools was 1305, of whom about 1100 were generally in attendance. One of the native teachers of the "Institution," or high school, had been baptized during the year, but not a single pupil had been withdrawn in consequence. "Five years ago," say the missionaries, "had a teacher been baptized, more than half the pupils would instantly have been removed. A few years ago the native newspapers were perpetually attacking the Institution, and holding up to reprobation those parents who allowed their children to attend. But this is very seldom done now; on the contrary, the importance of this and similar institutions is very generally acknowledged by the native press."

At Madras the missionaries, by the last report, 1858, were Messrs. Grant, Sheriff, Black, Walker, and Francis Christian. The number of pupils in the schools had been till quite recently, 400 boys and 200 girls. But the number had been diminished in consequence of a report that some of the children were likely to be baptized, and the number of boys was reduced to 282, while the number of girls was increased to 220.

At the time of the disruption of the Church of Scotland, all the missionaries then connected with the establishment, adhered to the Free Church.

IRISH PRESBYTERIAN MISSION.—The Irish Presbyterian Church established a mission in Hindostan in 1841. The missionaries were Jas. Glasgow, R. Montgomery, J. A. Speers, Adam Glasgow, and J. McKee. They occupied three stations, viz., Rajkote, Gogo, and Surat, situated in north-western Hindostan, the two former in Guzerat, and the latter on the opposite side of the Gulf of Cambay. Immediately upon entering the field these missionaries were enabled, by the aid of the London Society and the coöperation of government agents, to secure ample mission premises, and to erect suitable buildings. They organized a church of 21 members, and entered upon the usual course of missionary labor, as preaching, schools, &c.

They now have four stations, three missionaries, and three native assistants. Vernacular services are held on the Sabbath and week-days. There are schools for boys and girls, with an average attendance of 550 scholars. Prayer-meetings are maintained, and there have been several baptisms.

GENERAL BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The General Baptists of England commenced their mission in Hindostan in 1822. They chose for their field that part of the country called Orissa, or Ootkul K'hand, supposed to be the ancient country of the Or, or Oriya tribe of Hindoos, and lying between 19° and 23° N. lat. and 84° and 88° E. long. The boundaries of Orissa have been changed at different periods, but as now generally understood it is a long narrow strip of land, extending from Midnapore in the north to a few miles below Ganjam in the south, and from the shores of the Bay of Bengal in the east to the vast range of mountains in the west, comprising a tract of about 300 miles in length, and from 20 to 170 miles in breadth. The principal towns in Orissa are Cuttack, Bala-sore, Jajepoor, Pooree, Midnapore, Ganjam, and Berhampore.

Cuttack was the first place occupied by this society as a station, and the first missionaries were Rev. Wm. Bampton and Rev. James Peggs, who arrived in Feb. 1822. They were soon joined by Rev. Mr. Lacey and wife. They commenced at once the study of the language in which they were to make known the Gospel to the benighted Orissans, and in the mean time organized schools, and taught the heathen as they were able. Preaching in English on the Sabbath was practiced from the commencement of the mission, and an infant church was soon formed, and three convenient chapels were fitted up. Thousands of tracts and Gospels were also distributed during the first year or two.

Pooree.—In Sept. 1823, Mr. and Mrs. Bampton removed to Pooree, or Juggernaut, a little to the N. E. of Cuttack. It was one of the strongest holds of Satan in all India, for there the idol Juggernaut had his temple, making the whole region a modern Golgotha, and causing desolation and wo of the most appalling nature. The journals of the missionaries at Pooree are filled with the most shocking and heart-sickening details of the idolatry, destitution and wretchedness of the vast multitudes who thronged to the temple of Juggernaut. On one occasion, June, 1825, 250,000 pilgrims were estimated to be in the immediate neighborhood of the temple, a large portion of them without shelter, and without decent food or clothing, and dying off in the most frightful manner, of famine, cholera-morbus, and other diseases. Says one of the missionaries, "In every street, corner and open space, in fact wherever you turned your eyes, the dead and dying met your view. At one time I counted upwards of 60 dead and dying, from the temple down to the lower end of the hospital, omitting the sick that had not much life. At a corner opposite to the hospital, on a spot of ground twelve feet square, I counted ten dead, and five who were sick and nearly dead. This was the case while there were several sets of men in active employ carrying out and burying the dead. You will now perhaps reflect, that if the streets were thus crowded, what must the various Golgothas be? I visited but one, and that was between the town and the principal entrance. I saw things that I shall never forget. 'The small river there was quite glutted with corpses, and the wind having drifted them together, they formed a complete mass of putrifying flesh. They also lay upon the ground in heaps, and the dogs and vultures were able to do but little towards consuming them.' At a little later date the same writer adds, "Pages would not be sufficient to detail the miseries of the deluded worshipers of Juggernaut. The poor pilgrims were to be seen in every direction, dead and in the agonies of death, lying by fives, tens, twenties, and in some instances there were hundreds to be seen. In one place Mr. Lacey counted upwards of 90, and in another Mr. Bampton counted 140. In the hospital I believe I have seen 30 dead at once, and numbers more in the agonies of death, and even the living using the dead bodies for pillows."

It was amid such scenes as these that the missionaries sought to diffuse the knowledge of the true God, and of a pure Christianity,—a hopeless attempt, except in reliance upon the almighty and regenerating Spirit of God. This dependence was deeply felt; and in circumstances fitted most powerfully to impress such a truth, one of the missionaries writes: "The omnipotence of God is to me an encouraging consideration. In the power of God is all my hope. If I had to address any advocates for ministerial power to convert sinners, or for the power of the Gospel apart from Divine influence, I would say, come to Juggernaut; and if that do not change your minds you are incorrigible." Again, the same missionary says, "I am daily more convinced of the need of the Holy Spirit. I have seen the people confounded in their gods; I have heard them acknowledge the infinite superiority of Christ; I have seen them much affected, yea, in tears, under the preaching of the Gospel; but alas, what is all this without the Holy Spirit to change their hearts, to enlighten their minds, and to render the word effectual?"

The constant recurrence of such language in the journals of these devoted laborers, shows how scriptural were their views on fundamental points, and how exactly the General Baptists accorded in their belief, with the missionaries of other evangelical societies in the vast field of India. That they should labor with success, even amid the desolations of Juggernaut, was to be expected, both from their own spirit and the promises of God. Accordingly we find, at the end of four years, that they had gathered schools in Cuttack and Pooree, comprising 380 boys and 148 girls. Many of these children were able to read the Gospel with facility; and besides the advantage to the children, these schools became chapels for the declaration of the Gospel to the heathen, like the "school of Tyrannus," in which "Paul disputed daily."

Balasore.—In the early part of 1827, the society established a third mission at Balasore, a town situated about 170 miles S.W. of Calcutta, and containing about 10,000 people. Rev. Mr. Sutton, who had labored some time at Cuttack, was the first missionary at the place. In 1832 the society say in their Report: "Ten years ago our first missionaries opened their heavenly commission in broken accents on the plains of Hindostan; and there Oriya converts have been gathered to the Saviour, and Hindoos now proclaim the unsearchable riches of Christ. The grand contest between light and darkness in one of the darkest regions of India, has thus commenced. Even in the land of the modern Moloch of the East, Satan no longer maintains an unmolested empire." It is a fact entitled to distinct and honorable mention, that a field so dark, the very heart of Satan's empire in Hindostan, and a region that had never been penetrated by a single missionary, was chosen by the General Baptists as their place of toil and conflict. They entered into no man's labors, and counted neither ease nor life dear, that they might preach the Gospel to the most benighted and wretched heathen on earth. The report for 1832 mentions the death of Mr. Bampton, one of the first missionaries of the society in India. The same report notices the suspension of missionary operations at Balasore, on account of a deficiency of laborers. The town had then but recently been visited with an inundation, in which about 20,000 persons perished.

From Pooree Mr. Sutton writes this year: "The opposition in the way of obscene abuse runs very high. Oh, the abominable expressions shouted out against me this evening. It would frighten half England to hear them." Persecution was very bitter, especially towards those who exchanged Hindooism for Christianity, and of this class there were some very striking instances. To alleviate the trials of the converts and render them helpers of each other, the plan was adopted of settling them together, in the vicinity of Cuttack, and forming of them a Christian village. Being outcasts whom none would assist, they could thus enjoy sympathy and aid, could assemble conveniently for worship, and would also form a body of Christians, whose example would be salutary. The place of their assemblage was named Christianapoor.

By this time several native preachers had been raised up, of whom the most distinguished were Gunga Dhor and Rama Chundra; Gunga especially was regarded as a powerful preacher and an astounding witness against his idolatrous brethren. His illustrations were often exceedingly bold and impressive. For example: when wishing to show how the Gospel would spread, he said—"Suppose we were enveloped in complete darkness; but suppose it was ascertained that there was fire in the house of a certain individual in yonder bazar, some one would soon run and light his lamp from that fire; others would light their lamps at his, and others again would light their lamps from them, and so on, till the light would spread all over Cuttack. Thus it is with the true light of religion. All is thick darkness, but in the padre's (missionary's) house there is fire; I have lighted my lamp at his fire; you will light yours from mine, and others again will light theirs from you. Thus the true light will become universal." Of Rama it was also testified: "He is conscientious, humble, teachable, and zealous. As a preacher, he is a thunderer. Sometimes he almost makes me tremble; and the effect on natives, when he feels well and can get a hearing, is very powerful." Rama's wife was the earliest object of his solicitude. He constantly taught her, and sought to impress upon her the truths of Christianity, and his efforts were blessed. She became a well-informed and decided Christian, and was a great help and comfort to her husband.

In this year (1832) the plan was adopted by the brethren at Cuttack, of establishing country bungalows and circuits around some central point, at a considerable distance from the principal station. They chose Bhogepoor as the centre, a place eight miles from Cuttack, surrounded with villages and markets to a great extent. It was the quarter from which most of the converts had come, and where great inquiry was made in regard to Christianity.

From the commencement of the mission at Cuttack, the missionaries labored to promote religion among the European residents, preaching twice to them every Sabbath. These efforts were blessed, and many of the government officers and soldiers became decidedly pious. "At the communion service," says the missionary, "our poor dark native brethren and sisters are ranged round the same table and on the same seats with the civil and military officers of government." Thus the natives were led to see that their rulers acknowledged the obligations of Christianity.

In 1833 an important object was supposed to be gained for Pooree and for all India, viz., the abolition of the Pilgrim Tax. Hitherto avarice had been joined to Satanic influence in drawing pilgrims to Juggernaut. All the worldly interests of the most abandoned, impure, and depraved people were involved in the worship of this idol. By this craft they had their wealth, and of course they opposed every possible obstacle to the efforts of the missionaries. The sanction which the English government had lent to idol worship was also an insuperable difficulty. But now the government passed an act, instructing its officers in India to terminate the guilty support of Hindoo idolatry at Juggernaut and other temples. The order, however, remained a dead letter, the East India Company refusing to carry out the instructions it had received. As the connection of the British government with idolatry is an important topic, and one with which the General Baptists came into closer conflict than any other missionaries, a somewhat full statement of the facts may be desirable. In their report for 1837, the Society say:

"It appears that the servants of the Company, even when professedly Christians, are required to attend heathen and Mohammedan festivals for purposes of respect; that in some cases they are required to present offerings and do homage to idols; that the poor natives are compelled, without compensation, to attend heathen festivals to draw the idols' cars; and that European officers exercise so entirely the management and control of various temples, that no expense can be incurred but under their direction; and, O horrible! not even the prostitutes connected with the temple can be entertained or discharged without their concurrence! And those who thus degrade themselves lower than the managers of a house of ill-fame, are high-minded English gentlemen! To what infamy will not some men stoop through the accursed lust of gold! By this atrocious system has the British government in India been disgraced; and the Indian empire of Britain has been exposed to the frown of that holy God who abhors idolatry and those who participate in the abomination."

Glaring and awful as was the position of Great Britain in this respect, apologies for inaction were found from year to year, till 1840, when the Society record with great joy, that "the wicked Pilgrim Tax, which in its results has tended so greatly to add to the celebrity of Juggernaut, is at length abolished."

Strong hopes were now entertained that the great popularity of Juggernaut would decline, from the loss of one of its main supports; but these expectations proved fallacious. The Pilgrim Tax had indeed been abolished, but the government, in other forms, still extended its support and patronage to the bloody Moloch of the East. From year to year the missionaries remonstrated, and their efforts were seconded by some members of Parliament and of the East India Company; yet in 1846 the Orissa conference of missionaries had occasion to adopt the following resolutions in regard to this enormous evil:

"Resolved, That as a very general opinion is prevalent that the government of India has abandoned its connection with the temple of Juggernaut, we deem it obligatory on us as a missionary conference, assembled in the province of Orissa, to state that such is not the case. It is indeed true that the government has restored certain lands to the proprietors of the temple, and abolished the Pilgrim Tax; they have, moreover, ceased to receive the presents and other emoluments connected with the idol: and thus far they have done well; but the government do still, in fact, though in another form, contribute more largely than before to the support of the idol, inasmuch as they have not only relinquished the lands and other emoluments of the temple from which they formerly received a revenue, but have added an annual donation of 35,000 rupees, and allow the proprietors of the temple to receive all presents and levy any contributions they please on the pilgrims, so that a much larger source of revenue than ever is now open to the rajah and other interested parties.

"We do, therefore, consider the continuation of this yearly grant to Juggernaut as most anti-Christian in itself, and an act of partiality towards this idol, which is inconsistent with the neutral position the government professes to sustain towards all systems of religion in India."

These facts and statements are brought forward in this place in the belief that they may be needed both in England and America to remove the impression that the British government in India has withdrawn its direct and active support from the worship of Juggernaut. Such is not the fact. In their report for 1852, the missionaries say, "It is much to be lamented that the government grant in support of this idolatry is not yet withdrawn." At the missionary conference held at Cuttack in the year last named, the brethren protested against this crying evil in the following terms: "Resolved, As the donation to Juggernaut has not been discontinued, and as we have witnessed through another year the wasting and demoralizing effects of the system which it sustains, we are constrained to repeat our solemn and earnest remonstrance against this iniquitous support of idolatry."

As it is due to the friends of missions every where that this subject should be understood, and certainly not unjust to the Indo-British government, and as it comes up in no other connection in the present work, the precise responsibility of the Government in the support of idolatry may be given in another form of statement adopted by the missionaries and answering to the facts as still existing. They say: "The rulers of India still continue, by the payment of the large annual grant from the public treasury, to support this wicked system, (the worship of Juggernaut.) Nor is this all; a pension amounting to nearly 500 rupees is allowed to a byraggee (public servant or agent) on account of daily food to the idol; and another sum of 2,666 rupees is paid to another byraggee, that he may distribute the holy food among the starving pilgrims."

These astounding facts the Hindoos have the sagacity to turn to their own account. When rebuked for their idolatry by the missionary, they reply, "Why don't you teach your own people to worship Jesus Christ? They mind Juggernaut. They give a large sum of money to support his worship. If Juggernaut were not true, would the government give money for his support? Ask that babler (missionary) why the government gives 35,000 a year to Juggernaut if he be not true."

These, say the missionaries, are some of the forms in which the British donation to Juggernaut is mentioned by the heathen. The fact of its being given is universally known, they say, and only one reason for the bestowment is ever mentioned by the idol worshipers, and that is that "Juggernaut is true, and therefore the wise and mighty of the land contribute to his support." The British government still persists in its open and efficient patronage of idolatry in its most shocking and degrading form, in defiance of the fact, stated by the missionaries, over and over again, that the government grant is the principal support of Juggernaut, that more human life is sacrificed at the shrine of this idol than by the suttee and the sword, and that the efforts of the missionaries to enlighten and save the besotted and wretched masses who annually visit Poo-ree, are neutralized and baffled by British interference. In their report for 1853 the Orissa missionaries protest with the same earnestness as before against this great abomination. They say, "Our mission has now reached the thirtieth year of its history, and consequently of its contest with this gigantic evil. During this long period we have seen the ground of controversy continually shifting, but the controversy itself continually renewed. In vain have the various objections been met by the most conclusive refutation; ever and anon some new friend of the idol, oblivious of past arguments or imperfectly acquainted with the real facts of the case, has come forward with some new caveat." Thus, to this hour, the missionaries and the Christian world are doomed to disappointment, and to the humiliation and grief of seeing the most cruel, corrupt, and shocking form of heathen worship known on earth, supported by the money and influence of an enlightened and Christian nation. It is a singular fact, moreover, that the devoted missionaries of this society have occasion to arraign the government as the persevering patron and supporter of idolatry, at the same time that they speak with the highest satisfaction of its generous and noble efforts for the suppression of human sacrifices among the murderous Khunds. It is to be regretted that a government which is doing so much to encourage Christian missions should be any way involved in the support of idolatry.

For several years past no missionaries have resided permanently at Pooree; but the missionaries from several stations have uniformly visited this place at the annual festivals, for the purpose of distributing tracts and Scriptures among the pilgrims, and instructing them by preaching and conversation wherever hearers could be gathered. The Balasore station was continued till 1838, when it was suspended, and has since remained without a missionary. Berhampore, the most southern station of the General Baptists in Orissa, has been steadily and efficiently sustained. It is an important post, and enjoys the labors of two missionaries and their wives. The people are worshipers of a most detestable idol, and of course are in a state of extreme degradation. A proverb of their own says, "As is the king so are the subjects; as is the god so are the worshipers." There are three native preachers at this place, in whom the missionaries have great confidence. Two asylums, one for boys and one for girls, are accomplishing great good. They originated in a desire to provide for the children of converted natives, which could not be done except on the mission premises. To these were added such children as were made over to the missionaries, from time to time, by their parents in a season of famine. Some also were picked up in a state of starvation after being abandoned to death. More recently another class were added, viz.; children rescued from sacrifice among the Khunds, an extremely savage people inhabiting the Goomsur mountains in the neighborhood of Berhampore, and who were in the habit of sacrificing great numbers of children to their stupid and bloody goddess. Through the combined efforts of the government agent, J. P. Frye, Esq., and the missionaries, great numbers of these poor victims have been rescued from the sacrificial knife, and put into the asylums. Mr. Frye has also greatly aided in the establishment of schools among the Khunds themselves, and a rescued Khund, brought up in the asylum, is now superintendent of those schools. It was stated in the report for 1849, that Mr. Frye had been instrumental of rescuing one hundred and six victims from the horrid death to which they were doomed. In the same report the following deeply interesting particulars are given of this before almost unheard of people: "The last full moon had been fixed upon for a very great sacrifice, in anticipation of the agent's arrival, (it is the time for sacrificing through the whole sacrificing country,) but he was happily in the midst of them twelve days before the appointed time, and the fearful waste of human life was mercifully prevented. The torture with which the revolting rite is performed in this part of the Khund country exceeds, if it be possible, the worst that has been heard of anywhere. The victim is surrounded by a crowd of half intoxicated Khunds, and is dragged round some open space, when the savages, with loud shouts, rush on the victim, cutting the living flesh piece-meal from the bones, till nothing remains but the head and bowels, which are left untouched. Death has, by this time, released the unhappy victim from his torture; the head and bowels are then burnt, and the ashes mixed with grain. The efforts of the government to suppress the abhorred rites of human sacrifice and female infanticide among these barbarous people, and in these hills and jungles, are in a high degree creditable to its character. The revolting rites of sacrifice and female infanticide have prevailed from time immemorial in the impenetrable jungles and inaccessible hills of the Khund country. No one can tell where they originated, or compute the frightful waste they have occasioned, but it is estimated that, allowing these bloody rites to have prevailed from the commencement of the Christian era, as they were found to prevail when the district was discovered a few years since, on a moderate computation the awful aggregate would exceed three millions. We have thought, and talked, and prayed about the Khunds, and God has answered our supplications, though in a way we did not expect. Who can calculate the results of so many being brought under Christian influence?"

A late report states that the brethren at Berhampore have succeeded in obtaining a considerable quantity of fertile land, for a new Christian settlement. The experiment of thus providing for the honorable maintenance of the increasing Christian community, promises to be highly successful. A chapel and mission bungalow have been built for this village, chiefly by the liberality of Mr. Frye, and another government officer. The precise number in the church and in the schools at Berhampore is not stated in the recent reports. The report for 1853 contains some deeply interesting accounts of the Khund boys and girls in the asylums. Fourteen of these rescued children were this year baptized, after giving evidence of sincere conversion to Christ. They have been, like thousands of others, stolen from their parents in early childhood and sold to the Khunds for sacrifice, and but for the efforts of the missionaries and government agents, their flesh would have been distributed piece-meal in the fields, instead of coming around the Lord's table to commemorate his love. An older girl of this class was married this year to a young man in the asylum, and both went as teachers to their native hills. Four other young men, who had been rescued and trained in the asylum, also returned to the Khund hills as teachers. During this year, Col. Campbell, the government agent for the suppression of human sacrifices, rescued 120 victims. His account of the rescue of one pretty little girl is full of tender interest. He had received information by an anonymous letter that a sacrifice was to take place about thirty miles from their encampment. A party were sent to prevent the sacrifice, and by traveling all night through the jungle they reached the village mentioned at day-dawn, and found everything ready for the murderous offering. In a short time the people began to assemble, but they were soon surprised by the appearance of the Colonel's party, who made the chief men prisoners, and brought the little victim away. She was ready bound for sacrifice, and had the detachment been two hours later, would have been cruelly cut to pieces. She had been sold for this horrid death by her own father. The chiefs and head men of the villages have now signed an agreement to abandon the inhuman practice.

Cuttack, the earliest station of the Society, has been uninterruptedly maintained, and is still prosperous. The mission church numbers 125. There are two asylums for boys and girls, conducted on the same plan as those at Berhampore. The average number in these asylums, as last reported, was 105, of whom 56 were rescued from a bloody death on the hills of Goomsur, Boad, and Chinna Kinedy. Some of the remainder are the orphan children of idolatrous parents, and a large number are the children of native Christians, left fatherless or motherless. Rev. Mr. Sutton and his wife, from Cuttack station, visited the United States about twenty years since, and after laboring much to promote a spirit of Christian missions among their friends, returned again to their chosen field. The two native ministers, of whom mention has already been made, viz., Gunga Dhor and Rama Chundra, have continued to be very faithful, and important helpers to the missionaries. Honorable mention is also made of two other native preachers. An interesting sketch of these four individuals, with fine specimens of their style of preaching, will be found in the report of the Society for 1852.

Midnapore, a considerable town on the borders of Orissa and Bengal, and about 70 miles from Calcutta, was determined upon as a station by the Mission Conference in 1836, and Mr. and Mrs. Brooks subsequently removed to that place. A neat chapel was built, a congregation collected, and the first Hindoo converts soon gathered in. Means were also found for the extensive distribution of Testaments, and other religious books and tracts. But though the mission promised well, it was determined to remove Mr. Brooks to Calcutta, for the purpose of establishing there a branch mission, and after three or four years Midnapore was dropped from the Society's reports.

Gamjam, situated between the Berhampore and Pooree districts, was occupied by a missionary in 1840. It was once a very important and populous European settlement; but, in consequence of the rapid growth of Calcutta, and the prevalence of the Gamjam fever, so called, but which was probably the plague, it was forsaken by the Europeans, and the native population was much reduced. At the time of entering upon the mission here, it was believed to be a healthy place, and preparations were made for permanent labors; but after some two years it was found to be unsafe to remain there, and the station was given up.

Khunditta, not a great distance from Pooree, and near the great Juggernaut road, is first mentioned as a station in the report for 1840. But no European missionary has yet been stationed there, though the Society has been often and strongly urged to send one. Much good has been accomplished, however, by native laborers, in proof of which many interesting facts might be stated. The station is still continued.

Piplce, near Pooree, and a place through which nearly all of Juggernaut's pilgrims pass, attracted the special attention of the missionaries in 1847, and arrangements were soon made for commencing operations there. In 1849 two missionaries were sent to this station, and since that time a church of twenty members has been gathered, and quite a number of the natives have embraced Christianity. Deeply interesting statements, in regard to some of the converts, appear in the journals of the brethren at this place.

Choga is the only remaining station of the Society in India to be noticed. It is described as a secluded and beautiful spot, six miles from Cuttack, and its history is one of extreme interest. It appears that in 1833 two inquirers came to Cuttack from one of the villages of Choga, having heard much of Christianity, and listened to the missionaries, both on their journeys and in Cuttack. The Gospel had deeply impressed them; but they felt unwilling to give up all for its sake. The village to which they belonged was one of sixteen exempted from the East India Company's regulations, and did not enjoy the benefit of British laws, and therefore the converts were subject to confiscation, banishment, and every abuse. But they at length sent a message to the Cuttack missionaries to come and see them, and the interview ended in their deciding for Christ. They were baptized, and in a moment lost caste, were stripped of every possession, and persecuted in the bitterest manner. But the missionaries visited the rajah, and persuaded him to allow the converts to remain, if they would build houses outside the heathen village. This gave strength to other inquirers to come out and profess Christianity, and soon quite a number of families were gathered together. The work went on gradually, and in 1843 one of the missionaries, Mr. Lacey, secured a large piece of ground for a Christian village. It was a hill in the middle of a jungly plain, with high mountains on one side, and was the favorite resort of tigers and thieves. A missionary, in describing the place, says: "Crowded cities have generally been chosen by missionaries as the scene of their labors; but here is a secluded mount, far away from the busy haunts of men, where the tiger and the leopard and the bear have remained unmolested for ages, on which the God of missions collects from the rude agriculturists of the district a people for himself. It is cheering, indeed, in the midst of such a dense jungle, to see a beautiful chapel and village; and, as the Sabbath dawns to see the Christians busily preparing on every hand for the solemn services of the sanctuary, and to hear the voice of prayer and praise, from a spot which only a few years since was darkness—dense darkness, the residence of the goddess of thieves." The village church of Choga, in 1853, consisted of sixty-four members, besides eighty-five nominal Christians. They are industrious, strict observers of the Sabbath, and the colony is a source of great satisfaction and encouragement to the missionaries.

The foregoing statements furnish a comprehensive view of the General Baptist missions in Hindostan, the most interesting in some respects of any in that vast field of idolatry. But the reports are defective in respect to the details needed for a statistical table, and none can be furnished that would be of value.

[The preceding portion of the article on Hindostan was prepared by Rev. E. D. MOORE.]

FREE-WILL BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The first two missionaries of this Society, Messrs. Noyes and Phillips, with their wives, spent their first six months in India as laborers in connection with the English General Baptist missionaries. Mr. Phillips superintended their bazar schools at Balasore, and Mr. Noyes was in the English mission school at Cuttack. At the expiration of that time, it was mutually agreed that these brethren should enter a separate field, and Sumbhulpore, the capital of a district of the same name, was selected. It lies on the Mahanadi river, 250 miles above Cuttack, and contains some 15,000 inhabitants. It is the residence of the rajah, and situated in the midst of a populous country. The only European family in the place showed the missionaries every possible kindness, and afforded them much assistance. During the several months spent in building and preparing for a permanent location, the missionaries did what they could in preaching and distributing books. Six starving children were given them, and with them commenced a boarding school system which has been useful to the mission. Before they were settled in their new abodes, the missionaries one after another were brought very low by sickness. They were almost destitute of the comforts of life, and their hastily-built houses could not shelter them from the scorching heat. Having no physician or nurses, they assisted each other as well as their debility would permit, Mrs. Noyes on one occasion leaving her sick bed to bleed her husband. After burying a child, and narrowly escaping death themselves, they revived so far as to be put on board a boat, and were floated down to Cuttack. Mr. and Mrs. Phillips were called to bury their infant child, which she followed in a few days, and was laid in the grave by her desolate husband, attended by the six small children who were her scholars. He was immediately taken sick, and when hope had nearly fled, he too was carried on board a boat, being almost unconscious, and was taken to Cuttack. A few weeks' residence at this place, where they received the most kind attentions, restored the health of the invalids; but it was decided that they ought not to risk their lives by a return to Sumbhulpore. Balasore having been recently vacated by the return to England of Rev. Mr. Goadly, a General Baptist missionary who had previously occupied that station, by the advice of the missionaries at Cuttack, Messrs. Noyes and Phillips located there, and commenced their labors in 1847. Balasore is the capital of the district of the same name. It is a small river port situated on the great pilgrim road leading from the northern provinces to Pooree, and lies on the river Brundhabalanga, about eight miles from the sea. It contains about 14,000 inhabitants, and about 150 coasting vessels are owned in the place, which are mostly engaged in taking salt to Calcutta. The climate is comparatively cool and healthy. At Balasore the missionaries formed the nucleus of their boarding-schools with the six native children given to them in Sumbhulpore. Others were rescued from death in time of famine, and the number of scholars soon increased to fifty. In 1850 there were seventy-nine merias or Khund children in the two boarding-schools at this station, with a large number of other children who, like themselves, were kidnapped and kept for the purpose of being offered as sacrifices, in accordance with a horrible custom that prevails among the Khund tribes. These merias, as their captors call them, were rescued from their intended immolators by some of the officers of the British government, who commit the rescued victims to the missionaries in the country, by whom they are brought up and educated. A considerable number of the rescued ones have died of cholera, but the survivors are doing well.

In 1840, Rev. O. R. Bacheler and wife were located in Balasore, soon after which ill-health compelled Rev. E. Noyes to return to his native land. Mrs. Bacheler left the station for America in 1845, but died a few days after commencing her journey. Rev. R. Cooley and wife, Miss Lovina Crawford, and Rev. B. B. Smith and wife now occupy this station; but on account of the ill-health of his present wife, Rev. Mr. Bacheler has been compelled to return with her and their children to this country.

All the missionaries of the Society have been obliged sometimes to give medicine to the sick and dying heathen; but in consequence of having studied medicine previously to his going to India, Rev. Mr. Bacheler devoted more time and attention to this department of usefulness than could be consistently done by the other brethren of the mission. Through his efforts a dispensary has been established at Balasore, which, during ten years past, has been extensively patronized. All applicants for medicine have been supplied as fully as the means furnished would admit, and numerous surgical operations have been performed. In 1850, Mr. Bacheler treated 2,407 cases, besides performing 126 operations in surgery. As the patients were mostly poor, the medicines and services were bestowed gratuitously. These labors for the physical comfort of destitute and suffering idolators were performed at times set apart for such services, so as not to allow the duties of the physician to interfere with those of the missionary. On an average he devoted only an hour daily to his patients. He also formed a Medical Class of the native converts, to whom he lectured daily. The students, by taking copious notes of his lectures, were furnished with a competent guide in treating the ordinary diseases of the country, which, if they are studious and industrious, will afford them a comfortable support, and make them respected among their countrymen. Twelve young men have attended this class, six of whom have completed the course of two years' study, and are now useful in their calling. Mr. Bacheler's medical labors were considered beneficial to his missionary work, as they secured the confidence and esteem of many to whom he could otherwise have had no access.

Early in 1840, Rev. Mr. Phillips took a portion of the boarding-school and some of the native converts at Balasore, and went with them to Jellasore, where he commenced a new station. Jellasore is situated on the great pilgrim road, previously named in this article, thirty miles north of Balasore, and in the midst of a densely populated country, one hundred and twelve miles from Calcutta. It is rather a collection of villages than a compact town. Nominally the district in which Jellasore is located belongs to the province of Bengal, but its inhabitants are mostly Oriyas, numbering about half a million of souls. There is but one European family within thirty miles of the station, and the missionary has toiled alone more than thirteen years. During this period he buried his second wife, who was eminently prepared for usefulness in the boarding-school. A day school and a boarding-school have been in operation a considerable portion of the time at this station; and some four years ago a hospital was established there, mostly for the benefit of heathen pilgrims, and large numbers of the sick have received medical aid. The annual number of patients has usually varied from four hundred to five hundred. The hospital was erected for the benefit of the poor; and like the dispensary at Balasore, it has been sustained by subscriptions in India. The natives have given small sums for its support, but the principal contributions were made by Europeans.

Some six months after his arrival in India, in 1844, Rev. J. C. Dow located in Midnapore. It is the capital of a district in the province of Bengal, and contains some 20,000 inhabitants, and the district is peopled by about one and a half millions of Bengalis. The town is about seventy-five miles from Calcutta, and the climate is unusually healthy. A short time before Mr. Dow located in Midnapore, the place was vacated by the General Baptist missionaries. Three years of excessive toil broke him down, when he was compelled to return to his native land a confirmed invalid. There are some twenty European families in the town, who would do considerable towards the support of a missionary, were one sent there. Three times has this promising station been occupied by different missionary societies, and as many times has it been abandoned for want of laborers.

In 1852, a new interest was commenced at a place called Santipur, which is about six miles from Jellasore, and near several large villages. Two hundred acres of land have been secured, on which a Christian settlement has been commenced, especially for the benefit of the Santals. There is on the lot a small Santal village, and there are others near it. Some thirty or forty acres of the land are under cultivation, and the rest is covered with jungle or brush wood. The settlement is regarded as the outer court of the temple, into which Gentiles may be admitted. It is designed to afford refuge and protection to inquirers, while in their transition state from heathenism to Christianity, where the Santals may be secure from the interference and oppression of the landholders, and native Christians enjoy the fruit of their labors, and worship God unmolested. Though the heathen are permitted to settle on the premises, rules are adopted forbidding all idolatrous practices, enjoining moral duties, the observance of the Sabbath, attendance at worship, &c.

A Sabbath-school is held every Lord's-day afternoon, and a day school has been opened for the heathen children, from the adjacent villages and the children belonging to the station. It is designed to be in part a farming community, and several of the native Christians are already cultivating small lots for agricultural purposes.

During his residence in Jellasore, Rev. Mr. Phillips has labored considerably for the benefit of the Santals, spending what time he could spare from his other duties, in visiting their villages, acquiring their language, getting a few of their children into school, and giving the people a written language. Having no colleague he has been able to do but little in this interesting and important work, but what he has done has not been lost. Several of the Santal youth were brought into a school which he established in Jellasure, where they were taught their own language, reduced to system, and written for the first time in a book. But little religious concern was observed among them, till 1847, when some of the scholars began to manifest a deep interest in spiritual things. Several of them soon obtained a hope in Christ, two of whom promise to be useful to the mission and their countrymen, either as preachers or school teachers. Though alone and engaged much of the time in Oriya labors, Mr. Phillips has been enabled to translate the Gospel by Matthew into Santal, and is now engaged in translating Mark into the same language. He has written a Santal primer of 24 pp.; a sequel to it of 44 pp.; and an Introduction to the Santal language, comprising a grammar, reading lessons, and a vocabulary of nearly five thousand words. It contains 190 pp. He has also written a tract and geography in Oriya. Rev. Mr. Noyes prepared an Oriya tract and Rev. Mr. Bachelier a medical guide, both in Oriya and Bengali. These are the principal works that the missionaries have published. Mrs. Phillips has recently arrived in this country. She left Orissa with her children, partly with a view of educating them here, and partly on account of her ill-health. Her husband designs to follow his family in a year or two, and after recruiting himself, return with part of them to his present field. Nothing occurring to prevent it, he will then engage more earnently in the work of translating the Scriptures into Santal. Appropriations are expected from the American and Foreign Bible Society to aid him in the effort.

The following account of the results of the mission is taken mostly from Rev. O. R. Bachelier's work, entitled Hindooism and Christianity in Orissa:

1. The Gospel has been preached as extensively as two or three missionaries, assisted by four native preachers, could do it in a district inhabited by more than a million souls. A good impression has been made; the minds of the people have been in a measure prepared for the reception of the Gospel; and obstacles to the work that at first seemed to be almost insurmountable, have begun to disappear.

2. The Bible, either as a whole or in separate parts, has been extensively circulated. Good has been done in this way, and also by the extensive scattering of religious tracts among the people, multitudes of whom have read what was put into their hands.

3. Some seventy-five young men, women, and children are receiving a religious education in the boarding-schools, where several of the most prominent members, preachers, physicians and teachers have been instructed, who will exert an important influence in Orissa's evangelization.

4. Four native preachers have been raised up, who are qualified for extensive usefulness in this great work.

5. Two churches have been organized, both numbering some forty-five members, gathered from the darkness and degradation of heathenism. Some who were converted at the stations have left and united with other churches, and others have been removed to their heavenly rest.

REV. E. HUTCHINS.

AMERICAN PRESBYTERIAN MISSIONS.—The missions of the Presbyterian Board in India were commenced in 1833. The first missionaries were the Rev. Messrs. William Reed and John C. Lowrie, and their wives, who arrived at Calcutta in October of that year. They were sent out by the Western Foreign Missionary Society, with instructions to select a station in some part of the northern provinces, if this should appear to be expedient, after consulting with Christian friends in that city; otherwise, they were at liberty to proceed to any other part of India, or of the Eastern world. They were greatly favored in obtaining information and counsel from several gentlemen who were largely acquainted with the country, particularly the Rev. William H. Pearce, of the English Baptist mission, the Rev. Alexander Duff, D. D., of the Scotch mission, and Sir Charles Trevelyan, K. C. B., one of the Secretaries in the political department of the government, who had himself resided in the Upper Provinces. As the result of these inquiries, it was considered advisable to proceed, as originally contemplated, to the remote north-western part of the country; and the city of Lodia, on the river Sutlej, one of the tributaries of the Indus, was chosen as the station to be first occupied.

The principal reasons for choosing the Upper Provinces as their general field of labor, were these: The urgent need of missionaries and teachers in that part of the country; its being in a great measure unoccupied as missionary ground; the superior energy of the people, as compared with the inhabitants of the Lower Provinces; the relation of the north-western parts of India to other Asiatic countries west and north, which suggested the hope that the Gospel might be eventually extended from thence into the heart of Central Asia; the vicinity of the Himalaya Mountains, affording places of resort to missionaries whose health might become impaired by the hot climate of the plains. Besides general considerations of this kind, there were some special reasons, arising out of the liberal views concerning the education of the natives, which were held by European gentlemen of influence at some of the north-western cities, and the desire of some of the native chiefs to obtain for their sons the advantages of education in the English language. As an example of both, Sir Claude Wade, the political agent of the government at Lodia, had set on foot a school for the instruction of native youth in English, which was attended by sons and other relatives of certain Sikh Sardars or chiefs, and of the Affghan exiles then living at Lodia. This school was afterwards transferred to the mission, and the generous support of its founder was continued until his official duties called him to a distant part of the country. It is still in successful operation.

The missionaries recognized with grateful feelings the hand of Providence, in directing the time of their arrival in India at the precise juncture of circumstances which had turned the attention of Christian observers with special interest to the north-western provinces. If they had reached India a year sooner, their choice of a field of labor might have been a very different one; or, if a year later, they would probably have found the ground at Lodia already occupied, and that perhaps by some educational institution from which the Christian religion would have been excluded. They also recognized with thankfulness the favor that was shown to them in the eyes of some of the most influential persons in the country; so that although they had landed at Calcutta, feeling uncertain what their reception might be, they were cordially aided in their work by those who were in positions greatly to promote or to prevent its success; while nothing could exceed the friendly interest in their mission which was manifested by all the European missionary brethren with whom they became acquainted. Thus, having favor in the sight of God and his people, their missionary field was chosen and their plans of work were laid.

How often do we see that the Lord's thoughts are not our thoughts, neither his ways our ways! Signally was this shown in the early history of this mission. Only one of the first company of missionaries was permitted to see this carefully and well chosen field of labor; two of the others were early called to their rest—Mrs. Lowrie and Mr. Reed—both by consumption; and Mrs. Reed had accompanied her husband on the voyage homeward, which he did not live to complete. The remaining member of this company reached the station at Lodia in November, 1834, and entered on his duties; but a few days afterwards he was taken with dangerous illness. For several weeks the mission seemed likely to become extinct, by his removal from the scenes of this life; and, on his partial recovery, he was told by his medical attendants that he must not attempt to remain in the hot climate of India. A year longer, however, was spent by him in the charge of a school, preaching, and making journeys and inquiries, to gain information for the use of the mission and the church at home; thus doing the work of a pioneer. In January, 1836, he left Lodia, and Calcutta in April, on a visit to this country for health; but eventually the hope of returning to the mission was, for the same reason, reluctantly abandoned.

In the mean time, the Rev. Messrs. James Wilson and John Newton, and their wives, had arrived at Lodia in December, 1835, and entered upon enlarged labors in the service of Christ. Besides the school and other duties, they took charge of a printing-press in 1836, which has been a valuable auxiliary in the missionary work.

The third company of missionaries, the Rev.

Messrs. James R. Campbell and James McEwen, and Messrs. Jesse M. Jamieson, William S. Rogers and Joseph Porter, and their wives, reached Calcutta in March, 1836. It was Mr. Lowrie's privilege to welcome these brethren on their arrival, and to aid them in preparing for their journey to the Upper Provinces. Their meeting was of deep interest, as may readily be supposed, especially to one who had seen so severe bereavements and so many dark hours in the short history of the mission. It was now apparent that these afflictions were not intended to discourage the supporters of the mission, but to teach them their dependence on divine grace alone; to purify their motives; to chasten and strengthen their zeal; and thus at the latter end to do them good, so that by their means God would impart the greatest blessings to those who were sitting in darkness and the "region and shadow of death."

The brethren of this new reinforcement soon proceeded on their journey to Lodiaua, but Mr. McEwen was led, by what appeared to be indications of the will of Providence, to stop at Allahabad, a large city at the junction of the Ganges and the Jumna, which has ever since been occupied as a missionary station. Mr. McEwen's labors were crowned with pleasing success, and a church was formed in January, 1837, with 13 members. Besides preaching, he gave a part of his time to the charge of schools, in which he was greatly assisted by his equally devoted wife; but they were not permitted to continue long in these encouraging labors. On account of the loss of health, he was compelled to leave India in 1838; and, after serving the cause of Christ as a pastor, in the State of New York, he was called to his rest in 1845.

On the arrival of the other members of this third company at the end of their journey, in 1836, two new stations were formed. One of these was at Saharunpur, 130 miles south-east from Lodiaua; the other was at Sabathu, 110 miles north-east from the same place, in the lower ranges of the Himalaya Mountains, at an elevation of about 4000 feet above the level of the sea. The unordained brethren of this company were graduates of colleges, in preparation for the work of the ministry. They went out as teachers, but with the expectation of prosecuting their theological studies, and they were afterwards ordained to the sacred office.

A church was organized at Lodiaua in 1837; and it is remarkable that two of its first three native members have since become valuable laborers in the missionary work; one as a minister of the Gospel, and another as a teacher. This must be viewed as a signal proof of God's favor towards this infant church, and as a happy example of the way in which the Gospel is to be more and more extended in heathen countries. The schools at Lodiaua, Saharunpur, and Sabathu, were vigorously carried forward, and the brethren were engaged in preaching, distributing the sacred Scriptures and religious tracts, making journeys to places where large assemblages of natives were collected on festival occasions; but little more will be attempted here than to present a chronological outline of the arrivals of the missionaries, with some of the leading facts in their work.

The fourth company of missionaries, consisting of Rev. Messrs. H. R. Wilson, Jr., John H. Morrison, and Joseph Caldwell, Mr. James Craig, teacher, and Mr. Reese Morris, printer, and their wives, arrived at Calcutta in April, 1838. There they met Mr. and Mrs. McEwen, on their return homewards, and were greatly aided by them in making arrangements for their journey. One of their number, however, had already reached the last stage of her pilgrimage; Mrs. Morrison was taken to her rest before leaving Calcutta, after a brief illness of cholera. Her afflicted companions proceeded to their several stations: Mr. Morrison to Allahabad, to join the Rev. James Wilson, who had taken charge of the station on Mr. McEwen's removal; Mr. Morris to Lodiaua; and Messrs. Caldwell and Craig to Saharunpur. Mr. H. R. Wilson, while proceeding to the station at Lodiaua, was led by Providence to stop at Futtehghurh, on the Ganges, two hundred miles above Allahabad, a town which had been pointed out by some of the earlier brethren as eligible for a missionary station. Here, with an interesting family of orphan children, a part of whom were placed under his care by a pious English physician, and assisted by Gopeenath Nundy, the teacher previously employed in their instruction, Mr. Wilson began important labors, which have been steadily prosecuted ever since, with evident tokens of the favor of Heaven.

In February, 1839, the Rev. Messrs. Joseph Warren, John E. Freeman, and James L. Scott, and their wives, arrived at Calcutta, and became connected, the first two with Allahabad, and the last with Futtehghurh. A printing-press was sent out with Mr. Warren, which, under his efficient superintendence, became an invaluable means of promoting the influence of the mission. In November of this year, Mrs. Caldwell, at Saharunpur, was called to her rest.

In December of the next year, the Rev. Messrs. John C. Rankin and William H. McAuley, and their wives; the Rev. Jos. Owen and Miss Jane Vanderveer, teacher, arrived at Calcutta. Mr. Owen joined the Allahabad Mission, and the rest proceeded to Futtehghurh. In this year, 1840, the work of translating the Sacred Scriptures and preparing other religious books and tracts, began to be reported as occupying much of the time of some of the missionaries. One of these works was a translation of the Gospel of John from the original Greek into Punjabi, the language of the Sikhs;

One of these works was a translation of the Gospel of John from the original Greek into Punjabi, the language of the Sikhs;

another was the Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church into Hindustani, with the Scripture references at the bottom of the page.

In the year 1841, churches were organized at Saharunpur and Futtehgurh, and twenty-seven native members were reported at all the stations.

The Rev. Messrs. Levi Janvier and John Wray, and their wives, reached India in January, 1842, and were stationed—the former at Lodiana, and the latter at Allahabad. Messrs. Morrison and Caldwell were married. Mrs. Porter was called this year to her rest. Dr. Willis Green reached India in November; spent a few months at Lodiana; and returned home, the climate not suiting his health. Churches were organized at Saharunpur and Futtehgurh, and the year was further signalized by the organization of three Presbyteries under the instructions of the General Assembly, composed of the ministers in each mission, and taking their names, like the missions, from the leading city, or the station first occupied, in the bounds of each: Lodiana, Furrukhabad, and Allahabad. The brethren at Saharunpur being ecclesiastically related to the General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, were constituted by their Synod into a separate Presbytery. Their relations to the Board as missionaries are the same as those of the other brethren, and the intercourse between them has been mutually pleasant and beneficial. A part of their support has always been furnished by churches of the Reformed Synod.

The year 1843 was marked by the arrival in India of the Rev. John J. Walsh and his wife, who were connected with the Furrukhabad mission; the death of the second Mrs. Morrison; the return to this country of Mr. Rogers and family, on account of Mrs. Rogers's ill-health; and of Mr. Morrison, also for health; the forming of a new station at Mynpurie, 40 miles west of Futtehgurh; the licensure of the native assistants, Golok Nath and Gopeenath Nundy, by the Presbyteries of Lodiana and Furrukhabad; and the steady advance of the missionary work. The church members reported at Allahabad in January were nine Americans, three Europeans, eight East Indians, and eleven natives; in all thirty-one.

In 1844, Mr. Owen was married. Gopeenath Nundy was ordained. Parts of the Bible, in a revised translation, were printed at Lodiana in Hindustani. A translation of the Koran into the same language, by a Maulavi, with an Introduction and Notes, refuting its errors, by the Rev. J. Wilson, was published at Allahabad, marking quite a new era in Mohammedan literature. A larger number of tracts and books were distributed in the Lodiana Mission than during any former year, and all the branches of missionary labor were faithfully carried forward. The number of church members reported at Futtehgurh this year was twenty-seven, of whom sixteen were natives.

The next year witnessed the death of Mr. Craig at Saharunpur, and of Mrs. Jamieson at Sabathu; the return to this country of Mr. Morris on account of health; the destruction by fire of the printing-press, book-repository, &c., at Lodiana, causing the loss of about $10,000 worth of property, including upwards of 90,000 copies of parts of the Holy Scriptures and of tracts. In general, the labors of the missionaries were continued without change. In November of this year, the first meeting of the Synod of North India was held at Futtehgurh. Important questions, concerning the kingdom of Christ in India, received the earnest consideration of its members.

In 1846, Mr. Jamieson visited this country, to provide for the education of his motherless children; Mr. H. R. Wilson and family also returned, on account of Mrs. Wilson's health; and Miss Vanderveer came home also on account of impaired health; Mr. Morrison having regained his health, returned to India with his wife; Mr. Rudolph, a German teacher, and his wife, who had spent some years in India, became connected with the Lodiana Mission, and Mr. Rudolph was licensed to preach the Gospel. A new station was formed at Agra; and a number of the members of the church at Allahabad having removed to that city upon the transfer of the government offices, they were reorganized as a church, with other members, making in all fifteen, under the ministerial charge of the missionaries. At Futtehgurh, the number of church members reported was thirty-four. At Allahabad, a church building, 78 feet by 45, was erected; while, to the communion of the church itself, it was stated that from its commencement seventy-four persons had been admitted, fifty-one of whom were received on the profession of their faith. The Government college at Allahabad was transferred to the mission, and the Christian religion and books became a part of the daily study of the scholars.

Early in 1847, the Rev. Messrs. Augustus H. Seeley and David Irving and their wives, and Mr. Robert M. Munnis, licentiate preacher, arrived at Calcutta, on their way to the Furrukhabad Mission. Mr. Jamieson, on his return to his field of labor, with his wife, reached Calcutta in November. Mr. Campbell with his family arrived in this country on a visit, on account of his wife's health. Mr. Rudolph and Golok Nath were ordained as Evangelists by the Presbytery of Lodiana, and Mr. Munnis by the Presbytery of Furrukhabad. A new station was formed at Jalandar, in the Punjab, about thirty miles west of Lodiana, which was occupied by the Rev. Golok Nath and a native teacher. Churches were organized at Sabathu and Jalandar. Some new members were admitted to most of the churches; and the number reported from all the stations, except Agra and Saharunpur, was 107.

In January, 1848, the Rev. A. Alexander Hodge and his wife, and the Rev. Charles W. Forman, arrived in India. The former joined the Allahabad, and the latter the Lodiana Mission. In November, Mr. Campbell and his wife reached Calcutta, on their return to Saharunpur, accompanied by the Rev. John S. Woodside and his wife, of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, destined to the same station. Mr. Julius F. Ullman, a German teacher, who had lived for some years in India, became connected with the Furrukhabad Mission, and was licensed to preach the Gospel by the Presbytery. Mr. Porter returned to this country on a visit with his motherless children, and Mr. Rankin and his family came home on account of his ill-health. Mrs. Scott was called to her rest while on her return to this country for her health. A new station was formed at Ambala, a city almost equally distant from Lodiana, Saharunpur, and Sabathu, which was occupied by Mr. Jamieson and a native catechist. Some new members were admitted to the churches, and a few were suspended from church privileges. The second meeting of the Synod of North India was held at Agra, in December of this year. The minutes of this meeting, and also of the first meeting, are published in the Foreign Missionary Chronicle of November, 1849. They will be read in future ages, as well as at the present time, with deep interest.

In the next year, Mr. Porter returned, with his wife, to his field of labor; Mrs. Rudolph and Mrs. Freeman were taken to their rest; and Messrs. Irving and Wray and their families returned to this country on account of health. Mr. Ullman received ordination from the Presbytery of Furrukhabad, and John Hari, a native catechist, was licensed to preach the Gospel by the Presbytery of Allahabad. A new station was formed at Lahor, the chief city of the Punjab, which was occupied by Messrs. Newton and Forman. A church was organized at Ambala, and a special work of grace was manifested at Futtehgurh, as the result of which thirty-three members were admitted to the communion of the church. The whole number of church members reported this year was 16.

The year 1850 was marked by the arrival in India of the Rev. James H. Orbison, to join the Lodiana Mission; the Rev. Messrs. David E. Campbell and Robert S. Fullerton and their wives, to join the Furrukhabad Mission; and the Rev. Messrs. Lawrence G. Hay and Horatio W. Shaw and their wives, to be connected with the Allahabad Mission; and by the return to this country of Mr. Hodge and his wife, on account of her health, and of Mr. Freeman, whose health had also become impaired. The number of church members reported this year was 209.

Messrs. J. Wilson and W. H. McAuley and their families came home in 1851, on account of health. Mr. Freeman, with his wife, returned to his field of labor, and Messrs. Rudolph and Ullman were married. The number of church members reported this year was 231.

In 1852, Mr. Scott made a visit to this country on account of his children, and Mr. Newton and his family came home on account of his health. The Rev. Robert E. Williams embarked for India, and arrived at Agra early in the following year. Schools were now established at this city for the education of the children of persons of mixed parentage, European and native, who are commonly called East Indians, a class of growing numbers, intelligence, and influence. The members of the church, according to the report of this year, were 255.

The buildings required for their use were purchased, with the aid of very handsome donations from the late lamented Governor of the North-western Provinces, the Hon. J. Thomason, and other English friends. One feature of the missionary cause in India should be mentioned in this connection, as truly gratifying. From the beginning the missionaries have enjoyed the confidence of many of the English residents in that country—civilians, officers in the army, and others. With the best knowledge of the work in progress, they have considered it their privilege to promote it by their sympathy, influence, and very liberal gifts; and thus have they greatly encouraged the missionary brethren, gratified the friends of missions in this country, and promoted the cause of the Redeemer.

In 1853, Mr. Scott, with his wife, returned to India; Mr. Orbison was married; and Mrs. Seeley and Mr. Porter were called to their rest. The work of the missions continued to be carried forward with fidelity and zeal.

The preceding sketch conveys a very inadequate view of the work of evangelization which our brethren in India have been permitted already to accomplish. Besides preaching statedly at their various stations, they are accustomed during the cold months of each year to make journeys into parts of the country not yet occupied, in order to make known the way of life by public discourses, conversation, and the distribution of the Scriptures and other Christian books. To thousands of towns and villages has the Gospel been published on these tours. They are accustomed also to attend the Melas held at particular times and places. These are assemblages of the natives for religious ceremonies, but are attended by many for purposes of trade or amusement—so that they may be regarded as a kind of fair. They are held at places accounted holy, such as Hardwar, where the Ganges enters the plains, and Allahabad, where the Ganges, the Jumna, and according to the native tradition a third river, invisible, unite their streams. Immense crowds, amounting to hundreds of thousands, including many pilgrims and visitors from the most distant parts of the land, attend the more celebrated of these Melas; and there are numerous others of less note, attended by people from the neighboring towns and villages. They afford opportunities for widely disseminating the knowledge of the Gospel. The good influence exerted in this way will not be known until the great day reveals it, but sometimes it is signally displayed. An aged Brahmin had made a pilgrimage from Jubbelpore to attend the Mela at Allahabad, a journey of several hundred miles, to wash away his sins in the Ganges. There he heard a discourse by one of the missionaries, which shook his faith in Hindooism. He returned home without having had an interview with the missionary, and was led by the persuasion of a Qazi to study the Koran; but he found in Mohammedanism no rest for his troubled mind. Having by some means obtained a portion of the Scriptures, he carefully studied its lessons, and taught them to his only daughter. At this point, an English officer became acquainted with him, and found that he had renounced his own religion, and was sincerely seeking a knowledge of the Christian faith in the face of many difficulties. A Hindi Bible for him was requested from one of the missionaries at Agra, and thus his history became known to the missionary brethren.

Another means of promoting a knowledge of the Christian religion has been afforded by the press. Numerous tracts and catechisms, in various Hindoo dialects, and some larger works, have been published. The Way of Life, by Dr. Hodge, translated into Hindustani; another work, with a similar title, by a German missionary; a translation of the Koran into Hindustani, with notes in refutation of its errors; the Westminster Confession of Faith; a volume of hymns; revised editions of the Scriptures, in whole or in part; a translation of the books of Genesis, Exodus, chapters 1-20, and Psalms, and most of the New Testament, into Punjabi, by Messrs. Newton and Janvier, are among the larger works issued by the press. The whole amount of printing at Lodi and Allahabad from the beginning is over one hundred millions of pages, of which the sacred writings form a large portion. By means of these Christian books a large amount of truth, subversive of idolatry and Mohammedanism, and setting forth the true religion, has been widely diffused. Some striking examples of good which has been done in this way, sometimes in places far remote from the stations of our brethren, have been reported in their letters.

Still another important agency has been the schools of the missions. These have been supported from the beginning, it having been considered from the commencement of the work an object of the greatest importance to train up a native ministry; and the number of scholars has gradually increased until, as stated in the report of 1854, about two thousand nine hundred of the native youth are now under instruction. A few of the scholars are in elementary schools, but most of them are in schools of a higher grade; and all of them have been brought in greater or less degree under the influence of Christian instruction and example. A large proportion of them have become convinced of the folly, and in some measure of the sin, of idolatry. Many of them are prepared to acknowledge that Christianity is the true religion; some of them have become the professed followers of our Lord, and a few are laboring in various ways—one as an ordained minister, others as teachers, catechists, and Scripture-readers—to bring their countrymen to the knowledge of Jesus Christ as the Saviour of sinners.

The preaching of the Gospel in these missions has not been in vain, as the preceding statements have shown. It is with sincere thanksgiving that we can refer to still another and more impressive proof of the blessing of God on the labors of his servants,—the Christian life and the dying testimony of some of the converts, to the power of divine grace. An affecting and beautiful little memoir was published by Mr. Warren, a few years ago, of Jatni, a member of the church at Allahabad. She was the daughter of a Brahmin, but she became a child of God. In all the relations and events of life, her deportment was exemplary. And when called at length to pass over Jordan, she was supported by a good hope through grace. Mr. Warren, with tender caution, had apprised her of the probable termination of her disease; and he adds, "I was delighted to find that she had thought of it, and had come to feel willing that God should do with her, as to life just as he pleased. I questioned her closely, and set death and the judgment before her plainly; but her nerves were firm, her eye clear, and her voice calm and steady: 'I know Christ, and can fully and completely trust him in all things. He keeps my mind in perfect peace.' I saw her often, and always found her the same." She was enabled to resign her soul, her husband and her child to the care of her Father in heaven, and at the early age of twenty-two she departed joyfully to be with Christ. Another example hardly less striking was presented in the Christian death of a native catechist at Saharnpur. His missionary friend, Mr. Campbell, who had frequent and most pleasing interviews with him on his death-bed, gives a very interesting account of his religious views and hopes: "I asked him if he was afraid to die? 'No, sir,' he said, 'I am not now afraid. . . . I am now fully reconciled to the will of God. I do not wish to live longer in this sinful world.' On being asked where his hopes for salvation were placed, he replied emphatically, 'On Christ alone: he is the only Saviour, and I know he will not disappoint my hopes;' and then, bursting into tears, he said, 'O sir, how much I owe to you! You are the means of leading me to Christ, and of instructing me and saving my soul.' This was so much more than I had expected, it was too much for me, and we both wept together. At that moment I thought that this was more than enough to compensate me for all the little trials I have ever been called to endure as a missionary. I could have changed places with dear Samuel, to enjoy his happiness and assurance of hope." Examples like these are precious seals of the favor of Heaven towards the missionary work.—Lourie's Manual of Missions.

WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—For many years Dr. Coke had desired to enter India as a missionary field, but the keys of India were in the hands of the East India Company, and they kept them with the same jealous care as they did the keys of their counting-houses. The Doctor had often sounded individuals of the Company, but without effect. The island of Ceylon, not being in the Company's charter, became the object of Dr. Coke's attention with the hope that it might prepare the way for entrance into India. Finding certain gentlemen, high in office, willing to encourage the Gospel in the East, Dr. Coke became satisfied of his call to go, provided he could find six young men of hopeful talents willing to devote their lives to the work. He waited on the late Dr. Buchanan, and consulted him on the subject. And when his intentions became known, five preachers already in the work, expressed their readiness to go. To these were added Benjamin Clough, a local preacher. The conference could not but approve of the plan, as Providence obviously opened the way; the Doctor being willing if necessary to bear the expense of the outfit, which amounted to above £6000. After the conference of 1813, he assembled the six brethren in London, and procured them a Portuguese tutor, together with a printing-press and types, as one or two of the missionaries understood the art of printing.

Their books, clothes and other necessaries, were furnished suitable for a permanent residence in India. Having established themselves in Ceylon they soon turned their thoughts to the continent of India, where God seemed to be opening their way; and it was decided that Mr. Lynch, the senior missionary, should proceed to Madras, which he did, Jan. 25, 1817, taking with him letters of introduction from persons of the highest consideration at Colombo, to their friends at the presidency, which insured for him a kind reception. His piety and zeal soon endeared him to all who were interested in the progress of Christianity, and Madras became to him, in a short time, a scene of considerable usefulness.

Mr. & Mrs. Horner arrived in Bombay, in September, 1817, and the day following were kindly received by Sir Evan Nepean, the governor. On the same day he waited upon the Bishop of Calcutta who expressed his good opinion of the zeal and conduct of the Wesleyan missionaries in Ceylon, and wished Mr. Horner equal success at Bombay. Mr. Horner immediately applied himself to the study of the Mahratta language under the tuition of a Brahmin. He soon acquired the language, and began to preach to the people: he also gathered a school of fifty boys, to whose instruction he devoted himself. In 1819 the English and Malabar school of Mr. Lynch was attended by

Messrs. James R. Campbell and James McEwen, and Messrs. Jesse M. Jamieson, William S. Rogers and Joseph Porter, and their wives, reached Calcutta in March, 1836. It was Mr. Lowrie's privilege to welcome these brethren on their arrival, and to aid them in preparing for their journey to the Upper Provinces. Their meeting was of deep interest, as may readily be supposed, especially to one who had seen so severe bereavements and so many dark hours in the short history of the mission. It was now apparent that these afflictions were not intended to discourage the supporters of the mission, but to teach them their dependence on divine grace alone; to purify their motives; to chasten and strengthen their zeal; and thus at the latter end to do them good, so that by their means God would impart the greatest blessings to those who were sitting in darkness and the "region and shadow of death."

The brethren of this new reinforcement soon proceeded on their journey to Lodiana, but Mr. McEwen was led, by what appeared to be indications of the will of Providence, to stop at Allahabad, a large city at the junction of the Ganges and the Jumna, which has ever since been occupied as a missionary station. Mr. McEwen's labors were crowned with pleasing success, and a church was formed in January, 1837, with 13 members. Besides preaching, he gave a part of his time to the charge of schools, in which he was greatly assisted by his equally devoted wife; but they were not permitted to continue long in these encouraging labors. On account of the loss of health, he was compelled to leave India in 1838; and, after serving the cause of Christ as a pastor, in the State of New York, he was called to his rest in 1845.

On the arrival of the other members of this third company at the end of their journey, in 1836, two new stations were formed. One of these was at Saharunpur, 130 miles south-east from Lodiana; the other was at Sabathu, 110 miles north-east from the same place, in the lower ranges of the Himalaya Mountains, at an elevation of about 4000 feet above the level of the sea. The unordained brethren of this company were graduates of colleges, in preparation for the work of the ministry. They went out as teachers, but with the expectation of prosecuting their theological studies, and they were afterwards ordained to the sacred office.

A church was organized at Lodiana in 1837; and it is remarkable that two of its first three native members have since become valuable laborers in the missionary work; one as a minister of the Gospel, and another as a teacher. This must be viewed as a signal proof of God's favor towards this infant church, and as a happy example of the way in which the Gospel is to be more and more extended in heathen countries. The schools at Lodiana, Saharun-

pur, and Sabathu, were vigorously carried forward, and the brethren were engaged in preaching, distributing the sacred Scriptures and religious tracts, making journeys to places where large assemblages of natives were collected on festival occasions; but little more will be attempted here than to present a chronological outline of the arrivals of the missionaries, with some of the leading facts in their work.

The fourth company of missionaries, consisting of Rev. Messrs. H. R. Wilson, Jr., John H. Morrison, and Joseph Caldwell, Mr. James Craig, teacher, and Mr. Reese Morris, printer, and their wives, arrived at Calcutta in April, 1838. There they met Mr. and Mrs. McEwen, on their return homewards, and were greatly aided by them in making arrangements for their journey. One of their number, however, had already reached the last stage of her pilgrimage; Mrs. Morrison was taken to her rest before leaving Calcutta, after a brief illness of cholera. Her afflicted companions proceeded to their several stations: Mr. Morrison to Allahabad, to join the Rev. James Wilson, who had taken charge of the station on Mr. McEwen's removal; Mr. Morris to Lodiana; and Messrs. Caldwell and Craig to Saharunpur. Mr. H. R. Wilson, while proceeding to the station at Lodiana, was led by Providence to stop at Futtehgurh, on the Ganges, two hundred miles above Allahabad, a town which had been pointed out by some of the earlier brethren as eligible for a missionary station. Here, with an interesting family of orphan children, a part of whom were placed under his care by a pious English physician, and assisted by Gopeenath Nundy, the teacher previously employed in their instruction, Mr. Wilson began important labors, which have been steadily prosecuted ever since, with evident tokens of the favor of Heaven.

In February, 1839, the Rev. Messrs. Joseph Warren, John E. Freeman, and James L. Scott, and their wives, arrived at Calcutta, and became connected, the first two with Allahabad, and the last with Futtehgurh. A printing-press was sent out with Mr. Warren, which, under his efficient superintendence, became an invaluable means of promoting the influence of the mission. In November of this year, Mrs. Caldwell, at Saharunpur, was called to her rest.

In December of the next year, the Rev. Messrs. John C. Rankin and William H. McAuley, and their wives; the Rev. Jos. Owen and Miss Jane Vanderveer, teacher, arrived at Calcutta. Mr. Owen joined the Allahabad Mission, and the rest proceeded to Futtehgurh. In this year, 1840, the work of translating the Sacred Scriptures and preparing other religious books and tracts, began to be reported as occupying much of the time of some of the missionaries. One of these works was a translation of the Gospel of John from the original Greek into Punjabi, the language of the Sikhs;

another was the Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church into Hindustani, with the Scripture references at the bottom of the page.

In the year 1841, churches were organized at Saharunpur and Futtehgurh, and twenty-seven native members were reported at all the stations.

The Rev. Messrs. Levi Janvier and John Wray, and their wives, reached India in January, 1842, and were stationed—the former at Lodiana, and the latter at Allahabad. Messrs. Morrison and Caldwell were married. Mrs. Porter was called this year to her rest. Dr. Willis Green reached India in November; spent a few months at Lodiana; and returned home, the climate not suiting his health. Churches were organized at Saharunpur and Futtehgurh, and the year was further signalized by the organization of three Presbyteries under the instructions of the General Assembly, composed of the ministers in each mission, and taking their names, like the missions, from the leading city, or the station first occupied, in the bounds of each: Lodiana, Furrukhabad, and Allahabad. The brethren at Saharunpur being ecclesiastically related to the General Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, were constituted by their Synod into a separate Presbytery. Their relations to the Board as missionaries are the same as those of the other brethren, and the intercourse between them has been mutually pleasant and beneficial. A part of their support has always been furnished by churches of the Reformed Synod.

The year 1843 was marked by the arrival in India of the Rev. John J. Walsh and his wife, who were connected with the Furrukhabad mission; the death of the second Mrs. Morrison; the return to this country of Mr. Rogers and family, on account of Mrs. Rogers's ill-health; and of Mr. Morrison, also for health; the forming of a new station at Mynpurie, 40 miles west of Futtehgurh; the licensure of the native assistants, Golok Nath and Gopeenath Nundy, by the Presbyteries of Lodiana and Furrukhabad; and the steady advance of the missionary work. The church members reported at Allahabad in January were nine Americans, three Europeans, eight East Indians, and eleven natives; in all thirty-one.

In 1844, Mr. Owen was married. Gopeenath Nundy was ordained. Parts of the Bible, in a revised translation, were printed at Lodiana in Hindustani. A translation of the Koran into the same language, by a Maulavi, with an Introduction and Notes, refuting its errors, by the Rev. J. Wilson, was published at Allahabad, marking quite a new era in Mohammedan literature. A larger number of tracts and books were distributed in the Lodiana Mission than during any former year, and all the branches of missionary labor were faithfully carried forward. The number of church members reported at Futtehgurh this year was twenty-seven, of whom sixteen were natives.

The next year witnessed the death of Mr. Craig at Saharunpur, and of Mrs. Jamieson at Sabathu; the return to this country of Mr. Morris on account of health; the destruction by fire of the printing-press, book-repository, &c., at Lodiana, causing the loss of about $10,000 worth of property, including upwards of 90,000 copies of parts of the Holy Scriptures and of tracts. In general, the labors of the missionaries were continued without change. In November of this year, the first meeting of the Synod of North India was held at Futtehgurh. Important questions, concerning the kingdom of Christ in India, received the earnest consideration of its members.

In 1846, Mr. Jamieson visited this country, to provide for the education of his motherless children; Mr. H. R. Wilson and family also returned, on account of Mrs. Wilson's health; and Miss Vanderveer came home also on account of impaired health; Mr. Morrison having regained his health, returned to India with his wife; Mr. Rudolph, a German teacher, and his wife, who had spent some years in India, became connected with the Lodiana Mission, and Mr. Rudolph was licensed to preach the Gospel. A new station was formed at Agra; and a number of the members of the church at Allahabad having removed to that city upon the transfer of the government offices, they were reorganized as a church, with other members, making in all fifteen, under the ministerial charge of the missionaries. At Futtehgurh, the number of church members reported was thirty-four. At Allahabad, a church building, 78 feet by 45, was erected; while, to the communion of the church itself, it was stated that from its commencement seventy-four persons had been admitted, fifty-one of whom were received on the profession of their faith. The Government college at Allahabad was transferred to the mission, and the Christian religion and books became a part of the daily study of the scholars.

Early in 1847, the Rev. Messrs. Augustus H. Seeley and David Irving and their wives, and Mr. Robert M. Munnis, licentiate preacher, arrived at Calcutta, on their way to the Furrukhabad Mission. Mr. Jamieson, on his return to his field of labor, with his wife, reached Calcutta in November. Mr. Campbell with his family arrived in this country on a visit, on account of his wife's health. Mr. Rudolph and Golok Nath were ordained as Evangelists by the Presbytery of Lodiana, and Mr. Munnis by the Presbytery of Furrukhabad. A new station was formed at Jalandar, in the Punjab, about thirty miles west of Lodiana, which was occupied by the Rev. Golok Nath and a native teacher. Churches were organized at Sabathu and Jalandar. Some new members were admitted to most of the churches; and the number reported from all the stations, except Agra and Saharunpur, was 107.

In January, 1848, the Rev. A. Alexander Hodge and his wife, and the Rev. Charles W. Forman, arrived in India. The former joined the Allahabad, and the latter the Lodia Mission. In November, Mr. Campbell and his wife reached Calcutta, on their return to Saharunpur, accompanied by the Rev. John S. Woodside and his wife, of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, destined to the same station. Mr. Julius F. Ullman, a German teacher, who had lived for some years in India, became connected with the Furrukhabad Mission, and was licensed to preach the Gospel by the Presbytery. Mr. Porter returned to this country on a visit with his motherless children, and Mr. Rankin and his family came home on account of his ill-health. Mrs. Scott was called to her rest while on her return to this country for her health. A new station was formed at Ambala, a city almost equally distant from Lodia, Saharunpur, and Sabathu, which was occupied by Mr. Jamieson and a native catechist. Some new members were admitted to the churches, and a few were suspended from church privileges. The second meeting of the Synod of North India was held at Agra, in December of this year. The minutes of this meeting, and also of the first meeting, are published in the Foreign Missionary Chronicle of November, 1849. They will be read in future ages, as well as at the present time, with deep interest.

In the next year, Mr. Porter returned, with his wife, to his field of labor; Mrs. Rudolph and Mrs. Freeman were taken to their rest; and Messrs. Irving and Wray and their families returned to this country on account of health. Mr. Ullman received ordination from the Presbytery of Furrukhabad, and John Hari, a native catechist, was licensed to preach the Gospel by the Presbytery of Allahabad. A new station was formed at Lahor, the chief city of the Punjab, which was occupied by Messrs. Newton and Forman. A church was organized at Ambala, and a special work of grace was manifested at Futtchgurh, as the result of which thirty-three members were admitted to the communion of the church. The whole number of church members reported this year was 16.

The year 1850 was marked by the arrival in India of the Rev. James H. Orbison, to join the Lodia Mission; the Rev. Messrs. David E. Campbell and Robert S. Fullerton and their wives, to join the Furrukhabad Mission; and the Rev. Messrs. Lawrence G. Hay and Horatio W. Shaw and their wives, to be connected with the Allahabad Mission; and by the return to this country of Mr. Hodge and his wife, on account of her health, and of Mr. Freeman, whose health had also become impaired. The number of church members reported this year was 209.

Messrs. J. Wilson and W. H. McAuley and their families came home in 1851, on account of health. Mr. Freeman, with his wife, returned to his field of labor, and Messrs. Rudolph and Ullman were married. The number of church members reported this year was 231.

In 1852, Mr. Scott made a visit to this country on account of his children, and Mr. Newton and his family came home on account of his health. The Rev. Robert E. Williams embarked for India, and arrived at Agra early in the following year. Schools were now established at this city for the education of the children of persons of mixed parentage, European and native, who are commonly called East Indians, a class of growing numbers, intelligence, and influence. The members of the church, according to the report of this year, were 255.

The buildings required for their use were purchased, with the aid of very handsome donations from the late lamented Governor of the North-western Provinces, the Hon. J. Thomason, and other English friends. One feature of the missionary cause in India should be mentioned in this connection, as truly gratifying. From the beginning the missionaries have enjoyed the confidence of many of the English residents in that country—civilians, officers in the army, and others. With the best knowledge of the work in progress, they have considered it their privilege to promote it by their sympathy, influence, and very liberal gifts; and thus have they greatly encouraged the missionary brethren, gratified the friends of missions in this country, and promoted the cause of the Redeemer.

In 1853, Mr. Scott, with his wife, returned to India; Mr. Orbison was married; and Mrs. Seeley and Mr. Porter were called to their rest. The work of the missions continued to be carried forward with fidelity and zeal.

The preceding sketch conveys a very inadequate view of the work of evangelization which our brethren in India have been permitted already to accomplish. Besides preaching statedly at their various stations, they are accustomed during the cold months of each year to make journeys into parts of the country not yet occupied, in order to make known the way of life by public discourses, conversation, and the distribution of the Scriptures and other Christian books. To thousands of towns and villages has the Gospel been published on these tours. They are accustomed also to attend the Melas held at particular times and places. These are assemblages of the natives for religious ceremonies, but are attended by many for purposes of trade or amusement—so that they may be regarded as a kind of fair. They are held at places accounted holy, such as Hardwar, where the Ganges enters the plains, and Allahabad, where the Ganges, the Jumna, and according to the native tradition a third river, invisible, unite their streams. Immense crowds, amounting to hundreds of thousands, including many pilgrims and visitors from the most distant parts of the land, attend the more celebrated of these Melas; and there are numerous others of less note, attended by people from the neighboring towns and villages. They afford opportunities for widely disseminating the knowledge of the Gospel. The good influence exerted in this way will not be known until the great day reveals it, but sometimes it is signally displayed. An aged Brahmin had made a pilgrimage from Jubbelpore to attend the Mela at Allahabad, a journey of several hundred miles, to wash away his sins in the Ganges. There he heard a discourse by one of the missionaries, which shook his faith in Hindooism. He returned home without having had an interview with the missionary, and was led by the persuasion of a Qazi to study the Koran; but he found in Mohammedanism no rest for his troubled mind. Having by some means obtained a portion of the Scriptures, he carefully studied its lessons, and taught them to his only daughter. At this point, an English officer became acquainted with him, and found that he had renounced his own religion, and was sincerely seeking a knowledge of the Christian faith in the face of many difficulties. A Hindi Bible for him was requested from one of the missionaries at Agra, and thus his history became known to the missionary brethren.

Another means of promoting a knowledge of the Christian religion has been afforded by the press. Numerous tracts and catechisms, in various Hindoo dialects, and some larger works, have been published. The Way of Life, by Dr. Hodge, translated into Hindustani; another work, with a similar title, by a German missionary; a translation of the Koran into Hindustani, with notes in refutation of its errors; the Westminster Confession of Faith; a volume of hymns; revised editions of the Scriptures, in whole or in part; a translation of the books of Genesis, Exodus, chapters 1-20, and Psalms, and most of the New Testament, into Punjabi, by Messrs. Newton and Janvier, are among the larger works issued by the press. The whole amount of printing at Lodiāna and Allahabad from the beginning is over one hundred millions of pages, of which the sacred writings form a large portion. By means of these Christian books a large amount of truth, subversive of idolatry and Mohammedanism, and setting forth the true religion, has been widely diffused. Some striking examples of good which has been done in this way, sometimes in places far remote from the stations of our brethren, have been reported in their letters.

Still another important agency has been the schools of the missions. These have been supported from the beginning, it having been considered from the commencement of the work an object of the greatest importance to train up a native ministry; and the number of scholars has gradually increased until, as stated in the report of 1854, about two thousand nine hundred of the native youth are now under instruction. A few of the scholars are in elementary schools, but most of them are in schools of a higher grade; and all of them have been brought in greater or less degree under the influence of Christian instruction and example. A large proportion of them have become convinced of the folly, and in some measure of the sin, of idolatry. Many of them are prepared to acknowledge that Christianity is the true religion; some of them have become the professed followers of our Lord, and a few are laboring in various ways—one as an ordained minister, others as teachers, catechists, and Scripture-readers—to bring their countrymen to the knowledge of Jesus Christ as the Saviour of sinners.

The preaching of the Gospel in these missions has not been in vain, as the preceding statements have shown. It is with sincere thanksgiving that we can refer to still another and more impressive proof of the blessing of God on the labors of his servants,—the Christian life and the dying testimony of some of the converts, to the power of divine grace. An affecting and beautiful little memoir was published by Mr. Warren, a few years ago, of Jatni, a member of the church at Allahabad. She was the daughter of a Brahmin, but she became a child of God. In all the relations and events of life, her deportment was exemplary. And when called at length to pass over Jordan, she was supported by a good hope through grace. Mr. Warren, with tender caution, had apprised her of the probable termination of her disease; and he adds, "I was delighted to find that she had thought of it, and had come to feel willing that God should do with her, as to life just as he pleased. I questioned her closely, and set death and the judgment before her plainly; but her nerves were firm, her eye clear, and her voice calm and steady: 'I know Christ, and can fully and completely trust him in all things. He keeps my mind in perfect peace.' I saw her often, and always found her the same." She was enabled to resign her soul, her husband and her child to the care of her Father in heaven, and at the early age of twenty-two she departed joyfully to be with Christ. Another example hardly less striking was presented in the Christian death of a native catechist at Saharunpur. His missionary friend, Mr. Campbell, who had frequent and most pleasing interviews with him on his death-bed, gives a very interesting account of his religious views and hopes: "I asked him if he was afraid to die? 'No, sir,' he said, 'I am not now afraid. . . . I am now fully reconciled to the will of God. I do not wish to live longer in this sinful world.' On being asked where his hopes for salvation were placed, he replied emphatically, 'On Christ alone: he is the only Saviour, and I know he will not disappoint my hopes;' and then, bursting into tears, he said, 'O sir, how much I owe to you! You are the means of leading me to Christ, and of instructing me and saving my soul.' This was so much more than I had expected, it was too much for me, and we both wept together. At that moment I thought that this was more than enough to compensate me for all the little trials I have ever been called to endure as a missionary. I could have changed places with dear Samuel, to enjoy his happiness and assurance of hope." Examples like these are precious seals of the favor of Heaven towards the missionary work.—Louvie's Manual of Missions.

WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—For many years Dr. Coke had desired to enter India as a missionary field, but the keys of India were in the hands of the East India Company, and they kept them with the same jealous care as they did the keys of their counting-houses. The Doctor had often sounded individuals of the Company, but without effect. The island of Ceylon, not being in the Company's charter, became the object of Dr. Coke's attention with the hope that it might prepare the way for entrance into India. Finding certain gentlemen, high in office, willing to encourage the Gospel in the East, Dr. Coke became satisfied of his call to go, provided he could find six young men of hopeful talents willing to devote their lives to the work. He waited on the late Dr. Buchanan, and consulted him on the subject. And when his intentions became known, five preachers already in the work, expressed their readiness to go. To these were added Benjamin Clough, a local preacher. The conference could not but approve of the plan, as Providence obviously opened the way; the Doctor being willing if necessary to bear the expense of the outfit, which amounted to above £6000. After the conference of 1813, he assembled the six brethren in London, and procured them a Portuguese tutor, together with a printing-press and types, as one or two of the missionaries understood the art of printing.

Their books, clothes and other necessities, were furnished suitable for a permanent residence in India. Having established themselves in Ceylon they soon turned their thoughts to the continent of India, where God seemed to be opening their way; and it was decided that Mr. Lynch, the senior missionary, should proceed to Madras, which he did, Jan. 25, 1817, taking with him letters of introduction from persons of the highest consideration at Columbo, to their friends at the presidency, which insured for him a kind reception. His piety and zeal soon endeared him to all who were interested in the progress of Christianity, and Madras became to him, in a short time, a scene of considerable usefulness.

Mr. & Mrs. Horner arrived in Bombay, in September, 1817, and the day following were kindly received by Sir Evan Nepean, the governor. On the same day he waited upon the Bishop of Calcutta who expressed his good opinion of the zeal and conduct of the Wesleyan missionaries in Ceylon, and wished Mr. Horner equal success at Bombay. Mr. Horner immediately applied himself to the study of the Mahratta language under the tuition of a Brahmin. He soon acquired the language, and began to preach to the people: he also gathered a school of fifty boys, to whose instruction he devoted himself. In 1819 the English and Malabar school of Mr. Lynch was attended by

150 children, and the Mahratta school of Mr. Horner had 180. In consequence of application from European residents at Bangalore and Seringapatam, in the presidency of Madras, Mr. Hoole and Mr. & Mrs. Mowatt were appointed by the missionary committee to proceed to those stations, Mr. Close having been previously directed to assist Mr. Lynch at Madras. On the 19th May, 1820, Mr. and Mrs. Mowatt, and Mr. Hoole embarked at Gravesend, in the Tanjore, a private trader, in company with Sir Richard Ottely, Chief-justice of Ceylon, Mr. and Mrs. Browning, of the Church of England Missionary Society, and Adam Munhi Rathana and Alexander Derma Rama, two Buddhist priests, who had been educated and baptized in England by Dr. Adam Clarke, under the sanction of the Methodist Missionary Committee. On the 5th of September, the vessel anchored off the river, near Batticaloa. The day following having landed some baggage, they weighed anchor, but had not sailed far before they were overtaken by a tremendous storm, in which the vessel was set on fire by lightning, and they escaped with the loss of everything on board. In 1821 both the missionaries were obliged to leave Bombay on account of affliction. But at Madras the brethren were enabled to labor with considerable encouragement, where they had then 147 persons united with them in church fellowship, and 4 schools which were well attended, instructions being communicated in Tamil and English. In 1823 Seringapatam was added to the list of stations, Mr. Hoole being placed there. So that this year they were regularly established at Madras, where they had four missionaries, at Bangalore, where they had one, at Negapatam, where they had two, and one at Seringapatam; the number of members being 191, composed of English, Portuguese, Dutch, and Hindoos. They had erected nine or ten chapels, with as many schools; one of the chapels and two of the schools being at St. Thomas's Mount. In 1827 the schools had increased to 16, with 542 children, and the church members to 251, but part of this increase of the members had arisen from the number of pious soldiers in regiments which had been just landed in India, on account of the war then raging between the British and the Burmese, during which Dr. Judson and his devoted wife were suffering such "fiery trials," at the hands of the latter power. In proportion as the natives began, on conviction, to attach themselves to their societies, the usual trials are narrated by the missionaries. Many of the converts had to endure the keenest persecution, and all the injuries connected with loss of caste, and expulsion from their families; but by their faith and patience they showed, that they willingly "counted all things loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus their Lord."

In 1830 the number of missionaries was nine; of schools 25; and of scholars 1,000, of whom many were females; with 314 members in Society. This year Calcutta was added to the list of stations, with Messrs. Percival and Hodson as the laborers there. They operated chiefly among the Portuguese and Bengalee inhabitants of that city, and soon found a wide and promising field of labor, both among the young and the adult population. Two years afterwards, however, the committee in London considered that this mission had not presented those results which would warrant its continuance. The station was given up, Mr. Percival being sent to Ceylon, and Mr. Hodson to Bangalore.

A native ministry was raised up from the ranks of the local preachers, who coöperated with their European brethren in preaching Christ to their countrymen. The printing-press was, meanwhile, at work, diffusing a Christian literature among the people, and quietly undermining their systems of falsehood and pollution, which had stood for ages, only to deprave and oppress their wretched adherents.

In the year 1837, the Rev. Jonathan Crowther was appointed General Superintendent of the India Missions. He was accompanied by the Rev. Messrs. Best, Jenkins, Male, Griffith, and Fox, and their families. After shipwreck and much suffering, they at length arrived in safety. It is worthy of remark, as an exemplification of the advantages derived to the missionary cause from the Theological Institution, founded by the Wesleyans only three years before, that these five missionaries having been students in the Theological Institution, had gained such a knowledge of the Tamil and Canarese languages before their embarkation, that on their arrival in India, four of them immediately commenced preaching to the people in Tamil. This year several conversions took place among the natives, and they were received into the Church of Christ by public baptism at Madras. One of these cases justifies a more extended notice. Arumaga Tambaran was a native of the province of Tanjore, in Southern India, so much celebrated for numerous and splendid temples, and for a population inveterately attached to caste and heathen superstitions. He was born of highly respectable parents, and had the advantages of what is esteemed among his countrymen, as a good education. He was zealous above many his equals, in seeking knowledge, but appears never to have been satisfied in the degradation of heathen worship. At a very early age he lost his parents, and became united to the sect of Siva, under a celebrated gooroo, one of his relatives. After making pilgrimages of many thousand miles, he came back to the land of his birth. There he had time for reflection. In those moments when he brought to mind what he had passed through, and how all his companions that had set out with him on those weary pilgrimages had perished, some by fevers, some by wild beasts, and he only left alive, his spirit was agitated, and he groaned within himself with disquietude of conscience. He conversed with several native Christians, and heard the Gospel from the lips of its ministers. He felt the appeals of Christians against the besotted maxims and usages of a defiling system of heathenism, whose vain sacrifices and bloody orgies proclaim in every high place that its worship is that of devils, and not of the true God. The conversion of one of his pupils was the means of leading to the first interview between Sambrian and Mr. Carver. His intelligent mind soon opened to conviction, and he at once entered upon an investigation of the claims of Christianity, and the result was his conversion. He soon evidenced his sincerity by sacrificing all for Christ. This aroused the bitterest opposition. Several of his former disciples, assisted by other heathen, attempted to carry him off by force; and an appeal had to be made to the protection of the law. In the court-house, before the magistrate, and a multitude of his fellow-countrymen, he "witnessed a good confession." He appeared in the court in his heathen robes for the last time, only that he might be identified there as the head of his order. On that occasion he rose and addressed the magistrate as follows:

"Sir, I am a man well known in Madras, having resided in this city since 1824. I was born in the province of Tanjore. I was united when very young to the sect of Siva, in whose robes I appear before you this day. For many years I was engaged in traveling by way of Delhi, and other great cities, to the holy places of the Hindoos. I dwelt three years at Casi in Bengal, thence I traveled along the coast to Madras, by way of Juggernaut. I visited all the holy places in the south of India, and went by Ramiscram to Ceylon, visited Mannar, Colombo, Candy, the holy places called Katteragan, on the east side of Ceylon, and returned by Batticaloa, Trincomallee, and Jaffna, to the continent. Fifty years of my life have been thus spent. I sought all heathen books, but found nothing for the soul. I have taught many hundred disciples, as you know," (for the magistrate knew him well, and congratulated the missionary on having such a convert.) He continued: "I found nothing in heathen books, in heathen temples, in heathen ceremonies to satisfy the soul. I met with this minister, (pointing to Mr. Carver,) and he opened to my understanding the way of salvation, the treasures of the Scriptures: they suited my dissatisfied heart; I went again and again to the missionary; I determined to abandon heathenism. By heathenism I got money in abundance, and honors. I was worshiped by my disciples; but my soul sunk back at the blasphemy against the God of whom I had heard. I knew not how to escape from my heathen friends and disciples, who were about me on every side, when this minister, sir, (looking at the magistrate with great respect and firmness,) offered me an asylum, a place in the Mission premises. There, sir, I went of my own free choice, there I was when the heathen made the violent attempt to carry me away by force, there I wish to remain and be baptized in the name of Jesus; to teach others also of this Saviour, as some little attempt to remedy the evils of having taught so many heathen disciples a false way in time past."

The circumstance of one who had occupied so high a station renouncing his honors and emoluments, and subjecting himself to reproach and persecution, for the sake of Christianity, awoke the spirit of inquiry; and his Poem, in which he contrasted Christianity and heathenism, was eagerly inquired after, and extensively read. Three editions in a few weeks could not satisfy the demand. Every one wanted a copy; they were carried far and wide by the natives, sung in the streets, and even read by the children; until the spirit of the heathen was excited to opposition. The American missionaries at Madras printed an edition of 10,000 copies, besides an edition published by the Madras Religious Tract Society. From 80,000 to 100,000 copies were distributed in a few months. The effect produced by the conversion of this distinguished individual was so great, that a European missionary, who had spent forty years in India, and who was present at his baptism, declared "he had not seen any thing like it before." The missionaries diligently improved the increasing opportunities, which this event had afforded, for prosecuting the work among the natives.

In 1838, Goobee, in the Mysore country, was occupied by the Wesleyan missionaries, and Mr. Hodson appointed to that station. In a few months after he was enabled to open a mission in the city of Mysore. In the older stations in India there had been an increase in the number of professing Christians, several of the heathens were baptized, the public services were well attended, and the schools were in a prosperous condition.

About this time the various societies in South India were greatly agitated by the subject of caste; but the universal decision of the missionaries of all denominations was, that this odious distinction should be abolished, so far as the church of Christ was concerned. In this year arrangements were made to establish on the Coromandel coast an institution for training a native ministry, from the operation of which much assistance was expected in advancing the work of God.

In 1839, the Rev. Messrs. Arthur, (now one of the General Secretaries of the Wesleyan Missionary Society,) Squarebridge, Garret, and Pope, were sent out to reinforce the Indian Mission, and extend its operations by planting new stations. Mr. Arthur was sent to Goobee and Mr. Squarebridge to assist Mr. Hodson at Mysore. A printing-press was also forwarded to Bangalore, to assist the missionaries to meet the increased demand for Christian books and tracts in the Canarese languages. In 1841, this mission experienced a painful reduction in its strength and efficiency. Mr. Squarebridge died of cholera at Coonghull, Mr. Fox was also called to his reward; while Mr. Cryer and Mr. Arthur were both obliged to return home on account of the failure of their health; the committee, however, were enabled during the next year partially to supply the vacancies thus created, by the appointment of Messrs. Hardy and Sanderson. This year a perfect font of Canarese type was prepared in London for the use of the mission. The head-school in Mysore (the capital, with a population of 70,000,) is patronized and supported by the Rajah, much to the displeasure of many of the Brahmins of his court. He has shown much interest in some of the operations of the Mission; and it may be hoped that this example of the relaxation of Hindoo bigotry will be followed by many of his subjects. In this year, also, the officers of the Second Regiment of Native Infantry erected a chapel at the French Rocks Cantonment, about five miles N. E. of Srirangapatam, and presented it, through Mr. Hodson, to the Society.

Mr. Crowther having to return home in 1843, the Rev. Joseph Roberts succeeded him. The next year three more missionaries were sent out.

The opposition awakened about this time among the Brahmins and others, showed that the missionaries were making a decided impression upon the minds of the population, and this was further evident by the progressive increase in the number of professing Christians, and in the eagerness with which the people at large availed themselves of the instruction afforded in the Mission schools. The press at Bangalore was meanwhile diligently employed; the amount of its issues this year in the Canarese, Sanscrit, and English languages was over 843,000 pages; in the next year it was 922,000 pages; and in 1851 and 1852 it was nearly two millions of pages in each year; and over 100,000 of the Canarese people, with more or less regularity, had the Gospel preached to them by the missionaries. In 1849 a Canarese Brahmin of high caste, with several other converts, were baptized in Mysore.

After thirty years of devoted labor among the Hindoos, in Ceylon and Continental India, the Rev. Joseph Roberts was called from his work to his eternal rest. Mr. Roberts received his first appointment to the East in the year 1818. His vigor of mind made the acquisition of the languages in which he had to labor a work of comparative ease; and his frank and generous nature endeared him to his colleagues, and to all classes of the inhabitants of Ceylon, for whose spiritual benefit and salvation he labored for many years with faithfulness and zeal. In 1833 he published a most interesting volume, entitled, "Oriental Illustrations of the Sacred Scriptures," which reached a second edition, and has been very much read and admired, as a remarkable chapter in the history of the human mind, and as throwing light on numerous passages of holy Scripture, which has brought out their meaning with peculiar beauty and force. He also executed some translations from the Tamil language, which were published by the Oriental Translation Society in London, connected with the Royal Asiatic Society for Great Britain and Ireland, of which society he was a corresponding member from an early period of his residence in the East. In the year 1843 he succeeded the Rev. Jonathan Crowther as General Superintendent of the Society's Mission in the Presidency of Madras. In this vast field he found ample employment for his sanctified energies, and addressed himself to his work with the utmost zeal and devotion. In preaching the word of God both to Europeans and natives, and in the performance of pastoral duties, he was indefatigable, as well as in the superintendence of schools for children, and catechumen classes for young people. Though necessarily engaged in the management of the temporal affairs of the mission under his direction, he was an active member of the Committee of the Madras Auxiliary Bible Society, and of its Translation Committee, and of several other religious and charitable associations. In addition to his other engagements, he prepared a lucid and comprehensive "Treatise on Caste, and its bearing on Christianity and Missions," which was published in England a few years ago; he also contributed to the "Wesleyan Methodist Magazine," and other periodicals, several valuable essays on Paganism and Popery, and on other subjects connected with the work of missions. The labors and anxieties connected with the important position he held, are supposed to have weighed down his frame and shortened his earthly career. He sunk into the grave, exhausted mainly by the toils and conflicts of the missionary life. His excellent widow, Mrs. Roberts, continued in India to render the aid of her valuable experience and services in the superintendence of the native female schools.

As an evidence of the impression produced in favor of education upon the minds of the population of Mysore, it may be stated that an urgent petition from that city was presented to the Wesleyan Conference, held in Bradford in 1853, requesting the establishment of a first-class English school among them. This remarkable and interesting document occupied many folios of India paper of a large size, neatly backed with blue ribbon. It was a petition from the Hindoo and Mohammedan inhabitants of the city of Mysore, written in the Canarese language, with an English translation, and signed by 3,340 persons, in name different languages. It represented their great desire to have an English school for their children, and requested that one might be established; stating that, by so doing, "great fame and merit would accrue to their benefactors." If a qualified teacher and half the expenses could be provided by the Conference, the bearer of the document engaged on behalf of the natives of Mysore, that they would raise the remainder. This accomplished, a monthly grant of thirty pounds would be given by the liberality of the Mysore Commissioner. It was listened to with deep interest and attention by the Conference, and the request granted. Perhaps this is the first instance in which an assembly of Christian ministers has received a similar petition from such a number of heathens and Mussulmans, requesting the benefits of education at their hands, and it reminds us of the prayer of the Man of Macedonia, "Come over and help us." The money for this interesting object was subscribed, and a valuable school apparatus provided and taken to India at the commencement of this year, by Rev. E. J. Hardey. At present, Rev. D. Sanderson is busily employed in London, with Mr. Watts, the type-founder, in preparing new fonts of Canarese type, for the use of the printing establishment in Bangalore, which will further increase its efficiency,—already so great, that few provincial offices in England send out more beautiful work, either as to typography or binding. The labors of Mr. Garrett in that department have been of distinguished value; and Mr. Sanderson, by able translations of very recondite native works, has done much to secure to the Christian press a command of the literature of the country.

The printing establishment in Bangalore was never so efficient, and never promised such extensive usefulness as at the present. During the year it has issued 59,448 publications. It is impossible by human arithmetic to calculate the real benefit which is conferred upon India by this one establishment.—Crowther's History of Methodism; Hoole's Mission to Madras; W. Arthur's Reminiscences of a Mission to the Mysore; The Wesleyan Missionary Notices, and the Annual Reports.—REV. W. BUTLER.

WELSH CALVINISTIC METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—This society sent out Rev. Thomas Jones, in November, 1840, who commenced a station at Cherrapunji, in the north-east of Bengal, near Sylhet, among the Kassias, one of the hill tribes. Other missionaries followed, and in 1850 another station was commenced at Sylhet. In 1852, the number of communicants at the two stations was twenty-eight. Rev. W. Lewis has translated the four Gospels and the Acts into Kassias; a translation of Matthew, by Mr. Jones, having been previously printed in the Roman character.—W. B.

AMERICAN BAPTIST MISSION AMONG THE TELOOGOS.—The country of the Teloogos lies on the western coast of the Bay of Bengal, and stretches nearly 800 miles from the northern part of the Carnatic to the borders of Orissa. The Teloogos or Telingas are believed to be descendants of an ancient and once powerful race of India, and though now subject to different jurisdictions, they are united by a common language and common traditions as one people. They are generally estimated at upwards of ten millions in number, of whom three millions dwell within the Northern Circars, or collectorates of the presidency of Madras, while the remaining part are under the rule of the Nizam of Hyderabad, or Golcondah. Beyond this region also they are widely scattered over the territory of Southern India, especially in the districts of Tanjore, Mysore, and the city of Madras. The religion of the Teloogos is Brahminism, and the system of caste is established among them, separating them into classes and ranks, between which intercourse is impossible. Each trade or occupation is a caste by itself, and its members, with their families and kindred, cannot become connected, nor can they even associate with those belonging to any other.

The mission of the American Baptist Missionary Union among this people owes its origin to the representations of Rev. Amos Sutton, of the English General Baptist Mission in Orissa, during his visit to the United States in 1835. The London Missionary Society had stationed its earliest missionaries in India among the Teloogos, but in consequence of their death and other causes, the whole region had been abandoned. Their missionaries and others dwelling in the neighboring countries, had prepared a grammar and dictionary of the language, and had translated the entire Bible, of which the New Testament, and some books of the Old, had been printed in two editions, one at Serampore and one at Madras. The language was said to possess unusual copiousness and variety, and the people to be among the most interesting and intelligent to be found in India.

On the 22d of September, 1835, Rev. Samuel S. Day and his wife, and Rev. E. L. Abbott having been appointed missionaries among these people, sailed for Calcutta in the same ship which bore Rev. Mr. Malcolm, the agent of the Board appointed to visit the missions of the East, and Rev. Mr. Sutton, who was returning to Orissa. Mr. Abbott was, on his arrival at Calcutta, transferred to the Karen mission in Burmah, while Mr. and Mrs. Day immediately proceeded to Vizagapatam, where they entered upon the study of the language, with the aid of the books prepared by the missionaries of former years. After passing several months in acquiring the language and observing the condition of the country and its population, Mr. Day, with the advice of Rev. Mr. Malcom, at length, in March, 1837, fixed his residence at Madras, which, though it was already the seat of more than one missionary, yet had none for the large Teloogoo population of the city and its suburbs. With the aid of a native convert whom he employed, he established three schools, containing about seventy scholars, and assisted as far as he was able, in maintaining public worship in the native language, and also preached in English and distributed tracts and portions of the Scriptures to those of the population who could read. In 1838, a church of sixteen members, English, Eurasian, Hindoo, and Burman, was organized at Madras, and a branch of it, comprising soldiers of an English regiment, was also organized at Bellary. The preaching in English was understood by multitudes of the native population, and the members of the schools soon evinced their desire to acquire the language in preference to any other branch of knowledge—a fact which plainly indicates that the people not unfrequently attend the missionary schools, merely for the purpose of gaining some worldly advantage. The experience of missionaries in India on this subject is rapidly convincing them that teaching English is not a part of their appropriate duty.

Mr. Day was obliged to prosecute his mission alone, and was constantly embarrassed for the want of the sympathy and coöperation of an associate; but the Board now found themselves exceedingly restricted in funds, and unable to send another missionary to his aid. During the first four years of his residence in the country he had baptized many soldiers of the English regiments and other English residents of the country. He had also baptized several Eurasians and Tamils, but none of the Teloogos had thus far embraced Christianity. In these circumstances he decided, in the summer of 1839, to seek another station for the mission. He at length fixed upon Nellore, and removed thither, with his family, in February, 1840. Having rented of the government a lot, and erected a suitable building to serve as a mission-house and a zayat, he immediately commenced the daily reading of the Scriptures, and preaching on the Sabbath. A few weeks after his settlement at Nellore, he was joined by Rev. Stephen Van Husen and his wife, who had been appointed to the mission, and in September of the same year he baptized the first Christian convert from the Telooogoos. In a visit which Mr. Day subsequently made to Madras he found the church which he had left there scattered, and to a great extent, fallen from the faith which its members professed. It was without a pastor, and its members had ceased to meet together, and though others were waiting for baptism, Mr. Day recommended the dissolution of the church and the organization of another at Arcott, which should embrace all its living members and receive the converts who were about to be baptized.

The great external hindrances which the missionaries from the beginning encountered among the Telooogoos, arose from the system of caste, which holds in its iron bondage all classes of the people in Hindostan. They could not receive the missionary into their dwellings lest they should lose caste. They would allow their children to attend schools for religious instruction, if given by the missionary, or by unconverted native teachers, but not by Christian natives. Children may be sent to the missionary to be taught, but he may not visit them in the families to which they belong.

It has been the general practice of missionaries of the various Christian denominations to translate the Scriptures according to the authorized English version, a practice which requires the transfer of certain words from the original Greek without translating them. The Baptist missionaries, however, both of England and America, have generally felt obliged to translate these words, especially the word baptize, according to their own convictions of its meaning. The adoption of this view by the Board of Managers as a rule for the guidance of its missionaries, gave rise to the action on the part of the American Bible Society, which resulted in the formation of the American and Foreign Bible Society, an institution which was founded and has been supported by a portion of the Baptists of the United States. The copies of the Scriptures which Messrs. Day and Van Husen distributed in Madras and Nellore had been furnished by the Madras Bible Society, and printed at that city. But this society could not print a translation of the Scriptures made by the Baptist missionaries without abandoning their principles, and the missionaries, on the other hand, could not adopt any other without disregarding the instructions of the managers. This embarrassment was experienced in all the Baptist missions, and however much a circulation of the Bible in different translations is to be regretted, it yet seems to be an inevitable result of the existing diversity of views in the Christian world.

In 1841 Messrs. Day and Van Husen, seeing the necessity of an additional missionary and a printing-press, urged the matter in a special communication upon the attention of the Board, but in the condition of the treasury at that time, it was impossible to comply with their request. In 1843 three additional converts were baptized, and the number of schools both in the city and the adjoining districts was considerably enlarged. But the health of the missionaries now began to decline, and the mission was soon afterwards crippled, and subsequently doomed to an interruption of several years in consequence of the disability and absence of the missionaries. Mrs. Day, whose health first failed, was recruited after a brief absence. Mr. Van Husen was obliged to return to the United States in 1845, and has never recovered his health. Mr. Day was suddenly stricken down in October of the same year, and was obliged to hasten away when too ill to make any adequate arrangements either for his personal comfort or the continuance of the mission. The charge of the property and the care of the church at Nellore and the schools were all committed to an Eurasian assistant, while Mr. Day returned to the United States.

In 1848 the Missionary Union, after having long considered the question, finding that Mr. Day had now recovered his health, instructed the Board to reestablish the mission. In October of that year Mr. Day, in company with Rev. Lyman Jewett and Mrs. Jewett, sailed for Calcutta as missionaries at Nellore, where they arrived in the following April. The missions had been for more than three years wholly dependent on the care of a native assistant, a care which at best could not but be very inadequate to its maintenance and progress. The church was scattered but not destroyed, and though some had forsaken their faith, a salutary discipline was productive of the restoration of others. The schools were soon reassembled, public worship resumed, books and tracts distributed, and the whole agency of the mission again put in operation. The missionaries also took an early opportunity to attend several heathen festivals of this country, at which they met thousands of people from various parts of India and preached to them the doctrines of the Gospel. These labors were productive of much inquiry among the people, and of confessions which are constantly made to the missionaries, that Brahminism is an imposture and is destined soon to pass away. There have also been several apparent conversions, and two have been baptized; but the field occupied by the mission, it must be admitted, still continues to be one of great promise rather than of fruit. The missionaries have worked on assiduously beneath the protection of the English government, among a people of unusual intelligence, among whom great preparations would appear to have been made for the spread of the Gospel. The enervating heat of the climate has repeatedly prostrated their energies and obliged them to withdraw for a season to recruit, and at length in June, 1852, Mr. Day was compelled by ill-health to return to the United States. Mr. and Mrs. Jewett have since been in sole charge of the mission. The latest reports represent them as still prosecuting their accustomed work, experiencing the greatest kindness and receiving a hearty coöperation from the English residents at Nellore, and still more encouraged by tokens of divine approbation in the conversion of several of their pupils and visitors, of whom one has lately been baptized.

Statistics of Teloofoo Mission for 1854.—1 station, 2 missionaries, 2 female assistants, 1 native assistant, 1 church, 9 members, 1 boarding-school, 13 pupils, 1 day-school, 50 pupils, total, 2 schools, 63 pupils.—PROF. W. GAMMELL.

BASLE MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—Of the German missionary societies, that of Basle was the first which established a mission in the East Indies. In 1846 it had, in the province of Canara, on the west coast of Hindostan, and in Bodschagner, north of this, eight stations, of which Mangalore is the oldest. This was founded in 1834. It has, in the city and vicinity, several common schools, a high school, and a lithographic establishment. In 1837 and 1839, followed the stations at Dharwar and Hoobly, in the South-Mahratta country; in 1841, the neighboring village of Bettigherry. There was a prophecy traditional in this place, that, after the fall of the Indian kingdom, a king in the West should send messengers to teach Christianity and do away with caste; and as such the German missionaries were received. Malsamoodra was also added in the same year. In 1839, the mission work was carried on with great success, by Gundert, of Wurtemberg. In 1840 and 1842, stations were established at Cannanore and Calicut. The entire number of European laborers employed by the Basle Society at these stations, including eleven women, was thirty-three; with thirteen native helpers. 2,000 natives, partly adults, partly school-children, were connected with the mission. A Basle missionary in Mangalore had translated several books of the New Testament into the Tooloo language, which were lithographed at Mangalore.—Translated from the German of Wiggers.

The following notices of the several stations of this mission will show its present condition.

Mangalore.—In 1846 the lithographic press at this station issued 12,775 copies of 16 different works in Canarese, Teloofoo, and Malayalam. In the year 1847, 39 persons were received into the church by baptism, 29 of whom were adults and 10 children. In the year following, 24 adults and 10 children were baptized, and several were excommunicated. During the years 1849 and 1850, about fifty—adults and children—were baptized; and a boarding-school for Indo-British boys, and an industrial department, were formed. The printing in 1850 amounted to 966,230 pages.

Moolky.—At the latest dates, the station at Fort Moolky, which was commenced in 1845, had about 50 persons under the immediate instruction of the mission, a small church, and a school into which none but Christian children were admitted. The missionary, Mr. Amman, preached the Gospel in most of the neighboring villages, and was also engaged in translating the Scriptures, and revising the Tooloo translation of the Testament.

Hondre.—In 1847 there was at this station one missionary, a small congregation, and a school of 45 scholars, but at a later period the missionary had been removed, and no one had taken his place.

Dharwar.—In 1849 ten adults and two little girls were admitted into the church. Six of these were Tamulians, a people who up to this time had rarely afforded any encouragement to the missionaries. A later report says, "Several Lingaites seem to be inwardly attached to the Gospel, but the fear of man and the charms of the world keep them back from Christ. The thralldom in which the poor Lingaites live, under their avaricious and insolent high priests, four in number, is very galling. They farm their disciples out to certain priests, called priests of thousands, who squeeze from the poor deluded laity all they can get."

Hoobly.—The success at this station has not been of the most encouraging nature for the last few years. Heathen hearers have been few on the Sabbath; and, at times, they have seemed "to shun the word of God in the same measure as they became more acquainted with it," whether from indifference or fear, the missionaries could not tell. Still, the schools have been well attended, and through these the seed has been sown among young and old. Tracts and portions of Scripture were learnt by heart, and the scholars catechized concerning them.

Bettigherry.—The adult portion of the population at this station and in the villages around have for several years shown much good will to the missionaries. In most houses they have been welcome; and Hindoo men, when spoken to of their hardness which prevented their receiving the Gospel, have entreated the missionaries to have patience till a better day should come. In 1848 a Linga priest came to the station, from some distance, and after making careful inquiry into the doctrine preached, he stayed to learn, and subsequently embraced Christianity and was baptized. The event created great sensation at Bettigherry and elsewhere. He became a zealous laborer, and has traveled much with the missionaries in their tours through the neighboring country. Another priest joined them in 1849, and traveled with them several months. A respectable widow also joined them, was baptized, and subsequently married to the priest first named.

The people seem persuaded that the new teachers are their best friends, and they come in considerable numbers to hear the Gospel. The schools are in good condition.

Malasamoodra.—A poor house and hospital were erected in 1846, by contributions from friends in Poorah. In June of this year, on a morning appointed for the purpose, several prominent men, natives, entered the temple of Doorga, and broke the idol and his seat in pieces and cast them into the street. This caused considerable excitement, but it soon subsided, and the idol temple was converted into a school-house, where the Scriptures were daily read, and prayer offered to the living God. Since that period the brethren have met with serious discouragements, but have continued to labor with some success, especially in the schools.

Catery.—This station, on the Neilgherry Hills, has been attended with considerable success. In 1850 a native broke off the inveterate habit of opium eating, burnt his charm books, and withstood strong temptations to those works of darkness so profitable among the superstitious inhabitants of the Neilgherries. He attended the school with little children, though a man of advanced age, because he longed to be able to read the word of God. He was soon to be baptized, as the first fruit of the mission at this place. The missionaries have visited the greater part of the several hundred villages scattered over the Neilgherries, and have become personally acquainted with a large number of the people. Some of them have a Tamil New Testament, which, without being able to read, they worship morning and evening. Others, from an indefinite belief in the power of Christ, have received his name among the rest of the gods, and would not think that anything could prosper without the invocation of his name.

Cananore.—During the years 1847 and 1848 the people at this place were visited with cholera and small pox, which proved fatal to many, and severely taxed the time and strength of the missionaries in attending upon the sick and dying. The schools were much interrupted, but have since come together as usual. Several have been converted, and the missionaries record the happy deaths of two or three native converts within the last few years.

Tellicherry.—The number of persons baptized at this station in 1846 was 22. A printing-press was set up during that year, from which was issued 2150 different works. In 1848 this mission shared largely in the special divine influences which visited the region, and many of the boys and girls in the schools were "shaken out of slumber and death," and have since been baptized. At the out-stations also several "found grace and life." Comparatively few, however, show signs of real spiritual life. The Brahmins, who are few, and the Nairs, a spirited class of people, keep at a distance from the missionary. The Thiers are more accessible, but are altogether taken up with the cares of the world. The Mussulmen hate the Gospel, and show their hatred whenever they have an opportunity.

Chombala.—A mission was commenced at this place in 1849, since which time a church of 20 or 30 members has been gathered, and a chapel has been built. Micha, a native, having been converted, his wife ran away from him with her children, but returned after a few months. "Micha's father, an old drunkard, was driven to his house by want. At first he only laughed and mocked at the Gospel, but after some time, to the astonishment of all, his mind seemed changed. The very expression of his countenance was altered. He has been baptized, with Micha's wife and children.

Calicut.—In respect to the care of the poor-house, which in 1846 was committed to the missionaries, they say, "There are about 150 inmates, for whom every Saturday a service is held by one of the catechists. Such an assembly of crippled, lame, blind, leprous, sunk in the utmost ignorance and apathy, and who on a kind word of exhortation generally have nothing to say but 'What can I do?' It is the Lord's will; thus it is written on my skull;" is a melancholy sight." In the autumn of 1847, 18 were received into the church at this station. In January, 1848, six adults and four girls belonging to the girls' institution were baptized; and in June a weaver with his family, three persons in all, and in November a Tamil family of four persons, were baptized. In January, 1849, a Nair family, together with two youths, two women, and two children, were received into the church. About this time Mrs. Huber, wife of the missionary, commenced an English day school for Indo-British girls, and it has prospered remarkably, in spite of the opposition of the Romish priest. Three Parsee girls joined the school soon after it was opened.

Dacca.—A mission was commenced at this place in 1847, and a school and a small congregation of 12 or 14 baptized heathen was gathered by an English chaplain. Others were subsequently added; but the work became embarrassed by the want of local funds, and in 1850 the station was given up.

Dagapoor.—In 1848, six men, two women and five children of natives were baptized at this place. Before the rite was administered to them, the inquirers had to undergo a severe persecution from their pagan countrymen, but they remained firm in their profession of faith in the Saviour. On 'Good Friday,' 1849, 19 Christian natives sat down for the first time to the celebration of the Lord's Supper. "On the first of April Mr. Bion, with his fellow-laborers, opened a school. On Sunday fifty or sixty Hindoos and Mohammedans attended divine service, of whom not a few were visibly affected." The missionaries received the most pressing invitations from places at various distances, to visit them.

Comilla.—A missionary, Mr. Bost, with his catechist, reached this place on Christmas day, 1847, and immediately commenced preaching the Gospel, which roused the opposition of the enemy. On assuming a more retired activity in his own house, he found himself surrounded by crowds of visitors, who desired to hear the word of God. The higher castes asked for schools for their children. But embarrassments overtook the mission, and it was several years since discontinued.

Two of the foregoing stations having been discontinued, leaves thirteen now in actual existence, besides which there are 19 or 20 out-stations.

In 1851 "Inspector Josenham" visited the India missions of the Basle Missionary Society, and his report was of a highly gratifying nature. He found that about 1400 persons had been gathered into Christian congregations; and in one village, containing several hundred souls, only three persons continued heathen. Christian colonies had been established in three places, and were regarded with peculiar interest. The inspector says, "The religious life of the new converts is by no means so weak as many are disposed to think." On the whole, he expressed his astonishment that so much had been accomplished by the mission within a period of 18 years, for he found the work much more difficult than Christians at home had supposed it to be. Even he who had been familiar with the operations and trials of his brethren, had not appreciated the difficulties of the enterprise till he had the advantages of a personal inspection.

The preceding table will give some idea of the field occupied by this Society, and the extent of its labors, though imperfect, as the omissions indicate. It is based on the reports for 1850. A report for 1852 supplies some of the deficiencies, and swells the number of communicants to 780, a large number having been added to the churches during the preceding two years. The total number in the congregations is stated at 1699, 200 having been added during 1851. The whole number of laborers from Europe, including the wives of missionaries, is 45. The expenditures of the mission for the year last reported, amounted to 64,893 rupees, a considerable portion of which was contributed by the friends of missions in India.

BERLIN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The Berlin Society for Evangelizing the Heathen, established in November, 1843, a station at Ghazipur, a city of 50,000 inhabitants, on the Ganges, with four missionaries, who, in Feb. 1844, having acquainted themselves with the Hindoo and Urdu languages, made their first efforts at public preaching.

LEIPZIG MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The Lutheran Missionary Society at Leipzig has, by the report for 1853, eight stations in Southern Hindostan. The following table exhibits the state of their missions at the above date.

NORTH GERMAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—This society, which had two stations, one in the Telooogo country, Eastern Hindostan, and one in the Neilgherries, was obliged, in consequence of diminished receipts, to suspend operations in the autumn of 1850, and the mission was transferred to the Evangelical Lutheran Church in the United States. Since that time the responsibility of the mission has been assumed by the Bremen Union, and the committee of this society find themselves sustained by the sympathy and coöperation of many warm friends of missions in Northern Germany. The station in Eastern Hindostan is Rajamundry, and that in the Neilgherries is Ootacamund. No recent statistics have been furnished respecting either of these stations.

GOSSENER'S MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—Gosser's missionaries, with no preparatory education except that of the common schools, and accustomed to manual labor, appeared in 1838, on the middle Ganges, and joined in close fellowship with the English preacher Stael, who was laboring unconnected with any missionary organization. They came to Patna on the 29th January, 1839, and divided themselves among the stations, Hadschipur, Muzaffipur, Ohuprah, and Ribbelgandsch. Hence they visited Patna, Monghyr and Dinapore. A small colony settled at Dardschilling, on the boundaries of Nepaul. Another expedition went from Bombay to Jubblepoor, in the interior of India. Partly through death, partly through its members becoming connected with other societies, Gosser's society met with considerable losses, and the attempt was scarcely more successful than that of the Moravians in India, many years previous.—Wiggers.

The preceding table has been made out from the materials furnished by the foregoing statements. On some points the information is quite deficient ; the number of stations in connection with some of the societies is not fully reported. The number of native assistants is fully reported by few, and some societies report the wives of missionaries as assistants, and others do not report them at all. The number of organized churches and of schools is deficient in many of them. But the number of missionaries, communicants, and scholars, is pretty generally reported. It is to be regretted, however, that in such full and valuable reports as are furnished by the Wesleyans, they do not distinguish between ordained missionaries and assistants. In judging of the comparative success of different societies, some regard must be had to the degree of strictness practised in the admission of converts to church privileges. There is a difference, also, in the mode of counting stations. In some accounts, only the central stations are given, and others are reckoned as out-stations. But with all its deficiencies, this table speaks, in language not to be mistaken, of the results of missionary labor in India.

PRESENT STATE AND FUTURE PROSPECTS OF THE MISSIONARY WORK IN INDIA.—The following letter from the Venerable Dr. SCUDDER to the author, will give the impressions of one on the ground, who has witnessed the changes which have been going on for the last quarter of a century. We doubt not it will be read with deep interest.

MADRAS, April 6, 1854.

MY DEAR BROTHER :—Your letter of January 1, reached me last month. India, as a field of missionary labor, is very different from what it was a few years ago—very different from what it was when even the venerable Dr. Carey reached it. He, as you know, was not allowed to commence his operations anywhere within the dominions of the East India Company. It was on this account that he went to Serampore, where he resided until his death. Now the missionary may enter any part of India.

Within the last few years, other changes of a very important nature have also taken place. This is witnessed,

1. In the educational department.

"The Marquis of Hastings's government forms the brightest page in the history of Indian improvement, after a long chapter of dark and dismal proceedings. It gave that impulse to the cause of civilization, of which we are now reaping the benefits. When he first came to India in 1813, he found the press in the hands of a censor, who struck out whatever he pleased. He found that every attempt to impart knowledge to the people, and to give them the means of mental or social elevation had not only been neglected, but discouraged; that the British empire in India was considered stable, in exact proportion to the ignorance of the inhabitants. The only educational effort made in the reign of his predecessor was a proposal by Lord Minto to set up two or three colleges to teach the Sanscrit language, and the sciences of the Shasters, and the morality of Hindooism; but not the remotest idea was ever entertained of unlocking to the natives the treasures of the English language, or disseminating knowledge through their own tongue. This system Lord Hastings was the first to break through. He gave every encouragement, private and public, to the establishment of schools and colleges. Under his auspices, the Calcutta School Society, the School Book Society, the Hindoo College and other institutions sprung into being. He also abolished the censorship of the press, with the full knowledge that the general feeling among the directors and proprietors, at the India house, was against any relaxation of the restrictions on the press. That he met with opposition to his views in India, will appear from the following circumstance: An article appeared in the quarterly series of the Friend of India, on the burning of widows, in which the propriety of abolishing this rite was advocated with a degree of temper and moderation suited to the circumstances of the times; but which gave such offence to Mr. Adams, afterwards our temporary Governor-General, that he took it to the council chamber, and insisted on the suppression of the work, which Lord Hastings positively refused to sanction."

"After the censorship of the press had been taken off, the Court of Directors showed their opposition to what Lord Hastings had done, by the preparation of a dispatch, directing the imposition of the censorship again, which, however, George Canning nobly refused to sanction."

I just alluded to the opposition which was formerly made by the India government to the education of the natives. The reverse of this now obtains. So anxious are they to confer this benefit upon them, that they have offered to contribute their money for the support of those schools which are taught by missionaries, and of course in which Christianity is taught.

When speaking of the Marquis of Hastings, I referred you to Mr. Adams, who thought that the Friend of India should be suppressed, because it had ventured to suggest the propriety of abolishing the burning of widows on the funeral pile. By contrasting his conduct with that of Lord Bentick and Lord Hardinge, we shall at once see how much the views of the politicians of India have, in a short period, been changed for the better. Lord Bentick abolished the suttee throughout the British possessions of India, and Lord Hardinge made great exertions to have it abolished in the dominions of the native princes, not under British jurisdiction. And his labors were attended with great success. He returned to England, six or seven years ago, crowned with many worldly honors. But he has other honors—honors of a higher nature than these. He went home with the satisfaction of having lessened, in no small degree, the horrors of heathenism, in regions embracing a population of not less than twenty millions. This will appear from the following notice: "The Calcutta Gazette contains a proclamation by Maha Rajah Golaub Singh, prohibiting infanticide, suttee, and slavery throughout his territories, forming the remotest Hindoo principality of India. The Governor-General, as will be seen, directs his thanks to be conveyed to a long list—twenty-three in number—of potentates, who during the last three years, have cordially entered into the views of the British government, in suppressing such practices. Those edicts are estimated to affect not less than twenty millions of human creatures."

Such innovations as Lord Hardinge has been instrumental in making on the sacred customs of the Hindoos among the independent governments of India, will be the means of pulling many a stone from that fabric, which they have in times past considered to be as stable as the heavens. Under such circumstances, the missionary may go forth and labor among them with a much better prospect of success than he would otherwise obtain.

As I before remarked, Lord Hardinge left the country six or seven years ago. He left it much too soon for India's good. Had he remained his full time, to say nothing of anything else, the burning of widows would perhaps now be unknown here. Previously to his leaving, however, he left his protest against the conduct of those powers which had not abolished the rite—a protest which may issue in great good. It is as follows: "The Governor-general abstains on this occasion from prominently noticing those states in which these barbarous usages are still observed, as he confidently expects, at no distant day, to hear of the complete renunciation of them in every state in alliance with, or under the protection of the paramount power of India."

2. Infanticide has been very extensively suppressed. You can scarcely imagine to what a frightful extent this crime has prevailed. Among the Nairs in Mulwa, in Oude, and the northern provinces, it is impossible to calculate what numbers of infants have, in the times which have gone by, been put to death. A gentleman of the Bengal service was sent by the government through the northern and independent kingdoms to find out the number. In the provinces through which he passed the principal chiefs acknowledged that they had murdered many of their children, and that they knew their neighbors had destroyed many of theirs, and that this rite was rooted in the affections of the people. In one village there were fifty-one boys but only fourteen girls. In a second, sixty-six boys and only fourteen girls. In a third, seventy-nine boys and only twelve girls. In a fourth, ten boys and only two girls. In a fifth, fifty-eight boys and only four girls. In a sixth, twenty-two boys and no girls.

As you are aware, the Punjaub has lately been brought under British rule. Since this event took place, the fact has been brought to light that infanticide has been practiced extensively there. In the latter part of the year 1851 "Major Lake found it to prevail in the district of which he had charge. Soon afterwards, it was found to prevail in Umballa, Ferozepore, Jullundur, Hooshearpore, Lahore, Mooltan, Jhelum, and Leia districts. It is not, however, practiced by all of the inhabitants. It is confined principally to the Bedees and the Rajpoots, among whom the custom is one of immemorial antiquity. The Khetrees, however, and even some of the Mohammedan tribes maintain the practice; and the higher the rank the more certain are the female branches of destruction. It is believed also by the most experienced officers to have infected all classes in a greater or less degree. All over the Punjaub there is a disproportion in the number of female births not to be accounted for by ordinary causes; and in certain districts this disproportion rises to such a height, as almost to imply the extinction of the female race." The subject came under the notice of our present Governor-general, Earl Dalhousie, several months ago, and if this practice has not yet been put down, as it has been put down in other places, it must soon come to an end.

3. One of the most appalling religious sects which ever appeared in any country, has been nearly, if not entirely, destroyed. Allow me to give you a short description of this sect, from a work, which now lies before me. Scattered throughout India there is a lawless set of men whose profession it is to get their food by murder. They are called Phansiagars, or Thugs: they owe their origin and laws to the bloody goddess Karle: they say that she directed them to become murderers and plunderers: they are called Phansiagars, from the name of the instrument which they use when they murder people. Phansiagar means a strangle, and they use a phansi, or noose, which they throw over the necks of those whom they intend to plunder, and strangle them. These Phansiagars are composed of all castes, Hindoos, Mohammedans, Pariahs, and Chandellars. This arises from the circumstance that they never destroy the children of those whom they rob and murder. These children they take care of, and bring them up to their own horrible mode of life. They always murder those whom they rob, acting upon the maxim, 'that dead men tell no tales.' A gang of these robbers varies from a dozen to sixty or seventy persons. These divide into small parties. Those whom they murder are travelers whom they happen to meet on the road. Sometimes two or three of a gang will take up their station in a choultry, or place where the traveler stops, and while he sleeps they rouse him from his sleep, and cast the noose over his head and kill him. It takes two persons to kill a man. One casts the noose over his head, and immediately tightens it with all his strength; the other strikes him on the joint of the knees as he rises, which causes him to fall backwards. After he has fallen they kick him on the temples till he dies, which is usually in a minute. They never commit a murder until they have taken every precaution not to be found out. They will follow a traveler for weeks, if necessary, before they destroy him. After they have murdered him, they gash the body all over and bury it. They gash it that it may not swell and cause cracks to take place in the ground, which might cause the jackalls to dig down to the body, and thus expose their guilt. If a dog accompanies the person, they always kill it, lest the faithful creature should lead to the discovery of his master. They think it to be a very good act to give a part of the plunder, which they get when they murder a person, to their goddess. If they fail to put him to death according to their rules, they suppose that they have made her angry, and they make offerings to her, that she may be appeased. Thus, their religion teaches them to commit the blackest of crimes.

The reason why this people gash and bury the bodies of those whom they murder, is as follows: They say that the goddess used to save them the trouble of burying the corpses of their victims by eating them, thus screening the murderers from all chance of being found out. Once, after the murder of a traveler, the body was, as usual, left unburied. One of the Phansiagars employed, unguardedly looking behind him, saw the goddess in the act of feasting on it. This made her so angry, that she vowed never again to devour a body slaughtered by them, they having by this one act of curiosity forfeited her favor. However, as an equivalent for withdrawing her patronage, she plucked one of the fangs from her celestial jaw, and gave it to them, saying that they might use it as a pickaxe, which would never wear out. She then opened her side, and pulled out one of her ribs, which she gave them for a knife, whose edge nothing could blunt. Having done this she stooped down, and tore off the hem of her garment, which she gave them for a noose, declaring that it would never fail to strangle any person about whose throat it might be cast. She, moreover, commanded them to gash and bury the bodies of those whom they destroyed.

The Phansiagars bring up their children to their own profession. To learn this the boy is placed under the care of a tutor. Sometimes his father is his teacher. By him he is taught that it is just as proper to murder a man as it is to kill a snake which lies in his path, and would bite him as he passes. He is not permitted at first to see the murders, but merely a dead body; his mind being gradually prepared for the sight. After this, the dreadful secret of his trade is, by degrees, told him. When he expresses a wish to be engaged in this horrid business, they tell him all about it. In the mean time, he is allowed a small part of the plunder, in order that his desire to commit these murders may be increased, as it is only by murder that the plunder is obtained. He is allowed from time to time to assist in some things while the murder is taking place; or is allowed to be present to see how the business is managed. It is not, however, until he becomes a man that he is permitted to apply the noose. To attain this privilege, he usually devotes eight or ten years. Before he can commit a murder, his tutor must present him with a noose. This sets him loose upon the world, as a licensed murderer. When the tutor is about to give him the noose, he takes him apart, and solemnly enjoins it upon him to use it with skill, as it is to be the means of his earning his food, and as his safety will depend upon the skill with which it is used. After he receives it, he tries his skill in strangling a person, the first opportunity that occurs.

By the course of education which the Phansiagars undergo, they become so fond of their dreadful occupation, that nothing can induce them to quit it. Some who have been employed in the East India Company's service have shown this, by returning to their business when an opportunity offered of successful enterprise.

When the Phansiagars become old, they do not quit the service; but act as watchers, and decoy the traveler, by some false tale of distress, into some distant place, where he is murdered.

Women are sometimes admitted to the society of these plunderers, and on some occasions are allowed to apply the noose. They select a handsome girl, and place her in a convenient spot, where, by her beauty, or by a false story of distress, she may decoy some unsuspecting traveler, and be the means of his destruction. Should he be on horseback, she will induce him to take her up behind him, after which, when an opportunity offers, she throws the noose over his head, leaps from the horse, drags him to the ground and strangles him. Some time since, it happened that a horseman of Coorg, in the Madras Presidency, was passing by a spot where one of these interesting-looking girls was stationed. She told him a piteous story of having been robbed, and badly treated, and begged him to assist her. Feeling sorry for her, he offered to take her up behind him on his horse, and thus assist her a few miles on her journey. She expressed much gratitude for his kindness, and mounted. Soon afterwards, she suddenly passed a noose over his head, and, drawing it with all her might, endeavored to pull him from his saddle. At this moment a number of Phansiagars started from the neighboring thicket and surrounded him. The murderess then slipped from the horse; but the Coorg striking his heels into the horse's side, it threw out its hind legs with great violence, and struck the girl to the ground, who immediately let go the cord. He then drew his sword, and cutting his way through the robbers, effected his escape. He wounded two of them severely. These men were shortly afterwards taken, and, through their means, twelve others fell into the hands of the judicial officers of the king of Coorg, including the girl who attempted the murder. They were all put to death.

4. A stop has been put, in a good degree, to the Meriah sacrifices in the extensive hill-tracts of Orissa. It was not until the military operations of the British took place in Upper and Lower Goomsoor, in 1836 and 1837, that the cruel rite of immolating human beings in these places was brought to light, and it was not until that time that the first victims destined for sacrifice were taken from them. Captain Millar was the honored instrument in rescuing them. They were twelve in number. His services were acknowledged in the following manner by the Madras Government: "Captain Millar will realize in his own mind an ample reward for his most commendable conduct, in having rescued twelve victims destined for those horrible sacrifices, as the gratifying reflection of having been the means of saving so many human beings from a cruel and untimely death cannot fail, at all times, to be a source of genuine happiness to him. The discretion, however, with which he continued to effect his humane purpose, is entitled to the warmest and most unqualified approbation of government."

In the year 1838, Captain Campbell rescued a much larger number. He writes, "I have been most fortunate in my late expedition among the wild Khunds of Goomsoor, and have rescued no less than one hundred and three children of various ages, who were intended for sacrifice by these barbarians. The children are now at head-quarters, and form a most interesting group; happy such of them as were aware of their situation, in having escaped the fate which awaited them."

I am acquainted with Captain Mac Viccar, who is one of the British agents "for the suppression of human sacrifices and female infanticide in the hill tracts of Orissa." I learned from him that the whole number of victims who had been rescued, up to the time when I saw him, from those hill tracts, amounted to more than 1,900. Of these, no less than 500 were rescued by himself and his assistant, Captain Frye, in the course of a few months. Since my interview with Captain MacVicar, which was in the year 1851, other victims have been rescued.

There are various tribes inhabiting the extensive hill districts to which I have been alluding, and their manner of offering up these sacrifices have been various also. Let me give you a few quotations from a little book before me, to show how the Khunds were in the habit of offering up their victims. "When the day which has been appointed for the sacrifice arrives, the Khunds assemble from all parts of the country, dressed in their finery; some with bear skins thrown over their shoulders; others with the tails of peacocks flowing behind them, and the long, winding feather of the jungle-cock waving over their heads. Thus decked, they dance, leap, rejoice, beat drums, and play on an instrument not unlike in sound to the highland-pipe. In the afternoon, the priest with the aid of an assistant proceeds to fasten a man or a woman, or a boy or a girl to a post which has been firmly fixed in the ground. Around this post stand hundreds of those Khunds with knives in their hands. At an appointed signal they rush upon the poor creature and try who can cut the first piece of flesh from his bones. Great value is attached to the first morsel cut out from his body, as it is supposed to possess greater virtues. This is buried in the earth before sunset."

In Guddapore a different sacrifice precedes this. A trench, seven feet long, is dug; over which a human body is suspended alive, by the neck and feet, which are fastened with ropes to stakes firmly fixed in the ground, at each end of the excavation, so that to prevent strangulation he is compelled to support himself with his hands over each side of his grave. The presiding priest, after performing various ceremonies in honor of their goddess, takes an axe and inflicts six cuts, at equal distances from the feet to the back of the neck, repeating the numbers, one, two, three, and so forth, Rondi, Rendi, Mungee, Nalge, Chingi, Sajgi, and at the seventh, Argi, cuts off his head.

The body falls into the pit and is covered with earth.

Captain Mac Viccar gave me an account of other districts, where these sacrifices are performed in a different manner. "Some destroy their victims by heavy blows from the metal bangles, which they purchase at the fairs, and wear on these occasions. If the poor creature is not killed by two or three of these heavy blows inflicted on his head, they strangle him with a cleft bamboo, which they slip over his neck. Others destroy their victims by placing them on the ground bound hand and feet, with their faces downward, and by throwing large stones violently on the back of their necks, until life becomes extinct.

"In Patna the people do not use much of the flesh of their victims, frequently none at all. In some districts they cut out the liver, in others the lungs, and after chopping them up in small pieces, bury them. It is customary among some tribes to draw a cup full of blood from the body, and each family takes a little of it and sprinkles it on the floor of their houses. While doing this they implore blessings on their households and on their fields."

The victims whom the Khunds sacrifice are generally bought or stolen from the low country, and sold to them. Sometimes they escape from their owners and thus are saved from death. After the arrival of the British troops in the Khund country, a female found her way to the collector's camp with fetters on her legs. She had escaped from those who had charge of her, and said that she had been sold by her own brother for the purpose of being sacrificed.

I will mention the case of another individual who escaped from the Khunds, and this case is the more interesting from the circumstance that he has gone back to the hills to assist in establishing and superintending schools. His name is Joy Sing. He had witnessed one of these sacrifices by stealth. He had seen a child put in the cleft of a small tree which had been split for the purpose. He had seen how the child was held fast in that position, by the split parts of the tree having closed upon its body; and while it was thus secured, he had seen the flesh cut from its bones. We shall not therefore wonder that he was filled with horror at the thought of meeting such a doom. Neither shall we wonder at his determination to make the very last possible effort to free himself from the hands of his intended murderers. The effort was made, but it was, at first, unsuccessful. After traveling for two days through the jungle, he was recaptured by his owners and put in irons. His courage however did not fail. He determined to make another attempt to escape, though he could only crawl along, in consequence of the irons on his legs. Thus fettered, he traveled for two days and two nights, and when he had just reached the foot of the mountains, he again espied those who were in pursuit of him. Pro-videntially Captain Millar, of whom I have already spoken, had encamped near the place where he was. To this encampment he hastened with all the speed which he could command, scarcely daring to look behind him, and happily he reached it in safety. On his arrival he endeavored to make known his tale of woe by his looks and his tears, and those looks and tears spoke a language which this officer could not misunderstand. His irons were taken off and he was once more free.

Of the children rescued from the Khunds and others, many have been sent by the British Government to missionary schools. Connected with a station, where a very dear fellow-laborer of mine—the Rev. Mr. Wilkinson—resides, a station about ten miles distant from the first range of mountains inhabited by the Khunds, there are two schools, one for the boys and the other for the girls who have been rescued from this wretched people. Though not altogether in place, I cannot conclude without mentioning an interesting case or two of children in connection with the subject which is now before us.

A few years ago, a number of these rescued victims arrived at the gate of the Mission house, on their way to the sea-coast. The children of the schools went out to see them. Belonging to the female school there was a little girl, who thought that she recognized her brother among the strangers. In a few minutes she was seen coming forward, leading him by the hand, and was heard exclaiming with joy, "I have found my brother." Mr. Wilkinson said to her, "How do you know that he is your brother? Perhaps you are mistaken." "O no, papa," said she, "I am not mistaken. I thought, when I saw him at the gate, that he looked just like a little brother I had when I was taken from my home, only he was smaller. So I said to myself, if he is my brother he will know his own name. So I called out Pod! Pod! and he lifted up his head and came running to my arms." And this sister wept over her little brother, and kissed him, and at last catching him up, she bore him away to her school-room.

The Rev. Mr. Sutton relates the case of two brothers who met under similar circumstances. They had both been sold at different times to the Khunds, for sacrifices, by their unnatural uncle.

Among the victims formerly rescued from the Khunds, there was a very awkward lad, who was called David. Great pains were taken to instruct him, but he was so stupid that all efforts appeared to be useless. At last he was devoted to the work of sweeping the premises of the Mission house. "At this time," says Mr. Sutton, "our school was very full, and many of the young natives had been converted. All at once a ray of intelligence seemed to break upon the mind of poor David. He seemed suddenly to be possessed of new faculties. All were astonished at his understanding and his answers. He now applied himself so diligently, and was profited so much by the instruction afforded, that he was subsequently received into the church. Soon afterwards he was taken into the printing-office, and as he made rapid advances in his new business, he was made a compositor. While thus engaged, and amazing us all by his sudden proficiency, there appeared on his skin numerous white spots—the first indications of leprosy, a very common and also a very fatal disease in India. We sent him to the hospital, and every care was taken of him; but each of the white spots became a putrid ulcer, and his limbs were much eaten away. Nothing could arrest the progress of his malady, or save his life, and as there was danger that he might communicate his disease to others, by coming in contact with them, the doctor directed that he should be kept by himself. A tent was provided for him, from which he would creep at service time to the door of the meeting-room and join in the service. A more interested listener I never beheld. One day I went with my wife to pay him a visit. He was stretched on his mat. His Testament was close to his side. His hymn book was in his hand, and we saw that his attention had been rivited on the following verses:

"Of all that decks the field or bower,
Thou art the fairest, sweetest flower;
Then, blessed Jesus, let not me
In thy kind heart forgotten be.

"Day after day youth's joys decay,
Death waits to seize the trembling prey;
Then, blessed Jesus, let not me
In thy kind heart forgotten be."

When we left his tent, my wife said to me with great emphasis and emotion, "There lies an heir of glory, for though like Lazarus he is full of sores, like Lazarus also, he is rich in assured hope." I could not but concur in the remark.

Soon after this the spirit of this afflicted but happy youth took its flight, as we have every reason to believe, to the bosom of his Saviour, rescued by the British from the hands of the cruel Khunds, and rescued from eternal torment in consequence of his having been sold to them for the purpose of being sacrificed.

5. The law which declares that a native shall forfeit his paternal inheritance by becoming a Christian, has been abrogated. This was a most formidable obstacle to the spread of Christianity in this land, and I need hardly add that this abrogation is a very powerful blow to Hindooism.

6. Caste, the greatest obstacle to the spread of Christianity in India, has in some degree been put down. The government do not acknowledge it in the army. The Pariahs and the Brahmins are made to stand side by side when employed on duty. The government also disregard it in their educational institutions.

7. In the courts the practice of swearing is in some places changed, the Bible being substituted for the water of the Ganges: or the witnesses make only a declaration that they will speak the truth. I need hardly add that all such changes are undermining the faith of this people.

I have now mentioned a few things to show you that India is in a much better condition for the promotion of missionary labor than it was when you and I commenced life; and if we further take into consideration the patronage and the support which missionaries receive in their work from the British government, what greater encouragements can Christians at home need to make this land a prominent field for their exertions? This latter consideration should not be overlooked. I have again and again said that if we were not under the protection of this government, our lives would not be safe—humanly speaking—for an hour. But I have said enough. O that the misery and dying groans of the 130,000,000 of India might arrest the attention of the young men of our churches in America, and constrain them to flee to their help before it shall be too late! Is it not enough that so many myriads have already taken up their abode in hell forever? Very sincerely, J. SCUDDER.

HITIAA: A station of the London Missionary Society, on Tahiti, South Seas.

HOBART TOWN: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in New Zealand. The town is delightfully situated upon two hills, between which there runs a fine stream of water from the heights of Table Mountain, which towers above it.

HOLAPOOR: The capital of an independent state in Southern Hindostan, with a population of 550,000. It is 130 miles south of Ahmednuggur, and 60 miles south of Satara. It was occupied as a station of the American Board in 1852, no missionary labor having ever before been performed there.

HOME MISSIONS: This term is applied to the work of preaching the Gospel in the destitute portions of our own country, planting new churches in places where the people are not able to do it themselves, and aiding feeble churches to sustain the preaching of the Gospel. And this work is increasing in interest and magnitude as our territory is expanding, and the destitute classes of our population are multiplying by the immigration of hordes of ignorant and unevangelized foreigners. Not only the papists of Europe, but even the heathen from Asia, are coming to our shores; and if we do not wish to see the pagoda as well as the cathedral established among us, we must meet the case by the most vigorous application of the means of grace to our whole population. It is a significant Providence that is casting upon our shores these unevangelized multitudes, just at the time when we have arrived at such national maturity and strength as to be able to bear them, and when we not only have the means of giving them the Gospel, but are considering how we may most easily and successfully send it to all nations.

"It was about three-quarters of a century after the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth before anything answering to our present idea of Home Missions was attempted, or in fact needed. Churches were all the while slowly colonizing, as new settlements were rising; but always through a self-sustaining process. In the most missionary aspect of the work, it was the bestowment of a minister upon a new congregation, by some older church that had furnished itself with two. In this way an application was answered that came to Boston in 1642, from "certain well disposed people in the upper and newly settled parts of Virginia, bewailing their sad condition for want of the means of salvation, and earnestly entreating a supply of faithful ministers, whom, upon experience of their gifts and godliness, they might call to office." The request was read on "lecture day" in Boston; and after long consultation and prayer, it seemed good to the elders of the churches to recommend two of their number, Rev. Messrs. Knolls of Watertown and Thompson of Braintree—each of which had a teaching colleague—to go on this mission; and they were accordingly dismissed by their people, and went.*

"A nearer approach to Home Missions was made about the year 1695, when several of the 98 churches then in Massachusetts were found to be destitute of the stated means of grace and unable to procure them;—a circumstance not more distressing to the vacant churches themselves, than it was appalling to the guardians of the Commonwealth. In the archives of the State are to be found about 50 applications from feeble parishes, presented to the Legislature between 1695 and 1711; and a record of as many appropriations, amounting in all to nearly £1,000, for their relief in sustaining the ministry. This plan, of course, could not continue.

"The Society for Propagating the Gospel among the Indians and others in North America, was founded in 1787, and has the honor of being the oldest incorporated missionary society in the United States. A number of gentlemen, residing in Boston and its vicinity, that year received a commission from the 'Society in Scotland for Promoting Christian Knowledge,' to superintend funds which they had devoted to the purpose of Christianizing the Indians in this country. 'This Board of Commissioners, emulous to coöperate with their foreign brethren in a cause so benevolent and honorable to the Christian character, not only as their agents, but also as principals, by raising funds in America for the like purpose, formed themselves into a Society similar to that in Scotland,' and obtained an act of incorporation. At their request the Legislature also granted a brief for a contribution in all the Congregational churches throughout the State,—which, however, yielded but $1,561. A larger sum was soon after obtained by private subscription among the members of the Society. In about 16 years the fund had increased to $23,417, and yielded an annual income of $1,145 ;—which, since that time, has been expended partly among the Indians in different sections of New England and New York, and partly in new settlements, furnishing missionaries and Bibles, and supporting charity schools.

" The Connecticut Missionary Society, though not instituted till 1798, " may be said to have existed in fact, though not in form, from 1792 ;" for the General Association, which at first composed the Society, obtained permission that year from the Legislature to raise funds for missionary purposes. Indeed, several missionaries are known to have gone into Vermont and Western New York under the patronage of that body as early as 1788. And there is traditional authority for believing that the 'grain of mustard seed' from which this fruitful tree has grown, was a donation of three dollars, which a poor but pious woman put into her pastor's hand for a missionary use. Not knowing through what channel to appropriate the gift so as to answer the donor's purpose, he took it with him to the General Association, and sought counsel of his brethren ; which resulted in this missionary movement, whose original object was, 'to Christianize the heathen in North America, and to support and promote Christian knowledge in the new settlements within the United States.'

" The Berkshire and Columbia Missionary Society was organized in 1798 for the purpose of 'propagating the Gospel in the new settlements, and among heathen nations.' Its first name was 'The Congregational Missionary Society' originated in the counties of Berkshire (Mass.) and Columbia (N. Y.) ; and for a few years it received about an equal share of patronage from each State. Subsequently most of the New York members became associated with other organizations. When this Society assumed an auxiliary relation to the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society, it had expended about $13,000 in sustaining, on an average, four missionaries per annum, under a commission for three months each—or one minister through the year—besides a generous distribution of books on the missionary fields, and the establishment of nearly twenty 'charitable libraries.'

" The New Hampshire Missionary Society was instituted in 1801, for the purpose of 'sending missionaries to destitute towns, parishes and societies within this State, and on the borders of the same.' Provision was also made for the distribution of religious books. It is now auxiliary to the American Home Missionary Society ; and besides supplying the necessities within its own bounds, takes part each year in the work of evangelizing the West.

" The Hampshire Missionary Society was instituted at Northampton, Mass., in 1802, whose 'object and business,' as stated in the Constitution, is 'to promote the preaching and propagation of the Gospel of Jesus Christ among the inhabitants of the new settlements of the United States, and the aboriginal nations of the continent.' At first the Society covered the 'Old County of Hampshire,' from which Hampden and Franklin counties have since been separated, and now sustain their own charitable associations. By obtaining from benevolent individuals 'promissory notes with good securities,' a permanent fund was early created, which has since been increased by legacies. The income from this fund, together with the annual collections, usually amounts to several thousand dollars a year ; which is paid in part to the American Home Missionary Society, and in part to the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society, agreeably to the terms on which its present auxiliary connection is based. Previously to 1827, its independent disbursements amounted to $33,000 for missionary service, and about $10,000 in the purchase and distribution of Bibles and other religious books. Its missionaries labored chiefly in Western New York and in Maine, from four to six men being under commission from three to six months each, on an average, per annum.

" The Massachusetts Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, was instituted in 1803, 'for the benevolent purpose of promoting evangelical truth and piety ; in the first place, by a charitable distribution of religious books and tracts among poor and pious Christians, and also among the inhabitants of new towns and plantations ; and secondly, by supporting charity schools' and pious missionaries in places where the means of religious instruction are sparingly enjoyed.' The first distribution of books was made in 1804. The first missionary was employed in 1811 ; and during the subsequent ten or fifteen years the resources of the Society, amounting sometimes to $2,000 per annum, were expended in circulating books and in helping partially supplied churches to a permanent ministry. These labors were bestowed in various parts of New England, but more especially in New Hampshire. As its original objects are now reached through the Home Missionary and Tract Societies, its present income is small, and is expended in supplying destitute Sabbath-schools with libraries.

" The Rhode Island Home Missionary Society arose about the same time ; the Maine Missionary Society in 1807 ; and the Vermont Domestic Missionary Society in 1818 ;—all of them having similar objects, and all now sustaining an auxiliary relation to the AMERICAN HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

"The Massachusetts Missionary Society was formed in Boston, May 28, 1799; the original object of which was, 'to diffuse the Gospel among the heathen, as well as other people, in the remote parts of our country, where Christ is seldom or never preached.' But, having subsequently become strictly a domestic missionary society, the name was (in 1844) changed to the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society.

"The Domestic Missionary Society of Massachusetts Proper was formed by the General Association in 1818, to operate exclusively within the State of Massachusetts. On the formation of the American Home Missionary Society, in 1826, these societies united, and became auxiliary to the American Society, confining their operations to Massachusetts. At this time, one of them had 25 missionaries, mostly in Maine, and the other about the same number in Massachusetts."*

The Presbyterian Church in the United States has been a missionary body from its organization, in 1706, to the present time. For the first ten years of its existence, its operations were conducted by the original Presbytery of Philadelphia, under whose direction such ministers as could be had went out into the waste places, making known the Gospel. In 1717 the oversight of the missionary work was transferred to the Synod of Philadelphia, and after 24 years of labor, in the year 1741, the oversight was given to the Synods of Philadelphia and New York united, and remained with these bodies until the formation of the General Assembly, in 1789.

The business of domestic missions was conducted by the General Assembly, as a body, from 1789 to 1802, but the work having become extended, and increasing yearly, the assembly appointed a "standing committee of missions," and that committee made its first annual report in May, 1803. In 1816, the style of this committee was changed for that of "The Board of Missions," which name it still retains. "The Board, therefore, is no new creation, but the old standing committee of missions, under a new name, and with enlarged membership and powers." The Board now consists of 60 ministers and 36 laymen, elected for four years, and arranged in four classes, one of which goes out each year, when a new class is elected. And the reason for the election of so large a body, and those scattered over the United States, is to secure a quorum for business at the annual meetings of the General Assembly, which are held in various sections of the union; and besides this, the field is so large, that it is found necessary to have two executive committees, one located in Philadelphia and the other in Louisville, and the oversight of the several states is divided between them. The work of church extension is also committed to this Board. The following summary of a single year's work will serve as a fair specimen of what has been accomplished through its instrumentality:—In the year ending May 1, 1853, the number of churches and missionary stations supplied, was 838: organized within the year, 32 churches: admissions to the churches on examination, 1643; on certificate, 1287; total, 2930. Total number in communion in these churches, 19,966. The number of Sabbath-schools in these congregations, 432; scholars, 19,123; baptisms, 1876; houses of worship erected or finished, 45. The total amount of money paid out as the cost of all these operations for the year, was about sixty-eight thousand dollars. The following extracts, from the report of the Board for 1854, give an interesting view of the progress of the work:—

"In 1828, the year of the re-organization of the Board, there were but 31 missionaries, and an income of $2,400 only.

"In 1830, two years after, there were 198 missionaries and an income of $12,632. In 1840, two years after the division of the Church, and when the parts were fairly separated, there were 256 missionaries, and an income of $40,734. In 1850, the number of missionaries was 570, and the receipts were $67,654 19. This year, 1854, the number of missionaries reported is 523, and the receipts were $75,207 80.

"Let us now glance at the expansion of our Church, which has been mainly effected by missionary labor. We will begin with 1828, the year of the re-organization of the Board.

	Synods.	P'bt'ries.	Ministers.	Ch'ches.	Members
1828,	16,	90,	1,285,	1,968,	146,308.

"In this brief reference to the fruits of missionary labor, as seen in the increase of Churches, and Presbyteries, and Synods, we have said nothing of the thousands of religious volumes and tracts distributed by our missionaries throughout our country, the tens of thousands of children gathered by them into Sabbath-schools, the numerous Bible and catechetical classes they have formed, the thousands of temperance societies they have organized, the numerous parochial schools, academies, and colleges they have founded, nor of the various other instrumentalities which they have set in motion, and which are silently, but effectively producing a harvest of immeasurable good."

The following table is worthy of study. It tells its own story, as to the self-sacrificing spirit of our Home Missionaries; and it is probably a fair specimen of the whole.

American Home Missionary Society.—A desire having arisen for a more general coöperation, in the prosecution of Domestic Missions, on the part of several denominations which harmonized in doctrinal views, preliminary meetings were held in Boston for consultation ; and on the 13th of March, 1826, a circular was issued by the Executive Committee of the United Domestic Missionary Society of New York, inviting a meeting of the friends of the cause, which took place in the Brick Church, New York, May 10, 1826, when the society was formed, and a constitution adopted. At its next anniversary, the United Domestic Missionary Society was dissolved, and its life members and life directors became life members and life directors of the new society ; and subsequently, the several State societies of the New England States became auxiliary to the American Home Missionary Society, on the principle of first supplying the wants of their own States, and paying over to the American Society their surplus funds, their missionaries being commissioned by the parent society.

This society is composed of life members, who have become such by the payment of $30, who now number nearly 8000. Its first president was Hon. Stephen Van Rensselaer, of Albany, N. Y., and its first secretary, Rev. Abaalom Peters. Its affairs are managed by an Executive Committee of 14 members, clergymen and laymen, all located in the city of New York.

Summary.—The society has existed for twenty-eight years. The total amount of receipts, for this time, is $2,728,363 71. The total number of missionaries employed, is about 5,400. The total number of years of labor, is 15,706. The total number of preaching stations is about 4,000. The total number of churches that have become self-supporting through this society's aid, is nearly 1,000. The total of additions to the churches, is 126,705.

Interesting and important facts and comparisons.—When the society concluded its first year, 120 out of its 169 missionaries for that period, or nearly three-fourths, had been employed in the single State of New York, and only thirty-three, or about one-fifth in the Mississippi Valley. The largest item in its receipts was less than $6,000, which included all the contributions of auxiliary and allied associations. Its foremost contributor was the "Geneva Agency," which furnished the sum of $2313 36. When the society concluded its twenty-eighth year, 153, or little more than one-seventh of its missionaries had been employed during the year, in the State of New York, while 530 out of 1047 (or more than one-half), had labored at the West. Its foremost contributor, the Auxiliary Society of Massachusetts, alone, raised more than $46,000 (or $6,000 more than twice the whole income of the national Society in 1827,) of which over $38,000 went for the benefit of the new settlements. The first year, 110 years of labor were performed ; in the twenty-eighth year, 870 years. The number of Sabbath-school scholars now connected with its churches, amounts to more than 65,000. In its last year, 65 houses of worship were built by congregations receiving its aid ; 49 repaired or improved, while 88 remain in process of erection, and 20 churches have built parsonages. The society needs about 200 new missionaries, annually.

In 1827, Ohio	had 16 missionaries ;	in 1854, 110

At the same time its labors have also been much extended in the older States.

Benefit to particular States and Sections.—It is estimated that one-half of the churches in New England have received missionary aid—most of them from this society, through its auxiliaries ; and in Maine and Ver mont, three-fourths of the churches; in Central and Western New York, five-sixths, and in the states north-west of the Ohio river, out of 1,200, all but about 50, or eleven-twelfths.

The operations of this society from year to year, its regular increase of means and labors, with the results, will all be seen in the following

Remarks.—The influence of this society, however, can hardly be estimated in figures, and is not easily described in words. Its missionaries are not merely pastors and preachers, they are founders of schools, colleges, and theological seminaries. They labor not merely in the pulpit, the conference-room, and by the bed-side of the sick and the dying; but they are abroad in the world, laying the foundations of the country's future, through labors, specific, and direct, as well as in the general influences of their sacred calling, and of the religious institutions that they build.

Methodist Home Missions.—The Methodist Home Missions in the United States are those sustained by the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Methodist E. Church South, and the Protestant Methodist Church. The mode of operation in raising and appropriating funds for Domestic Missions is so much alike in each of these churches, that one description will do for all. There is no separate Home Missionary Fund in any of these bodies. What they raise for missions, is raised without any particular designation. But out of the whole sum subscribed by the church, a certain proportion is set apart for the support of Home Missions. In the month of November of each year, the General Missionary Committee, the Board of Managers, and the Bishops of the Methodist E. Church, meet together in New-York, in order to make the appropriations for missions for the ensuing year. This committee, after having disposed of the foreign missions, takes up the domestic missions. First, the missions to the Germans in the United States and Territories are taken up by the conferences, and considered one by one, and the amount necessary for each conference set down; then the missions to the foreign population other than German are taken up and considered, and the amount necessary set down, then the domestic English Missions in each annual conference are taken up, and the amount necessary to enable each annual conference to carry on its own domestic missions is determined, and set down to each conference. This committee determines the amount for which each bishop may draw for the domestic missions of those conferences over which he shall preside, and he cannot draw on the treasurer for more than this amount. The Book of Discipline (Part III. ch. iv.) prescribes the plan for raising the funds thus appropriated. The leading provisions are: (1) Each conference has an auxiliary to the parent society; (2) Every church within the bounds of that conference is to have a missionary committee, to aid in carrying into effect the disciplinary measures for the support of missions; (3) In each church suitable missionary collectors are appointed to solicit subscriptions; (4) One Sabbath in the year is given to the advocacy of this cause, when a public collection is usually taken up; (5) A transcript return of all subscriptions of fifty cents and upwards, is to be reported at Conference for insertion in the Annual Report of the Conference Missionary Societies.

The moneys appropriated for domestic missions are placed to the credit of the conferences, severally, which have charge of these missions. In each of the annual conferences there is a mission committee, appointed at each session, whose duty it is, in conjunction with the bishop presiding, to make the estimate for each mission under the care of the conference; and the estimates must be kept within the credit allowed to the conference for its missions, and, further, must receive the sanction of the bishop presiding. Thus, it will be seen that each conference is responsible for the use made of the money placed to its credit for the support of the missions under its care. The conference missionary committee for estimating for the support of the missions under its care, can obtain all information of the condition and prospects of each of their missions, and hence make just estimates; and when these estimates are made, they are brought to the notice of the bishop in council with all the presiding elders, so that the bishop has an opportunity of thoroughly understanding each case, and thus is enabled to give or withhold his sanction. When the estimates are approved by the bishop, he draws on the treasurer at New York for the same, in quarterly drafts, in favor of each presiding elder, for the amount estimated for the missions in his district, and under his direction. In the expenditure of the moneys appropriated for these missions, the Board of Managers at New York are in no way responsible; but each conference and the bishop presiding are responsible for the specific appropriations made to the missions under its care.

The Domestic Missions of the M. E. Church are (1): Missions to those who speak the English language in the destitute, or new portions of the country; (2) To foreigners who have settled together in various portions of the country, and in particular quarters of our cities; (3) Besides these they have also an interesting mission to New Mexico. Of these, the missions to the Germans are the most numerous and successful; but they have also missions to the Swedes, Danes, Norwegians, Welsh, and French.

The missions to people who speak the English language are instituted by the bishop and council of presiding elders of each conference, within whose bounds such mission fields lie; and the appropriations for the same are reported to the conference for its approbation. As these English domestic missions become strong, they cease to be missions, and become self-supporting churches, and in their turn contribute to sustain other new or promising fields of labor.

The missions to the foreign populations which have settled in the country, and still speak their own language, sprung up among these people spontaneously. Individuals were converted under the ordinary ministration of the Gospel, and they began to declare to their countrymen what they had experienced. The work among the Germans began about seventeen years ago. Now there are 160 missionaries and 11,000 members, with numerous Sunday-schools, and a few day-schools. These missions in the United States have reacted on Germany, and produced the Foreign German Missions.

Then there are the Scandinavian Missions to the Swedes, Norwegians, and Danes. Of these people the Swedes are the most numerous in this country, and the missions are more extensive among them. The Norwegians also have received the Gospel gladly, and have carried it back to Norway; and have thus laid the foundation of a mission there. The centre of the missions to the Slavonic people from the north-west of Europe, is in New York, where they all land. The Bethel-ship, John Wesley, in the North River, is the place where, upon landing, they hear for the first time the simple, spiritual preaching of the Gospel of Christ. These missions took form nine years ago, in the city of New York, under the labors of the Rev. O. G. Hedstrom.

Besides these, there are missions to the Welsh and French immigrants, as will appear in the table.

Oregon and California have hitherto been placed among foreign missions, owing to their distance, the peculiarities of their population, and their dependence upon the Missionary Society. It has pleased God to give the Methodist Episcopal Church the earliest, and, as yet, the widest and strongest occupancy of these new countries. Hitherto this body have prosecuted these missions vigorously and successfully. They have sent a large proportion of their best men into these missions; and the last General Conference judged it best to grant their request to be organized each into a regular independent annual conference. From the time of their meeting, in the spring of 1853, under the presidency of Bishop Ames, they took their places among their sister conferences.

The mission to New Mexico was commenced about five years ago, by the Rev. E. Z. Nicholson. It was for a while suspended, but has been again renewed. Santa Fe is its central position. Mr. Nicholson is the superintendent, having for his assistants, the Rev. Messrs. W. Hansen and Benigno Cardenas. Mr. Hansen is the fruit of the Swedish mission in New York, and being able to preach in Spanish, had long desired to go to Mexico as a missionary. Benigno Cardenas had been an intelligent and well-educated Roman Catholic priest of much influence at Santa Fe, and a preacher of considerable eloquence. During Mr. Nicholson's previous residence in that city, Cardenas had freely conversed with him upon the errors of the Church of Rome, and the nature of evangelical religion. He afterwards left Mexico and visited Rome, and returned by way of London, where he called upon the Rev. Mr.

Rule, who had long been a Wesleyan missionary in Spain. There he remained for several weeks, and his mind and heart underwent such a change, that he renounced popery for ever, and cordially embraced the Gospel of Christ. He then offered himself to the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, as a missionary for his native Mexico, where he is now zealously and usefully employed.

THE METHODIST E. CHURCH, SOUTH, has missions in the United States:—(1) In the destitute portions of their regular work; (2) Among the people of color; (3) Among the German emigrants; and (4) In California. But these missions are so like those we have described, that we need only thus enumerate them and refer to the annexed table for full information. The mode of raising the money is also the same as that given above.

The Methodist Protestant Church has 99 missions in the destitute portions of their regular work; they have no others.

The following tables contain the results. Some of the statistics are for 1853, but most of them for the present year. We have made the tables as complete as we could, some of the Reports being quite defective.

American Baptist Home Missionary Society.

—At a meeting of the Baptist Missionary Society of Massachusetts, held in Boston, in November, 1832, the spiritual destitution of many of the new states, and especially of the Mississippi Valley, having been made a subject of consideration, it was resolved to take measures for the awakening of interest and systematic effort, throughout the Baptist community, in behalf of domestic missions. Resolutions were passed, recommending the formation of a General Home Mission Society, and appointing Rev. Jonathan Going, of Worcester, Mass., an agent on the part of the Massachusetts Society, for the accomplishment of this plan. In New York and Philadelphia the proposal was favorably received. A provisional executive Committee was elected in New York city, by whom measures were taken, initiatory to a convention of members of the denomination from all parts of the union, for the purpose of forming an organization. This convention was held in the Baptist church, in Mulberry-street, New York, on the 27th of April, 1832; fourteen of the states and one territory being represented by delegates. The American Baptist Home Missionary Society was formed, a constitution adopted, and Hon. Heman Lincoln, of Massachusetts was elected president.

It is now thirty-five years since the Methodist E. Church began her domestic missionary operations. At the end of the year

The plan of operations adopted by the executive committee proposes: First, to obtain and disseminate information respecting the moral condition of the country—especially the Mississippi Valley. Second, to excite the entire Baptist community to systematic, liberal, and vigorous action, in support of missionary effort. Third, to establish state agencies, employing and sending to destitute regions, ministers of suitable qualifications. Fourth, the collection of the necessary funds.

It was proposed to raise $10,000 the first year. The receipts amounted, however, to but $7,586 73, which was expended in the support of 59 missionaries and agents, some of whom labored only during a part of the year. Twenty-two were appointed by the Kentucky Baptist Convention, a separate and preëxisting organization. Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio and Michigan chiefly formed the field of the first year's operations. The receipts of the society, in 1836, had risen to $16,910; 115 missionaries and agents had been employed during the year, in fourteen states, two territories and two provinces. In 1838, 317 missionaries were employed during the year. The annual receipts varied from 1838 to 1841, from $10,000 to $20,000. In 1841, 82 agents and missionaries were commissioned, who occupied 300 stations, preached 10,922 sermons, traveling 73,451 miles. The auxiliary Baptist societies employed 233 laborers, making a total of 315.

The society now began to receive, from the churches aided, new and active auxiliaries, "who will continue to repay, with large interest, the debt of gratitude, until their character of debtors will be lost in that of benefactors. At the annual meeting in 1842, it was resolved to commence a mission to the Jews in North America, provided sufficient funds should be specifically contributed for its support. The receipts, for this year, including those of auxiliaries, rose to $57,154 72. Total number of missionaries, 367. During the ten years of the society's existence, from 1832, to 1842, great results had been effected through its instrumentality, in Kentucky, Missouri, Indiana, and Michigan. Previous to 1832, there were in those states but 955 Baptist churches, 484 ministers—ten only being pastors. There was an anti-missionary spirit prevalent among the ministers and churches, and scarcely anything was contributed for benevolent objects. In 1842, there were in the same states, 1689 churches, with 772 ministers, of whom 99 were pastors. The anti-missionary spirit had greatly decreased, and $6,245 had been then contributed for benevolent purposes. In 1832, there was but one (Baptist) scientific and theological institution; in 1842 several had been established. During the ten years, 756 missionaries had been employed by the society, generally west of the Alleghanies; 732 destitute churches and stations had been supplied; 10,990 persons baptized, 401 churches organized, 142 ministers ordained.

During the decade, from 1842 to 1852, the society extended its operations to Florida, Arkansas, Iowa, and Wisconsin, and greatly increased its labors in the Mississippi Valley. In the year 1845, a controversy upon the subject of domestic slavery, which had existed in the society for some years, reached its crisis, and produced a separation. A missionary body was then organized in the slaveholding states, which has since received the support of the majority of, southern Baptists. Since then, the operations of the society, with two exceptions, have been directed to the free states and territories only. From 1842 to 1852, 877 ministers were employed, 9,468 persons baptized, 354 churches organized, 246 ministers ordained. In mission fields, 105 houses of worship had been built, and $18,843. 57 contributed to benevolent objects; 65 of the churches once aided, were sustaining the Gospel themselves. In 1852, three missionaries were sent to Oregon and California; one to an Indian tribe in New Mexico: a Chipewa to his countrymen. In 1854, the executive Board resolved to take measures for the establishment of a church edifice fund. The society, from its commencement, has had in its employ 1750 missionaries and agents. They have in the field at present, 184. The entire amount of their receipts, from the beginning, is $430,170. From New York State, $160,039 of this sum. Receipts for the fiscal year, ending 31st March, 1854, $62,730 26.

During the past 22 years, the missionaries of the society have baptized 22,814 persons, organized 911 churches, ordained 466 ministers; and the people among whom they have labored have built, and in most cases paid for, 178 houses of worship. About 200,000 children have been gathered into Sabbath-schools; and the Gospel has been preached in fourteen different languages. For the past year, the missionaries report the baptism of 1,322 persons, the organization of 67 churches, the ordination of 30 ministers: 46 church edifices have been built, or are in progress of erection. About 163 have been baptized from the Catholics and Lutherans.

Southern Baptist Board of Domestic Missions.—In 1845, owing to controversy arising from the discussion of slaveholding, a large number of the Southern Baptist churches withdrew from the American Baptist Home Missionary Society, and a Board of Domestic Missions was formed, in connection with the Southern Baptist Convention. The receipts of this Board, for 1852, amounted to $10,939 15; for 1853, to $13,074 17. During 1853, 66 missionaries and agents were commissioned by this Board, a large number of whom have labored in the rapidly growing cities on the southern Mississippi and Atlantic seaboard. The reports are imperfect; 217 stations have been supplied, 5,958 sermons and addresses delivered, 1,521 prayer and other religious meetings attended, 642 persons have been baptized, 381 added by letter, 763 converted, not baptized—making 1,786 substantial additions to the strength of our cause, in place of 1,109 last year. 65,182 miles have been traveled, 8,712 religious visits made; 59 Sabbath-schools and Bible classes, 218 teachers, and 2,105 pupils are reported. These latter statistics are, however, exceedingly deficient. 17 meeting-houses are reported as commenced, 13 finished; 21 churches have been constituted, 24 ministers and 34 deacons ordained; 8 are preparing for the ministry.

What is doing by this Board, is as nothing to what is being carried on for domestic missions by the denomination, through other channels. The General Association of Baptists in Virginia, proposed to raise and expend $10,000 in domestic missions during the year 1853. Nor does this include the whole of what is done in that State, a single association raising some $3,000 or $4,000 more. In most, if not all, of the states of the South and South-west, associations are carrying on, independently of any State organization, a system of missions within their own borders.

Board of Domestic Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church.—For a history of the organization and constitution of this Board, together with its annual and aggregate receipts, see Episcopal Board of Missions. The account is given in that place, rather than this, because of the intimate connection between the foreign and domestic boards. The Board now have under their charge 105 churches or stations, 13 of which are vacant. They have in their employ 92 missionaries, and 8 missionary bishops. These missionaries are distributed as follows: in Maine, 2; New Hampshire, 3; Delaware, 2; Florida, 1; Alabama, 7; Louisiana, 1; Mississippi, 5; Tennessee, 4; Kentucky, 3; Indiana, 9; Illinois, 11; Michigan, 9; Wisconsin, 11; Iowa, 9; Minnesota, 3; Missouri, 3; Arkansas, 1; Texas, 6; Indian Mission, 1; California, 1 (bishop); Oregon, 3.

The amount of donations received for the financial year ending Sept. 30, 1853, was $23,856; and from Oct. 1, 1853, to Aug. 15, 1854, $36,327. The aggregate amount of donations from the beginning is $626,751.

But a new department of domestic missions is opening up before the Episcopal Board of Missions. Rev. E. W. Syle, of the Episcopal Mission in China, having returned on account of his health, had his attention turned to the Chinese in this country. After much searching and inquiry, he discovered about 70 Chinamen in New York, most of them in a destitute condition. He called a meeting of them at the vestry-room of old St. George's Church, where he continued to instruct from forty to fifty, who came regularly for some time, every Thursday morning and Sunday afternoon. After some time, a meeting was called, and measures were taken to raise funds to make temporary provision for their wants. Twenty-two of them were sent to California and four to China. The remainder were all provided with employment suited to their ability, by which they could earn a living, except six, who desired an education, and these are placed under the instruction of a theological student, to make trial of their capacities, and in the mean time are provided with a support. The sixteen, who are provided with employment, are located at Gowanus, near Greenwood Cemetery. They attend one of the neighboring churches in the morning, and Mr Syle preaches to them in the afternoon. In a communication in the "Spirit of Missions," in which these facts are detailed, Mr. Syle says: "Our connection with the Chinese is becoming daily more intimate and inevitable. The emigration from Canton has been so large that old ships not considered seaworthy have been bought up at enormous prices, to meet the demand for passages. The now indispensable guano is put on board our ships at the Chincha Islands by Chinese laborers, and what unutterable sufferings are they not made to undergo in the operation! The labor on the Isthmus railroad is largely performed by Chinese. In Kentucky, the Chinese coolies are said to be employed at certain iron mills on the Cumberland River, near Eddyville. Tea-stores, owned and kept by Chinamen, are to be found at Boston, Albany, and other places; not to mention that Chinese are to be seen in the tea-stores of this city, and at Cincinnati, Dayton, Indianapolis, and elsewhere. Chinese cooks and stewards on board our ships are now quite frequently to be met with."

The fact that God is sending the heathen to us, as well as requiring us to go to them, ought to be a matter of gratulation and thanksgiving; and it certainly calls loudly upon us to seek their evangelization.

Board of Missions of the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church.—This Board has been in existence twenty-two years. Its receipts for the year ending May 1, 1854, were $15,257. The following summary of results will show what the Board is doing:

1. In nineteen out of twenty-seven classes, one or more churches or missionary stations have been aided during a part or the whole of the year.

2. Sixty-nine pastors and missionaries have received aid during a part or the whole of the year.

3. Eighty churches and missionary stations have been aided from its funds.

4. Thirteen new churches and missionary stations have been established and assisted.

5. Eight churches have been organized, to which appropriations have been made.

6. Twelve new houses of worship have been built by congregations aided by the Board.

7. Three have ceased to ask aid of the Board, and several others give notice that they will not need any aid beyond the present year.

8. Four hundred and fifty-nine persons have been received, on confession of their faith in Christ, into the churches aided.

9. Four hundred and sixty-six have been received on certificate from other churches.

10. Eighty-three Sabbath-schools have been in operation during the year; besides many Bible and catechetical classes, both in and out of the schools.

11. Four thousand two hundred children and youth have been taught in those the truths which are able to make them wise unto salvation.

12. Nine hundred and thirty-four dollars have been contributed, by the churches and missionary stations aided, to the funds of the Board.

13. Three thousand six hundred and seventeen dollars have been contributed by them for other benevolent objects.

14. One hundred and ninety-three out of three hundred and forty-two of the churches have contributed to the cause of Domestic Missions.

15. One hundred and forty-nine out of three hundred and forty-two of the churches have given nothing.

The last report states that the Domestic Missionary efforts of this Board have aided in establishing a majority of the Dutch churches in the country. The churches aided are represented to be in a good condition. Special efforts are made in behalf of the Dutch and German emigrants.

* Number of missions. Probably preaching places many times greater.

HONGKONG: A flourishing English settlement, on an island about 40 miles east of Macao. (See China.)

HONORE: A station of the Basle Missionary Society, in the province of Honore, Hindostan. Pop. 4000.

HOOBLY: A station of the Basle Missionary Society, in the Mahratta country, India.

HONOLULU: The chief city of the Sandwich Islands, and the seat of government. It is situated in a fertile plain, which extends 9 or 10 miles along the southern coast of Oahu, and about two miles inward to the base of the mountains. A rich alluvial soil, two or three feet deep, covers a layer of fine volcanic ashes and cinders, extending to the depth of 14 to 16 feet. These ashes rest on a stratum of calcareous rock. The harbor is considered the best in the whole group, and most frequented by shipping. It contains two large churches, established by the missionaries.

HOPEDALE: A station of the Moravians in Labrador.

HOTTENTOTS: A family of affiliated tribes in South Africa, formerly inhabiting the territory embraced in the English colony of the Cape of Good Hope, comprising the Coranas, Namaquas, and Bushmen, as well as the tribes on the coast.

The Hottentot is of a yellowish brown, high cheek bones, spread out above, and contracted to a very narrow chin; nose remarkably flat; eyes, chestnut color; hair grows in small tufts.

and does not cover the whole head. The stature of the Hottentot is very short, about four feet six inches being the medium size for the men, and four feet for the women. Their history and origin are involved in obscurity. They resemble none of the Kaffre tribes, and are equally distinct from the Negro race. Mr. Moffat thinks they more nearly resemble the Chinese than any other people. All these tribes possess the same physical characteristics, the same manners and customs, and their language is so nearly identical that they readily understand each other. Mr. Moffat thinks that the difference between the Hottentots and Bushmen is to be accounted for by the fact that the former, residing in towns, are improved by intercourse with each other; while the latter, being scattered over thinly inhabited districts, having little intercourse with each other, lead an exposed and half famished life, and degenerate rather than improve. The language of the Hottentots is as singular as their persons. Its pronunciation has been compared to the clucking of the turkey.

Character.—Dr. Philip gives a very favorable view of the native character of the Hottentots. He says, when the Portuguese first visited the Cape of Good Hope, they found the inhabitants rich in cattle, and living in a comfortable manner. It was said that they were remarkable for the excellence of their morals, and that the records of the colony during the first 50 years, unite in praising the virtues of the Hottentots, so that they were distinguished by the appellation of The Good Men. It is said that, during the whole of that period, the natives had never been detected in stealing from a colonist. But the injuries inflicted on them, for 150 years, during which they have been driven from the most fertile portions of their country, and deprived of their independence, he says must have exerted upon them a deteriorating influence. Mr. Barrow says that Hottentots are capable of strong attachments, are grateful for kindness shown, and honest and truthful. They live together in kraals or villages, and have their cattle in common. Rev. J. J. Freeman estimates the present number of the Hottentot tribes at 150,000.

Religion.—Like the Kaffres, the Hottentots have no religion, except a gross, undefined superstition. Dr. Philip says of them, "I have never been able to discover, from my intercourse with the natives, or from any other source, that this nation had ever attained any distinct notion of a Supreme Being, or that an idea of a future state had at any period prevailed among them." Rev. Mr. Moffat and Rev. Mr. Schmelen also testify to the same fact, and quote the conversations of the natives and the declarations of the converts, to confirm their statements. Yet, Dr. Philip says they were not entirely without moral restraints. —Freeman's Tour in South Africa; Moffat's South Africa; Philip's Researches; McCulloch's

HUMAN SACRIFICES: The prevalence of human sacrifices among the heathen, from the earliest periods of history, is a fact of momentous interest. It shows, first, a sense of the need of an offering for sin, of the highest value that the human mind can conceive; and second, false notions of the character of God, in supposing that he would be pleased with one man, in consequence of his imbruing his hands in another's blood. It shows, also, the ferocious character of their gods, who are thus represented as feasting upon human gore. We said the practice had prevailed from the remotest ages. The ancient Egyptians, the Cretans, the Arabians, brought human blood to their altars. The people of Duma sacrificed every year a child, and buried it under an altar. The Persians buried their sacrificial victims alive. Amestris, the wife of Xerxes, entombed twelve persons alive, under ground, for the good of her soul. The Cyprians, the Rhodians, the Phœnicians, the people of Chios, Lesbos, Tenedos, all had human sacrifices. The king of Moab offered up his eldest son, his successor to the kingdom, on the wall, when the king of Edom was fighting against his capital. When an enemy was at the gates of Carthage, 200 children of the most distinguished citizens were offered up to appease the sanguinary deities and avert the danger. The natives of Tauric Chersonesus offered up to Diana every stranger whom chance threw on their coasts. The Pelasgi, in a time of scarcity, vowed that they would give a tenth of all that should be born to them for a sacrifice, in order to procure plenty. Aristomenes, the Messenian, offered up 300 noble Lacedæmonians, and among them the king of Sparta, at the altar of Jupiter, at Ithome. The Spartan boys were whipped in the sight of their parents, before the altar of Diana Orthia, with such severity that they often died under the torture. Every Grecian state made it a rule, before they marched toward an enemy, to seek a blessing on their expedition, by the sacrifice of human victims. The Romans likewise offered human sacrifices, by public authority. Caius Marius offered up his own daughter, to procure success in a battle against the Cimbri. Augustus Cæsar offered up on the Ides of March, after the surrender of Persia, three hundred chosen persons, at an altar dedicated to the manes of his uncle Julius. The Gauls and the Germans were so devoted to this shocking custom, that no business of any moment was transacted by them without being prefaced by the blood of men. They were offered up to various gods, particularly to Hesus, Taranis, and Shantates, whose altars were far removed from the common resort of men, being generally situated in the depth of woods, that the gloom might add to the horror of the operation, and give a reverence to the proceeding. There were many places set apart for this purpose all over Germany, but especially in the woods of Arduenna, and the greater Hercurian forest, a wild that extended over thirty days' journey in length. These places were held in great veneration, and only approached at particular seasons.

These practices prevailed among all the people of the North of Europe, and even among our Saxon ancestors. Their chief gods were Thor and Woden, whom they thought they could never sufficiently glut with blood. Of these sacrifices, none were esteemed so auspicious and salutary as a sacrifice of the prince of the country. When the lot fell to the king to die, it was received with universal acclamations of joy. In a time of famine the lot fell upon King Domalde, who was put to death. Olans Triliger, another prince, was burnt alive to Woden. Harold, the son of Gunild, slew two of his sons to obtain a storm of wind to destroy the ships of his enemy. Another king sacrificed nine sons, to prolong his own life. In Mexico, in the courts of a single temple, there were found 136,000 skulls, the remains of those who had been slain in sacrifice. The manner in which the victims were slaughtered was various, but generally, it was attended with the utmost cruelty. A native Hindoo artist engraved a cut to represent a practice of our forefathers, which is thus described in a Bengalee paper, published by a society of natives, the followers of Ram Mohun Roy, who professed to have forsaken Hindoo idolatry.

After describing human sacrifices, as they have existed in various countries, they say: "Yet even all these frightful enormities appear less surprising to us, when we hear of the horrors practiced in their religious rites, by the ancestors even of the present race of our English rulers. Among them, on the commencement of a war, or when some great chieftain was attacked with disease, or when any other calamity affecting the public occurred, the Druids, who were the priests of their religion, in order to secure the favor of their gods, presented them with offerings of human victims, attended with circumstances of peculiar cruelty and horror. There was one special atrocity, the recital of which makes the heart tremble. They constructed an enormous figure, resembling a man of gigantic stature, formed of dried plant stems, or wicker-work, in the hollow interior of which were placed, as in a cage, numerous criminals, fast bound, to prevent their escape. Or if these could not be had in sufficient numbers to fill the capacious cavities of this terrible image, the deficiency was made up of unoffending victims. Surrounding the whole with straw and dry wood, they then set fire to the whole, thus murderously consuming at once, hundreds of living men, women and children."

The editor of the London Missionary Magazine says: "The instance here described, is a correct specimen of the superstitions of ancient Britain. When we hear of these horrid practices as existing among heathen nations, our feelings are instinctively shocked, and we seem to regard them as sunk too low almost for the reach of the Gospel; but when we reflect that no pagan or barbarous nation that ever existed has exceeded in those cruelties our own ancestors, and reflect that the Gospel reached them, and that we are now reaping its blessed fruits, how ought the reflection to stir us up to send the same Gospel to those who dwell in similar dark places, which are full of similar habitations of cruelty! For human sacrifices still exist." In the native provinces of India, beyond the reach of the British government, human victims are offered up to appease the anger of their gods. Dr. Scudder writes, in 1848, that four persons had then recently been offered up as sacrifices by the Khunds of Goomsoor, which forms the north-western extremity of the northern Circars. The following description of these cruel rites was published in a Madras paper, in 1838:—

"Miria Pooja, or human sacrifice, takes place in Goomsoor once a year, in one or other of the confederate districts in succession. The victims are stolen from the low country, or brought from some other distant part, and sold to those districts where the sacrifices are offered; if children, they are kept until they attain a proper age.

"When the appointed day arrives, the Khunds (inhabitants of the hill country) assemble from all parts of the country, dressed in their finery, some with bear-skins thrown over their shoulders, others with the tails of peacocks flowing behind them, and the long winding feather of the jungle-cock waving on their heads. Thus decked out, they dance, leap, and revel, beating drums, and playing on an instrument not unlike in sound to the Highland pipe. Soon after noon the Jani, or presiding priest, with the aid of his assistants, fastens the unfortunate victim to a strong post, firmly fixed into the ground, and then standing erect, the living sacrifice suffers the unutterable torture of having the flesh cut off from his bones in small pieces by the knives of the savage crowd who rush on him and contend with each other for a portion of the gory and quivering substance. Great value is attached to the first morsel thus severed from the victim's body, for it is supposed to possess superior virtues, and a proportionate eagerness is evinced to acquire it.

"Women are sacrificed as well as men. A female found her way into the collector's camp, at Patringia, with fetters on her limbs, who related that she had been sold by her brother

* The Khunds are in the habit of sacrificing children annually at sowing time, in a most cruel manner, for the purpose of propitiating the demon of their worship, and of securing, as they suppose, a good harvest by the blood of their victims.

"In January, just before the turmeric shrub is planted, the Khunds make the sacrifice alluded to. They select, as their victims, male children who are devoted from infancy to this purpose, and are sold to the chiefs of the different villages. When the ground is ready, the victim is led forth, bound to bamboos for the better security, and taken into the open plain. The cultivators assemble, and at the supposed auspicious moment, commence the dreadful carnage by hacking with knives the body of the truly pitiable creature; each cutting off a part as quickly as possible, and hastening with it to the field whose fertility is the object to be secured. The blood, in which the Khunds imagine the virtue of the spell to subsist, is then made, by pressure of the hand, to fall in drops upon the soil; and the flesh, not yet cold, is cast into the same ground. In hewing the body great care is taken not to touch a vital part, for should death occur before the blood is dropped on the field, the charm, according to the notions of the people, would be lost.

"Some of the Khunda, on being expostulated with, asked what else they could do, as they should have no crops if they neglected to perform this ceremony."

Doct. Spry, in his "Modern India," gives an account of a tribe in the Nagpore kingdom, who not only sacrifice human beings, but feast upon the sacrifice.

The practice of offering human sacrifices has prevailed to some extent among the North American Indians. In 1838 a sacrifice of this kind was made by the Pawnee Loups, in consequence of the prevalence of the small-pox. Young females are the victims selected. After various preliminary rites and ceremonies, she is disrobed, and one half of her person painted red and the other black; the feet and hands being extended, the right wrist and ankle are tied to an upright piece of timber, and the left wrist and ankle to another, and she is thus suspended on a scaffold. At intervals, various ceremonies are performed. The young men and boys, each having provided a handful of arrows, about a foot long, made of the stems of a species of tall grass that grows on the prairies, now advance, and shoot these arrows into the breast and other parts of the unfortunate sufferer. The arrows enter just enough to adhere, and the breast is literally filled with them; but they do not destroy life. An old man now comes forward and shoots an iron-pointed arrow through the vitals. The chest is now cut open, and the heart taken out and burned. The smoke that rises from this fire is considered a most potent medicine, and their implements of war, hunting, and agriculture are passed through it, to insure success in their use. The flesh is now wantonly slashed off with knives, and thrown to be devoured by the dogs, but the skeleton remains suspended till it decays and falls.

The custom prevails among most of the unevangelized tribes of Southern and Western Africa, and is attended with shocking barbarities. Mr. Hutchinson gives the following account of a sacrifice offered by the king of Ashantee, to secure the assistance of the fetish in an approaching war: "The bones of the king's mother and sisters were taken out of their coffins, and washed with rum and water, wiped with silks, rolled in gold dust, and wrapped in strings of rock-gold, aggrary beads, and other costly materials. Those against whom the king had any complaints were then sent for, and immolated as they entered, that their blood might 'water the graves' of the royal dead. During the whole night the king's executioners traversed the streets, and dragged away to execution all whom they met. The next morning, desolation seemed to reign over the capital, and none appeared in the market but the king and his attendants. At the close of the day the sacrifice was renewed. The bones were removed to the sacred tomb, preceded by the victims in chains, and followed by a splendid procession. When the procession returned the next day to the market-place, the king's horns sounded the death-knell, and the work of sacrifice commenced. The king sat with a goblet of palm-wine in his hand, and every time the executioners cut off a head, he imitated a dancing motion in the air."

In the neighboring kingdom of Dahomey, the barbarous monarch paves the approaches to his residence and ornaments the battlements of his palace with the skulls of his victims; and the wide-spreading branches of the gigantic fetish-tree at Badagry are laden with human carcasses and limbs, which have been offered in sacrifice.

The same rite was generally prevalent in the islands of the Pacific, before the introduction of Christianity, and the mode much like that practiced in Africa. It still prevails among the Pagans in those islands. Capt. Wilkes, of the United States Exploring Expedition, thus describes the practice, as it still exists in the Feejee Islands: "The victims are usually taken from a distant tribe, either by war or by negotiation; and, after being fattened for the purpose, they are bound in a sitting posture, and placed in the oven and roasted alive; after which the body is taken out, the face painted black, and carried to the temple, where it is offered to the gods. The Feejees being cannibals, it is then cut up and distributed, to be eaten by the people!" Surely, "the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty!"

It appears, from the foregoing, that the horrid practice of offering human sacrifices to gain the favor of blood-thirsty deities has been almost universal, except where the religion of the Bible prevails, and that we owe our deliverance from it to the introduction of the Gospel among our ancestors. What obligations, then, must rest upon us to send the Gospel to those who are still groaning under the cruelties of paganism.—Pamphlet by Mr. Peggs, late missionary to Orissa; London Missionary Magazine for July, 1846; Beecham's Ashantee and the Gold Coast; United States Exploring Expedition, Vol. III. p. 97.

IDOL: A statue or image of some false god, to whom divine honors are paid, altars and temples erected, and sacrifices offered. The idol or image, of whatever material it consists, is, by certain ceremonies, called consecration, converted into a god. While under the artificer's hands, it is a mere statue. Three things were necessary among the ancients to change the image into a god: proper ornaments, consecration, and ovation. The ornaments were various, and wholly designed to blind the eyes of the ignorant and stupid multitude, who are chiefly taken with show and pageantry. Then followed the consecration and ovation, which by the Romans were performed with great solemnity.—Rees' Cyclopaedia.

IDOLATRY: The worship of idols, or the act of ascribing to things and persons, properties which are peculiar to God alone. The principal sources of idolatry seem to be the extravagant veneration for creatures and beings, from which benefits accrue to men. The first objects of idolatrous worship are thought to have been the sun, moon and stars. Soon after the flood we find idolatry greatly prevailing in the world. In process of time noted patriots or deceased kings, animals, plants, stones, and whatever people took a fancy to, were idolized. The Egyptians worshiped pied bulls, snipes, leeks, onions, and many other equally insignificant objects. The Greeks had about 30,000 gods.

The Apostle Paul traces idolatry to its true source, the corruption of the human heart: "As they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient." And this statement is corroborated by the discoveries of Layard, among the ruins of Nineveh:—

"They show, in conformity with the tenor of Scripture, that the earliest ages were not, as many think, barbarous ages; but that the race of men, originally enlightened from a divine source, had, at first, a high degree of general knowledge which they gradually lost through their defection to idolatry. It has been demonstrated by these excavations, not only that a high state of the arts existed in Nineveh a thousand years before Christ, but also, that in the earliest ages of that city, dating but a few centuries from the flood, their sculptures were the best. In this remarkable result, the Egyptian and Assyrian antiquities also agree.

"It is also proved, contrary to the general impression, that idolatry was introduced when men had a better knowledge of the true God than afterwards prevailed; that it did not grow up as a religion of nature, by the ineffectual attempts of men to find the true God. But it was introduced as an expedient of men in order to obscure what knowledge of God they possessed, because they did not like to retain God in their knowledge. This is shown in the fact, that the earliest representations of God found in these sculptures are the best, and immeasurably exceed every thing of the kind existing in after ages; especially in their approach to the true idea of God. So that idolatry came in not for want of light, but by an abuse of light. Men, knowing God, and yet not willing to glorify him as God, became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened."

And the description which Paul gives in the first chapter of Romans, of the debasing influence of idolatry upon the heathen of his day, is a just description of its effects in every age and in every portion of the world. The worship of inferior objects tends to debase, as the worship of the true God tends to exalt the human mind. Nor is the baptized idolatry of the church of Rome essentially better than that of pagans. The learned men profess, indeed, to worship, not the images and pictures, but through them the objects they represent, or the Supreme Being through them, as mediators; and so do the learned among the heathen. But it cannot be expected, that the masses, whom they keep designedly in ignorance, will make this distinction. And even though this distinction were made, the worship of God in this manner is expressly forbidden in the second commandment; hence the Romanists leave out this command from the decalogue.

The idolatry of the heathen is everywhere connected with superstitions the most debasing, and rites the most cruel.

INDIAN ARCHIPELAGO : This vast extent of islands, which tradition reports to be the remains of a sunk continent, forms, as it were, a bridge to that remote part of the world, Australia, and from thence again up northward to China. Its exterior crescent form begins with the Andaman and Nicobar islands; then come two of the great Sunda islands, Sumatra and Java, which are followed by the lesser Sunda islands. Up northward of these are the Moluccas, to which belong also the islands of Banda, Amboyna, and Ternate. These are followed by the Philippines, and lastly by Formosa. Within this curve of islands are embosomed the two other great Sunda islands of Borneo and Celebes. The whole of these islands together, comprising an area of 170,000 square miles, contain about 20,000,000 of human beings, of all grades of color and stature. The most ancient appear to be the Papoos, who are the only inhabitants of the Andaman Islands, but who are found farther eastward as a people driven into the forests, mountains, and defiles, and are not found again as a leading population till we reach New Guinea. They are some of the most degenerate of the whole human race. They were supplanted more immediately by the Malays, who, having many centuries ago emigrated from India beyond the Ganges, have become a mysteriously heterogeneous people, by mixture with Papoos, Hindoos, Arabs, Chinese, Siamese, and even with Europeans. The shores have of late years been more and more covered with Chinese emigrants, who threaten the same fate to the Malays which they have inflicted upon the Papoos. The religions here are as various as the nations, and tribes, and languages. Here we may still meet with aboriginal sorcery, together with the divine worship paid to mountains, rocks, woods, storms, volcanoes; then with Brahminism and Buddhism, the Chinese worship of ancestors exalted into demigods, the Mohammedan delusions, and the saint-worship of the Romish communion. The worship of God in spirit and in truth has hitherto been to these wretched nations a thing unknown; and what has been attempted for these forty or fifty years past by about 70 or 80 missionaries, is as yet but little more than a beginning of what remains to be done.

1. THE NICOBAR AND ANDAMAN ISLANDS.—South of Burmah Proper, and nearest to it, are the Andaman Islands, for whose wild inhabitants, the Papoos, nothing has hitherto been done. Below them are the Nicobars, which are also called Sambalang, or the Nine Islands, with a Malay population, who are of a tawny complexion, short stature, and strong-limbed, without any modesty, or any knowledge of any other superior Being except the evil spirit. Here the Danish Government, in 1756, attempted to establish a mercantile settlement; and two years afterwards, at the request of that Government, some missionaries of the United Brethren's church set out on their way thither. After an eight years' sojourn at Tranquebar, they came at length, in 1759, to the island of Nancawery. But scarcely ever had any mission to encounter so many privations and hardships of every kind, while the inhabitants continued quite unimpressible. Besides which, the climate was so deadly, that new comers were perpetually swept away after a very short interval. Yet the mission was not wholly abandoned till 1787, after eleven missionaries had been buried in Nancawery, and thirteen others had died from the injurious effects of the country after they had left it, while none of them had seen there any fruit of their labors.

2. SUMATRA.—This, first of the Sunda Islands, which is almost bisected by the equator, is 1200 miles in length, and 200 in breadth. Its western shore, facing the Indian Ocean, is rugged and steep, and rises onward inland into a mass of mountains pervading the length of the island. Their highest summit is 13,000 feet. Here are brooks and rivers of no great length; but, on the eastern side, where the descent is gradual to the low land, there are numerous river-vales, which abound with most luxuriant vegetation, but whose exhalations cause a deadly fever to Europeans. Ravenous animals of all kinds are abundant here. The inhabitants, who are estimated at 7,000,000, are Malays; and are considered as the most bigoted and fierce abettors of the Mohammedan delusion. A remarkable, though less known people, are the Batta tribes in the north of the island; as are also the Kampungs in the south of the mountainous interior. The Battas devour the flesh of persons who have been executed. When the Portuguese arrived, which was in 1511, the Malays had their principal force in the peninsula of Malacca; and the sultans of Atshin, at the north point of Sumatra, attacked the intruding Portuguese at seven different times within the period of 130 years. But, in 1664, the Dutch took the city of Palembang, in the south; and during very many wars they went on enlarging their dominions, while the English also in the west formed settlements at Bencoolen and Tapanooly. These English settlements have been consigned to the Dutch since 1825.

The English Baptists had previously commenced several missions in Sumatra; first, at Bencoolen, in 1820, in the vicinity of which is Fort Marlborough; then at Padang, above 312 miles further north, in 1821; and lastly, in 1822, at the Batta village of Sebolga, in the vicinity of Tapanooly. But the mission was broken up in consequence of the exchange of governors; for it could not act with sufficient freedom under the narrow-hearted Dutch, who, moreover, had drawn upon themselves the hatred of the Malays, so that war, conflagration, and pillage, were perpetually on the increase. The missionary Burton likewise found it necessary to withdraw from Sebolga, because fanatical Malays, called Padrees, were approaching the place with fury, to compel those Battas to embrace Mohammedanism. Besides the Baptist missionaries, there were also others from Holland, who from time to time attempted to establish themselves at Padang and Palembang; but their society, it seems, wanted the means for carrying anything into effect at those places. Lastly, in the year 1833, the American Board of Missions sent out Messrs. Munson and Lyman to make a tour of inquiry through the island. These missionaries pushed their way from Tapanooly through deep ravines and defiles, primeval forests, and over steep and precipitous rocks and mountains; but were at last cruelly butchered by the insensate Battas near the village of Sacca. The missionary Ennis likewise, who, in 1837, ventured into the interior from Padang, had much difficulty to escape from the perils and dangers of the country, the attacks of wild beasts, and of the savage inhabitants. Since that time there has been nothing further attempted for the mission in Sumatra itself; and the Baptist missionary Ward, who remains at Padang, can do little more than circulate copies of the Scriptures and tracts, on account of the extreme jealousy and irritability of the Malays.

The mission, however, is only the more active, and prospered in some islands on the east coast of Sumatra; especially in that of Bingtang with the isle of Lor, below Singapore; also, in Lingin, further south; and in the large island of Banca, over against the province of Palembang. The two first mentioned islands are possessed and governed by native rajahs, who, however, are dependent on the Dutch, who have totally subjugated Banca. To Bingtang, in 1827, came the Dutch missionary Wentink, to whom Gutzlaff for some time lent a successfully helping hand. They gained many Chinese and Malays, as likewise in the neighboring islands of Muntoc, Poolo Piningat, and Tercolee, so that the otherwise friendly rajah began to be jealous. Wentink's successor, the missionary Rœttger, extended the mission on to Lingin and Banca; and, in 1836, baptized in the latter island many Mohammedans and pagans.

3. JAVA.—This next great Sunda island is 700 miles in length, and averages 100 miles in breadth. Its southern coast consists of lofty rocks, behind which rises a chain of mountains from five to eight thousand feet high, with thirty-eight volcanic craters, some of which are exhausted, and others still burning. The north coast is inferior to no country in beauty and magnificence. The island is also one of the healthiest of the tropical countries, except in some parts of it, as at Batavia, which is built upon a river in a marshy region, where the climate is so deadly, that, in the space of twenty-one years, more than a million of human beings have been swept away, so that it is called a large burying-ground. The natives, who are a finer formed people than the Malays, are reckoned at about five millions. Their habits, education, and religion, are of Indian origin, and they formerly consisted of separate kingdoms, one of which at length obtained dominion over the rest. But after this came the Arabian invaders, in 1327, who subjugated the whole island, and established in it the Mohammedan religion and customs. The Javanese, however, had nearly recovered their independence, when the Dutch arrived, and fixed themselves at Batavia and Chapara. Amidst incessant insurrections and civil wars, they became increasingly powerful; they even expelled the French, the Portuguese, and the English from the island, and retained the sovereignty of all Java till the year 1749. But it was not till the English took Java from them, in 1811, that a better and more liberal government was introduced, the system of which the Dutch themselves, when the country was restored to them in 1815, could not avoid retaining in some particulars. In the high mountain regions, in the east and west, there are still various pagan tribes. The Chinese who have come hither, have formed a chain of colonies on the northern coasts; and in the centre, and in the south, there are still two native sultans, whose residence cities, Sooracarta, or Solo, and Yudshyakerta, each contain 100,000 inhabitants. The Dutch territory is divided into seventeen provinces, each of which has a native governor; and these again are subdivided into towns and negereys, or smaller circuits. The governor resides at the country seat called Buitenzorg, a name which, in the Dutch language, signifies, free from care; as Batavia, the capital, with its 45,000 inhabitants, is the certain grave of Europeans. The other towns of most importance are Samarang, with 30,000 inhabitants, and Soorabaya, which has a population of 100,000.

The London Missionary Society was at first chiefly interested about the Chinese in Java. Several missionaries, who had been educated in Holland and at Berlin, were consigned to that society, and landed at Batavia in 1813. Bruckner, who was one of them, and who, in 1816, joined the Baptist Society, repaired to Samarang. But Supper, who was another, remained at Batavia till his death, in 1816. He was very zealous for the conversion of the Chinese in that quarter, and was employed chiefly in the circulation of the Scriptures among them. No one succeeded him till 1819, when the missionary Slater arrived there, who brought with him a great many printed works, and was received in a friendly manner by the Chinese, whom he visited from house to house. His dwelling was, indeed, accidentally destroyed by fire, with all his stock of books and furniture; but this circumstance only served to awaken an increased interest among the Christians at Batavia, and missionary buildings and schools were soon erected, together with a chapel. In 1821, the missionary Medhurst came from Penang to assist him; and the zeal and activity of this missionary were evinced in a particularly laudable manner. He composed a number of tracts, preached at four different places, especially in the village of Depoc, read the Scriptures and other books aloud in public places, and stirred up much desire for salvation among the Chinese, by his familiar intercourse and journeys. As the government allowed him entire liberty to preach and distribute books, he frequently took very considerable journeys in Java and the neighboring islands. Many Chinese and Malays were baptized; and the ground was becoming more and more decidedly prepared for a still richer harvest.

Greater difficulties were thrown in the way of the Baptist missionaries, who likewise arrived in 1813, and labored more immediately for the benefit of the Malays. Robinson, it is true, soon got together one congregation, and another at Batavia, and at Weltevreden, in its neighborhood; but the Dutch mode of government was not favorable to the desirable working of a Malay mission. As he had so many and various obstacles put in his way, he repaired, in 1821, to Bencoolen, in Sumatra. Trowt meanwhile had come to Samarang, where he was made very useful, and set himself to learn the Cawee language, which is the ancient and original language of Java, and is still spoken in the island of Balee. But he died in 1816. The missionary Brückner had joined him in that year; as this missionary, however, could not see much fruit of his labors at Samarang, he removed in 1823 to Salatiga, in the higher ground of the interior, and from that place his letters communicated more cheerful reports. But a dreadful insurrection against the Dutch, in the kingdom of Yudshyakerta, obliged him to return to Samarang. Here the Dutch refused him permission to print his translation of the Scriptures in the vernacular tongue, as well as to circulate copies of it, after it had been printed at Singapore in 1831. Even Medhurst's applications to the government for that purpose were rejected. "Let the Javanese," it was said, "remain as they are; we do not think it a good thing to have them more learned and knowing." On the other hand, there were only the more tracts put to press, which were eagerly called for, in the hospitals, prisons, and markets.

The Netherlands Missionary Society has two stations on this island, viz., Depok and Soorabaya. Of the former, very little is known, except that Mr. Wentink, after laboring there 15 years, has been obliged by ill-health to retire, and has been succeeded by another missionary. At Soorabaya a great work of evangelization among the Mohammedan population has been prosecuted for many years by a German watchmaker, Emede, and his daughter. The first fruits of their efforts were baptized in Dec. 1843, viz., 18 men and 12 women. In Dec. 1848, at a village 50 miles from Soorabaya, 56 natives, young and old, were baptized, after having been instructed in Christianity by Paul, a native evangelist. In March, 1849, 21 persons were baptized at a neighboring village; and, at the close of 1849, there were under the care of the missionary, Mr. Jellesma, 347 adult Christians, or baptized persons, and 183 children. He has taken six Javanese youths into his own house, in order to bring them up as catechists among their own countrymen.

4. THE LESSER SUNDA ISLANDS.—These come next to Java, eastward, in succession, and reach to the Straits of Ombay, beyond which commence the islands of Timor, which in a wider sense have been reckoned as part of the Moluccas. The most important of these Sunda Islands are Balee, with about 1,000,000 of inhabitants, who adhere to Hindooism, and, agreeably to it, bury widows with their husbands; Lomboc, which is also called Sasac, with 180,000 inhabitants, who are mostly Mohammedans, and are subject to the Baleenese; Soombava, 200 miles in length, with 800,000 inhabitants, probably like the Baleenese; also, Sandalwood Island, which is but little known; and Flores, 250 miles in length, which once was in the possession of the Portuguese. In not one of these islands has any mission as yet been established, though most of them appear to be very promising fields for the purpose. It is true that in the island of Balee, Mr. Medhurst, in 1831, met with a very unfriendly reception. The rajah even forbade him to hold any conferences with the inhabitants, and threatened to poison those who should apply to him for medicine; and when Mr. Medhurst complained of these restrictions, he was answered, "No one sent for you hither; if you do not like it, go away to the place you came from." But the missionary Ennis, when he arrived there, found things quite altered, within less than seven years afterwards; he was permitted to speak freely upon spiritual subjects, was esteemed, and kindly treated, and was frequently even requested to remain there.

5. BORNEO.—This is the third great Sunda Island, and is called by the natives Broonai. It is 1000 miles in length, and 750 in breadth, but hitherto is known only on the coasts. It appears formed out of several smaller islands by alluvial soil, which is especially evident on the western side, where all is level inland for several days' journey. In the interior, and on the eastern coast, there are lofty chains of mountains, which contain diamonds, gold and inferior metals, in abundance; and from whose heights very many rivers descend in cataracts and waterfalls. These mountains form the boundary between the Mohammedan Malays of the coast country and the pagan Dyaks of the interior and upper country. The former, who are about a million, are well instructed in their false faith, as well as adroit and fanatical in defending it; they follow agriculture, traffic, and mining, and especially the cruel trade of piracy. The Dyaks, of whom there are several millions, are behind no nation in barbarism and rude ignorance. The nearest tribes, who are mostly subject to Mohammedan chieftains, are indeed good tempered and social, but, at the same time, stupid and cowardly; but those of the interior find their delight only in war and murder. Their constant aim is to strike off the heads of their real or supposed enemies; and to this every stranger is exposed without ceremony. In many of their provinces, no one is allowed to marry that cannot show a certain number of human heads that he has recently struck off. The grave of the chief must be fenced round with human heads; and the possession of many human skulls constitutes the chief ornament and glory of families. An offering of human skulls is with them the surest safeguard against the evil spirits, to whom they attribute all diseases. Little is known of the rest of their religion. Not less lawless are the settlers called Bugies, from the island of Celebes, who are about 30,000. The most quiet inhabitants are the Chinese, who work in the mines, and who amount to about 300,000. Magellan's companions were the first Europeans that entered the island; this was in 1521; but the subsequent Portuguese settlements failed. In the year 1643, the Dutch founded a factory at Pontianak in the west; and their domains on the south coast have become considerably enlarged since the year 1812. They have now preponderant influence upon both coasts, though the native princes have still much power, and the Dyaks remain almost entirely independent. In the east, the sultan of Cotee is the most authoritative despot; and in the north, the sultan of Broonai.

RHENISH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—In 1835, the Rhenish Missionary Society sent Barnstein and Heyer to Borneo. Barnstein, who had learned the Malay at Java, brought with him Lucas Monton, a converted Celebese. They landed at Bandschermassing. Monton was received by a Chinese acquaintance, in whose house he could read his books to an audience of Chinese, Malays, and Arabs. Monton preached here in public to a large crowd until evening. The Chinese received the Gospel with many favorable manifestations.

Soon after landing, Barnstein made a journey to the Dajak country, with Monton. From the chief in Gohong they received a friendly invitation, and entered into a treaty with him. Conforming to the custom of the country, they allowed incisions to be made on their right shoulders, and tasted of a draught with which the blood thence flowing was mixed. When the Dyaks heard of Christ, they appeared like a people awakened from a long sleep, and continually heard the word with joy. At the missionaries' departure, one of the chiefs said to them, "My brethren, do not fear to remain with us. We will do you no harm, and if any one molests you, you shall be defended with our hearts' blood. God and this assembly bear witness that this is true." And all the people cried out in corroboration, "Baalak!" Amen.

Returning to Bandschermassing every one was filled with wonder to hear that the Dyaks in the south-east were asking for a religion, as they had none themselves, and would not embrace Islamism. The Malays in the city, moreover, assembled themselves for the reading of the New Testament. In 1836, the mission was strengthened by the arrival of three new Rhenish missionaries, who all had cause to be rejoiced at the success of their labors. Some Dyaks went in troops to a Chinese temple, where one of them destroyed, with repeated blows, an idol erected there, with the words, "These gods must perish." They demolished the heathen temples and schools. The Chinese and Dyaks were won over. A chief of the latter expressed his sentiments in these words, "This writing has touched my heart. It has taken possession of it." Stations were established at Palingkau, Sungei Bintang, Gohong, Mentangei, and Patey. Many Dyaks were freed from slavery by the efforts of the missionaries; and every missionary has a little household gathered around him, consisting of liberated debtors, who had fallen so deeply in debt that they had pledged life and limb to their creditors, and had become their property. The following table shows the present condition of the mission:

STATIONS.	Commenced.	Population.	Baptized from the beginning.	Communicants at the present time.

AMERICAN BOARD.—The first missionaries of the Board to Borneo were Rev. Messrs. Elihu Doty, Elbert Nevius, and William Youngblood, with their wives, and Miss Azuba C. Condit, teacher. Mr. Doty arrived at Sambas, June 17, 1839; and Mr. Youngblood arrived at Pontianak about the end of the following November. Mr. Nevius reached Pontianak at a little later period. Sambas is on a river of that name, in the western part of the island, described as a "noble stream, in width nearly a mile, and in depth sufficient for vessels of large burden. Its borders are skirted with an unbroken jungle and forest, without the appearance of a single habitation or trace of human culture to enliven the scene." The Sambas river afforded facilities for reaching the scattered Dyak population, but besides this the place held out no strong inducements for a permanent location. Pontianak, in the west part of the island, further south, was regarded as a more desirable station, having a larger population than any other place on the coast, and being the entrance point, by a navigable river, to large settlements of Chinese and Dyaks in the interior.

The Dyaks, as seen at home, are described as mild and gentle, and given to hospitality. They will beg, but will rarely steal, though clothes and other articles be ever so much exposed. But when they exchange their domestic habits for those of the warrior, their greatest delight seems to be to revel in blood, and their greatest honor to ornament their dwellings with human heads, which are the trophies of their inhuman barbarity. Mr. Doty, in a tour through that part of the province of which Sambas is the seat of government, distributed 600 tracts and volumes, including several copies of the New Testament, and found that many thousand volumes might be distributed during such a tour.

Until the arrival of the missionaries, the inhabitants of western Borneo had been, in a religious point of view, almost wholly unknown. They found there, as in many other parts of the Archipelago, a variety of races, the principal of which were the Chinese, Arabs, Malays, and Bugies, all of foreign origin; and the Dyaks, who were believed to be the aboriginal race. The Malays, Arabs, and Bugies, were found to be all Mohammedans. The chief difficulties of prosecuting missionary labor among these people were, the variety of languages, the interference of petty chiefs and priests, the levity and ignorance of the people, and especially the difficulty of reaching the inhabitants, whose houses were generally built upon posts, on the banks of the river; or on rafts or logs, which rose and fell with the water, and were accessible only by boats.

The report of the Board for 1842 mentions the removal of Mr. Nevius to Singapore, on account of ill-health, and the arrival of Rev. Messrs. Thomson and Pohlman. The mission was now concentrated chiefly in the district of Pontianak, where a Malay school of about 15 scholars, half girls, was established, and a regular preaching service maintained in Chinese and Malay.

But the mission was exceedingly annoyed and embarrassed by the Dutch government in Netherlands India. The missionaries were required to spend their first year at Batavia, in the island of Java, which was regarded by the Board as "unreasonable and of no good tendency;" and even on reaching Borneo their labors would be restricted to the sea-coast. None but native Dutch missionaries were allowed to penetrate the interior of the island, and to obtain such was difficult. In this state of things the Board, in connection with the missionary Board of the Reformed Dutch Church, sent an agent, Rev. Isaac Ferris, D.D., to the government at Holland, with a view, if possible, to get these restrictions removed. The agent was kindly received, but was informed that the exclusion of all foreigners from the interior of their possessions in the Indian Archipelago, was a principle of settled state policy, and that so far as the civil policy of the government was concerned, the members of the Reformed Dutch Church and the missionaries from the same must be regarded as foreigners. Dr. Ferris was, however, assured by the minister for the colonies, that all proper means should be taken for bringing their government to the adoption of a more liberal policy.

The report of Dr. Ferris, on his return, rather encouraged the Board to continue its labors in Borneo, and a mission was commenced among the Dyaks, at Karangan, about eight miles south of Landak, and 140 from Pontianak. Messrs. Youngblood and Thomson took charge of this mission in September, 1842, and erected a house on the banks of the Karangan. In their journal of this year they make the following interesting statements respecting the Dyak people, concerning whom so little had been previously known:

"We are fully satisfied that there is nothing to prevent us from settling, with our families, immediately in the midst of these interesting people, and teaching them without reserve the principles of the doctrine of Christ. They are mild, inoffensive, and docile in their dispositions. In our opinion there would be no more danger from them, in ordinary times, than from the most civilized people in the world. They almost universally expressed the utmost willingness, if not strongest desire, to receive teachers; and some at least of their rulers professed to entertain the same feelings. As to the country, we hope it will appear from the journal to be such as no one need disdain to inhabit."

In the spring of 1844 Messrs. Doty and Pohlman removed to China, leaving Pontianak without a missionary. Mr. Youngblood subsequently removed to that place, leaving Messrs. Thomson and Steele at Karangan. Mrs. Thomson died in December of this year, soon after following a daughter to the grave. The brethren at Karangan say at this period, "These are truly small things, but instead of faint-heartedness that we see no greater results, we ask you to join us in most fervent praise to God for the changes we have witnessed, and that each day brings advancement." Alluding to their school they say: "We cannot paint to you the intelligence and the affectionate confidence of these little ones, their delight in obtaining new and elevating ideas, their unselfish rivalry for an approving word or smile from the teacher they have learnt to love. The number of boys has seldom been more than seven; the number of girls has been larger, and they have received instruction in needlework and vocal music, in addition to the lessons in spelling, reading, and writing."

A very discouraging feature in the condition of the Dyaks, was found to be their degrading subjection to the Malays. It is described as "a despotism the most absolute, and yet the most irrational perhaps ever invented." Hence the Dyaks were unspeakably and increasingly wretched, and without any stimulus to rise or to attempt the improvement of their condition. Their ignorance was profound, especially on subjects connected with the soul and a future world, and, in their journal of 1845, the missionaries "could see no signs of moral improvement."

In 1847 Mr. Thomson and Mr. Youngblood, were both compelled to seek the restoration of their health by a cessation of labor, and a temporary absence from Borneo. They sailed for Singapore, at which place Mr. Thomson was seized with hemorrhage of the lungs; but after a little delay he proceeded to Geneva, and thence to Berne, at which place he died. Mr. Youngblood returned to Borneo with his wife, but in such feeble health as to forbid the expectation of their long continuance on the island. Mr. Steele was also in feeble health, and in 1849 he returned to the United States. Both he and Mr. Youngblood had intended to resume their labors, and earnestly desired to do so, but neither of them were able to return; and neither did the Reformed Dutch Church find any ministers willing to enter into this field, and it was left without a missionary. In their report for 1852 the Prudential Committee say:—"It is indeed a hard ground to cultivate, though not more so than some others where success has at length come. The committee cannot believe that the missionary labors and sacrifices that have been expended on Borneo will be in vain. The existence, character, necessities, and claims of a large heathen people in that great island, have been kept a long time before the attention of our American churches, and the seed thus sown may one day result in a rich harvest."

Since the above date, no laborers have been sent to Borneo, and it remains to be seen whether that mission will be resumed.

6. CELEBES.—This name was given by the Portuguese to the fourth great Sunda island, called by the natives Nigre-Orang-Bugies, country of the Bugies people, a lofty island, with four far-stretching peninsulas, whose natural beauties are as striking as those in Java. The three millions of inhabitants are divided into Bugies and Macassars. The former are the most cultivated islanders of this Archipelago; they are found in all the harbors of these seas; they are also the most formidable pirates. The latter are a coarse and clumsy race of men, who inhabit the west of the island. Both are at present strict Mussulmans, and are subject to sultans, who, however, are very dependent on the lesser rajabs. Originally they were pagans; but, in 1512, their king having resolved to embrace another religion, invited to his capital two Mollahs and two Jesuits. The Mollahs arrived first; and soon was Mohammedanism imposed upon the inhabitants, especially in the kingdom of Bonee. About the year 1656, the Dutch landed in the island of Bootong, in hostility against the Macassars, and, since 1677, the Macassars and Bugies have remained subject to the Dutch, notwithstanding they have made, from time to time, the most savage insurrections, to throw off the yoke of their masters.

Netherlands Missionary Society.—In the north of Celebes, in the 18th century, a large number of natives who had not embraced Islamism, were baptized by a native of Holland. After long neglect, the mission work was renewed here by the Netherlands Society. Three missionaries went from Amboyna to Menado, who were followed in 1822 by Müller, and in 1825 to 1839, by Hillendoorn. They found that many, of all classes, wished for baptism; among these the chief, Tondano. In Amurang the church numbers 1,000 souls, and the schools 115 scholars. A church of 550 was gathered at Tanowanka. At Menado, 260 heathen were baptized in one year. In consequence of these successes, Midel and Schwartz were sent by the society as co-laborers, who endeavored to introduce the Malay into the schools, as a common medium of communication. The number of Christians, old and new, in Manahasse, amounted in 1832 to 5,000, with 20 schools, which latter number is now increased to 56. The creed learned by the school-children in Malay, was the means of converting many heathen. People who had passed their years in reckless debauchery, cheerfully begun to lead orderly and Christian lives. An aged priest, who, by his craftiness, had led whole villages astray, besought his people to embrace Christianity, which had brought rest to his own soul. The chief seats of the Christian communities in Celebes, are at Menado, Kema, Tondano, Langowang, Tomohon, and Amurang. In Langowang, Schwartz, after 11 years of hard labor, saw the first fruits of his faithfulness, in the baptism of 30 persons. Since 1837, the mission has had a printing-press, in order to print school-books and tracts. In Macassar, also, in the south, there is a preacher of the Gospel.

On the neighboring island of Bonoa, he found Christians, who had so far backslidden as to engage with the heathen in the practice of cutting off the heads of human victims. On other islands, he was compelled to silence by laughter and derision. In Ternate, where Jungmichel was stationed, there were, in 1819, 700 Christians in a population of 5000. Since 1821 he has paid frequent visits to the Sangeer islands, where Christianity appears to be at a low ebb.

The Society has in this island eight stations. The station at Tondano has one missionary, Mr. Riedel, who baptized * in the year 1847, 356 adults and 270 children, all natives. In 1848 he baptized 440 adults and 223 children. In 16 schools in his district he had 768 boys and 514 girls. In 1849 he succeeded in building a chapel and school-house, by the assistance and contributions of the native Christians.

At the Langowang station the missionary is Mr. Schwartz, who baptized, in 1848, 958 adults and 382 children, and numbered in the 15 schools under his charge 1182 boys and 423 girls. In February 1849, he wrote—"In nearly every one of the 26 villages in my district, a desire for instruction in Christianity manifests itself with young and old, so that I and my assistant and the schoolmasters are hardly able to satisfy all their wishes. The number of Christians on my list at the close of 1848, was 2951, and those who attended preaching in my seven congregations on the Sabbath numbered 1500.

At Amurung Mr. Herrmann baptized, in 1847, 195 adults and 57 children; and in the following year 321 adults and 177 children. He had 23 schools, with 1261 boys and 661 girls, and eight places of public worship, to which he devoted more or less attention. In February, 1849, he wrote—"My present sphere of labor includes 75 very far scattered villages, with 23,000 souls. I usually preach on Sundays at two different places, in the Alfoor language.

Tomakon is another station, where Mr. Wilken has several congregations, and 16 schools, containing 1415 boys and 242 girls.

Menado, a principal town, on the northern extremity of the island, enjoys the labors of a faithful missionary, who has charge of Dutch and Malay congregations, and also of five schools, attended by 230 boys and 130 girls.

Tanavangho was occupied in 1849 by Mr. Bossert, who found there more than 500 nominal Christians, but who were very far from the real life of God. But he says, "Besides Tanavangho I have seven other villages committed to my charge, one of which gives me very much hope: it is Tately, where there is a very good school and a good teacher. Some 30 or 40 have received baptism, and as many more who are receiving instruction desire baptism."

Kema is a new station, where the missionary in 1848 baptized 299 adults and 83 children. His 12 schools contain 747 boys and 107 girls.

The station at Koomelemboy was recently commenced by Mr. Ulfers, who describes that part of the island as "most picturesque, hilly, woody, and abounding with springs of excellent water." He lives there, in the centre of a missionary circuit, comprising 25 villages, with about 9,000 inhabitants, all living on high mountains or in deep valleys. He has 9 schools under his care.

7. THE MOLUCCAS.—In a wider sense, all the islands situated between New Guinea and Celebes are termed the Moluccas, or Spico Islands; and thus there belong to them—1. the Timor Islands in the south, Timor, Rotty, Simao, Dao, and others. 2. The Banda Islands, which next form a group of ten small isles, about which, in an extensive bend, are situated to the south-west the islands of Wetter, Roma, Kissor, Letty, Damm, Moa, and others; and to the south-east, Timorlaut, with its surrounding isles; and eastward, as far as towards New Guinea, the Aroo Islands. 3. The Amboyna Islands, Amboyna, Ceram, Booro, and others. 4. The proper Moluccas, or Ternatas, with the islands Jilolo, Morty, Ternate, Tidor, Moteer, Machian, Bachian, and others. Lastly. 5. The Sangeer Islands, which form the chain of passage to the north Philippine Islands. All these islands, together, are splendidly adorned and gifted, and are particularly rich in spices of every kind; many of them, also, have active volcanos. But the intercourse of their population with civilized countries, is considerably less than in the rest of this vast Archipelago, and they seldom see a European vessel. The natives consist partly of untractable and proud Malays, and partly of savage aborigines, called Alfoors, or Papoos, governed by their own rajahs. In the year 1521, the Portuguese took possession of these islands. Mohammedanism had been forced upon the latter hardly forty years before. The chief Portuguese settlement was in Ternate; but their cruelty and barbarity made them to be so hated by the natives, that these oppressed people at length threw themselves into the arms of the Hollanders, who, in 1617, first expelled the Portuguese from Amboyna, and then extended their conquests farther and farther.

Another sphere of missionary labor has been formed in and around the island of Timor, whither the Dutch missionary Lebrun came, in 1819. He settled at Cupang, the seat of the Dutch government, on the south coast of Timor. The north coast about Dilly belongs to the Portuguese. For twenty years there had been no Christian minister among the na tives there, who profess Christianity. With so much the greater eagerness did they now crowd to the missionary's preaching; and in the very first year, ninety pagans were admitted to the church, which already consisted of 3,000 professed Christians. Moreover, the rajah of Rotty submitted himself to Christ crucified; and, in 1823, Lebrun baptized in Little Timor, Kissor, Letty, and Moa, four hundred and ninety-six persons. The Friendly Society which he established, was subscribed to even by some of the pagan princes. He everywhere formed schools, and to the remote churches he addressed pastoral letters, after the manner of the apostles, of the good effect of which there are very pleasing testimonies. A few years before his death, which took place in 1829, eight missionaries more arrived, who distributed themselves among various stations, and made it one part of their business to establish more fundamentally in Christianity the churches and congregations that had been gained to it. The islands of Timor, Babaw, and Rotty, as also Kissor, Letty, Moa, Roma, Wetter, and others, are places where they are continually visiting and laboring. Their work, indeed, is often exceedingly harassing and fatiguing; and though the missionary Bär, of Basle, who, in 1825, was stationed in Kissor, and at present in Amboyna, was soon enabled to baptize 1,500 of the 5,000 inhabitants, yet he has to this day, amidst his unspeakably troublesome and wearisome occupations, had one of the most difficult of posts to maintain. But the persevering patience of the messenger of peace is never unaccompanied by some blessed benefit or other. In the proper Moluccas there is but little as yet done, except what, since 1819, the missionary Jungmichel has been effecting in Ternate. Since 1821, he has also periodically visited the Sangger islands, 150 miles north-west of Celebes; but has found only extremely ignorant Christians and bad schools at those places. In 1850 it was reported that the natives of Amboyna, being all nominal Christians, it was no longer regarded as a field for missionary labor. Harookoo, in the same neighborhood, is also inhabited by nominal Christians, over whose different congregations and schools a missionary, Mr. Luyke, is placed as pastor and overseer. Timor has two stations, viz.: Koo-pang and Babow, at which there are four missionaries, the two last having been sent out in 1849. They have in charge various congregations and schools, concerning which no recent reports have been made.

8. THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.—Of these islands, which contain about three millions of inhabitants, we shall say but little, as they are no theatre of Protestant missions. The famous circumnavigator, Magellan, began here his conversions with cannon-ball, in 1521. This he did, especially in the island of Zebou, where, after a cannonade, 800 Dyaks, or Al-foors, were immediately baptized. He, however, and his officers fell a sacrifice to this zeal, and Zebou fell away again from Christianity. The Spaniards and Portuguese soon contended for possession of these islands; and the former got the mastery. Zebou, in 1564, received a sanguinary chastisement for its apostasy; and as fast as the conquests proceeded, did the Romish religion everywhere take root, as Augustinian monks, Franciscans, and Dominicans, zealously prosecuted the work of their missions. W. Hoffman, in his "Geography," says: "Here is the paradise of the monks. Here vegetate one thousand monks, Augustinians, Dominicans, and Franciscans, in luxuriant and luxurious monasteries; four provincials command them; one thousand two hundred parishes are occupied by them. The temporal government, the instruction, and the whole activity of the inhabitants are all under their heavy hand. The pious idleness of their festivals and processions is excessive; the poorer, but without knowing it, are the native secular ecclesiastics in their three thousand parishes. The titular archbishop of Manila, who resides at Madrid, together with the bishops of New Segovia, Zebou, and New Caceres, are at the head of them."

9. THE ISLAND OF FORMOSA.—This island, which is also called Taiwan, is between the Philippines and the Chinese coast; and the greater part of it is subject to the emperor of China. Hither, in 1631, was sent by the Dutch government, the preacher Junius, who, with much labor acquired the language of the country, and at the period of his death had collected a Protestant church of five thousand nine hundred adults. But the light was soon extinguished, through perpetual wars with pirates, and the subsequent reduction of the island by the emperor of China; and probably at the present day scarcely a single trace of those fair beginnings can be found.

[The early history of the missions noticed in the foregoing article, has been taken from "A Manual of Christian Missions," by Rev. C. Barth, D.D., principal of the Basle Missionary Institution, and Wigger's History of Missions, in German. The later portions have been gathered from various sources.]

INFANTICIDE: The practice of destroying infants soon after their birth. That a practice so revolting to humanity should ever prevail, in any country, seems almost incredible. One characteristic of heathenism, however, as given by the Apostle Paul, is that of being "without natural affection;" and, although there are exceptions, yet, as a general rule, selfishness, in the heathen mind, rises above every other principle. And hence, in all ages, infanticide has been a prevalent custom of the heathen. It was a law of the ancient Spartans that only promising children should be reared. They were submitted to the examination of certain persons, and if weak or deformed, they were thrown into a cavern. The exposure of children was a practice commonly sanctioned by the ancients. Gimelli Careri states that, in the Philippine Islands, children born with imperfections, were put into a hollow cave, and buried alive. In the Sandwich Islands, it was estimated by the foreigners who went first among them, that two-thirds of the infants that were born, were destroyed by their own parents. The sickness or deformity of the child, or the trouble of taking care of it, was a sufficient excuse for its destruction. Mothers would cast their children into a hole dug in the earth, and covering them up, would trample upon them with their feet, and thus stifle their cries. The writer of this article has seen a native of the Sandwich Islands, who was buried alive by his mother, and rescued from the grave and reared by the missionaries. Some of the converted native women have confessed to the missionaries, with tears in their eyes, that they had killed all their children.

In the Georgian and Society Islands, infanticide prevailed to an incredible extent. It is stated by one of the missionaries, that on a certain occasion he inquired of three women who were sitting together, how many children they had destroyed. "One replied with a faltering voice, 'I have destroyed nine.' The second, with eyes suffused with tears, said, 'I have destroyed seven,'—and the third informed him she had destroyed five." To such an extent was this cruel and unnatural practice carried, that it is the opinion of the missionaries that two-thirds of the children were murdered by their own parents.

There are several tribes in India, in which the custom has long prevailed of destroying the female children. The British Government have exerted themselves to put an end to the practice, and to some extent have succeeded. Infanticide also prevails in China. A missionary was conversing with a Chinaman, who was away from home; and inquiring for his family, the man said he had three sons and one daughter; he had had another daughter, but "did not bring her up." "Not bring her up," said the missionary; "what did you do with her?" "I smothered her," he replied. When expostulated with for murdering his own child, he said, "It is very common in China. We put the female children out of the way, to save the trouble of bringing them up. Some people have smothered five or six daughters!"

Mr. Barrow computes, from authentic data, that not less than 9,000 children are exposed in the streets of Peking every year, and as many more in the provinces. He states that it is part of the duty of the police to carry away in carts, every morning, those that have been exposed at night, some of whom are yet alive; but they are all carried to a pit, without the walls, and buried promiscuously. Here the Roman Catholic missionaries attend, selecting the most lively for future proselytes and administering baptism to others before they die. The practice is connived at by the government.

The people in some parts of India, particularly in Orissa and the eastern part of Bengal, frequently offer their children to the goddess Gunga, by drowning them in the river. In the northern districts of Bengal, if an infant is sickly, it is hung up in a basket on the branch of a tree, to be destroyed by the ants or birds of prey. In Japan, mothers, on finding themselves too poor to bring up their children, do not scruple to suffocate them at the breast. In Greenland, where a mother died leaving an infant, the latter was buried with her. The South American women on the river Oronoko are said frequently to destroy their daughters, to save them the hardships and sufferings to which they are exposed. The Bushmen in Africa take no great care of their children. They kill them without remorse when they are ill-shaped, or when they are in want of food; and when obliged to fly from their enemies, they will cast them aside, strangle, smother, or bury them alive; and, to save themselves, they will throw them to the lions, which practice has greatly increased the desire of the lion for human flesh. In Madagascar, the fate of the infant depends on the calculation of lucky and unlucky days. If, judging from the time of birth, its destiny is concluded to be malevolent, it is put to death by suffocation. A poor woman called on a missionary, and acknowledged that four out of five of her children had been destroyed in this way. Where the destiny may possibly be averted, one plan adopted for the purpose is, to place the infant at the entrance of a cattle-fold, and then to drive in the cattle. If the child is not destroyed, its fate is declared to be averted; but, if trampled on and killed, the contrary is manifest. Infanticide has also prevailed among the North American Indians. From time immemorial, the Choctaws had considered it no crime, until they received Christianity. A young man would take a wife, and having no means of supporting her, would soon leave her. The woman, seeing herself deserted, would say, the child has no father to provide it a blanket; it had better be dead than alive. Sometimes the mother digs a grave and buries it alive, soon after it is born. Sometimes she puts it to death by stamping on it with her feet. But after the establishment of a mission among them, they passed a law against this crime.

We are amazed in contemplating the utter extinction of parental affection, which ages of heathenism has thus effected; but what shall be said of the worse than heathen, among the lower classes in England, who murder their own children for the sake of obtaining the burial fee from some mutual benefit society to which they belong! Human nature is the same every where, when unaffected by the Gospel; and even in a Christian land, those who treat it with utter contempt or neglect, often fall, if possible, even below the heathen.—Edinburgh Encyclopedia; Rees' Cyclopaedia; Pegg's Great Moral Evils in India; Narrative of Persecutions in Madagascar, p. 61; Dibble's Sandwich Islands; *Miss. IRISH PRESBYTERIAN MISSIONS: The General Assembly of the Irish Presbyterian Church maintain both Home and Foreign Missions. The former have been very successful among the Roman Catholics of Ireland. They have a Foreign Mission in Western India, with four stations. They have Jewish missions at Hamburg, Bonn, and Damascus, and colonial missions in British North America, Australia, Van Dieman's Land, and New Zealand. All these missions are prosecuted with energy and zeal.

JEWS, MISSIONS TO: Coeval with the establishment of Christian missions among the heathen, spring up in the church the spirit of missions to the Jews. The voice that, coming across the lapse of centuries, struck upon the ear and thrilled the heart of Christendom, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel," called attention to the moral condition and wants of God's ancient people, Israel, scattered among all nations. There was a feeling, that if the Gospel was to be preached among all nations, it ought, as in the apostles' days, to begin at Jerusalem. There was also a firm belief that "the Gospel was the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, to the Jew first;" and that God had not cast away this people from the covenant of redemption in a way that they could not be saved by grace, "for even at this present time also there was a remnant, according to the election of grace." Whatever may be the theories advanced by many, respecting the future of the Jewish people, it is a prophetic and providential fact that they have been kept distinct from all other nations from the time of the Abrahamic call to the present hour. During the former part of their history, they were distinguished as the people of God; during the latter part they have been distinguished as the special objects of Jehovah's indignation. In this respect, their relation to Christianity and all other forms of religion is peculiar. While all other tribes and nations, springing from whatever source, have come upon the stage of the world, passed through scenes of prosperity and adversity, socially and morally, having a common history and fate, the Jewish people remain always the same, both in religious and social adversity. They are alone, dwelling in the valley of weeping; a proverb among the nations with whom they sojourn, but to whom they never assimilate. As, in ancient days, in respect to the covenant of redemption, the whole world was divided into two classes, "Jews and Gentiles," so it is now, only the order of the relation is reversed. The "Ammi" are now the "Lo-ammi," and the "Lo-Ammi" are the "Ammi." Divine Providence has kept up the distinction, and an enlightened Christian consciousness always recognizes it.

In order to a comprehensive view of a work of Christian missions among the Jews, a brief review of the rise and progress, and decline of Christianity among them, is necessary. Christianity began at Jerusalem. The story that Jesus of Nazareth, on the cross expiating the sins of the people, was the long-promised Messiah of the fathers, kings, and prophets, contained the truth essential to their salvation. It was told and reported in their hearing. It lodged in their hearts, and pricked their consciences. The Spirit was poured out from on high, and brought them to embrace the truth. On the day of Pentecost, three thousand were converted. A few days after, five thousand more were converted. The work thus begun continued until the converts were numbered by multitudes of men and women, and great companies of priests. The apostles to the circumcision were as successful in preaching and making proselytes to Christianity throughout the world, as were the apostles to the uncircumcision. There was no difference during the first century. The leaders and teachers of the early church never supposed that Jews were not as hopeful subjects of grace as Gentiles, notwithstanding the "judicial curse of blindness" was resting upon them. In every province of the Roman empire, and in all known countries out of the empire, Jewish Christian churches were established. At the close of the second century, there were no less than forty-four Jewish Christian congregations at Rome. The third century witnessed the triumph of nominal Christianity over the territory of the Roman empire. The state espoused the church, and promised to be her protector and defender. The Roman government, after subduing the adjacent states and kingdoms, reduced them to provinces, and caused them, by the extension of its laws, manners, and customs, to assimilate to the empire. The Jewish people alone remained unaffected. In the midst of the Roman empire, they continued to be a distinct people, and bitter despisers of both church and state. The state, now a Christian government, attempted to exterminate this obstinate enemy by force of arms; while the church, sympathizing with her liege lord, imitated his example by excluding the Jews from the spiritual mercies and graces of Christianity. Every effort at length was abandoned to evangelize the Jews. The council of Elvira forbade all familiar intercourse with the Jews by Christians, under pain of excommunication from the church.

Finally, a decree was passed, forbidding a Jew to enter a Christian church. Thus, as through corruption, Christianity ceased to be propagated among the heathen, so, by wicked decrees, it was not allowed to be extended to the Jews. But, happily, the age of Christian missions to the unevangelized came. The Jews were not altogether forgotten.

The spirit of Jewish missions first manifested itself in the national Synod of the Low-countries. The subject engaged the serious attention of the synods of Dordrecht, Delft, and Leyden, which were held 1676, '7, and '8. The founders of these synods devised a scheme for promoting the conversion of the Jews in their own country. Many Israelites and among them some distinguished scholars, embraced Christianity. From this date conversions among the Jews were frequent. To promote the work societies were formed by interested Christians. In 1728 the Callenburg Institution was established at Halle, which had for its chief object the conversion of the Jews, by means of tracts, Hebrew Scriptures, and missionaries. The Moravian brethren, about the year 1764, had their attention turned to the spiritual welfare of the Jews. Some of their most distinguished men, for example, Leonard Dober, Count Zinzendorf, and David Kirckhoff, did all in their power to further this object. In 1736, 400 Jews were admitted into the evangelical church at Darmstadt. In 1739, 100 Jews embraced the Gospel in the Grand Duchy of Hesse. The infidel revolution in Europe in 1789 put an end to all like efforts to evangelize the Jews. After these brief notices we arrive at the period of modern missions to the Jews.

Numbers of the Jews.—In exact fulfilment of the Scriptures the Jews are sojourners among all nations. And so little is known respecting them, in many countries, that no reliable estimate can be obtained of their numbers. The Jewish population of the whole world, as far as it is known with approximate certainty, is 14,000,000. They are distributed as follows:

In the Mohammedan countries in Europe, Asia, and Africa . . .	3,000,000
China	60,000
Russian Empire	1,200,000
Poland	1,000,000
Prussia Proper	150,000
Austria	453,000
German States	138,000
Holland	66,000
France	81,000
Italy	200,000
England	30,000
Ionian Isles	7,000
Danish States	15,000
Sweden	1,700
Switzerland	1,900
Gibraltar	4,000
Rhenish Provinces	250,000
Gallicia	200,000

West Indies	13,500
North and South America . . .	200,000

Add to the above the Beni-Israel among the Hindoos, found in the year 1822, and reported by the agent of the London Jews Society, Mr. Largon, about . . . 6,928,900

Whole number 14,000,000

The Jews that are accessible to missionary operations are distributed as follows:—Great Britain, 30,000; France, 81,000; Italy, 200,000; Austria, 453,000; the Rhenish Provinces, 250,000; Silesia, 50,000; East and West Prussia, 26,000; Prussia Proper, 150,000; Danish States, 15,000; Poland, 1,000,000; Holland, 66,000; Palestine, 19,000; Bagdad, 100,000; Smyrna, 15,000; Salonica, 35,000; Russia, 1,000,000; United States, 100,000; miscellaneous, 1,000,000. In all about 5,000,000.

Present Social State.—The social state of the Jews has not changed since their dispersion. The same feeling in the various governments where they sojourn, that excluded them from civil privileges during the sway of the Roman Empire, still exists in the old world, excluding them from any participation in political matters not only, but depriving them of many privileges enjoyed by all others. In Russia, Turkey, Austria, Italy, and Switzerland, they are not at all regarded as citizens, but as aliens that are to be rigidly watched, and that may be at any time sacrificed, personally or pecuniarily, for the benefit of those governments. The Russians draft their young men at an earlier age and in a larger proportion to their numbers, than their own legitimate subjects, and make it a crime worthy of death for them to leave the country. Austria, when it suits her purposes, extorts enormous taxes from them, oftentimes reducing them to the stages of utter destitution. Rome confines them to filthy and almost uninhabitable quarters, locks them in at nightfall, and inflicts death upon any one of them that ventures to mingle with Romans. Switzerland has but lately banished them from her cantons. Among the Turks it is no crime to kill a Jew. In Prussia, France, and England, although as Jews they cannot participate in the first offices of these governments, still by the force of their genius, and the power of their money, one may occasionally rise to political distinction. In England, the most liberal and lenient government in Europe towards them, a controversy has been for many years pending upon the propriety and constitutionality of admitting Jews elect to seats in parliament. In no country of Europe have the Jews been emancipated from the political thralldom into which they were thrown by the Roman power. In Asia, they generally live in exclusion and have no desire to be received as citizens. In the United States there are presented no barriers to their political aspirations, and the consequence is many Jewish names are found on the rolls of both the upper and lower houses of Congress. Also in some of the free governments of the West India islands Jews have a prominent voice in their legislative bodies. The principal occupation of the Jews is trade and traffic. From their political relation to the governments, their condition is made one of instability and change. They do not become agriculturists, nor deal largely in real estate. Having no government to protect them, they have endeavored to secure that which forms a very good substitute, viz., money. Their investments are made in banks and in public or government stocks. So that, whenever the decree goes forth for them to seek a new home, their possessions are immediately, as by magic, turned to gold to accompany and solace them on their pilgrimage.

Intellectual Position.—The intellectual position of the Jews ranks high. They are the great thinkers for the masses of Europe.

The following eloquent passage, from a discourse on the "Present Relation of Israel to the World," may serve to meet all historic demands in a sketch like this: "The European continental press is mainly in Jewish hands; every department of periodical literature swarms with Jewish laborers. The newspaper press is under their control, and the correspondence is mainly conducted by them. Taking a step higher, there we find them again. We ask for knowledge of the mysteries of the starry heavens, and the children of Israel become our instructors. The Herschels and the Aragos are the leaders of that lofty band of celestial travelers that journey among the stars. We cry for light upon the mysteries of revelation, and the children of Israel open the pearly gates of day, and light flows around us. Jahn, Hengstenberg, Tholuck, Krummacher, and a host of others, furnish us with biblical criticism, didactic theology, and general sacred literature. We ask for a key to unlock a dialect of Moses and the prophets, and a Hebrew takes one from his drawer. Gesenius gives us our lexicon, and Nordheimer our grammar. We would have the dark chasm in early Church History filled up, and a bridge thrown across it, in order that we may pass safely from inspired to uninspired history; the children of Israel furnish the materials and cover the chasm. Neander furnishes us with our incomparable Christian Church History, and Da Costa with a history of the Jews. What need I add more? These facts show that the Hebrew intellect is exerting a powerful influence upon the secular and sacred literature of the age."

Religious Condition.—The religious condition of the Jews may be viewed in relation to Judaism and Christianity. In their relation to Judaism they may be divided into four classes:

1. A considerable number of the older Jews are strict Talmudists. They are so, however, less from conviction than because they perceive the necessary consequences of deserting the old foundations. The link which binds them to Talmudism is purely of a negative character. They adhere to it not from love to that system, but from dread of a worse. If they leave traditional ground, they know of no evidence strong enough to arrest them on this side of infidelity. Their state, therefore, may be summed up in this aphorism, that something is better than nothing, and authority is better than no ground at all.

2. A second class of Jews having thrown off the Talmud, endeavor, perhaps vainly, yet earnestly, to find a resting-place in the Old Testament. Having left their old moorings, they endeavor to let down their anchor there; and, if it fixed, nothing would please them more. But, missing the right interpretation of the Old Testament, they can get no sure bottom. They are thus driven along, whether they will or not, by the spirit of the times.

3. A third class, far more numerous than the other two, whose reverence for authority being entirely destroyed, have thrown off the Talmud, and whose moral sense having become darkened and debased, have cast off the Old Testament too. The link which binds the first class to the Talmud, and that which attaches the heart of the second to the Bible, being broken, they have sunk down into avowed infidelity. It is to be observed, however, that all who may be reckoned fairly among this class do not occupy exactly the same position. With many, their infidelity is a mere negation. Their understandings being emancipated, they can receive nothing without evidence; their hearts being callous, they do not inquire after it. Still, if it were presented, they would be open to conviction. Another party, and it is one which is daily increasing, places itself in the position of direct and active antagonism. They would gladly banish all systems of belief out of the world. They regard them all alike as imposing fetters on the understanding, and an unnecessary restraint on the inclinations of the heart. They are, for the most part, proud, high-minded, neither reverencing God, nor regarding man.

4. A fourth class is found a stage lower down than all the preceding ones. The last mentioned, though having given up all idea of revelation, stand at least on deistical ground. But this goes further, and treads the dreary wastes of pantheism. Of course, in dealing with such, one must take up a question antecedent even to the inspiration of Scripture, viz., the existence and personality of Him whose revelation it professes to be. It is difficult to compute the number belonging to this class. There is reason to believe that it is already large; and, without any doubt, it is continually receiving new accessions.

In their relation to Christianity, they may be divided into three classes :

1. A very large proportion of the Jews view Christianity in the aspect of the double apostasy of Popery and infidelity, or Rationalism. They see in the one an idolatrous worship ; in the other, a denial of its very being. There is something abhorrent to their mind in the former, and nothing attractive to it in the latter. A Christianity that presents itself as a mitigated form of heathen idolatry, can never win the regards of a Jew ; nor can it be expected that a Christianity which requires to be pared and pruned of its chief doctrines by its own supporters, should gain his confidence or engage his affections. So far, therefore, as Christianity is identified in his mind with either of these apostate systems, it is necessarily rejected by him. He regards it either as a veil thrown over the grosser features of heathenism, or as a thin partition wall, employed for a season to conceal the infidelity of the heart, till circumstances permit its removal and the free profession of the inward sentiments. Popery has been so long and so widely prevalent, and infidelity has acquired in recent times so fearful an ascendancy, that we need not wonder if most of the notions floating about in Jewish society regarding Christianity, have been drawn from the one or the other of these two sources. The natural effect is the formation of the large class of which I now speak, who, whatever they may think of their own position, consider that of Christians as equally, if not more untenable. They are not animated, however, with any special hatred of Christianity, nor do they show themselves actively hostile.

2. A second class, who have come into closer contact with the Christian system, or with true Christians, exhibits a difference of sentiment, corresponding to the difference of their situation. Their views are very indistinct, nor do they know well what passes in their own minds. The idea, however, seems to have started in many of them that possibly in Christianity is to be found the solution of their own difficulties, and that Christianity is the terminating point of the present movement. Those who shrink back with horror from the thought of infidelity, feel the necessity of some form of positive belief to rest upon. To return to the Talmud is out of the question. The Old Testament, if they reject the Christian interpretation, is also untenable. Christianity, therefore, presents itself as the only and last refuge.

3. The third and last party to be mentioned entertain very different feelings towards Christianity from the other two. They manifest towards it the greatest hostility, and persecute it with the utmost rancor. The chief weapon which they can at present command is the tongue ; but the venom with which they poison its arrows shows sufficiently the disposition of their hearts, and what they would be inclined to do if they had more power. They regard Christianity, whether as a system or as embodied in the persons of its professors, as their natural enemy. They consider it as the one great obstacle to the leveling process which they are attempting to carry out in society. They declare they will not rest till it is rooted out of the earth.

Reasons for distinct Missions to the Jews.—

The reasons for establishing distinct missions to the Jews are various, and upon examination they will be found to be the same in some respects now that were acted upon by the apostles. (1) As they were Israelites then to whom pertained the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises ; so are they now. (2) They are a separate people, and those among whom they dwell would have no more relation to them than though they did not exist. (3) As in our Saviour's times it was necessary to begin at Moses and all the prophets, and expound unto them in the Scriptures the things concerning Christ, so it is now. In order to this, the missionary must not only be thoroughly versed in the Hebrew Scriptures, but in Rabbinical literature in all its departments. Having proved that the Messiah of the ancient Scriptures is Jesus of Nazareth, the way opens for preaching repentance and faith. (4) There were, at the time of the establishment of modern missions among the Jews, no adequate means or agencies for meeting the religious wants of the Jews. There was also a very prevalent sentiment that all efforts made for their conversion would prove abortive ; and hence, on this ground, if no other, the church declined to entertain the subject of Jewish missions, and did not deem it expedient to project any measures for a work of the kind. For these and like reasons, separate missions to the Jews were needed and established.

The London Society for promoting Christianity among the Jews.—This Society was formally organized in the year 1809. The "object of the Society was to relieve the temporal distress of the Jews, as well as to promote their spiritual welfare." The fundamental principle on which it was founded, was by means of temporal relief to gain access to the poor. In order to furnish employment to converts, a printing-press was established in 1811, which yet continues in operation. The Episcopal Jews' chapel for Christian worship, and schools, were opened in 1813. Up to this time there had been made 79 proselytes from among the Jews in London. In the year 1818, the first foreign missionary to the Jews was sent abroad to Poland—an enterprise that has been eminently successful from the first. In contemplating the wants of the field, this Society was convinced that little could be done towards the conversion of the Jews without missionaries and editions of the Bible and other books adapted to their religious state. Accordingly, in 1821, a seminary for the instruction of missionaries to the Jews was opened, and shortly afterwards an edition of the Hebrew Scriptures was published. Subsequently, the Scriptures were issued in Judeo-Polish for the Polish Jews, and in Syriac for the Chasidim and Cabalistic Jews. In 1840, the Hebrew College was established for the instruction of missionary candidates in the branches of learning requisite to promote the efficiency of their missions. From this college have gone forth many converted Israelites as missionaries, not only in connection with the London Society, but also other societies.

This Society has at the present time 31 mission stations in Holland, Frankfort-on-the-Maine, Poland, Jerusalem, Pozen, Rhine District, Strasburg, France, Konigsburg, Danzig, Smyrna, North Africa, London, Berlin, Prussia, Constantipole, Safet, Beyrût, Sweden, Bagdad, Bucharest, Salonica, Breslau, Jassy, Adrianople. The number of missionaries is 78. Of this number, 59 are converted Israelites. Since the year 1820, there have been distributed among the Jews by the agents and missionaries of this Society—Hebrew Old Testament copies, 61,620; Hebrew portions of Old Testament, 167,034; Hebrew New Testaments, 55,745; Hebrew prayers of the Church of England, 4,471; tracts and publications of diverse languages, 1,039,665. The Society has 20 schools, in which there have been taught since the year 1827, children of Hebrew parentage, 9,244. Since the Society's organization, there have been ordained under its auspices, 50 clergymen who were converted Israelites, the majority of whom are now laboring as stated pastors over Christian congregations. It is almost impossible to state with approximate certainty the number of conversions that have been made in connection with this Society. The Society avows its object to be not to baptize Jews, but to promote Christianity among them; and hence a return of baptisms can form no criterion of the number really converted, for the Jews are generally but temporary residents in the towns where they receive instruction, while only a small proportion of those instructed by the missionary are baptized by him, and the vast majority of the proselytes connect themselves with the Christian Church, unreported by the missionary. The following is the most authentic estimate we have seen of converts through missionary efforts. In Germany, during the last 20 years, 5,000; Russia, 3,000; London, 2,000; in other countries of Europe, 1,500; making, through the operations of the London Society, either directly or indirectly, 11,500. It should be remembered here, for the benefit of certain classes of American readers, that the London Society has always been composed of the evangelical strength of the Church of England. There are found among its principal managers the following names: Burgess, Ryder, Wilberforce, Simeon, Basil Wood, Saunders, Hawtrey, Way, Marsh, Grimshawe, Bickersteth, Stewart, Cunningham, McCaul, McNeile. Consequently the missionaries of the Society have been selected generally with a strict regard to their evangelical views and piety. The manner of conducting the work of missions may be seen by the following extract. Speaking of Poland, where there are two millions of Jews of the most orthodox stamp, a writer says: "A great work was thus begun in Poland in 1821. Public preaching, private discussions, daily conversation respecting the character and coming of the Messiah, and the fulfilment of the prophecies in him; the circulation of the Hebrew Scriptures, and the Scriptures in the Judeo-Polish dialect. All these means are owned and blessed of God among the numerous descendants of Abraham in that country." Again, "A great extent of the kingdom of Poland has been traversed every year, and the sound of the Gospel has penetrated into almost every nook and corner of the land, and the seed thus sown has taken root in the hearts of many Israelites." The annual income of this Society is about $150,000.

The London Society is by priority of existence, and in the magnitude of its operations, the leading Jewish mission society of Christendom. It takes rank among the great missionary enterprises of the day among the heathen, and is equally successful under the influence of the Divine Spirit in bringing souls to Christ.

The British Society for the Propagation of the Gospel among the Jews.—This Society is located in London and is mainly composed of the various denominations of dissenting churches in England, and supported by them. It was founded in 1842. Its object is to propagate the Gospel among the Jews by means of missionaries and colporteurs, who are directed to preach, teach, and visit the Jews, and distribute Bibles, books, and tracts among them. Its first endeavors were among the Jews resident in Great Britain, with a population of 30,000. Subsequently it extended its operations to foreign parts. The society has now in its employ 24 missionaries, mostly converted Jews, located in the following places, besides the different localities in England, at Tunis, in Northern Africa, at Gibraltar, at one of the gates of the Holy Land, at Frankfort, in Paris, in Lyons, in Wurtemberg, and in Breslau. It supports one female agent, who has under her charge 60 Jewesses, whom she instructs in the Sacred Scriptures. For about seven years the society sustained a Hebrew Mission College, to prepare young men for the missionary work among the Jews. Eleven of the graduates, converted Jews, are now missionaries of the society, while others have become missionaries of other societies.

The number of converts made through the operations of the society is 100. Its annual income is about $20,000, the larger proportion of which is the fruit of female piety and devotedness.

Missions to the Jews of the Free Church of Scotland, and other Presbyterian bodies in Great Britain.—The mission to the Jews of the Free Church of Scotland is not conducted by a voluntary society, but is one of the departments of the general missionary work in which that church is engaged. It was originated before the division took place in the Church of Scotland. A deputation was sent to the East to make inquiry into the religious condition of the Jews, in 1839. The result was the establishment of Jewish Missions at Pesth, Hungary, and Jassy Moldavia. In 1841 the Presbyterian church in the north of Ireland established a mission at Damascus, and about the same time the English Presbyterian Synod located one at Oorfu. At the time of the memorable disruption, it was found that those clergymen that left the established church were the friends of Jewish missions, whose majority was so large that the missions already established easily passed over into the hands of the Free Church.

About this time, a great revival among the Jews took place at Pesth. Hundreds, and many Jews of distinction, were converted to Christianity. This mission was interrupted by the revolution in Hungary, and nearly annihilated by the despotic decrees of the Austrian government. The established missionary stations and number of missionaries are as follows: Pesth, a teacher and a school of 300 scholars; Breslau, one missionary and wife aided by Jewish converts. Constantinople, three male and three female missionaries, one female teacher, a colporteur, and four Jewish teachers, in all eleven laborers. Amsterdam, two missionaries, four teachers in the college, with 16 scholars. The number of converts is not known. The income of the church devoted to this branch of missionary labor was in 1854 about $36,000.

The Scottish Society for the Conversion of Israel.—This society is composed of different denominations. It was organized in 1845. Mission stations were established at Hamburg, Altona, and Algiers. The number of missionaries is two. A number of Jews have been converted.

Besides these general efforts, many local societies have, from time to time, been instituted on the Continent of Europe, for the conversion of the Jews.

AMERICAN MISSIONS TO THE JEWS.—The attention of American Christians has also been attracted to the Jews, and many efforts have been put forth with varied success. In 1832, Rev. W. J. Schauffler settled in Constantinople. He had been preceded by Dr. Wolfe; but little or nothing was accomplished by him. Mr. Schauffler labored alone, with extremely limited means. His efforts were mainly devoted to the preparation of an edition of the Scriptures (O.T.) in Hebrew-Spanish, and Hebrew. In this he was aided by the American Bible Society. He also published an edition of the Psalms, and two editions of the Pentateuch, in the same language. These publications he distributed among the Jews. He is now engaged in printing, under the auspices of the A. B. C. F. M., a Hebrew, and Hebrew-Spanish Lexicon, to accompany the Old Testament. Besides aiding Mr. Schauffler, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions have sent two missionaries to the Jews at Salonica and Constantinople.

The Reformed Presbyterian Church in the United States has sent two missionaries to the Jews at Salonica and Damascus. The Campbellite Baptists have a mission station at Jerusalem. The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions has under its care three missionaries to the Jews in Baltimore, Md. and New York. The labors of these missionaries are divided between Germans and Jews. Two places of worship have been opened, which are frequented on Sunday, by a promiscuous congregation of German population. A few individuals have been baptized by one of the missionaries.

The American Society for Meliorating the Condition of the Jews.—This society was organized in 1820. Its fundamental idea was, the temporal relief of persecuted converts from abroad. It aimed to afford an asylum for such Jews, as believing in the Christian religion, dared not profess their faith for fear of persecution from their kindred. From representations made to them, the whole American Christian community became deeply interested in the persecuted converts in Europe. Considerable sums of money were raised, which were devoted to the purchase and furnishing of an establishment for this purpose. But either because there were no converts disposed or because no provision was made to enable them to emigrate, no colony of converts was ever fully organized, for want of subjects. To realize the idea started with, a number of different experiments were tried, all of which proved abortive. It was in 1849 that a purely missionary work among the Jews in the United States was projected on a grand scale. Although the society had employed missionaries to the Jews previously, yet its purposes were not well defined, nor its plans matured until this time. The society retaining its baptized title, so changed its constitution as to admit of a grand missionary enterprise among the Jews. The field upon examination is found to be an extensive one, at the present time. In 1851 there were found on the synagogues' rolls, in the United States, according to a Jewish publication, 60,000 males, from thirteen years and upward. The number of females being about equal to that of the males, not including any under thirteen years, would make the religious portion of the Jewish population in the country, 120,000. Add to this the thousands of Jews that are traveling through the country, and those who have not entered their names on the rolls, together with all the children under thirteen, and we shall have a Jewish population of 150,000 souls.

The society aims to accomplish its work by the distribution of the Scriptures in Hebrew, German and French; of tracts suitable to their religious state; and books which have a bearing upon the question of the Messiahship of Jesus of Nazareth. The character of the society's operations is that of an itinerancy. It baptizes no converts, but prepares them for that ordinance, and leaves the responsibility of a public profession of faith with pastors of churches; hence the society can never know the amount of fruits resulting from the cultivation of this field.

During the year 1854, the society supported 10 regular missionaries and 7 colporteurs, who labored among the Jews in forty cities and large towns in different parts of the country. It also delegated an agent to Palestine, on a mission of inquiry as to what could be done there in agriculture among the Jews, with a view to reach them with the Gospel. During this same year, 29 converts were reported as the results of the society's labors. The income of the society for the same year was about $14,500. The whole number of converts reported as the results of the missionary operations of the society since 1849, were 59 Jews.

REV. E. R. MCGREGOR.

JACOBITES: A sect of Christians in Syria and Mesopotamia, so called either from Jacob, a Syrian, who lived in the reign of the emperor Mauritius, or from one Jacob, a monk, who flourished in the year 550. They are of two sects, one following the rites of the Latin church, and the other continuing separate from Rome. There is also a division among the latter, who have two rival patriarchs. They number about thirty or forty thousand families in Syria and Mesopotamia. They hold but one nature in Christ. With respect to purgatory and prayers for the dead, they hold with the Greeks and other Eastern Christians. They use unleavened bread at the eucharist, reject confession, and practice circumcision before baptism.—(See Copts.)

JACKMEL: A town in Hayti, containing a population of about 10,000, surrounded by a district containing 60,000 more. A station of the Baptist Missionary Society.

JAFFA: The ancient Joppa. It is the principal port of Judea, and the only point of communication which David and Solomon had with the Mediterranean. It is a station of the London Jews' Society.

JAFFNA: A seaport town, near the northern extremity of the island of Ceylon, capital of the district of Jaffnapatam. Population about 8000. A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

JAIPUR: A city in Upper Assam, and formerly a station of the American Baptist Mission.

JAINS: A remarkable sect, scattered throughout India, but nowhere comparatively numerous, except in South Canara, where Jain temples still remain in a state of tolerable perfection. Their temples are of two sorts: one covered with a roof, named Busty; the other, an open area, called Betta, which signifies a hill. In the Betta temples, the only image of a saint is that of Gornuta Roya, said, when on earth, to have been a powerful king. The word Jain signifies a person who has renounced the ordinary modes of thinking and living among mankind. The Jains assert that they have preserved the true and primitive religion; and say that the Brahmins have swerved from all the ancient religious maxims of their ancestors; and that, laying aside the venerable traditions of their masters, they have substituted in the place a monstrous combination. The Vedas, the eighteen Puranas, the Trimurti, the Avatars of Vishnu, the Lingam, the worship of the cow and other animals, and of sensible objects, the sacrifice of the Yojna, are all rejected by the Jains, who hold them to be a mass of abominations, innovations, and corruptions of the true primitive religion. The Jains are frequently confounded with the worshipers of Buddha; and their tenets have certainly, in many points, a strong resemblance to those taught in Ava by the adherents of Buddha.—Hool's Year Book of Missions.

JALNA: A city of Hindostan, 120 miles N.W. of Ahmednuggur, and 300 miles from Bombay. It is situated in the territories of the Nizam, or Mohammedan prince, who has nominally an independent government over a territory of 95,000 square miles. It was occupied as a station of the American Board in 1837; and belongs to the Ahmednuggur mission.

JAMAIOA: See West Indies.

JASSORE: A town on the Ganges, 62 miles N. of Calcutta. The English Baptists commenced a mission here in 1800.

JAUNPUR: The capital of a district of the same name, in Northern Hindostan, about 40 miles north-west of Benares. It is a station of the Church Missionary Society.

JAVA: See Indian Archipelago.

JERUSALEM: See Oriental Christians, Jews.

JEREMIE: A station of the Wesleyans, in Hayti.

JESSORE: Capital of a district of the same name, 62 miles N.E. of Calcutta. A station of the Baptist Missionary Society.

JESUITS: The Society of Jesus, one of the most celebrated monastic orders of the Romish Church, founded in the year 1540, by Ignatius Loyola.—(See Church of Rome and Europe.)

JILOLO: One of the Molucca Islands in the Indian Archipelago.

JOONEER: A town in the province of Arungabad, Hindostan, about 48 miles from Poona. The fort has seven gates of masonry, one within the other, and contains the ruins of many Mohammedan tombs and Hindoo excavations. About a mile south of Jooneer, are numerous excavations and cave temples, the sculptures of which prove them to be of Jain origin.

JUGGERNAUT: A celebrated place of Hindoo worship, in the district of Cuttack, on the sea-coast of Orissa. It stands close to the sea-shore, a few miles north-east of the Chilka lake, and immediately adjacent to the town of Pursottom. The town and temple are surrounded with low sand-hills, and the surrounding country is very sterile. The idol is a carved block of wood, with a frightful visage, painted black, with a distended month of a bloody color. On festival days, the throne of the idol is placed upon a stupendous movable tower, 60 feet high, resting on wheels, which indent the ground deeply as they turn slowly under the ponderous machine. He is accompanied with two other idols, his brother Balaram, and his sister Shubudra, of a white and yellow color, each on a separate tower, and sitting upon thrones of nearly an equal height. Attached to the principal tower are six ropes, of the length and size of a ship's cable, by which the people draw it along. The priests and attendants are stationed around the throne, on the car; and occasionally address the worshipers in libidinous songs and gestures. Both the walls of the temple and the sides of the car are covered with the most indecent emblems, in large and durable sculpture. Obscenity and blood are the characteristics of the idol's worship. As the tower moves along, devotees, throwing themselves under its wheels, are crushed to death; and such acts are hailed by the acclamations of the multitude, as the most acceptable sacrifices. The scenes which occur at the temple as acts of worship, are too indecent to be described. A number of sacred bulls are kept in the place, and fed with vegetables from the hands of the pilgrims. In the temple, also, is preserved what is regarded as a bone of Krishna, considered a most sacred relic. The temple of Juggernaut is esteemed the most sacred of all the religious establishments of the Hindoos; and the concourse of pilgrims by which it is annually visited is immense, particularly in March, when the Dole Jattrah takes place, and in July, when the Ruth Jattrah is celebrated. Dr. Carey was of the opinion that, at the lowest calculation, 1,200,000 attend every year, of whom an incredible portion die by the way, from want, fatigue, or disease. At 50 miles distance, the approach to the spot is known by the quantity of human bones which are strewn by the way.

Mr. Sterling, in his "Account of Orissa," gives the following description of the grand procession of the idol: "On the appointed day, after various prayers and ceremonies, the images are brought from their throne to the outside of the Lion-gate, not with decency and reverence, but a cord being fastened round their necks, they are dragged by the priests down the steps and through the mud, while others keep their figures erect, and help their movements by shoving from behind, in the most indifferent and uncereemonious manner. Thus the monstrous idols go, rocking and pitching along, through the crowd, until they reach the cars, which they are made to ascend by a similar process, up an inclined platform, reaching from the stage of the machine to the ground. On the other hand, a powerful sentiment of religious enthusiasm pervades the admiring multitude of pilgrims, when the images first make their appearance through the gate. They welcome them with shouts and cries; and when the monster Juggernaut, the most hideous of all, is dragged forth, the last in order, the air is rent with acclamations. After the images have been safely lodged in their vehicles, a box is brought forth, containing the golden or gilded feet, hands, and ears, of the great idol, which are fixed on the proper parts with due ceremony, and a scarlet scarf is carefully arranged round the lower part of the body, or pedestal. The joy and shouts of the crowd, on the first movement of the cars, the creaking sound of the wheels, as these ponderous machines roll along, the clatter of hundreds of harsh-sounding instruments, and the general appearance of such an immense mass of human beings, produce an astounding effect."

JU-JU, or JEW-JEW: A charm; a fetish. (See Africa, West.)

JUNIN: In Western India, about 70 miles east of Bombay. It has 3,000 houses, and about 25,000 inhabitants, and is a station of the Church Missionary Society.

KADATCHAPORAM: A station of the Church Missionary Society in the Tinnevely district, India.

KAFFRARIA, or Kaffreland, extends from the Keiskamma river, (the Kei, according to the late arrangement,) which separates it from Cape Colony, to an undefined line somewhere on the south of Delagoa Bay. Its extent is not exactly ascertained. Its western boundary is supposed to be near the source of the Orange river, which flows through a vast extent of country into the Atlantic Ocean, and the Mapoota, which empties itself into Delagoa Bay.

KAFFRES: The appellation of Kaffre, which signifies unbeliever, was originally given, by the Moorish navigators of the Indian Ocean to the inhabitants of the south-eastern coast of Africa, and was borrowed from them by the Portuguese. Afterwards, when the Dutch colonists came in contact with the most southern tribe of the Kaffres, the Koosas or Amakosa, the Moorish name was given to them exclusively; and in this restricted sense it is generally used by the Dutch and English colonists. It is, however, well ascertained that not only the tribes commonly called Kaffres, but the Tambookies, Mambookies, Zulus, Damaras, the inhabitants of Delagoa Bay, Mozambique, and the numerous Bechuana tribes, who occupy the interior of the continent to an extent yet unexplored, are but subdivisions of one great family, allied in language, customs, and mode of life. The Bechuana dialect, which prevails universally among the interior tribes, so far as they have been visited, varies but slightly from that of the Damaras, and of the natives of Delagoa Bay; and the Amakosa is a dialect of the same language. The natives of the Comoro Islands and the aboriginal tribes of Madagascar also speak a dialect intimately allied to those of Kaffraria and Mozambique. This word is variously spelled, Kaffre, Kaffir, Kafir, and Caffre. Which is the more proper it is not easy to determine. We have followed the Encyclopædia Britannica, on the ground that such a standard work would be most likely to fix and settle the orthography.

Government.—The ancient government of the Kaffre tribes is feudal: an aristocracy of chiefs, acknowledging the supremacy of the sovereign, but except on extraordinary occasions, acting independently of him. Each tribe is divided into kraals or hamlets, each of which has its petty chief. The general chief is the sovereign of the nation, and in a council of chiefs is very powerful, and is looked upon by all the nobles and people with unbounded respect.

The People.—In personal appearance, the Kaffres are a remarkably fine race of men. Their noble figures and power of limb; their lofty stature and graceful deportment, have drawn the attention and excited the admiration of travelers. Their color is dark brown, mixed with a warmer tint of yellow. Their hair is black and woolly, but not the wooliness of the Negro. Their faces approach the European model. They wear no clothing but a cloak of skin. In disposition, they are cheerful, frank, good-natured, and intelligent. They are a pastoral people, and their flocks and herds constitute their chief care.

Religious and Moral Condition.—The Kaffres have no national religion. They have only a few unmeaning rites and superstitions, which may be the ruins of some forgotten creed. They practice circumcision, abhor swine's flesh and fish, and have a reverential fear of serpents, which may suggest their eastern origin. Mr. Moffat states that there is, with them, an entire absence of theological ideas. The venerable Dr. Vanderkemp, the first missionary among them, says, "If by religion we mean reverence for God, or the external action by which that reverence is expressed, I never could perceive that they had any religion, nor any idea of the existence of God." This he said with reference to them as a nation, for individuals among them had some notions of God, which they had acquired from those who had associated with white people. And, as proof of this, he said they had no word in their language to express the idea of a Supreme Being. Mr. Moffat adds his testimony to the same fact, of which he says he became convinced in opposition to his preconceived and cherished opinions, both by the declarations of the untutored natives themselves, and the accounts given by the native Christians of their former state, to illustrate which he relates a number of interesting conversations and anecdotes. But, although they appear to possess no just spiritual ideas, or to have any true conception of a future state, a belief in witchcraft holds the same terrible sway over them as in other African tribes. So deplorably does this superstitious dread of the sorcerer's art prevail among them that they never attribute the death of their people to natural causes. If a Kaffre should die of extreme old age, they would attribute his death to witchcraft, and wreak their vengeance on some poor innocent creature as the witch. But in those portions of their country which have come under British authority, these cruelties have been suppressed by law. Polygamy is also universal among the Kaffre tribes.

The various tribes of the Kaffre family are estimated by Rev. J. J. Freeman, Secretary of the London Missionary Society, at 2,000,000, spread from the eastern frontier of Cape Colony to beyond Delagoa Bay, and then across the whole continent, without break, to the Atlantic, in latitude 20°.—Condar's Dictionary of Geography; Wrongs of the Kaffre Nation, by JUSTUS; A Tour in South Africa, by Rev. J. J. FREEMAN; Moffat's Southern Africa; Philip's Researches in Southern Africa. (For Missions among the Kaffres, see AFRICA, SOUTHERN.)

KAHUKU: A station of the American Board on the Sandwich Islands, on Oahu.

KAILUA: The first station occupied by the American Board at the Sandwich Islands.

situated about the centre of the eastern coast of Hawaii.

KAITOTEHE : A station of the Church Missionary Society in New Zealand.

KAIKOHI : A station of the Church Missionary Society in New Zealand.

KAIPARA : A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society on the western coast of New Zealand, celebrated for a large muscle, measuring 11 to 13 inches, found there in great abundance.

KAITAI : The most northern station of the Church Missionary Society in New Zealand. It lies under a fine wooded range of hills, having on the east a vast plain, with a dark forest in the middle, extending to the flat, marshy estuary of the Awarua river, ending in the Sandy Bay; to the northward a bright line of sand marks the district of Muriwenna, which reaches to the North Cape; on the westward the wooded range of Maungu Tanewha bridges the whole inland country between Kaitai and Waimate.

KALUAAHA : A station of the American Board on the island of Molokai.

KALIFF : See Califf.

KAMA'STONE : A station of the Wesleyans in South Africa, near Buffalo's Vleij.

KAMBEL : A Burman village near Rangoon and an out-station of the Am. Baptist Mission at Rangoon.

KANTHA : A Karen village in the district of Tavoy, Burmah, and an out-station of Am. Baptist Mission at Tavoy.

KANEOHE : A station of the American Board in the Sandwich Islands, on Oahu.

KANDY : In Ceylon, about 90 miles N. E. of Colombo. It is surrounded by hills and mountains, and was anciently the capital of an independent kingdom of the same name. The town itself has about 3000 people, but in the neighboring highlands there is a population of 200,000. It is a station of the Church and Baptist Societies.

KAPITI : An island of New Zealand, in Cook's straits, whose chief sent his sons 500 miles for a missionary. The whole island had embraced Christianity, by the labors of one native, who had gone there of his own accord.

KARANGAN : Formerly a station of the American Board in Borneo.

KARENS : An interesting race of aboriginal inhabitants of the mountainous regions of the southern and eastern portions of Burmah Proper, and all parts of the Tenasserim provinces, extending into the western portions of Siam, and thence northward among the Shyans. It is impossible to form a satisfactory estimate of their numbers. In the province of Tavoy a British census makes the number 2500. Around Maulmain and Rangoon there are perhaps 20,000 more. In Siam and Laos, there are probably 10,000, making in all, about 30,000. They are a quiet and intelligent people, living by agriculture, and their government is patriarchal. They have received the Gospel with great readiness, and among them the missions of the American Baptists have met with wonderful success. (See Burmah.)

KAT RIVER : A district in South Africa, on the borders of Kaffraria, where the London Missionary Society have a station at Philipton, with 13 out-stations on Kat River, and four in Tambookee land. The population consists chiefly of liberated Hottentots, living in 50 or 60 locations.

KAUAI : One of the Sandwich Islands group, about 75 miles north-west of Oahu. It is 46 miles in length and 23 in breadth, mountainous, and of romantic appearance.

KAUKAUA : A station of the Church Missionary Society in New Zealand. It stands on a plain immediately adjoining a mountain. The Kaukua district extends from Opotiki in the Bay of Plenty to Waipiro in Open Bay.

KAU : A district in the south of the island of Hawaii, where is a station of the American Board.

KAWHIA : A station of the Wesleyans on the west coast of New Zealand.

KEALAKEKUA : A station of the American Board in the Sandwich Islands, on the north-west coast of Hawaii.

KEALIA : A station of the American Board on Hawaii, Sandwich Islands.

KEISKAMMA : A station of the London Missionary Society in Kaffreland, South Africa.

KEMEES : A tribe inhabiting the mountains of Burmah, in many of their habits resembling the Karens.

KEMMENDINE : A Karen village near Rangoon; a station of the American Baptist Mission at Rangoon.

KENT : Town of liberated Africans, in the parish of St. Edward, at Cape Shilling, Sierra Leone, West Africa, about 40 miles south of Freetown—station of the Church Missionary Society.

KERIKERI : A station of the Church Missionary Society in New Zealand.

KHAMIESBERG : A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in Little Namaqualand, South Africa.

KHAMTIS : One of the races occupying the country of Assam, to whom the missionaries of the American Baptist Missionary Union have preached.

KHAN : In Asia, a governor, a prince, a king. Also, an inn.

KHARI : A station of the Baptist Missionary Society in Bengal.

KHARPUT : Prospectively a station of the American Board among the Armenians. It is in Northern Mesopotamia, on an extended, well-cultivated, and beautiful plain, having a delightful climate; 366 villages on the plain, with an Armenian population, including that of the city, of at least 100,000 souls

KHUNDITA : A station of the General Baptists in Orissa, about 200 miles south from Calcutta. It is surrounded by populous villages, and not far from the large town of Jageepore.

KING WILLIAM'S TOWN : A station of the London Missionary Society, on the Buffalo river, South Africa.

KING WILL'S TOWN : A station of the American Presbyterian Board in West Africa.

KINGSTON : The capital of the Island of St. Vincent, W. I., and a station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. Pop. 8,000. It is situated on the south-west side of the island, and stretches along the sea-shore, the mountains gradually rising behind in the form of an amphitheatre, to a considerable height.

KIOSK : In Turkey, a summer-house.

KIRKWOOD : Station of the United Scotch Presbyterian Church in Tambookieland, South Africa, on the river Ixhouse.

KISSOR : One of the Banda Islands, a group of the Moluccas, in the Indian Archipelago.

KISSEY : Town of liberated Africans, and station of the Church Missionary Society, in the River District, Sierra Leone, West Africa, about three miles east of Freetown, on the Sierra river.

KLAAS VOOK'S RIVER : A station of the London Missionary Society in Little Namaqualand, South Africa.

KNAPP'S HOPE : A station of the London Missionary Society, among the Kafres in South Africa.

KOHALA : A station of the American Board in the Sandwich Islands, on the north-east coast of Hawaii.

KOKFONTEIN : A station of the Rhenish Missionary Society in Little Namaqua, South Africa.

KOLOA : A station of the American Board in the Sandwich Islands, on the island of Kauai.

KOLOBENG : The most inland station of the London Missionary Society, in South Africa, situated on the southern borders of the Kalahari desert, 200 miles N. E. by N. from Kuruman.

KOMMAGGAS : A station of the Rhenish Missionary Society in South Africa, in the north-west corner of Cape Colony.

KOTGHUR : A station of the Church Missionary Society, the capital of a chiefship of the same name, in Himmalaya, India, between the Sutlej and Jumna, on a declivity of the Whartoo Mountain, near the left bank of the Sutlej, at an elevation of 6,634 feet above the level of the sea, on the high road to Thibet. The language of the inhabitants is the same as that of the hilly parts of the Sutlej.

KRAAL : A small village in Africa, consisting of a few native huts.

KRISHNAGUR : A station of the Church Missionary Society, a little to the north-west of Calcutta.

KRISHNAPORE : A station of the Church Missionary Society in Hindostan.

KRUSFONTEIN : An out-station of the London Missionary Society in South Africa, situated on a dry and barren piece of land, near the Gamtoos river.

KULANGSU, or KOOLANGSOO : A small island near the city of Amoy, China, occupied as a station by the Presbyterian Board.

KUMASI, KOOMASSIE, or COOMASSIE : The capital of Ashantee. Population, 15,000. A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

KUMISS : An intoxicating liquor distilled from mare's milk, in use among the Tartars.

KURUMAN : A station of the London Missionary Society in South Africa, 630 miles north-east of Cape Town, among the Bechuanas.

KYOUK PHYOO : A town in Arracan, on Ramree Island, where the mission of the American Baptist Missionary Union in Arracan was first planted.

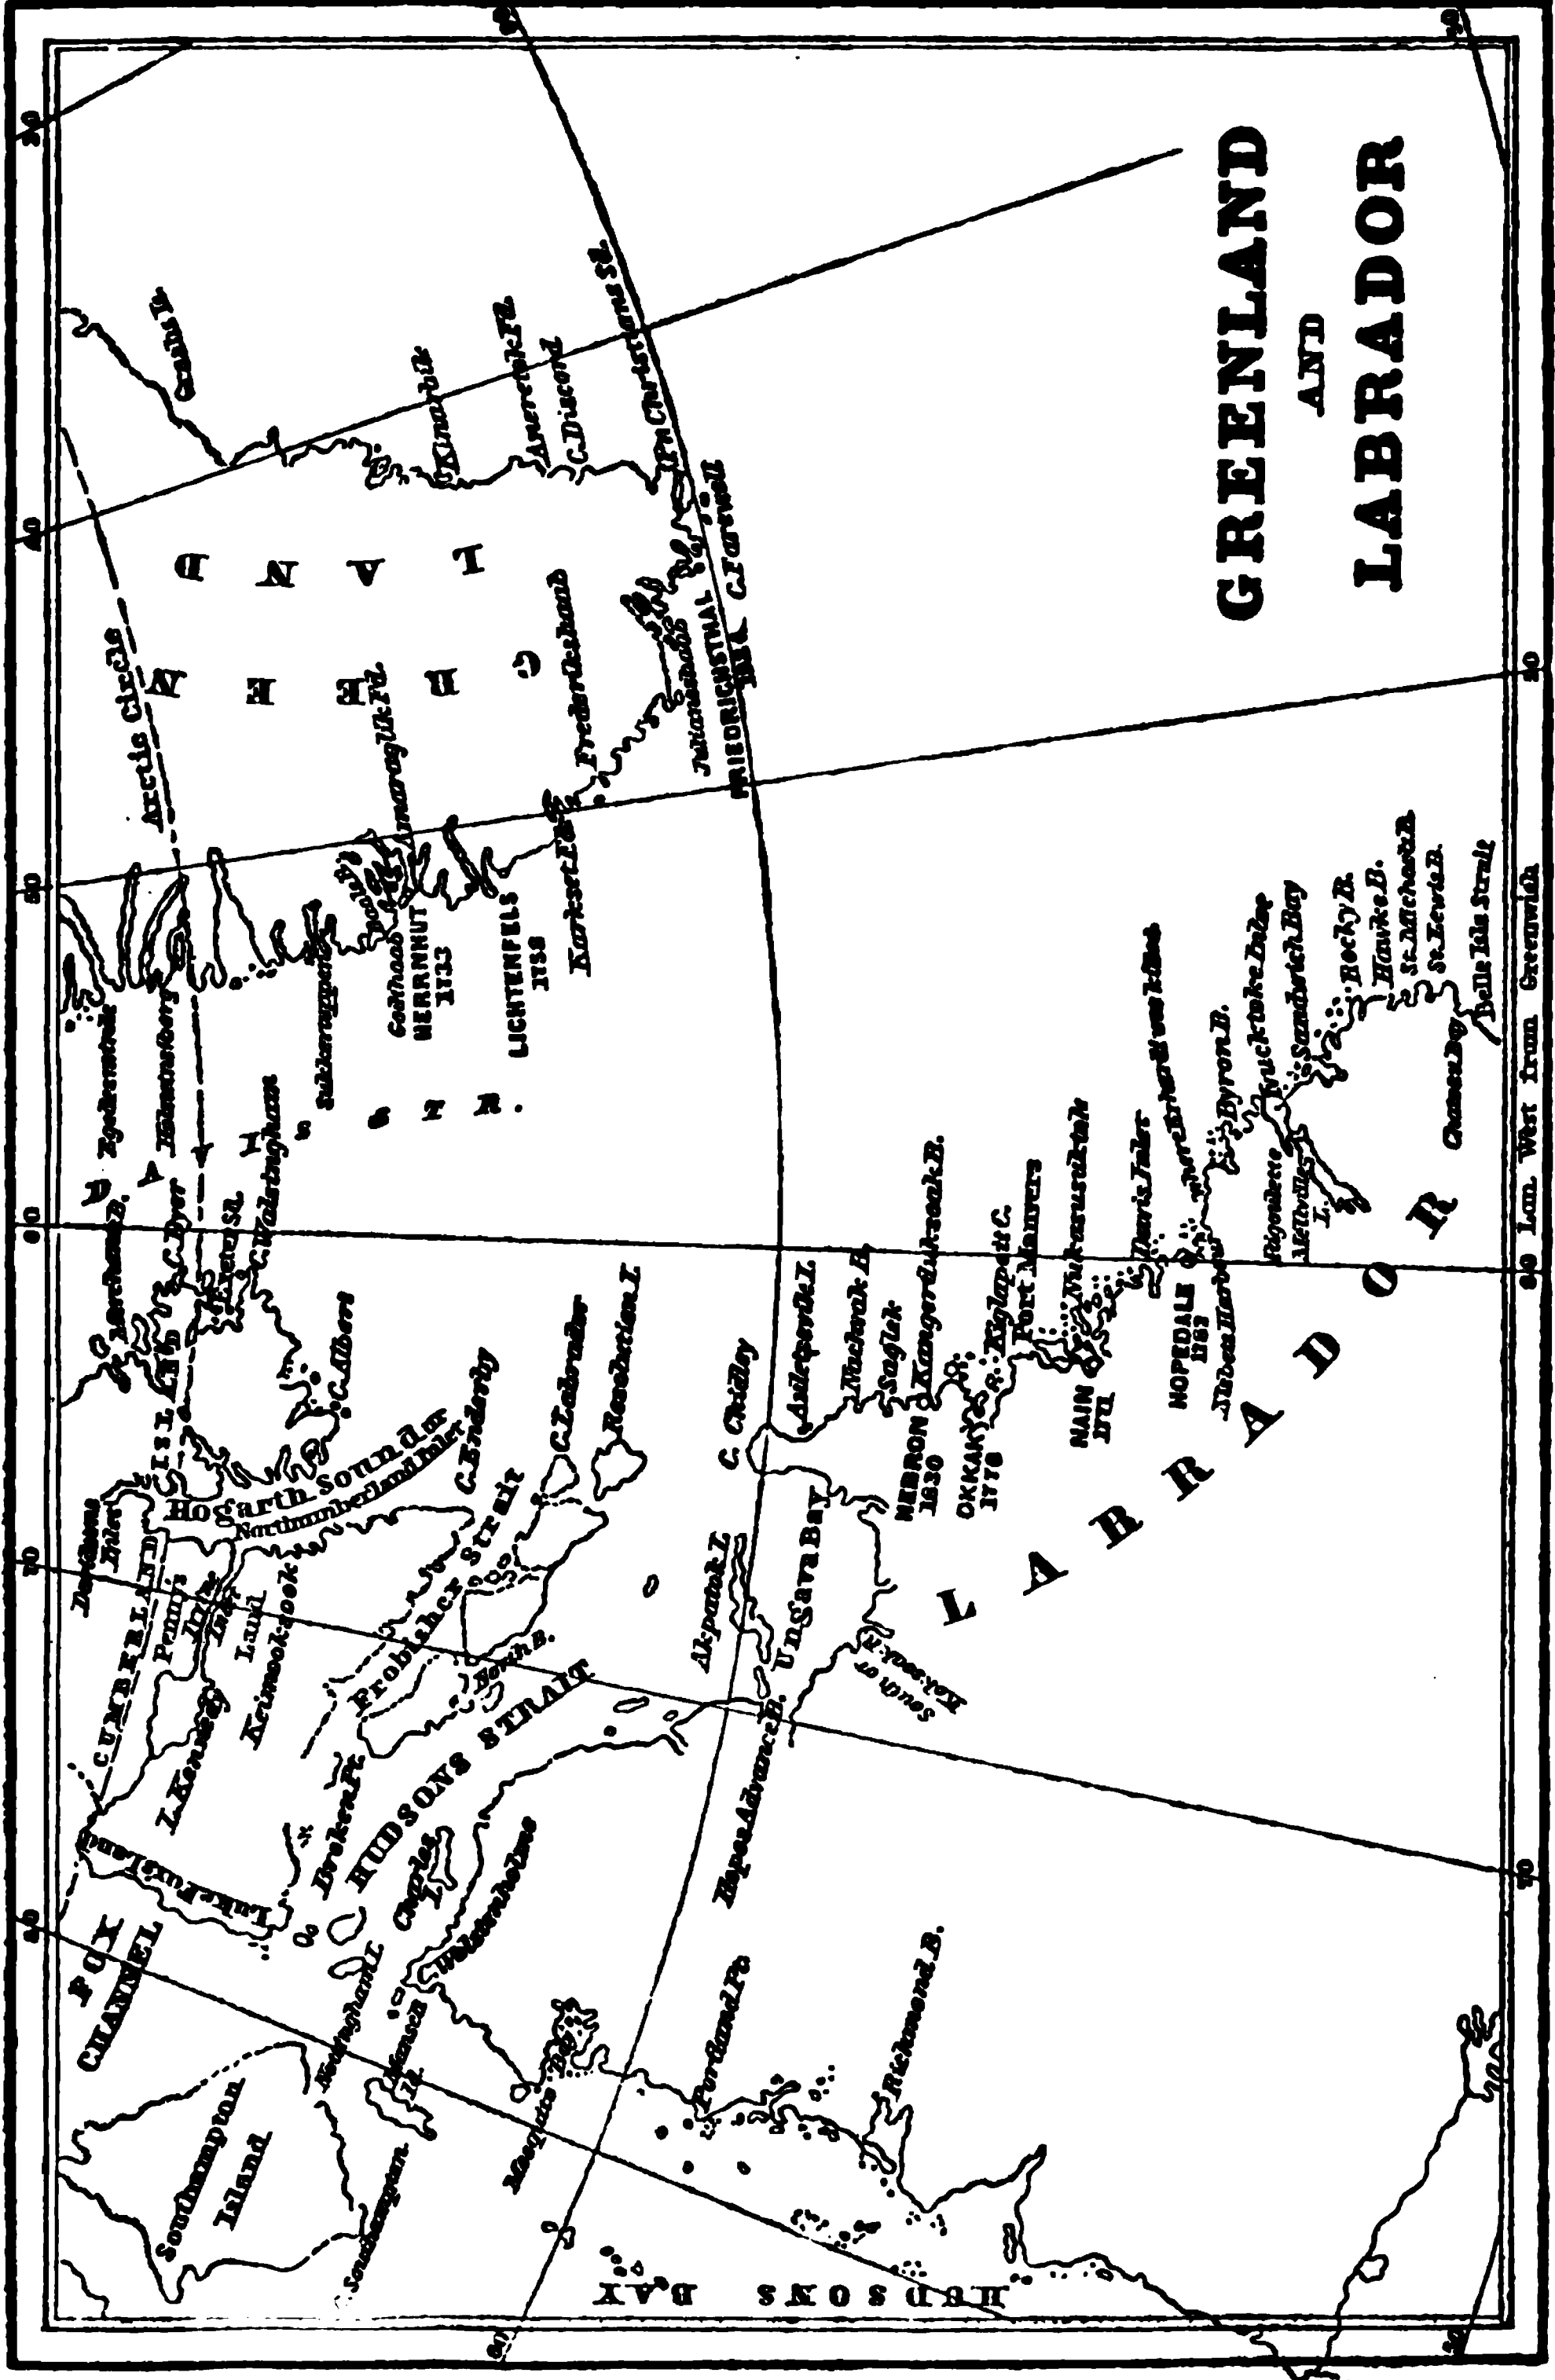

LABRADOR AND GREENLAND : These two countries are grouped together in one article on account of the connection of the missions, particularly those of the United Brethren, which may be considered as in fact but one mission.

GREENLAND.—Greenland is the remotest tract of land in the north, lying between Europe and America, and is divided into East and West Greenland. The eastern coast is almost inaccessible, but on the western coast the Danes have erected several factories, for the purpose of carrying on the whale fishery. The want of large timber is in some measure compensated by the drift-wood, which floats in great quantities into the bays and islands, and serves the Europeans for fuel, and the natives for building their houses, tents, and boats. The population of Greenland is estimated at 6,000; 150 or 200 of whom are Europeans. They are a remarkably docile and harmless people, and the missionaries have not had to encounter among them any fixed forms of superstition or idolatry.

The climate in this country is intensely cold, sometimes so severe that beer, and even brandy, freeze in a room heated by a stove, and yet it is a remarkable fact, that the bays and the water between the islands are seldom frozen for any length of time, and sometimes they remain open during the whole winter. This is of great advantage to the Greenlanders, as their principal subsistence is derived from fishing.

The summer seldom lasts above four months, and even then it frequently snows, and the frost never leaves the ground entirely, as the rays of the sun seldom penetrate above a foot below the surface. Yet the heat in summer is said by the missionaries to be as great as in any part of England or Germany, though of shorter duration. There is scarce any night in summer, as the sun does not remain more than two or three hours below the horizon, and from the tops of the mountains his beams are reflected even at midnight, so that a person seated in a room may read and write without the aid of a candle. And, though the winter nights are proportionably long, yet the darkness is considerably lessened by the stronger light of the moon, the prevalence of the aurora borealis, and by reflections from the ice and snow.

The natives are of a tawny hue and low stature, with very dark or black eyes, and strong, flowing hair. They are clad the whole year round in fur dresses, made of the skins of seals and reindeer, very neatly sewed by the women. Their dwellings are of two kinds: first, tents, which are covered with seal-skins, and constitute their summer habitations; secondly, winter houses, constructed of large stones, the walls being a yard in thickness, and the crevices filled up with earth and sods. The roof is of wood, covered first with sods, and the whole overspread with skins. The inside breadth of such a house is generally 12 feet, but its length varies from 24 to 72 feet, according to the number of inmates. Four, or even ten, families live together in a house, the apartments being separated from each other by screens, made of skins. In every apartment a lamp is kept constantly burning, which lights and heats it, and serves also for cooking. There is not a great regard for cleanliness, and the smell of the train-oil is offensive, but the contentment of the Greenlanders amid their poverty, and the order and stillness observed among those who dwell together, excite the admiration of Europeans.

Notwithstanding the rigors of the climate and the sterility of the soil, the missionaries have succeeded in laying out gardens, in which they grow lettuce, cabbages, radishes, turnips, and a few other vegetables. However, as they cannot be sown before June, and killing frosts commence again in September, they remain small, but have a fine flavor. Oats and barley spring up very fast, but never come to maturity. The missionaries have introduced the breeding of sheep and goats, though hay is difficult to obtain, as it comes only from the valleys.

Several kinds of animals and fish are serviceable to Europeans and natives, both for traffic and food, such as reindeer, hares, foxes, white bears, different descriptions of winged game, and a great variety of fishes, especially herrings, which, in the beginning of summer, come into the bays in such shoals, that whole boats can be filled with them in a few hours. But the seal is the most important to the Greenlanders, as it furnishes a principal article of food, and also serves for clothing, bedding, covering for boats, tents, and houses, oil for their lamps, implements for fishing and hunting, and also serves as a medium of traffic, instead of money.

MISSIONS.

To Hans Egede, a Danish missionary, belongs the honorable title of "Apostle of Greenland," and most cheerfully is this title conceded to him by the Moravian brethren. It was in the year 1721 that this excellent man exchanged his comfortable parsonage at Vogen, in Norway, for the bleak, desolate island of Kangek, near the mouth of Baal's river, on the contiguous mainland, at Goodhab, on the western coast, where he exerted himself with patient and unwearied zeal, for the conversion of the Greenlanders to the faith of Christ. Through ten weary years, with very little apparent success, he persevered in his labors; but it appeared as if the mission must be abandoned, when a new era began to dawn upon benighted Greenland. In 1831, two baptized Greenlanders, who had been taken to Denmark by some colonists, gave much interesting information relative to the state of the nation to which they belonged, and the comparative failure of the mission. This being reported to the congregation at Herrnhut, a young brother, named Matthew Stach, felt an impulse which he could not resist, to offer himself as a missionary to the Greenland race. His offer was accepted; and the brethren Christian Stach, cousin of Matthew, and Christian David, the veteran emigrant from Moravia, both common workmen, were commissioned to accompany him. On the 19th of January, 1733, these brethren set out on foot for Copenhagen, a distance of about 500 miles.

Nothing can more strikingly exhibit the zeal of these devoted servants of Christ, and their truly apostolic spirit, than the manner in which they entered upon their great work. They literally obeyed the injunction, "Take nothing for your journey." "There was no need," says one of them, "of much time or expense in our equipment. The congregation consisted chiefly of poor exiles, who had not much to give, and we ourselves had nothing but the clothes on our backs. We had been used to make shift with little, and did not trouble our heads how we should get to Greenland, or how we should live there. The day before our departure a friend in Venice sent a donation, and part of this we received for our journey to Copenhagen. Now we considered ourselves richly provided for, and therefore would take nothing of any one on the road, believing that he who had procured us something for our journey at the very critical moment, would also supply us with everything requisite for accomplishing our purpose, whenever it should be needful."

On arriving at Copenhagen they were kindly received by many friends; but their design appeared romantic and unreasonable, especially as the Danish mission to Greenland was in a low state, and the government was inclined to withdraw its colonists altogether. In this state of things a residence on the coast of Greenland was regarded as highly dangerous, both on account of exposure to the cruelty of the natives, and the liability of being left without any regular supply of provisions from Europe. These reports however did not dispirit the missionaries, who on being asked by Count Pless, "How they intended to maintain themselves in Greenland," answered, "By the labor of our hands, and God's blessing," adding, "that they would build a house and cultivate a piece of land, and not be burdensome to any." On being told by the Count that there was no timber fit for building in that country, they said, "If this is the case we will dig a hole in the earth and live there." Astonished at their ardor in the cause in which they had embarked, the Count replied, "No; you shall not be driven to that extremity; take timber with you and build a house; accept of these fifty dollars for that purpose." They then committed their cause to Him who orders all things, and on the 10th of April, 1733, they sailed from Copenhagen, and on the 20th of the next month they reached the place of their destination, having had a safe and speedy passage.

They soon fixed upon a place, to which they afterwards gave the name of New Herrnhut, and here they kneeled down and invoked the blessing of God on themselves and their undertaking. Their first labor was to erect a small hut, as a shelter against the inclemency of the climate. A few days after they laid the foundations of their proper dwelling, for which they had brought the timber with them from Copenhagen. The season was remarkably in their favor, the ice and snow having melted a month sooner than usual. Besides their own house they built one after the Greenland manner, for the accommodation of such of the natives as might be induced to come to them for instruction. During the first year of their residence in Greenland the small-pox prevailed to a frightful extent, during which the brethren exerted themselves much for the relief of the sick and dying, till at length they were violently attacked themselves, and nearly lost the use of their limbs. Having thus passed their first year, they were strengthened and encouraged by the arrival of two brethren, Beck and Boenish, who came in the character of assistants.

They now resolved to pursue their work with redoubled ardor, and applied themselves to the study of the language with unremitting diligence. Unused though they were to grammars of any kind, they soon conquered the greatest difficulties, so as to be able to hold a short conversation with the natives. They also obtained some copies of pieces which Mr. Egede, the Danish missionary, had translated, such as the Ten Commandments, the Apostles' Creed, and the Lord's Prayer, and embraced every opportunity of reading these to the Greenlanders, with instructions suited to make an impression on their hearts. By these means they conciliated the esteem of the natives, who often visited them, though not without asking for some article that struck their fancy, showing that they were actuated by selfish motives.

In 1735 some ships arrived from Europe, but without bringing them supplies of any description. They were therefore reduced to great distress, as their whole stock of provisions consisted of a barrel and a half of oatmeal. They had been less successful than usual in hunting and fishing, and on attempting to buy seals of the natives, the most exorbitant prices were asked, and in some cases they refused to sell at all. But in the spring of 1736 an unexpected supply of provisions was sent to them from Holland, and by a person from whom no aid had ever been solicited. The same individual promised them other supplies for the ensuing season.

In July, 1736, some Danish ships arrived, bringing with them the mother of Matthew Stach, a widow about forty-five years of age, with her two daughters, Rosina and Anna, the former twenty-two, and the latter twelve years of age. Their domestic affairs were now confided to female hands; and the two younger being desirous of acting as missionaries among their own sex, applied themselves sedulously and successfully to the study of the Greenland language.

Their temporal circumstances were now more comfortable, but they were severely tried with the character and conduct of the savages, who seldom visited them except in quest of victuals, and who were strongly averse to religious conversation. If a missionary remained with them more than one night, they employed every means to draw him into their dissolute practices, and, failing in this, they endeavored to provoke him by mimicking his reading, praying, and singing, or by interrupting these exercises with frightful howling and the deafening noise of drums. On some occasions they even pelted the brethren with stones, destroyed their goods, strove to drive their boat out to sea, and even threatened to assassinate them in their tent. In the midst of all these dangers, however, they were mercifully preserved.

Thus five years passed away, and the brethren witnessed no abiding fruits of their self-denying labor. They had tilled a soil apparently unfit for culture, and in tears had sown the seed on hearts apparently as barren as the coast where they had pitched their tents. But now the Lord was about to bless their work in a new and peculiar manner.

"In June, 1738," write the missionaries, "many Southlanders, or people from the south of Greenland, visited us. Brother Beck was at this time translating a part of St. Matthew's Gospel. The heathen being very curious to know the contents of the book, he read a few sentences, and after some conversation with them, asked whether they had an immortal soul, and where that soul would go after death. Some said, "Up yonder." Others said, "Down to the abyss." Having rectified their notions on this point, he inquired, "Who made heaven and earth, man, and all other things?" They replied that they did not know, nor had they ever heard, but that it must certainly be some great and mighty being. He then gave them an account of the creation of the world, the fall of man, and his recovery by Christ. In speaking of the redemption of man, the Spirit of God enabled him to enlarge with more than usual energy, on the sufferings and death of the Redeemer, and in the most pathetic manner to exhort his hearers to consider the vast expense at which Jesus had ransomed their souls, and no longer reject the mercy offered them in the Gospel. He then read to them out of the New Testament the history of our Saviour's agony in the garden.

Upon this the Lord opened the heart of one of the company, whose name was Kayarnak, who, stepping up to the table in an earnest manner, exclaimed: "How was that? tell me that once more, for I do desire to be saved." These words, the like of which had never before been uttered by a Greenland, so penetrated the soul of Mr. Beck, that with great emotion and enlargement of heart, he gave them a general account of the life and death of our Saviour, and of the scheme of salvation through him.

In the mean time the other missionaries who had been abroad on business, returned, and with delight joined their fellow-laborers in testifying of the grace of God in the blood of Jesus Christ. Some of the pagans laid their hands on their mouths, which is their usual custom when struck with astonishment. Others, who did not relish the subject, slunk away secretly, but several requested to be taught to pray, and frequently repeated the expressions used by the missionaries, in order to fix them in their memories. In short, they manifested such an earnest and serious concern for their salvation, as the missionaries had never witnessed before, and at going away they promised soon to return, and hear more of this subject. They also promised to tell it to their countrymen.

The impression made on Kayarnak was not transient, for the word had taken deep root in his heart. He frequently visited the missionaries, and at length took up his residence with them. He told them that he often felt a monition in his heart to pray, and when they spoke to him he was often so much affected, that the tears rolled down his cheeks. Considering the general stupidity of the Greenlanders, the missionaries were not a little surprised at the quickness with which he comprehended every thing which they told him, and at the retention of his memory. He manifested very strong attachment to them, and a constant desire for further instruction.

By means of his conversion, those who lived in the same tent with him were brought under conviction. Thus before the end of the month three large families came with all their property, and pitched their tents near the dwelling of the missionaries, "in order," as they said, "to hear the joyful news of man's redemption." They all appeared much affected, and even some who had formerly opposed the word, declared that they would now believe, and winter with the missionaries. Most of them, however, soon went away to hunt reindeer, but Kayarnak refused to accompany them, lest thereby harm should come to his soul. If enticed to go away, he would reply by some short remark, such as "I will stay with my teachers and hear the word of God, which I have once found sweet to my taste." If they railed at him he held his peace, after he had borne his testimony to the truth in a few serious words. At length he prevailed so far on some of his nearest relatives, that they resolved to return, and even some other families desired leave to settle near the missionaries.

Thus, in October, 1738, when the Greenlanders left their tents to move into their winter houses, above twenty persons took up their abode near the brethren. This induced them to commence morning and evening devotions, with the two families of Kayarnak, and his relation Simek, besides the reading and expounding of the Scriptures on the Lord's day. Five of these persons, who appeared most serious, they selected, as suitable candidates for baptism, and gave them more frequent instruction in the truths of salvation.

The year 1739 was distinguished in the mission, by the baptism of the first Greenland converts. This interesting and solemn service was performed on Sunday, March 29th. The candidates having, before the whole assembly, given a full account of the ground of their hope, and promised to renounce all heathen customs and superstitions, to remain with their teachers, and walk worthily of the Gospel; were in fervent prayer, and with imposition of hands, commended to the grace of God, and baptized in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. The presence of the Great Head of the Church was felt in the most powerful manner during this transaction; the tears flowed in streams from the eyes of those just baptized, and the spectators were so overcome, that they earnestly desired to be made partakers of the same grace. The first fruits of the Greenland nation, who by this rite were publicly ingrafted into the Christian church, were Kayarnak, his wife, his son and his daughter.

Scarcely a month had elapsed before the joy occasioned by this event was succeeded by a dark cloud. The brother-in-law of Kayarnak, who also resided with the missionaries, was murdered by a northern banditti; and as Kayarnak and his surviving brother-in-law were threatened with the same fate, the former resolved to retire with his family to the south. The missionaries were sorely tried with the loss of these first converts, besides having to bear the reproach, that though they might baptize Greenland pagans, they could never imbue them with Christianity, nor wean them from their roving habits. But they trusted that these events might be overruled by the great Head of the Church, for the furtherance of the Gospel; and so it proved; for but a short time had elapsed, when 21 boats filled with Southlanders arrived at the mission station, with the intelligence that they had met with Kayarnak and his family, who had told them many wonderful things of a religious nature, and had directed them to apply to the brethren for more ample and satisfactory instructions. Soon after this event 9 families of the Greenlanders returned to the vicinity of the missionary settlement.

The missionaries thus found occasion for great thankfulness and encouragement; but amid all their rejoicings they sighed with unutterable grief over the absence of Kayarnak, and could not venture to cherish the smallest hope of his return. One day, however, while they were attending the nuptial dinner of Frederic Boenish and Anna Stach, he suddenly entered their dwelling, after about a year's absence, and on this occasion they had the satisfaction to discover that not only had he remained steadfast, but that he had brought with him his brother and his family, to whom he had communicated the glad news of salvation. About the same time several other Greenlanders took up their abode at New Herrnhut, and gave unquestionable proofs that they were the subjects of serious and deep convictions; and in spite of the persecution of their countrymen, they continued steadfast, and rendered many important services to the missionaries.

Early in 1741, Kayarnak was attacked with a pleurisy, which soon put an end to his earthly labors. During his illness he exhibited the utmost patience, and appeared alike regardless of worldly concerns and of bodily sufferings. Observing his relatives bathed in tears, he affectionately said, "Why do you weep on my account? Are you not aware that when believers die they go to Jesus, and become partakers of everlasting joy? As I was the first of our nation who was converted by his grace, he has determined that I should be the first to enter into his presence. He knows how to provide for you in my absence, and if you remain faithful to the end, we shall surely meet again, and rejoice for ever before the throne of God and the Lamb." These words completely tranquilized the minds of his wife and brother, who evinced the most pious resignation to the bereavement which they were called to endure, and solicited the missionaries to bury him according to the rites of the Christian religion, which request was complied with, and he was buried amid the most solemn and impressive services.

From this time the missionaries found the field of their labors gradually extending. Wherever the new converts went in quest of food, they proclaimed the riches of the grace of Christ, and numbers were led to the Moravian settlement, anxious to understand those things more fully. One of the baptized Greenlanders informed the missionaries that he had found his countrymen, many leagues to the north, so anxious to be instructed in the things of religion, that they urged him to spend a whole night with them in conversation. Even one of their angekoks, or necromancers, was brought under such serious impressions, that he wept almost incessantly during two days, and asserted that he had dreamed he was in hell, where he witnessed scenes which it would be utterly impossible to describe. When this general awakening began to subside, the necromancers circulated the most absurd and ridiculous stories about the effects of the Christian religion; but God frustrated these attacks of the enemy, and the company of believers increased; so that at the close of 1748 no less than 230 Greenlanders resided at New Herrnhut, of whom 35 had been baptized in the course of that year.

In 1747, the brethren erected their first church, the frame and boards of which had been sent them by friends in Europe, and in this house they frequently had the pleasure of addressing congregations of more than 300 persons. At the same time some commodious storehouses were built, both for the brethren and their converts; and such excellent regulations were adopted in the settlement, that the believing Greenlanders not only subsisted comfortably, but were enabled to extend aid to others in times of scarcity.

The winter of 1752, and also the winter following, were rendered extremely trying by the dreadful intensity of the cold, which made it nearly impossible to obtain food, and threatened a general famine; and to this was added a contagious distemper, introduced by some Dutch vessels. It carried off great numbers of the inhabitants, and no less than 35 of the converts fell victims to this terrible malady. But these trials furnished to the missionaries the most pleasing evidence of the sincerity of the baptized Greenlanders, who sought in every way to relieve the distressed, even when suffering themselves, and who were enabled to meet death with great peace and composure, "knowing in whom they had believed."

In 1758, the congregation at New Herrnhut having become numerous, the missionaries felt anxious to establish a new settlement, more contiguous to the Southlanders, many of whom had repeatedly solicited them to come and reside in their part of the country. On hearing of this, Matthew Stach, one of the first founders of the Greenland mission, but who was now in Europe, resolved on resuming his labors in the proposed new field. Accordingly, in May, 1758, he set sail with two assistant brethren, and arrived at New Herrnhut in safety. After resting a few weeks, these three brethren, with four Greenland families, proceeded in search of a situation for a new settlement; and after carefully exploring that part of the country to which their attention had been directed, they fixed upon an island about three miles from the main ocean, and at an equal distance from the Danish factory at Fisher's Bay. This spot did not afford such a prospect of the sea as they could desire, but it possessed three advantages of great importance, viz., fresh water, which is never entirely frozen over, a secure harbor for their boats, and a strand which remains open the whole year. Here, therefore, they pitched their tents, and called the place Lichtenfels.

Owing to the scarcity of building materials, they were likely to suffer, if not to perish, for want of shelter, when, by a most remarkable providence, beams suitable for their purpose were drifted on to the shore.

In 1760, the brethren at Lichtenfels baptized the first heathen family at that place, consisting of a man and his wife, with their son and daughter; and the congregation was now rapidly increasing. The next year they obtained a supply of building materials from Europe, and erected a commodious mission house and a spacious church, in which their numerous hearers could be accommodated. At New Herrnhut, in the mean time, the cause of Christ prospered, and between 30 and 40 persons were annually admitted to the church by baptism.

So remarkably had the lives and health of the Moravian brethren been preserved, that the original founders of the mission still labored with undiminished energy and zeal, having been almost 30 years in the field. But in 1763, the mission sustained a severe loss in the death of Frederick Boenish, who died at the age of 54, after 29 years of toil on the dreary coast of Greenland. In the winter of 1768, an aged angekok (sorcerer,) who had often heard the Gospel, became alarmed about his future state, renounced his mode of life, confessed that he and the other angekoks had deceived the people, and not only exhorted them to repent and turn to God, but sent messengers to the brethren at New Herrnhut with an earnest solicitation that a missionary might be sent to instruct them in the truths of the Gospel. The request was complied with; and so extensive was the awakening that took place among the natives, that in little more than twelve months two hundred were admitted into the church by baptism, at the two settlements of New Herrnhut and Lichtenfels.

In 1773, Christopher Michael Koenigseer

arrived in Greenland as superintendent of the mission in that country. Having received the advantages of a liberal education, he was well qualified to correct the translations of his predecessors; and he added to their little stock a Greenland hymn-book, a catechism, and some other pieces of a devotional nature.

In 1774, two of the brethren sailed from Lichtenfels, in order to form a third settlement in the south of Greenland. After a voyage of about six weeks, they arrived at the island of Onartok, where they were surprised to find, at the mouth of a warm spring, a verdant meadow, abounding with different kinds of flowers. But it was not a good place for obtaining provisions, and they fixed upon a spot a little distant, four miles from Lichtenfels, to which they gave the name of Lichtenau. Here they found an extensive field for their exertions, and their labors were crowned with the most pleasing success. Even at first considerable numbers of the heathen flocked to hear them preach, so that they were frequently obliged to worship in the open air, previous to the erection of a church; and during the winter of 1775 nearly 200 persons took up their abode with them. Many of these were baptized at the end of a few months, and in a few years the believing Greenlanders at Lichtenau exceeded in number those at either of the other settlements.

In 1782 Greenland was visited by a pestilence more fatal than that before noticed, and within a few months the deaths at New Herrnhut amounted to 180. The disease broke out later at Lichtenfels and Lichtenau, but it was equally fatal. Among the heathen Greenlanders the mortality was still more frightful; so that the country lost by this visitation nearly half its inhabitants.

About the same time the directors of the Greenland Trading Company issued a mandate, enjoining that fewer Greenlanders should reside together in settlements. This led to a partial dispersion of the converts, compelling them to fix their abodes ten or twelve miles from the missionaries, by which means they were deprived of regular instructions. But it was soon resolved that a native assistant should accompany each party, and by this means, and frequent visits from the missionaries, their spiritual wants were in a measure provided for.

In 1801, so great had been the success of the missionaries, the people on the western coast of Greenland had nearly all embraced Christianity, and of the women, the last one that remained in heathenism was baptized in January of this year. During many years following the above date the general course of things at the settlements was prosperous, although great trials were at times endured, both from sickness and the want of necessary food. Particularly in 1807, the war between Great Britain and Denmark interrupted communication, and supplies from Europe were entirely cut off. The utmost distress followed, and many died of hunger. It was not until 1811 that the British government permitted the Danes to send vessels with provisions to Greenland.

In a letter, written July 1818, the excellent Mr. Beck, of Lichtenau, says, "Of the greatest part of our congregation, we may say with confidence, that their words and walk give us great joy and encouragement. Many of the excluded persons have been led, with weeping and supplication, to confess the error of their ways, and to return to the fold; and those who remain faithful have been preserved in the conviction, that real happiness and rest are only to be found in Jesus." In the same year Mr. Beck wrote another letter, in which were stated the following interesting particulars: "The Southlanders, or those Greenlanders who reside south of Cape Farewell, though not quite wild, are ignorant of the things of God, and in reality a heathen race. There is another description of heathen who live on this side of Cape Farewell, and frequently join our people at the out-stations. These have acquired some knowledge of the truth, and have abandoned their gross heathenish practices."

The year 1823 was rendered remarkable, by the printing and circulation of the first complete New Testament in the Greenland language. The translation was completed in 1821, and sent to England, to be printed by the British and Foreign Bible Society. The manuscript was accompanied with a note, saying, "The Society will judge for themselves of the number of copies which will be wanted, when they are informed that the three congregations under the care of the brethren in Greenland consist of 1278 persons, viz., 359 at New Herrnhut, 331 at Lichtenfels, and 588 at Lichtenau."

In 1824, a new Moravian settlement was formed at the most southern extremity of Greenland, at a place called by the missionaries Fredericksthal. Building materials soon arrived, and a house and chapel were put up, and the people seemed anxious for religious instruction; and within a year twelve persons were admitted as candidates for baptism. A missionary at this place writes, under date Oct. 1825, "Fifty persons have returned hither from Lichtenau, and have been joined by about 200 heathen from this neighborhood; so that there are not far from 250 Greenlanders living here. This is, indeed, a most encouraging beginning, and our little chapel is already much too small. On the 19th of Dec. last, forty candidates were baptized, and during the winter many more were admitted to the same privilege. Since our arrival here in June 1824, 104 heathens have been baptized."

Having reached the period when the four Moravian settlements in Greenland were in successful operation, their subsequent history must be noticed more briefly. The characteristic zeal and earnest piety of these brethren have never been known to abate, and from year to year they have met with a degree of encouragement most cheering to their own hearts, and blessed in its results to the people for whose spiritual good they have toiled through more than 120 years.

One of the severest trials which these missionaries have had to endure, has been the repeated and long continued interference of the Danish government, forbidding the converted Greenlanders to dwell in communities near the Moravian settlements. It has been impossible in these circumstances to watch over and instruct them in a proper manner, for since the converts have increased and spread over a wider surface, the missionaries and their assistants have not been numerous enough to follow them into the various and often distant places, where they have been compelled to reside. Still, it is a remarkable and most gratifying fact, that the converts have generally been steadfast, and that apostacies have been of comparatively rare occurrence.

The injurious and dishonorable conduct of the government, to which they are prompted by commercial cupidity and national jealousy, has led the Moravian brethren to consider the importance of raising up native teachers, who, on giving evidence of piety, might act as assistant missionaries in the districts to which the converted natives are driven.

Accordingly in 1851 a school was established at New Herrnhut, for training native assistants, and strong hopes are entertained that this will in a measure repair the evils which an unrighteous course of legislation has produced. In their journal for 1852, the missionaries employ the following language of hope and cheerfulness:—

"However we may deplore the circumstances referred to, (the dispersion) we will not lose courage nor quit our post, but we will trust in the help of the Lord. Nor will we be too much disheartened by the order lately received from the Board of Trade, in Denmark, to baptize and receive no more heathen, but to direct them to the Danish mission. This proposition, however indicative of an unfriendly spirit, has reference chiefly to Fredericksthal, the most southern of our stations, since heathen (probably descendants of the ancient Normans) are found in any considerable number, only on the east coast, a coast almost inaccessible to us on account of the ice. From that quarter the congregation at Fredericksthal has hitherto had a considerable increase, while such as came only on a visit, and could not remain, took with them what they had heard, and assisted in spreading the Gospel."

In July, 1852, on the occasion of administering the sacrament of the Lord's Supper at Lichtenau, so many of the out-dwellers came together for the enjoyment of this sacred season, that the number of communicants amounted to 237.

The present state of the mission, at the four Moravian settlements in Greenland, will appear from the following LABRADOR.—On the 17th of May, 1752, four Moravian brethren sailed from London for Labrador, and on their arrival in a fine bay, the same year, they fixed upon a spot which they intended should be the place of their future settlement. But after the lapse of a few weeks the vessel proceeded farther to the northward, with the design of opening a commercial intercourse with the natives of the coast; and as the Esquimaux were fearful of venturing on board on account of the guns, a company of five mariners went among them in an unarmed boat, accompanied by Christian Erhardt, a member of the Moravian church, who, in his voyages to Greenland had obtained some knowledge of the language, and supposed he could make himself understood on the present occasion. But neither Erhardt nor his companions ever returned; and as the captain had no means of sending in search of them, he made his way back to the missionaries, whom he had left behind, and requested their assistance in working the ship back to Europe. As the best of his men had been lost, and there was no other method of accomplishing the voyage, they acceded to his request, and thus the mission was for a time abandoned.

In the spring of 1764, Jens Haven, who had previously labored as a missionary in Greenland, sailed from England, with the hope of conveying the blessings of the Gospel to the inhabitants of Labrador. He did not however proceed farther than Newfoundland, though he found there some Esquimaux chiefs, whom he addressed in language which they could perfectly understand.

In May, 1765, Jens Haven sailed again for Labrador, taking with him C. L. Drachart, formerly one of the Danish missionaries in Greenland, and two other brethren. They now penetrated farther into the interior of the country, and on their return to the coast they had an opportunity of addressing several hundreds of the natives, who seemed to listen with interest to the truths of the Gospel. As to the doctrine of depravity, however, they thought it might be true in respect to foreigners, but not in respect to themselves. No permanent settlement was made at this time, although land was purchased of the natives for that purpose.

In 1769, George III. presented 100,000 acres of land to the Moravian brethren, to aid them in commencing a mission on the coast of Labrador. A society was also formed in England the same year, in furtherance of this object. In May, 1770, the indefatigable Jens Haven, taking with him nine brethren, sailed again for Labrador, further to explore the coast, and if possible fix on a place for a settlement. They purchased a piece of land of the natives for that purpose, and returned again to England to make preparations for entering upon their work. Accordingly in the spring of 1771, a company of 14 persons, under the direction of Mr. Haven, proceeded to Labrador, and took possession of the spot formerly purchased, and gave it the name of Nain.—This place is on the east coast of Labrador, in N. lat. 55°, and is so intensely cold in winter, that rum placed in the open air freezes like water, and rectified spirits in a short time become as thick as oil. The brethren at once commenced the erection of a mission-house, the frame and materials for which they had brought with them from England, and by great exertions it was completed before the setting in of winter. They could, however, obtain but few of the necessaries of life; and as much delay was experienced in getting supplies from England, they began to look forward to all the distresses of a famine. But in season to prevent this extremity, and at a moment when they had only two pieces of meat and a few berries left, a vessel arrived from England, bringing the needed relief.

The conduct of the Esquimaux towards the missionaries was uniformly friendly, from their first arrival. In former times, no European could have passed a night among these savages without hazarding his life; but now the missionaries, regardless of the inclemency of the season, traveled across the ice and snow to visit them in their winter houses, and were hospitably entertained for several days and nights together. These visits were often returned; and in consequence of the friendly intercourse thus opened, the natives not only asked the advice of the brethren in all difficult cases, but even chose them as umpires in their disputes, and invariably submitted to their arbitration. They were also in a mood to listen with attention to the preaching of the Word, and at times they seemed to be deeply impressed; still they were savages, habituated to the gratification of the most brutal passions, and always ready with some excuse for their sins.

munication, and supplies from Europe were entirely cut off. The utmost distress followed, and many died of hunger. It was not until 1811 that the British government permitted the Danes to send vessels with provisions to Greenland.

In a letter, written July 1818, the excellent Mr. Beck, of Lichtenau, says, "Of the greatest part of our congregation, we may say with confidence, that their words and walk give us great joy and encouragement. Many of the excluded persons have been led, with weeping and supplication, to confess the error of their ways, and to return to the fold; and those who remain faithful have been preserved in the conviction, that real happiness and rest are only to be found in Jesus." In the same year Mr. Beck wrote another letter, in which were stated the following interesting particulars: "The Southlanders, or those Greenlanders who reside south of Cape Farewell, though not quite wild, are ignorant of the things of God, and in reality a heathen race. There is another description of heathen who live on this side of Cape Farewell, and frequently join our people at the out-stations. These have acquired some knowledge of the truth, and have abandoned their gross heathenish practices."

The year 1823 was rendered remarkable, by the printing and circulation of the first complete New Testament in the Greenland language. The translation was completed in 1821, and sent to England, to be printed by the British and Foreign Bible Society. The manuscript was accompanied with a note, saying, "The Society will judge for themselves of the number of copies which will be wanted, when they are informed that the three congregations under the care of the brethren in Greenland consist of 1278 persons, viz., 359 at New Herrnhut, 331 at Lichtenfels, and 588 at Lichtenau."

In 1824, a new Moravian settlement was formed at the most southern extremity of Greenland, at a place called by the missionaries Fredericksthal. Building materials soon arrived, and a house and chapel were put up, and the people seemed anxious for religious instruction; and within a year twelve persons were admitted as candidates for baptism. A missionary at this place writes, under date Oct. 1825, "Fifty persons have returned hither from Lichtenau, and have been joined by about 200 heathen from this neighborhood; so that there are not far from 250 Greenlanders living here. This is, indeed, a most encouraging beginning, and our little chapel is already much too small. On the 19th of Dec. last, forty candidates were baptized, and during the winter many more were admitted to the same privilege. Since our arrival here in June 1824, 104 heathens have been baptized."

Having reached the period when the four Moravian settlements in Greenland were in successful operation, their subsequent history must be noticed more briefly. The characteristic zeal and earnest piety of these brethren have never been known to abate, and from year to year they have met with a degree of encouragement most cheering to their own hearts, and blessed in its results to the people for whose spiritual good they have toiled through more than 120 years.

One of the severest trials which these missionaries have had to endure, has been the repeated and long continued interference of the Danish government, forbidding the converted Greenlanders to dwell in communities near the Moravian settlements. It has been impossible in these circumstances to watch over and instruct them in a proper manner, for since the converts have increased and spread over a wider surface, the missionaries and their assistants have not been numerous enough to follow them into the various and often distant places, where they have been compelled to reside. Still, it is a remarkable and most gratifying fact, that the converts have generally been steadfast, and that apostacies have been of comparatively rare occurrence.

The injurious and dishonorable conduct of the government, to which they are prompted by commercial cupidity and national jealousy, has led the Moravian brethren to consider the importance of raising up native teachers, who, on giving evidence of piety, might act as assistant missionaries in the districts to which the converted natives are driven.

Accordingly in 1851 a school was established at New Herrnhut, for training native assistants, and strong hopes are entertained that this will in a measure repair the evils which an unrighteous course of legislation has produced. In their journal for 1852, the missionaries employ the following language of hope and cheerfulness:—

"However we may deplore the circumstances referred to, (the dispersion) we will not lose courage nor quit our post, but we will trust in the help of the Lord. Nor will we be too much disheartened by the order lately received from the Board of Trade, in Denmark, to baptize and receive no more heathen, but to direct them to the Danish mission. This proposition, however indicative of an unfriendly spirit, has reference chiefly to Fredericksthal, the most southern of our stations, since heathen (probably descendants of the ancient Normans) are found in any considerable number, only on the east coast, a coast almost inaccessible to us on account of the ice. gations are obliged to spend the warm months away from the settlements, in quest of provisions for the winter. They are thus deprived of instructions, and subjected to many temptations. But as a mitigation of this evil it is to be gratefully considered, that in their dispersion the converts often carry the news of a Saviour to the heathen at a distance, and bring in many to the settlements who otherwise never would have heard of a missionary, or of the way of salvation.

On the whole, therefore, while the trials of the missionaries have been great and peculiar, the results of missionary labor in those frozen and inhospitable regions have been happy and encouraging to a remarkable degree.

The present state of the missions at the four stations in Labrador, is indicated in the following

REV. E. D. MOORE.

LAC-QUI-PARLE: Once a station of the Am. Board among the Sioux Indians.

LAGOS: A large, well-built, and populous town, situated on a small island at the mouth of a lagoon in the Bight of Benin, West Africa, about 36 miles east of Badagry. It is accessible to vessels drawing ten or eleven feet of water, and has a water communication far into the interior, and for hundreds of miles along the coast. It is a great commanding point, from whence Christianity may go forth into the interior. The coast station of the Yoruba mission of the Church Missionary Society has been removed from Badagry to Lagos.

LAHAINA: A town on the Island of Maui (S. I.), which is rapidly increasing in commercial importance. In the year 1844, 300 ships visited its harbor.—A station of the American Board.

LAHAINALUNA: Upper Lahaina, a station of the American Board in the Sandwich Islands, on the north-east of Maui.

LAHOR: The chief city of the Punjaub, Northern India, a station of the Presbyterian Board.

LA POINTE: A station of the American Board among the Ojibwas.

LAUNCESTON: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in Van Dieman's Land.

LEFAASALELEAGA: A station of the London Missionary Society on the island of Savaii, one of the Samoan group.

LEGUAN: A beautiful island in the mouth of the Essequibo river, containing 22 sugar estates. A station of the London Missionary Society.

LEICESTER MOUNTAIN: Station of the Church Missionary Society in the Mountain District of Sierra Leone, South Africa, about three miles from Freetown.

LEKATLONG: Station of the London Missionary Society in South Africa, on the Hart river, among a branch of the Batlapi nation; one missionary, 300 communicants.

LEONE: A station of the London Missionary Society on the island of Tutuila, one of the Samoan group.

LEOPOLD: A town of liberated Africans and station of the Church Missionary Society in the parish of St. Peter, Sierra Leone, W. Africa, a little south of Freetown.

LEPA: A station of the London Missionary Society, on the island of Upolu, one of the Samoan group.

LETTY: One of the Banda Islands, a group of the Moluccas, in the Indian Archipelago.

LE ULUMAEGA: A station of the London Missionary Society on the island of Upolu, one of the Samoas.

LEW-CHEW, or LOO-CHOO: The kingdom of Lew-Chew consists of the island bearing this name, the various small islands lying around it, with the entire Madjicosimah group on the south-west, the whole number being 36. The island of Lew-chew is about 60 miles long and from 12 to 15 wide; and it is nearly equidistant from Japan and China. Coral reefs line the shores; and in some places they seem to have been thrown up by volcanic agency, or to have been raised so as to form ledges along the beach. The climate is one of the most delightful and healthy in this region of the world. The vegetation partakes more of the tropics than the adjacent coasts of China.

Cities and Villages.—Napa, or Nafa, lies on the river, the mouth of which is known as Napa-kiang; and it stretches inland from the beach for more than a mile, most of the houses being in view from the anchorage. Shui, or Shudi, is the residence of the court, and is prettily situated on the ridge and side of a hill, about three miles from Napa, the two being connected by a broad paved road, in some places elevated above the marsh with great labor. Shui is a well-built town; and the stream which runs down the hill, adds greatly to its appearance. The waters are collected into pools and tanks for the convenience of the people, and its banks are connected by stone bridges of great durability; while the houses are scattered along the steep sides, intermixed with ledges of stone and trees in a most picturesque manner. The palace is a collection of large buildings, inclosed and defended by a stone wall of great solidity. The buildings themselves are of an ordinary description; but the flights of stone steps, the ornamented triune gateways, and the paved court-yards, with detached trees and arbors, exhibit some skill.

The streets of Napa and Shui are partly macadamized, with open gutters at their sides; some of them are wide enough for carriages. The road between these two cities is well paved; but elsewhere the common highways are rough, stony, and painful to the feet; and they seem to have had no mending since they were made. The markets are held in the squares and corners of the streets, and present only a miserable assortment of the commonest necessities of life.

The villages are often prettily situated; but all of them exhibit proofs of the poverty and oppression of their inhabitants.

The People.—In stature the natives of Lew-chew are below their neighbors; but they are compactly built and well-proportioned. In general the people are healthy, though their countenances indicate the depressing effect of unremitted labor. The serious aspect of the Lew-chewans strikes a visitor as soon as he lands. Groups of women, with children around, are seen along the highways. The wrinkled, grimed, and care-worn countenances of these poor creatures offer a melancholy proof of their toil and exposure, and the low position which they hold in society.

The color of the Lew-chewans is a pleasing, reddish-olive tint, presenting a lighter or darker shade, according to exposure. In general however, it is darker than that of the Chinese.

Products of the Soil.—The greatest part of the population is engaged in agriculture; and the fields show abundant evidence of the unceasing toil bestowed upon them, in which the women take a large share; but the productions of Lew-chew are less varied than those of China or Japan. Timber and fuel are supplied from the forests in the northern part of the island, among which the camphor and tal-low-tree are found.

Dwellings.—The arrangement of a Lew-chewan dwelling is very simple, it being fitted only for a warm climate, and so open that in the latitude of 26° north it must often prove an indifferent shelter. The roof is supported by a double row of posts, on its sides, about four feet apart; and beams extend across to assist in upholding the roof in the centre. These beams and the rows of joists running across, as well as the inner of the two on the outside, are provided with grooves, in which panels slide, so as to form, when closed, the sides of the house and the division of the rooms. The floor is elevated about two feet above the ground; and it is usually covered with stuffed mats an inch thick, on which are sometimes spread felt carpets. The space between the outside posts forms a porch, sheltered from the rain. In unpleasant weather sashes, covered with oiled or thin paper, are slid along the inside grooves, imperfectly supplying the place of glass, and furnishing a twilight to the inmates, who warm themselves with braziers of charcoal. The porch serves many purposes; and parts of it are partitioned off in the rear of the houses; so that the whole establishment is under one roof, and can be thrown into one room. No chairs or tables are seen in the houses, all persons eating and sleeping upon soft mats. A few low stands are used for writing-desks. The mats and felted carpets harbor an abundance of fleas; and mosquitoes annoy the inmates. But houses of the better sort are cleanly.

The houses are usually placed within inclosures, the walls of which are six or seven feet high, and surmounted with plants, completely concealing the house. The entrance to each yard is usually at the end of a short lane running up from the street; but no passer-by can look within.

Dress.—The dress of the Lew-chewans consists of loose robes, not unlike night-gowns, lapping over in front, and secured by a girdle. The capacious bosom thus made is usually pretty well filled with a variety of papers, books, and other articles, so as to give the wearer a corpulent appearance. The feet are protected by grass sandals, fastened by a strap passing between the first and second toe. The women are always modestly dressed. The men wear two hair-pins of brass or white copper to secure their hair, which is done up in a coil on the top of the head, with a bow above the coil, through which the large pin is thrust. Much time is daily spent in arranging and oiling this tresseau. One of the pins has an ornamental end, like a flower, nearly an inch broad, which always points forward. The other is not much unlike a skewer, four or five inches long, and thrust in sideways. Females collect their hair in a knot on the side of the head, where the ends are kept from falling over the shoulders by a skewer. All married women tattoo or color the back of their hands and fingers blue. Neither sex wear any head-dress; but official rank is denoted by an oblong flat-topped cap, covered with red, yellow, purple or variegated silk, the last being the badge of the highest. In rainy, or cold weather, an overcoat of thick cotton, forming a comfortable defence, is worn by the gentry.

Language.—The language of these islanders is a dialect of the Japanese, differing so greatly, however, that the people of the two countries cannot very readily understand each other.

The Arts of Life.—Workshops are found in various places, occupying favorable positions near the markets; and as their fronts are open to the street, all the operations of the workmen can easily be seen. The mechanical arts are at a low point among the Lew-chewans, judging from these shops, in which one sees tools and manipulations strikingly resembling those of the Chinese.

Religion.—The religion of the Lew-chewans partakes of that of their two neighbors, from whom they have derived most of their civilization. They have ancestral worship, the ritual of which is mainly taken from the Chinese; from whom the adoration paid to Confucius is also derived. The temples are numerous. They are among the best structures in the island, affording lodging-places for travelers within their precincts, as well as dwellings for the priests. The latter possess but little influence in the government; but they seem to receive a good support from devotees.

Government.—The government is a hereditary monarchy; and the political institutions, like those of China, are founded on the writings of Confucius; who is highly revered here, as well as in Japan, as a wise and safe guide. The kingdom has been under the sway of the princes of Satsuma for more than two centuries. The present hereditary sovereign of the kingdom is a minor, about thirteen years old; and the administration of affairs is nominally in the hands of an officer called "tsung-li kwán," or general superintendent, usually known as the regent, assisted by three others, called "pu-ching," or treasurers, one for each of the prefectures into which the island is divided. No soldiers or arms of any kind are seen in the streets. The power of the government seems to be maintained by means of a system of espionage, in which the gentry act as policemen, their duty being to mark every thing which is done by the meanest person. The servile fear which the system has caused in the mind of the lowest beggar, rendering him suspicious of his neighbors and kindred, stands in lieu of the actual presence of the officer.

Foreign Policy.—The Lew-chewans, situated between the powerful empires of China and Japan, have consulted their safety by a system of strict non-intercourse; and their gentle disposition has led them to exhibit kindness to all who have been cast on their shores, or have visited their ports, prompted in a measure too by the conviction that kindness had no reprisals to fear. For a long time they were able to maintain their independence by paying homage to their neighbors; but, in 1609, the Prince of Satsuma, who rules in the southwestern corner of Kiu-siu, compelled their sovereign to go to his capital, Kagosima, and the subjects to pay him tribute and receive his tax-gatherers.—S. WELLS WILLIAMS, in Missionary Herald for June, 1854, abridged.

MISSION.

The kind hospitality of the Lew-Chew people to British and American vessels which touch at their islands, or were wrecked on their coasts, excited a deep interest in their behalf among the officers of the British navy; and between February 1843 and Dec. 1845, more than £1,000 were raised for the purpose of sending the Gospel to them, and £700 more in 1846; and a Board of Trustees was appointed to manage the affairs of the mission. Dr. Bettelheim, a converted Jew, a physician, and a learned man, with the sanction of the bishop of London, was sent out in Sept. 1845, and arrived at Lew-Chew in January, 1846.

He was met on board the vessel which conveyed him by a French Catholic missionary, who greeted him with a cordial welcome. Fearing that permission to settle would be denied him, he effected a landing with his wife and his effects, by getting into the native boats that came out to visit the ship. The authorities, however, refused to give him leave to remain, pleading poverty and scarcity of food; and he was requested to give up his design of stopping, and to embark on the vessel that brought him. But this he declined to do, returning a good present for an answer.

After the vessel had sailed, he was invited to go and look at a house intended for his residence, but finding it low and damp, he declined it, and was afterwards shown to the temple, an old, but spacious and pleasantly situated wooden building, which was offered him on condition that the keeper of the idols should reside in the house, the idols being screened off by a sliding partition; and he accepted it. But three guard stations, with five men in each, were arranged near the house, under pretence of protection, but really for espionage.

For about a year he was able to carry on missionary operations, maintaining a service in his own house with his servants, and preaching to the people as he met them in the streets. Crowds gathered around him wherever he raised his humble pulpit, upon a stone, or on the corner of a street, in the market, in the roads and lanes, or elsewhere. Wherever he halted, there the passers-by stopped, and all the people in the neighborhood came out to hear him. The stalls were idle, sellers and buyers forgot their trade, while apparently engaged in a higher business. "I have seen," says Dr. B., "the coolies lay down their burdens and quietly listen; laborers lean their heads on the handles of their rural tools, and rest in pensive attention; thoroughfares were obstructed, and roads and open places rendered impassable from the masses of the people crowded in the space around me; none forbidding, none driving them away, much less preventing their assembling."

But suddenly all was changed. It was reported that the king was dead; but Dr. B. thought it was but a feint to justify the officers in changing their course. Immediately all things assumed a new aspect. On the very day which he supposed to be the day of the king's burial, he was assaulted with stones and sticks in the open road, and his life endangered. His appeal to the government was only met by a denial of the assault. Soon after, the people, who used to crowd around him whenever he went into the street, now ran from him: and whenever he passed through a street, all the shops were closed, and the doors and windows of the houses closed. "First there was a bustle, a running here and there, a rattling and clapping of shutters, doors, and windows, as if a devil incarnate had come in their way; green grocers deserted their stalls, laborers ceased their work, and crews left their boats; women dragged their children in-doors in such haste and fright as made them scream out when they saw me again far off. Often the noise, confusion, and bewilderment rose to such a pitch that I was not always free from fear myself, and almost dreaded to walk out."

All his appeals to the government were ineffectual. It seemed to be a concerted, systematic movement on the part of the authorities to drive him from the country; and the people, being held under an oppressive despotism, were compelled to act according to their orders. This course of incessant annoyance was continued, with increasing rigor up to the time of his writing a letter to Rev. Dr. Peter Parker, of China, which was published at Canton in 1850, from which this statement is derived.

We learn from recent intelligence that Dr. Bettelheim has succeeded in maintaining his position at Lew-Chew; and a layman, after laboring seven years in London as a city missionary, has been sent to his assistance. The visit of the American squadron has operated favorably; and the prospects of the mission are brightening. Three persons have received baptism in Napa; and another is a candidate for the same privilege at Shuy.

An appeal has been issued by the committee having charge of this mission, for the men and the means of a speedy enlargement. "The Lord," it is said, "seems to be preparing an open door for entering Japan;" and "the machinery and materials for a future mission in that kingdom are in preparation at Lew-Chew."

LIBERIA: A republic on the western coast of Africa. Its civilized population, consisting of free colored people and emancipated slaves from the United States, and their descendants, native Africans rescued from slave traders, and a few other natives who have become civilized, may be estimated at about 10,000. Its native population, entitled by treaties to protection and the means of civilization, and to all the privileges of citizenship when civilized, are supposed to be two or three hundred thousand.

Government.—The government consists of a president and vice-president, elected once in two years, a senate and house of representatives, chosen by the people, a judiciary, secretaries of the necessary departments, and other executive officers, appointed by the president and senate. None but persons of color can hold office, hold land, or be citizens.

The territory has been purchased, at various times, by the American Colonization Society, and the emigrants, with few exceptions, sent out at its expense. The government was administered at first wholly, and afterwards in part, by officers appointed by that Society, till the growth of the colony and the extent of its commercial relations required the establishment of an independent government, which could form commercial treaties with the several powers of Europe. By advice of the Society, therefore, the colony proclaimed its independence August 24, 1847; and the government, under its present constitution, was organized at the commencement of the succeeding year. It has been recognized by the principal nations of Christendom.

Education.—The laws of the republic require a free school in every settlement, and provide for raising money to defray the expense. At present, however, the whole educational establishment, including the primary schools required by law, are supported by various missionary societies in the United States, and a full account of them will be given in connection with the several missions. In addition to these the legislature has incorporated a college, and given it a valuable tract of one hundred acres, on the north bank of the St. Paul's, about twelve miles from Monrovia. For its establishment and support, funds are held by the Trustees of Donations for Education in Liberia, incorporated by the Legislature of Massachusetts.

The provisions for religious instruction and worship, like those for education, are connected with the several missions, and to a great extent supported by societies in the United States.

Extent.—The name Liberia, however, has a wider application. The whole country known by that name extends along the western coast of Africa, from Manna Point, lat. 7° 25' N., long. 12° 34' W., to the river San Pedro, lat. 4° 44' N., long. 6° 37' W. The entire length of its sea-coast is about 520 miles. Of this coast about 390 miles, extending from Manna Point on the north-west, to Grand Sesters, belongs to the republic of Liberia. The remainder of the coast, extending about 130 miles to the river San Pedro, the extreme eastern boundary, belongs to Maryland in Liberia. Its civilized settlements were planted by the Maryland Colonization Society. Its government has always been entirely distinct from that of the republic. It has this year, 1854, passed from its colonial state to that of national independence. These two republics intend to unite under one government. In respect to their religious interests, they are already united, and may be considered as one. The territory, having been purchased of numerous small tribes, extends inland as far as the rights of the several tribes extended; in some places, sixty miles, in others, only fourteen. From Grand Cape Mount to Grand Sesters, 286 miles, it averages about forty-five miles in width, and contains 12,870 square miles, or 8,236,800 acres. If the remainder averages twenty miles in width, which is a low estimate, the whole contains 17,270 square miles, or 11,052,800 acres. It is nearly all susceptible of cultivation; and it is a low estimate of its fertility to say, that every cultivated acre will, on an average, furnish the necessaries of life for one inhabitant. For procuring luxuries or acquiring wealth, they would need other employments, or larger farms. Settled as densely as Sierra Leone, it would contain 1,740,000 inhabitants.

Liberia is every where well watered by numerous small streams, but has no very large rivers. Sand-bars at the mouths of the rivers prevent the entrance of large vessels; and, at about twenty miles from the coast, their navigation is obstructed by rapids. Here is the base of the mountain range which divides the waters of the Atlantic from those which flow into the Niger, the great river of Central Africa. From this range, spurs and detached elevations run down between the rivers, in some places quite to the coast, forming, as at Cape Mount and Cape Mesurado, bold promontories. According to the best information yet obtained, the summit of this range, beyond which the waters flow eastward and north-eastward into the Niger, cannot be more than 150 or 200 miles from the coast.

Harbors.—The coast is deficient in natural harbors; but in several places, good harbors might probably be constructed at a moderate expense. The whole coast, however, is one continuous roadstead, where, at any season of the year, ships may lie at anchor within a mile or two of the shore, and landing-places for boats occur as often as once in five or ten miles.

Productions.—The productions are those of other tropical countries. Rice is the principal grain. It is grown on uplands, without irrigation. Yams, sweet potatoes, cassada, and other esculent roots, are easily raised, as are oranges, bananas, and other tropical fruits. Coffee is indigenous, of several varieties, including the Mocha, as are also several varieties of cotton. Indigo is a troublesome weed. Another native production is the Malaguetta pepper, or "Grains of Paradise," from the abundance of which, the coast was formerly known as "the Grain Coast." Sugar-cane, ginger, and arrow-root, are easily cultivated. Palm-oil is made in large quantities, and camwood and ivory are brought from the interior for exportation. The waters furnish fish abundantly, and of good quality. The domestic animals for food are bullocks, of small size and little value for the yoke, goats, swine, and poultry.

Climate.—The climate is a healthy one for its native population; as is evident from their well-developed, vigorous forms, their usual freedom from disease, and the age to which they live. It must, of course, be adapted to the constitutions of their descendants, in proportion as they retain the constitutional peculiarities of their ancestors. Foreigners, however, from temperate climates, whatever may be their ancestry, must undergo an acclimating fever, within a few weeks after their arrival. To this rule, the exceptions are too few to be of any account. The fever is sometimes violent, and even fatal; but in most cases, where the constitution was previously unimpaired, it is not severe, and yields readily to judicious treatment; and in many, it is very slight, not even confining the patient to his house for a single day. White men never become perfectly acclimated; though, with prudence and occasional visits to their native air, they have been able to live and labor usefully for five, ten, and even twenty years. Visitors may avoid the fever by spending their nights on board their ships, half a mile, or even less, from the shore.

Native Inhabitants.—Liberia belongs to that division of Africa, called Nigritia by the Latin geographers; Belâd-es-Sudan—that is, the Land of the Blacks—by the Arabs; and Guinea by the Portuguese. These names are unknown to the natives, and the last is of unknown origin. It extends eastward across the continent, north of the equator, even into the valley of the Nile. In its inhabitants, the form, features, complexion, and all the characteristics of the negro, are most perfectly developed. They appear as slaves on some of the oldest monuments of ancient Egypt. They were carried as slaves across the Great Desert, and sold to the Carthaginians. They have always been hunted and seized as slaves by the Arab, Moorish, and mixed races on the Great Desert and its southern border. After the discovery of the western coast by the Portuguese, they were bought and carried as slaves, first to Europe, and afterwards to the West Indies and the American continent. This last calamity, however, has fallen with almost equal weight on the Zingian or Zambezan races, south of the equator. So far as is known, they have always been divided into numerous small tribes, ignorant of letters, and with but slight knowledge, if any, of some of the simplest arts of civilization. A large majority—a well-informed writer supposes five-sixths—of them are slaves. Wives are bought, worked as slaves, and sold, according to each man's ability and caprice. Favorite wives, and other slaves, sometimes in great numbers, are killed in sacrifice on the death of a king. Slaves are sometimes killed, to give solemnity to the ratification of a treaty. In some of the tribes, cannibalism is occasionally practised; but to a less extent, probably, than in some of the Zingian tribes farther south.

Religion.—See Africa, Western.

Discovery.—The first discovery of this coast of which we have any authentic account, was made by Piedro de Cintra, in 1462. He was in the employment of the King of Portugal, to whom Pope Martin V. had given all the territories he might discover, from Cape Bojador to the East Indies, to be conquered and "recovered to Christ and his church." The natives had never seen ships before. The few that came off to him, 16 miles beyond Cape Mesurado, in canoes carrying two or three each, were naked, had some wooden darts and small knives, two targets and three bows, rings about their ears and one in the nose, and teeth, which seemed to be human, strung about their necks. It does not appear that he carried away any of them as slaves, though that practice had been followed by most explorers on the west coast of Africa, since it was first commenced by Antonio Gonzales, in 1440.

For nearly a century and a half the Portuguese were masters of this coast. They had forts or trading houses at numerous points, of which Gallinas, Cape Mount, Cape Mesurado, Junk river, Sesters and Sangwin seem to have been the most important.

Slave Trade.—The slave trade to the West Indies was commenced in 1503, and encouraged by edicts of Ferdinand V. of Spain, in 1511, and of Charles V., in 1515. From that time forward, procuring slaves from the natives and selling them to the Spaniards, was a principal branch of their business. Their influence was so predominant, that before 1600 the Portuguese had become the language in which business was usually transacted, and was generally understood by natives who had dealings with foreigners.

The Pope's Grant not recognized.—The English and Dutch, being Protestants, cared nothing for the Pope's grant to Portugal; and the French soon learned to disregard it, claiming that they had discovered the coast and traded at Sesters before the Portuguese, and even as early as 1346. The English took the lead. In 1553, having already made two voyages to Morocco, Thomas Windham, though the Portuguese had threatened him and his crew with death, visited the whole coast from the river Sesters to Benin. In 1554, Captain John Lok, with three ships, reached Cape Mesurado, sailed along the coast to Benin, and brought home "certain black slaves," the first, so far as we know, ever seen in England. In 1588, the English "African Company" was incorporated for the more vigorous prosecution of commerce in this region. The Portuguese did what they could, and hired the natives to do what they could, to resist these encroachments. They destroyed the ships of the intruders, and killed or enslaved their crews. But by 1604 they were driven from all their posts, from Cape Mesurado to Cape Palmas; and a few years later, the Dutch had possession at Cape Mount, and the English at Sierra Leone. The Portuguese, however, did not wholly quit the country. Being driven from the coast, some of them, with their mulatto descendants, retired inland, and endeavored, with some success, to monopolize the trade between the interior and the coast, and were gradually lost by amalgamation with the natives.

Portuguese Missions.—Of the missionary labors of the Portuguese while in possession of the coast, we have no particular information; but, as the Pope gave them the country for that purpose; as they had chapels and priests at all their settlements; as we have accounts of their efforts and success at Sierra Leone and other places; and as they are said, when driven from the coast, to have built chapels and tried to make converts in the interior, there can be no doubt that some such labors were performed. From them the natives probably first received the idea of a Creator, whose existence they admit, though they never worship him. The word "fetish," by which they designate a consecrated post or any object of their superstitious reverence, is derived from a Portuguese word, signifying a charm, such as witches are supposed to use. From the same source, they may have received the term "devil," which they apply to the disguised chief of certain nocturnal orgies. These are the only remnants of their religious influence, which even conjecture can now detect.

Character and Influence of Traders—Slave Trade.—The character of the traders to this coast, whether Portuguese, French, English or Dutch, appears to have been, with very few exceptions, of the worst kind. Many of the English and Dutch were "interlopers," trading there in violation of the laws of their own countries, and indeed of all laws whatever. From about 1600, pirates began to mingle with them, and the crews of traders sometimes joined the pirates, and often copied their examples. The slave trade raged with increasing violence. Not only were slaves bought of the natives, and wars excited for the purpose of making slaves for the market, but negroes were seized indiscriminately and carried off, whenever it could be done without too much danger. The custom of "panyaring," that is, alluring an individual, beyond the reach of protection, and then seizing him or her as a slave, became common; and the negro trader who was employed to panyar his countryman one day, was sometimes panyared himself the next. From 1688 to 1697, the power of the "buccaneers" in the West Indies was broken, and they were dispersed. They spread themselves over the whole Atlantic and Indian Oceans, and in Western Africa, for about 30 years, were one of the strongest powers. Besides other places, they several times plundered Sierra Leone, which was one of their favorite resorts. They held the bay next south of that cape for seven years, till, in 1730, they were broken up by the French. Meanwhile, the Genoese first, and then the French, obtained the exclusive privilege of furnishing negro slaves for the Spanish colonies. In 1713, the English government, by the famous Assiento treaty, obtained it for the South Sea Company for thirty years. What multitudes were sold, and how profitably, may be judged from the fact, that in 1739 England sold out the remaining four years to Spain for a hundred thousand pounds—nearly half a million dollars.

Under such influences, the character and temper of the natives became such that, in 1730, not a single European factory was in operation on the whole coast of what is now Liberia; traders found it dangerous to go on shore; and trade was carried on by sailing along the coast, and coming to anchor where the natives, by building a fire, indicated that they had slaves or other articles for sale. This state of things seems to have continued, with little change, to the close of that century. The testimony concerning the character of the slave trade, laid before the British Parliament from 1791 to 1807, showed that in other parts of Africa, slaves were collected and kept for shipment in factories; but on the "windward coast," where Liberia now is, "every tree was a factory," and ships stopped and traded wherever a signal was made.

Origin and History of the Colony.—About the year 1770 the celebrated theologian, Rev. Samuel Hopkins of Newport, R. I., began to preach against slavery and the slave trade. April 7, 1773, he called on his neighbor, Rev. Ezra Stiles, afterwards President of Yale College, for conversation on his design "to make some negro ministers, and send them to Guinea." There were two young natives of Africa in his church, whom he wished to educate for that purpose. Mr. Stiles thought there might be some prospect of success if thirty or forty were sent, and a society formed for the purpose. They "left the matter to further thought." August 31, 1773, they published a circular, asking contributions for the education of these young men. The plan was received with favor by the ministers of Berkshire County, Mass., by those of several counties in Connecticut, and by the Presbytery of New York. The young men left New York for Princeton, to be educated, Nov. 21, 1774, and three days after, bills were drawn on a gentleman in London for fifty pounds sterling, of which thirty pounds were given by the Edinburgh Society for promoting Christian Knowledge, and five pounds by some one in London; and assurances were received, both from England and Scotland, that more would be given, if needed. About as much more was raised in America, besides one hundred dollars for which Mr. Hopkins had, some years before, sold a slave, and which he now devoted to this purpose.

When the plan of connecting a colony with the mission was first fully adopted, and how far it was understood by contributors in England, Scotland, and America, is not known. April 29, 1784, Mr. Hopkins says, it "has been on foot for some time." This, it was thought, would not only be for the benefit of those who should return to their native country, but would do much to stop the slave trade, and to introduce Christianity into Africa.

March 7, 1787, his friends knew that he had been desirous to attempt such a settlement "for years." He was glad to learn that "certain Friends and other Dissenters in Britain have joined to carry this design into execution," on the plan, as he supposed, of "the late Dr. Fothergill." Dr. William Thornton, a native of Virginia, had been in Newport some weeks, proposing to form such a settlement with free blacks from New England. A number volunteered to go with him; but the attempt failed for want of funds, perhaps, because others thought, with Mr. Hopkins, that Dr. Thornton, though "an honest man," was "too flighty and unsteady to be the head" of such an enterprise.

In that year, 1787, Granville Sharp and other British philanthropists commenced the colony at Sierra Leone, with some hundreds of colored people from America, who had served in the British army during the war of Independence. After some reverses it has grown to a colony of more than fifty thousand inhabitants.

The same year, the Constitution of the United States was formed, by which the several States were deprived of the power of continuing the slave trade more than twenty years.

In 1789, Dr. Hopkins wrote to Granville Sharp, to learn whether colonists from America could be received at Sierra Leone, and also whether the character and government of that colony were such that he could recommend it. He was then acquainted with "a number of religious blacks," who were ready to form a church, with one of their own number as pastor, and to settle in Africa, to introduce Christianity and civilization, and to receive others who might wish to emigrate. In 1791 he wished the Emancipation Society in Connecticut to embrace this object in its charter. In a sermon against slavery and the slave trade, May 17, 1793, and more fully in its appendix, he urged almost precisely the same plan of colonizing, which has since been carried out. In 1799, in the last work he ever published, he expressed the same desires, and the same hopes that they would yet be realized.

The emancipation of slaves and their colonization in some part of America had been a favorite idea of Mr. Jefferson, and others in Virginia, as early as 1786, and probably earlier. In the autumn of 1800, an extensive and dangerous conspiracy was discovered among the slaves in and around Richmond. Unwilling to put so many to death for such a cause, the House of Delegates, December 31, in secret session, requested the Governor to correspond with the President of the United States as to procuring land out of the State, to which they might be removed. The correspondence continued till 1805, and the plan was so modified as to express a preference for Africa as a place of a settlement, but without sovereignty, and to include free blacks and slaves who might be emancipated. The President, Mr. Jefferson, applied to the Sierra Leone Company to receive the proposed colonists, but was refused.

In 1807, Congress passed an act prohibiting the importation of slaves after the end of that year. Nearly all the States had prohibited it many years before. Previous acts had forbidden American citizens to trade in slaves between foreign countries. The same year the British government, moved by evidence of the nature of the trade, collected principally at Sierra Leone, abolished the traffic by British subjects.

About 1810, Samuel J. Mills and others, theological students at Andover, began to collect information concerning the colored people of the United States, bond and free, and were soon brought to the conclusion that, in the words often used by Mills, "we must take care of them, or they will ruin us." They endeavored to rouse attention to the subject by the press, and by correspondence and conversation with leading men. Mills thought of colonizing them north of the Ohio, but some of his associates early saw that any colony on this continent would soon be overrun by white people, and would be a failure. This was one principal object for which he afterwards resided some time in New Jersey, where he procured the establishment of the "African school" at Parsippany.

About 1811, Captain Paul Cuffee, a colored man of New Bedford, carried 38 colored emigrants to Sierra Leone, in his own vessel, and thirty of them at his own expense. This movement was to have been more extensive, but it was stopped by the war of 1812. Ann Mifflin, of the Society of Friends, in Pennsylvania, advocated a colony in Africa. Her views were communicated to Mr. Jefferson, who expressed his warm approbation in 1811. February 15, 1815, the Rev. Robert Finley, D. D., of New Jersey, wrote to a friend, asking his opinion of an attempt to found a colony of colored people on the coast of Africa. In February, 1816, General Charles Fenton Mercer, of the Virginia House of Delegates, became acquainted with the proceedings of that house in 1800-1805, and pledged himself to renew the subject, if he should be re-elected at the next session. He soon after communicated the facts and his intention to two friends, Elias B. Caldwell and Francis S. Key, of Washington, who pledged their coöperation.

The same year, probably towards its close, the first meeting preparatory to forming a Colonization Society, was holden at Princeton, N. J., and was attended by most of the professors of the Theological Seminary and the College. In December, Dr. Finley visited Washington, and consulted with Elias B. Caldwell, his brother-in-law, and Francis S. Key, who encouraged him to call a public meeting. The meeting was holden December 23. Meanwhile Gen. Mercer, yet unacquainted with Dr. Finley, and ignorant of his plans, redeemed his pledge. His resolution was introduced to the House of Delegates on the 12th, sent to the Senate on the 14th, and passed on the 23d. The Constitution of the Society was adopted Dec. 28, 1816, and the officers elected Jan. 1, 1817. Samuel J. Mills was one of the original members, and Dr. William Thornton was a member of the Board of Managers.

The society owed its origin, therefore, to the union of the various influences which, in Rhode Island, in Massachusetts, in New Jersey, in Pennsylvania, and in Virginia, had been tending towards such a result for nearly half a century.

In 1817, Samuel J. Mills and Ebenezer Burgess were sent to Africa, to find a place for a colony. They selected a place on Sherbro Island, or the adjacent continent, near where the Mendi mission now is. In visiting Paul Cuffee, preparatory to this voyage, Mills took a severe cold, from which he never recovered. He died on his voyage home.

January 21, 1820, the first colonists, 89 in number, embarked on board of the Elizabeth, at New York. After an unsuccessful attempt to settle on Sherbro Island, in which many lives were lost, and an effort to purchase a location in the Bassa country, which was defeated by the attachment of the natives to the slave trade, Cape Mesurado was purchased, December 15, 1821. The colonists arrived January 7, and were landed on a low island in the river, from which, in a few months, under the conduct of Elijah Johnson, one of their own number, who had been left as a temporary Governor, they removed to the Cape.

Before this time, slave-traders had begun to reestablish factories on the coast. In 1813, though the trade had been abolished by act of Parliament from the beginning of 1808, two British subjects, Bostock and McQuinn, had one on Cape Mesurado, and in June his Majesty's ship Thais sent 40 men on shore, who, after a battle, in which one of their number was killed, entered the factory and captured its owners. The trade, however, still continued.

Missions in Liberia.—There had been one attempt at missionary labor in this region. Mr. John Brereton Cates, with William Tamba and William Davis, two converted natives, the latter a Bassa, rescued from a slave-trader, spent February, March and April, 1819, in a journey from Sierra Leone to the St. John's river. At Sugury, near Grand Cape Mount, a plot was laid to rob them, which only amounted to stealing a hat, for which they followed and arrested the wrong man, and had to pay a fine of "three bars," or $2 25. At Little Cape Mount, a plot was laid to rob and murder Mr. Cates on his way to Cape Mesurado; but Tamba understood enough of the language to detect it, and it was abandoned. On an island in the Mesurado river, they were hospitably entertained by John S. Mill, a mulatto slave-trader who had been educated in England. Mill had houses on the Cape, which he sold when the Cape was purchased. August 25, 1824, he engaged as Secretary of the Colony, under Governor Ashmun. He performed the duties of the office well till September 30, when, tired of civilized life, he returned to his former habits, and nothing has since been heard of him. At some places, especially among the Bassas, the kings professed a willingness to receive missionaries; but Mr. Cates thought that only white missionaries would command respect enough to be successful. He suffered much from the fever on his journey, and died in a few months after his return.

The first American missionary in Liberia was Lot Cary, who had been a slave, and had purchased himself and children for $850. In 1815, more than a year before the Colonization Society was formed, he took a leading part in forming The African Missionary Society, in Richmond, Va. In five years that society had raised about $700, which had been expended in aiding missions in Africa. Having read the report of Mills and Burgess, Cary resolved to devote himself to the work. He resigned the pastoral care of a Baptist church of nearly 800 members, and accepted that of a missionary church, composed of himself and wife, Colin Teage and wife and son Hilary, and Joseph Langford and wife. Cary and Colin Teage were appointed missionaries of the Society, embarked in February, and arrived in Sierra Leone March 8, 1821. Here Cary preached to such as could understand, and started a mission among the Mandingoes. He was one of the first that took possession of Cape Mesurado. The absolute necessity for his services as magistrate, physician and pastor among the colonists, detained him from systematic labor among the heathen, till his death, by casualty, November 10, 1828. Yet, before June, 1825, he had established at Monrovia, a missionary school for native children; and about a year before his death, was enabled to establish another near Grand Cape Mount. Here, John Revey, afterwards a distinguished Baptist preacher and Colonial Secretary at Cape Palmas, was for a time the teacher; and one of his pupils, a few years afterwards, invented the syllabic alphabet in which the Vey language has been extensively written and read for nearly 20 years. Cary was allowed,

In March, 1825, and in May, 1827, Mr. Ashmun, governor of the colony, issued earnest appeals for missions to be established in Liberia; not only for the good of the natives, but as necessary to preserve the colonists themselves from subsiding into barbarism. His first appeal reached the venerable Blumhardt, of the Missionary Seminary, at Basle, in Switzerland; and, after some correspondence, five young men commenced special preparations for the mission. About the close of this year, the Rev. Calvin Holton was ordained at Beverly, Mass., as a missionary of the Baptist Board to Liberia. He embarked at Boston, January 4, 1826, in the brig Vine, with thirty-four emigrants, mostly from Rhode Island. Before embarkation, eighteen of them were organized into a church, of which Newport Gardner and Salmur Nubia, two of the native Africans, whom Dr. Hopkins had selected in their youth to be educated as missionaries, were chosen deacons. This expedition proved one of the most disastrous in respect to life and health, ever sent to that country. Mr. Holton lived only to July 23, yet he had already done much towards giving system to the means of education, both among colonists and natives.

Of the Swiss missionaries from the Basle Seminary, Messrs. Handt and Sessing arrived at Monrovia, December 21, 1827, and the others a few months later. Mr. Wulff died December 22, 1828. Sickness compelled Mr. Hegele to leave, and Mr. Sessing was obliged to accompany him. They arrived in England, May 7, 1829. Mr. Handt left the service of the Society, and commenced an independent mission near Cape Mount. Only Mr. Kissling remained. Mr. Sessing soon returned with his wife, Mr. Buhrer, Mr. Graner, and Mr. Dietschy who was to reside, as secular superintendent, in a house at Monrovia, bequeathed to the mission by Gov. Ashmun; while the principal seat of missionary labor was to be at Bassa Cove. They visited the United States on their way, and attended public meetings and received pecuniary aid in Philadelphia, New York, and Boston. Messrs. Sessing and Buhrer sailed early in Dec., and the others a few weeks later, arriving at Monrovia March 4, 1830. There Mr. Graner died, May 12. Mr. Sessing remained for a time, and opened an orphan school; but he soon removed to the older colony of Sierra Leone, where, as he believed, the native mind was better prepared to profit by missionary labors. With his removal, the mission seems to have been closed. Notwithstanding its short duration and many interruptions, its beneficial influence is still felt. It did much to form some of the best minds in Liberia, and some of its native pupils are still useful missionary laborers.

Of missions subsequently established, accounts will be found under the head of Africa, Western.—REV. JOSEPH TRACY.

LICHTENFELS: The first station occupied by the Moravians in the south of Greenland. It is situated on an island, about three miles from the main ocean, and at an equal distance from the Danish factory at Fisher's Bay.

LICHTENAU: A station of the United Brethren in Greenland, four miles from Lichtenfels.

LIFU: One of the New Hebrides, where is a station of the London Missionary Society.

LISHUANI: A station of the Wesleyans among the Griquas, Basutos, and Mantatees, South Africa.

LITITZ: A station of the Moravians in Jamaica, W. I.

LITTLE BASSA: A village near Edina in Liberia, and a station of the American Baptist Mission among the Bassas on the western coast of Africa.

LIVERPOOL (Australia.) This town was founded about 26 years ago by Gov. Macquarie, and for some time its existence was only indicated by a post, with the inscription, "This is Liverpool." It now, however, speaks for itself; and though not situated in a very fertile country, yet affording a route to the fine agricultural and pastoral districts of Camden and Argyle, it is a place of considerable bustle, and daily increasing in importance. It is occupied by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel.

LODIANA: The principal station of the Presbyterian Board in Northern India. The city is situated on the river Sutlej, in lat. 30° 55' N. and long. 75° 48' E. It is 1,170 miles north-west of Calcutta, and 115 south-east from Lahor.

LOMBOE: One of the lesser Sunda Islands, in the Indian Archipelago.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY: The formation of the London Missionary Society was one of the grandest enterprises of the age. It had for its object, not the conversion of the heathen to any particular form of church order or government, but to send the Gospel to the heathen, leaving it to the minds of those whom God might "call into the fellowship of his Son among them to assume for themselves such form of church government as to them shall appear most agreeable to the word of God."

In the year 1794, the minds of British Christians were turned towards the subject of missions by an Address to Evangelical Dissenters, published in the London Evangelical Magazine, which excited considerable interest, and led to a meeting with a view to the formation of a society, which was held on the 4th of November. It consisted of "a small but glowing and harmonious circle of ministers of various connections and denominations." In the month of January, 1795, an "Address to Christian Ministers and all other Friends of Christianity, on the subject of Missions to the Heathen," was drawn up and sent as a circular to various persons, in which it was proposed that a meeting should be held in London the ensuing summer for the purpose of organizing a Missionary Society.

On the 15th of January, a number of ministers convened in the city of London, and "appointed a committee of correspondence to collect the sentiments of their brethren in the country relative to the great plan under contemplation." A circular letter addressed to ministers was drawn up, acquainting them with the plan and object of the proposed society, and requesting them to communicate it to their congregations, and to send delegates to the general meeting. The time appointed for the convention was the 22d, 23d, and 24th days of September. On the evening preceding the meeting, a consultation "was held by a numerous and highly respectable assembly of ministers friendly to the proposed institution. Several interesting letters from ministers and private Christians approving of the formation of a society were read to the meeting, and an address delivered by the Rev. Dr. Haweis of Aldwinkle. The exercises were concluded with prayer by the Rev. Rowland Hill, and the assembly broke up with a feeling of delight which, as has been justly remarked, "the highest gratification of sensuality, avarice, ambition, or party zeal could never have inspired." The following day the Rev. Dr. Haweis delivered a highly animating discourse from Mark xvi. 15, 16, to a large congregation assembled at Spa-fields chapel. At the close of the public exercises, a large number of ministers and laymen formed themselves into a society. In the evening a sermon was preached by the Rev. G. Burder, and, on the three subsequent days, successive meetings were held, in different parts of the city, at which the cause of missions was pleaded with solemnity and earnestness. The effect of these meetings both upon the ministers and people was most happy. "The unanimity and fervor of the assembly in entering upon this greatest of all schemes—the evangelizing of the world—created bursts of joy which nothing could express but tears. The Christian world seemed to awake, as from a dream, wondering that they could have been so long asleep, while the groans of a dying world were calling upon them for the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Another consideration that rendered these seasons inexpressibly delightful was the visible union of Christians of all denominations; who, for the first time, forgetting their party prejudices and partialities, assembled in the same place, sang the same hymns, united in the same prayers, and felt themselves one in Christ."

The condition of membership in this Society is, a subscription of a certain amount to its funds. Its proceedings are conducted by a Board of Directors, who hold monthly meetings, in which the treasurer and secretaries, ministers who are annual subscribers, and the officers of auxiliaries are entitled to vote. Committees are allowed, but their acts are not valid till ratified at a monthly meeting; and the directors are not allowed to make an expenditure exceeding £500 without calling a general meeting of the subscribers.

Soon after the formation of the Missionary Society, its members began to agitate the important question, "In what part of the world they should commence their work of mercy?" The Rev. Dr. Haweis, who was one of the founders of the Society, and among its most liberal supporters, was requested to prepare a "Memorial" upon the subject, which was delivered at Surrey Chapel. In the course of his address he says, "The field before us is immense! O that we could enter at a thousand gates! that every limb were a tongue, and every tongue a trumpet, to spread the joyful sound. Where so considerable a part of the habitable globe on every side calls for our efforts, and like the man of Macedonia cries, 'Come over and help us,' it is not a little difficult to decide at what part to begin." He then drew a comparison between the climates, the governments, the language, and the religions of heathen countries, and concluded that of all the "dark places of the earth" the South Sea Islands presented the fewest difficulties, and the fairest prospect of success.

Such was the interest excited by this discourse, and by the glowing representations which had been made respecting the newly discovered regions in the South Seas, that the directors determined to attempt a mission to these islands, and immediately began to raise subscriptions, to examine and select missionaries, and to make preparations for the voyage. At length a ship was purchased, and in August, 1796, twenty-nine missionaries, several of whom had wives and children, embarked at London on board the Duff, commanded by Captain James Wilson, who had retired several years previous from the East India service, but who now kindly offered to conduct the adventurous voyage. On the 23d of September they took their final leave of England.

The missions of this Society have since been extensively prosecuted in the South Seas, West Indies, South Africa, African Islands, China, and India. The following summary statement will show the extent of its operations:

Missionaries: in Polynesia, 32; China, 17; India, 47; Africa and Mauritius, 43; West Indies, 20; total, (exclusive of wives and children), . . .	170
Native Teachers and Evangelists, . .	700

Translations.—The Scriptures have been translated by the society's missionaries into Chinese, Bengalese, Urdu, Teloo goo, Canarese, Tamil, Goojurattee, Malayalim, Buriat, Tahitian, Rarotongan, Samoan, Sechuana, Malagasy, 14 languages and dialects. The receipts of the society for the year 1853, were £71,821 1s. 6d., of which £12,933 7s. 9d. were contributed at the missionary stations. The following table exhibits the receipts of the society, for periods of four years each, since 1815, (which is the first year in which they published a financial report, when the society possessed funds to the amount of £39,790,) with the average annual receipts in each of these periods.

Periods.	Amount for the Period.	Average Annual Receipts.
1815 to 1818	£80,109	£20,027
1819 " 1822	95,549	23,887
1823 " 1826	133,431	33,357

	£2,149,707

From this statement, it appears that the aggregate of the Society's receipts, from donations and legacies, for 38 years, has been £2,149,707; and that, during this period, the contributions have been steadily rising in amount, the average of annual receipts rising from £20,000 to £94,000, with a slight decrease in the three last periods. This may be taken as a fair index of the growth of the missionary spirit with the large class of Christians who make this society the organ of their missionary operations. But, in addition to the growth of the missionary spirit at home, a fact is here developed of great importance to all future missionary efforts, that nearly one-fifth of the contributions of this society, the last year, came from its own missions. Here is a source of supply which is not to be overlooked. It shows that, while, up to a certain point, the demands on the churches at home must increase with the success of the missions, beyond that point they will diminish, by means of the supply created by success.

LONG KLOOF (LONG VALLEY): A station of the London Missionary Society in South Africa, commenced in 1840. This valley extends more than 100 miles, between a range of mountains on one side and of high grassy hills on the other. It is celebrated for its fertility, arising from the number of springs found everywhere to irrigate the soil.

LONSDALE: A station of the London Missionary Society in Berbice.

LOO-CHOO: (See Leu-Chew.)

LOVEDALE: A station of the Free Church of Scotland in South Africa, 60 miles from Graham's Town.

LUCCA: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in Jamaica, W. I.

LUSIGNAN: A station of the London Missionary Society in Demarara, W. I.

MACAO: A Portuguese settlement in China, situated on a small peninsula at the south-eastern extremity of the large island of Hingshan, between 60 and 70 miles south-east of Canton. (See China.)

MACHIAN: One of the Molucca Islands in the Indian Archipelago.

MADAGASCAR: A large island on the eastern coast of Africa, containing an area somewhat larger than Great Britain and Ireland. Its mineral productions are silver, iron, slate, limestone, and coal. It produces, also, many valuable articles of commerce, as sugar, cotton, hemp, silk, indigo, tobacco, gum elastic, copal, ebony, wax, &c. The island possesses many fine ports, from which considerable trade is carried on with Mauritius and Bourbon, the Arabs from Muscat, and the Americans.

Population.—The great mass of the population of Madagascar are of the Malay race; but with some mixture of negroes and Kafres. They are all of dark complexion, but some more swarthy than others. The language, which is nearly the same throughout the island, is of Malay origin. The inhabitants are industrious, intelligent, and semi-civilized.

Government.—Madagascar does not appear ever to have formed one kingdom, but to have been occupied by independent tribes, to the number of 20 or 30. The most powerful State is the kingdom of Madagascar, situated about 200 miles from the eastern coast, in the central part of the island, called the Hova country. The Hova tribe had risen from a very limited possession of influence and power to extensive authority under Andrianimpoinerina, who had formed the ambitious project of subjugating the whole country to his control. He was succeeded by Radama, in the beginning of this century, who inherited his father's ambition, and succeeded in enlarging the boundaries of his kingdom. He encouraged the labors of the missionaries, and sought to civilize his subjects by establishing schools, and sending some of them to Mauritius and Europe; in which he was favored with the friendship and aid of Sir Robert Farquhar, the Governor of Mauritius. He established an army, provided with fire-arms and horses, and organized on the European system. But, in 1827, he visited the eastern coast of the island, where he was feasted, and indulged in habits of intemperance and irregularity, which brought on him a fatal disease that terminated his life the following year. The legitimate heir to the throne was his sister's son, Rakotobe, a young man in the mission school, who gave some hopeful indications of piety. But Ranavalona, one of the wives of Radama, a woman combining in herself the worst traits of character of Jezebel, Athaliah, and bloody Queen Mary, on hearing of the king's death, sent for two military officers from her native village, and promised, if they would devote themselves to her interest, and secure to her the throne, she would advance them to the highest rank, and reward them with riches, and exempt them from capital punishment whatever crime they might commit. Having first secured the favor of the gods by collusion with the diviners, she succeeded in destroying four officers of the late king, who declared that he had named Rakotobe and his own daughter, Rakotaka, to succeed him. She soon after took measures to destroy both these, their mother, and a number of other relatives of Radama, some of whom were starved to death, and others openly speared. She afterwards perfidiously murdered the principal actor in her elevation to the throne, the reputed father of her only son, to whom she had made such promises before her accession.

Notwithstanding the immoral and bloody character of this woman, she is as religious in her way as Queen Mary, as weak and devoted to her superstitions as her Roman Catholic prototype. She has attempted to carry out the design of her predecessor, in annexing the whole island to her dominion, but in such a way as tends rapidly to the depopulation of the whole island. For years she has maintained a standing army of from 20,000 to 30,000, and these have been in the habit of going out on predatory excursions, several thousands at a time, desolating the villages, treacherously destroying all the men after they have surrendered, and carrying captive the women and children, treating them with the greatest cruelty, and selling them into slavery; and in these expeditions multitudes of the soldiers perish every year. The people generally are treated as the servants, not subjects of the government. The soldiers are compelled to serve, and the bourgeois to work for the government without pay, thus reducing themselves and their families to starvation. So much of their time is employed in the service of the Queen, that they are obliged to neglect the cultivation of the land, and hence they have suffered severely by famine. Many have been unable, for several months of the year, to obtain more than one meal a day. And, what renders the oppression the more infamous is, that they are often employed, not in the necessary service of the government, but in collecting fighting bulls and dancing idiots, for the amusement of this modern Jezebel. In consequence of this oppression, hundreds and thousands of the people have deserted the villages, and fled to the forests; and robbers and highwaymen have fearfully increased.

Religion and Morals.—The natives of Madagascar have no just ideas of God. The name which they give the Supreme Being literally signifies "Fragrant Prince." They have some idea of such a Being, but what precise notion is affixed to it, it is extremely difficult to ascertain. Their ideas of a future state, and indeed their whole religious system is indefinite, discordant, and puerile. It is a compound of heterogeneous elements, borrowed, in part, from the superstitious fears and practices of Africa, the opinions of the ancient Egyptians, and the prevalent idolatrous systems of India, blended with the usages of the Malayan Archipelago. There are no public temples in honor of any divinity, nor any order of men exclusively devoted to the priesthood, but the keeper of the idols receives the offerings of the people, presents their requests, and pretends to give the response of the god. They worship also at the grave or tomb of their ancestors. Some Jewish or Mohammedan customs prevail, such as circumcision, the division of time into weeks of seven days, abstinence from swine's flesh, &c. Marriage is general, but polygamy prevails, and conjugal fidelity scarcely exists.

The Malagasy, though not naturally savage and inhuman, have become dreadfully familiar with blood, under the present reign. Falsehood, chicanery, avarice, deceit and sensuality extensively prevail. But they have some redeeming qualities. Parents are devoted to their offspring, and children are respectful to their parents. There is much genuine hospitality in the country, and warm and steady friendships exist. They are prepared for improvement and for rapid advancement, under favorable circumstances.

MISSION.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—This Society, from the time of its formation, had an eye upon Madagascar as a missionary field; and, in 1818, two married missionaries, Messrs. Jones and Bevan, were sent out; and having left their families at Mauritius, they proceeded to Madagascar, and found every encouragement for commencing a mission. They returned to Mauritius for their families, and again, early in 1819, reached the coast of Madagascar. But in a very short time Mr. and Mrs. Bevan and Mrs. Jones, with their children, were removed by death, and Mr. Jones was so disabled by serious illness, as to be obliged to return to Mauritius. They had landed on the coast during the rainy season, the most sultry and unhealthy portion of the year.

In 1820, the mission was recommenced by Rev. D. Jones, at Tananarivo, the capital, in the district of Ankova. This was in the interior of the island, the most salubrious and populous part of the country; and the mission was commenced with the express sanction of Radama, the chief, or king as he styled himself. From that time the mission proceeded without interruption for fifteen years. In its early stages it had to encounter the jealousy of the natives, whose ideas of Europeans were associated with the slave trade; and many of the natives whose interests were involved in the traffic opposed the proceedings of the king, in forming a treaty with Great Britain for its suppression, and in encouraging the residence of Europeans among them. And some of the people imagined that the schools were nurseries for making their children more valuable when sold into slavery; and some of them fancied that their offspring were purchased by white men as articles of food!

For a considerable time, the efforts of the missionaries were directed almost exclusively to the instruction of the children in schools, under the sanction of government. But two facts in the history of this mission, show that this was a mistaken policy: "One is, that the majority of natives converted to a profession of the Gospel, so as to afford credible evidence of piety, consists of adults not trained in the mission schools, but impressed by the preaching of the Gospel, or by conversation with those who had received it. The other is, that most of those who embraced the truth, voluntarily and immediately commenced learning to read, however much engaged in secular business, or advanced in life."

During the first fifteen years of this mission, the whole Bible was translated, corrected, and printed in the native language, at the capital, aided by the British and Foreign Bible Society; 20,000 tracts and 1000 copies of Russell's Catechism were also printed. About 100 schools had been established, with 4000 scholars; and during that period 10,000 to 15,000 had received the benefit of instruction in these schools. Two printing-presses were established at the capital, by the London Missionary Society. A Malagasy and English dictionary was published in two volumes. Two large congregations were formed at the capital, and nearly 200 persons applied for admission to the church. Adult Bible classes were formed for the regular and systematic study of the Bible. Various preaching stations were visited every Sabbath; and the minds of multitudes had become enlightened in regard to the truths of Christianity, and had renounced the superstitious customs of the country. Meetings for prayer were held, convened and conducted by the natives themselves. At a village about 60 miles from the capital, a small chapel had been erected by the natives, chiefly through the influence and exertions of a pious woman; and public worship, chiefly for reading the Scriptures and prayer, was held in many distant parts of the country, conducted by those who were formerly teachers or scholars in the mission schools.

In addition to the missionaries a number of artisans were sent to Madagascar, in fulfilment of the treaty between Radama and the British Government, by whose instruction habits of thought, attention, industry, and application, were generated, a spirit of inquiry fostered, and a general advancement in civilization secured. Besides these influences much good was accomplished by the religious exertions of these pious missionary artisans, who embraced suitable opportunities for communicating religious as well as secular knowledge. The female members of the mission also accomplished much good, by instructing the native women.

Numerous causes were operating to produce an extensive change in the minds, manners, habits, and institutions of the people; but in that change, the Madagascar government did not sympathize. They looked upon it from the beginning with a jealous eye; and, fearing its progress, they determined to crush it. It is believed that this feeling was indulged by Radama himself. His successor, the queen, though possessing a masculine will, has never shown any indication of superior intelligence. She is slightly acquainted with the elements of reading and writing. But she never availed herself of the opportunity of becoming familiar with the instructions of European teachers. She has always been strongly attached to the superstitions of the country, and cherished a veneration for the national gods. Her accession to the throne was publicly attributed to the gods, and she necessarily felt bound to sustain their authority. One of the hereditary guardians of the principal idol, Rainiharo, was appointed, as it was pretended, by the command of the idol, to remain with the queen. Two parties were formed at court; the idol party, of whom this man was the head, and the party who sought to extend education, and to carry out and enlarge the measures of Radama, which consisted of Andriamihiaja and his friends. But, in about two years after the accession of the queen, the idol party prevailed, and Andriamihiaja, as already stated, was murdered.

The idolatrous party represented the missionaries and teachers as having some political designs, and so wrought upon the jealousies and fears of the queen to prejudice her against them. The first indication of this was manifested in an abrupt order for Rev. D. Griffiths to leave the country, on the ground that the period of five years, to which his permission to remain extended, had expired. Similar measures were pursued with regard to other missionaries. Towards the close of 1831, the permission which had previously been given for the administration of baptism and the Lord's Supper was recalled. The next year, slaves were prohibited learning to read and write. This was believed to have been done because many free people were in the habit of purchasing slave children, to place in the schools instead of their own, certain towns and villages being required to furnish a given number of children for the schools; and parents were unwilling to place their children where they might so soon be drawn off to the army and perish.

In the fall of 1834, a circumstance transpired, which tended still further to prejudice the mind of the queen against Christianity, and to hasten the crisis. A middle-aged man, a keeper of an idol, had experienced in 1832 a succession of calamities, which rendered him melancholy; and meeting with a native Christian, who conversed with him on the subject of religion, a deep impression was made on his mind; and, disregarding the advice of the native Christian to seek further instruction, he immediately set about preaching to the inhabitants of his native village, telling them of the day of judgment, the resurrection, and of the happy time when all men would receive Christianity, and live in peace with one another. He imagined himself raised up for a reformer, and professed to receive immediate revelation from God; and very soon he began to mix the worship of his old idol with that of the true God, probably with the hope of conciliating the queen. In the course of two years, he had gained 200 followers. In 1834, this man sent to the queen that he had an important message for her. His message was received by Rainiharo, the principal officer, who was informed that this man's followers were very numerous. This roused the jealousy of the government, and the whole party was summoned to the capital. When they arrived, they stated that they had a message from God to the queen, to the effect that she was to be the sovereign of all the world; that the dead would rise, and the living never die; that all would then live peaceably and happily, for there would be an end put to the ordeal of tangena, divination, murder, wars, and contention; and they offered to forfeit their heads, if these things were false, "for," said they, "God has told us these things, and God cannot lie." After an examination of two or three days, the man, with three of his principal followers, was condemned to death, and led to the north end of the town, and put head downwards in a rice-pit, and boiling water poured on them; after which, the pit was closed upon them, and filled up with earth. A number more of the party were cruelly put to death, and the rest were sold into slavery and their property confiscated; which yielded a profit of several thousand dollars to the queen, officers, and judges, thus giving them a taste for plunder. The queen and her advisers being ignorant of the principles of Christianity, it was natural that they should identify this fanatical sect with the Christians ; and hence the occurrence tended greatly to their prejudice.

Prejudice was further excited by the indiscretion of some young converts, who undertook to be teachers of others before they had themselves become fully acquainted with the principles of Christianity. The statements made by native converts were also misunderstood and misrepresented. In the beginning of 1835, a native, addressing a small congregation at the capital, was overheard to say that ere long God would punish all the workers of iniquity, and reward those who had loved and served him. The expressions were reported to the queen, and she ordered spies to be sent next time to bring a fuller report. The subject was the resurrection, and the speaker said, "All must rise, and God alone will be the judge. Every one in this country will be raised and judged then." It was reported to the queen that he had said the inhabitants of her country alone would be judged by God in that day. "It is false!" cried the queen. "Other sovereigns are allowed to judge their people as they please, and am I alone to be prohibited? If so, God indeed is partial. Besides, how should they know that God will raise the dead?" After this, a young man, a native convert, who held a meeting at some distance from the capital, had given offence to the people, by working on Saturday, their sacred day, and speaking disrespectfully of their idol. In revenge, they accused him to the queen ; but instead of punishing him, she ordered the ordeal of tangena to be administered, by which he was declared innocent. Having retired to a private village a few days, according to the usual custom, he came up to town in a public procession, which, being joined by a number of the native Christians, dressed in white robes, was much larger than on ordinary occasions. The queen happened to see the procession, and inquired what it meant. She was informed that it was the young man's procession whom she had ordered to pass the ordeal, and that the persons dressed in white were native Christians. "You would be surprised," they added, "at the love of these people for one another ; when any one of them happens to be in distress, they all feel distressed, and when any one is happy, they are all happy ; when any are poor or destitute, they form a society to assist them ;" meaning that they collect money of one another to afford relief. "I am indeed surprised," replied the queen, "to see such things in my country. Was it not I who ordered him to take the ordeal, and why do they now make such an exhibition, as if they had overcome an enemy? All this is intended for me, I suppose."

These circumstances created so much prejudice in the mind of the queen, as to prepare her to receive any charges that might be brought against the whole body of the Christians. The officer who had accused this young man in the first instance, felt piqued at his acquittal, and hearing that the queen was displeased with the procession, determined to bring an accusation against the whole body of the Christians. And, in order to get something upon which to found an accusation, he went to one of their meetings, where he heard a slave addressing the congregation, from Josh. 34 : 14, 15, exhorting them to forsake the gods which their fathers had served, and to serve Jehovah and Jesus Christ. He then represented to the queen that there were in and around the capital certain people who were seeking to change the customs of the country, who despised the idols, and divinations, and all the customs of their forefathers ; entering into a league with the English, holding meetings in the night, and urging all present to serve Jehovah and Jesus Christ ; and he supposed that Jehovah was the first king of England, and Jesus Christ the second, and that the idols they were urged to forsake were the queen and her successors. "Besides," said he, "these meetings are carried on by slaves. We cannot see the end of these things ; but we fear that these people, who have become so friendly with the English, will attempt to transfer the kingdom of the queen to them." Such a communication was well calculated to arouse the suspicious temper of the queen ; and she burst into tears, and then swore that she would put a stop to these things, and that with the shedding of blood. And soon afterwards she ordered the judges to convene the people at the capital, on Sunday, March 1. The previous Sabbath she had ordered the sewing women, (the women whom the female missionaries had taught to sew,) to meet in the court yard to sew for her. Passing by them, she said, with a contemptuous sneer, "You had better go and ask permission of the Europeans to come and sew for me on the Sabbath. You observe the day like the English ; I do not. You had better go and ask their permission." In the evening of the same day, as she was returning home from a bull-fight, passing the chapel and hearing the singing, she said, "These people will not leave off till some of their heads are taken from their shoulders." The next Tuesday, orders were given to procure a list of all the houses where prayer-meetings were held, and the names of all the baptized persons. The queen was astonished at their numbers, and swore that she would put to death the owners of the houses. She appeared now exceedingly violent against the Christians. One of her officers, named Rainingatabe, rose and said that though she might think proper to destroy him, he could not refrain from speaking his mind ; and he entreated her to consider well what she proposed to do to these people ; for he had for years had opportunity to observe their conduct, and he assured her that he had seen none more upright diligent, faithful and trustworthy. Besides this, he said they were the most intelligent people in the country; and if she put one of them to death she would be the loser, and would be sorry for it. After a long pause, the queen said, "I thank you for your advice. I have indeed a father and a mother in you: you do not conceal from me what you think will be of service to the kingdom. We shall consider well what to do with them." Andrianisa then rose up and said he very highly approved of the advice that had been given, and added that almost all the new things that had been introduced for the good of the country, had been introduced by the English; and that if any who had been placed under the instruction of the Europeans should be put to death, it would be a reproach to the queen's country. The queen had also summoned some of the head people from other districts, to give their opinion as to putting to death one or two of the most active Christians in each district. They did not hesitate to express their disapprobation of such a measure.

On Thursday, the missionaries received a letter from the queen, forbidding them to teach Christianity to the natives, but allowing them to teach the arts and sciences. To this they replied, remonstrating against the order, but without effect. The rest of the week was a time of great excitement among all parties. At length the day of the dreaded assembly came, and the people flocked in from all quarters, amid the parade of troops and the roar of artillery. After the meeting had been opened with pompous addresses, the queen sent a message, couched in the style of oriental bombast, in which she called on all who had been baptized, or who had attended places of Christian worship, to come and accuse themselves, threatening with death all who refused, and forbidding the performance of Christian worship, or changing the customs of the country.

Many of those who had attended on Christian worship, and among others, the twelve principal teachers, came forward, and accused themselves, and made their submission; but others remained faithful, and boldly told the persons appointed to receive confessions, "We did no evil, and intended none to the queen or her kingdom, in our prayers and our observance of the Sabbath. We prayed to the God of Heaven to prosper her reign." Being asked how many times they had prayed and worshiped God, they said they could not tell. "We always," said they, "prayed before going to our work in the morning, and before going to sleep in the evening, also before and after eating, and often at other moments in the course of the day." A man of considerable influence from a distant district, being asked how many times he had prayed, said he could not tell, but that for the last three or four years he had not spent a single day without offering prayer several times a day, but that he asked for nothing injurious to any one. The judges asked him to give them a specimen of his prayer, which he did in the presence of the multitude. He said he confessed his sins before God, implored his forgiveness, and asked for help to enable him to live without sinning, that he might be holy and prepared for heaven. The same blessings he asked for his family and friends, for the queen, and for all her subjects. "I asked all these things," said he, "in the name of Jesus Christ, for we sinners can receive nothing from God but through his Son Jesus Christ, who died for sinners." The judges acknowledged that his prayers were good, but as the queen did not approve of such things, they ought not to be done in her country.

During this time of trial a small company of the converts met for prayer at midnight, every night in the week, and many of them said they had never before enjoyed so much in drawing near to God. Among these was an officer of high rank, who had never before declared himself as a Christian. When asked by a friend why he joined the Christians at this time, he replied that he perceived so much injustice in the proceedings of the government, that he determined to join the injured party, and that after having united with them in these meetings, he had felt so much pleasure in their company that he resolved to take their God as his God, and their people as his people. And as to accusing himself, he had determined not to do it until convinced that he had done wrong in attending the meetings. His wife has since become a convert, and the refugees who fled to England were greatly indebted to him and his wife for having concealed them for some time in his house.

During the following week many reports were circulated, and apprehensions entertained that some would be put to death. It was expected that the final result would be announced on the expiration of the week, but it was the policy of the government to keep the people in suspense, that they might fear the worst. The people were summoned again on the 9th, and the queen sent another bombastic and threatening communication, in which she reduced the rank of those officers of the government who had been at the meetings, which punishment was received by them with the most degrading servility. The number thus reduced was not less than 400.

In the course of the second week in March, orders were issued that all persons who had received any books from the Europeans should deliver them up, and not conceal even a leaf, on pain of death; and orders were sent to all the outposts to collect in the books, some of which had been carried 300 miles from the capital. The books were delivered up by the Christians, with great grief, but it is supposed that many were retained and concealed. After the books were all collected, the queen ordered four officers to examine them, and ascertain if any of them were free from obnoxious expressions. The twelve senior teachers were called on to read them to the officers. As the Bible was the largest book, it was taken first. They found no fault with the first verse; but as the word darkness occurred in the second, they said that the queen did not like darkness, and therefore the book was condemned. The hymn book was taken next, and that was condemned, because the word Jehovah was found in it. Then several tracts and catechisms were examined, but in all these the words "Jesus Christ," "Jehovah," "darkness," "hell," "Satan," or "resurrection" occurred, and they were condemned. After the verdict had been pronounced upon all that had been printed in the Malagasy language, the examination of books in other languages commenced. A Hebrew Bible was first taken, of which the reader knew about as little as the hearers, but he pretended to read it off with fluency; yet as it was incomprehensible to the officers they pronounced against it. The English and French books, with a few Latin and Greek, shared the same fate. These were afterwards sent back to the missionaries as European property, but while in the hands of the government, they were kept in an old unoccupied building, where the rats were so plenty that it was feared the books would be devoured by them; and the soldiers were directed to provide cats, and keep them on the spot, and a weekly allowance was made from the royal treasury to provide meat for the canine guards.

The missionaries continued to impart instruction and comfort to the native Christians, up to the time of their departure, in 1836. The number of converts had gradually increased, notwithstanding the difficulties under which they labored, and the dangers to which they were exposed. The Lord's Supper was administered in private, and several were baptized. They increased in spiritual knowledge, even more than they had done before the persecution arose. A strong bond of union was formed among them, which continues to the present day. Before the missionaries left, they supplied each one with a copy of the Bible, some of whom walked more than a hundred miles to obtain it. A sick man, who had not been able to leave his house for five months, traveled sixty miles, and when he received the Bible, he pressed it to his bosom, saying, "This contains the words of eternal life; it is my life, and I will take as much care of it as of my own life." He has since been compelled to leave his home, and take refuge in the forests, for his adherence to the faith. Before the departure of the missionaries, they translated the Pilgrim's Progress into Malagasy; and eight copies were written out by the native Christians, and left in their hands; and it has proved a great comfort and blessing to them.

The London Tract Society afterwards printed 1000 copies, which were sent to them.

The missionaries remained till they had completed the translation and printing of the whole Bible, when they came to the conclusion to leave, as they were forbidden to impart religious instruction, and their presence only excited the jealousy of the queen, and increased the rigors of the persecution. Messrs. Freeman, Cameron, Chick, and Kitching left Madagascar in June, 1835; and Messrs. Johns and Baker remained another year, to see if any changes were likely to take place favorable to the prosecution of the mission. That was a year of suspense, anxiety, and pain to them. The servants of the missionaries who left were subjected to the murderous ordeal of tangena, and two of them died. The infant of another was suffocated the day after its birth, by order of the queen, because it was born on a "fatal day." The oppressions of the government became more and more cruel. The Sabbath was purposely desecrated by public works and amusements. Vice, disease, and poverty increased at a fearful rate. Gradually the faithful became known to the missionaries and to each other. Sometimes a recognition took place by a reference to Jer. 38 : 15, which was answered by the following verse. After some time the native Christians began to hold secret meetings at their own houses, at the houses of the missionaries, and on the summits of solitary mountains. At length, after leaving 70 complete Bibles, and several boxes of psalters, Testaments, spelling and hymn books, catechisms and tracts, chiefly buried underground, Messrs. Johns and Baker, sorrowfully and in great depression of mind, left Madagascar, and arrived at Mauritius in September, 1836.

Just before they set out from the capital, the storm burst out afresh, and its earliest object was Rafaravavy. She had been a convert before the suppression of Christianity. Before her conversion, she had been so devoted to idolatry that, when there was not a meal of rice in the house, the money required to purchase it was paid to the support of idol worship. But when she embraced Christianity, she became one of the most zealous converts. She took one of the largest houses in the capital, for the purpose of maintaining a prayer-meeting; and she did much to secure the attendance of others on the means of grace. A short time before the missionaries left, she was accused by three of her servants of reading the Bible and praying on the Sabbath, with nine of her companions; and the charge was received, though it was contrary to law to receive an accusation from slaves against their masters. As they did not return home, her father, who was a heathen, went after them and put them in irons. But they were released by the interference of Rafaravavy, by whom they were addressed with so much earnestness that she found reason to hope they had become new creatures. The judge informed her father of the accusation, and advised him to persuade her to accuse herself, and make known her companions. She readily acknowledged to him that she prayed, but steadily refused to betray her associates. The queen, on hearing of the case, was in a great rage, and gave orders to put her to death immediately; but, as her father had rendered great service to the government, some influential persons at court persuaded her to a more lenient course.

While these things were in progress, Rafaravavy contrived to reach Mr. Johns's house just before he left. It was about 3 o'clock in the morning. She was fully expecting to be put to death. The interview was affecting on both sides. Mrs. Johns remarks, "I shall never forget the serenity and composure she displayed while she related to me the consolation she enjoyed in pleading the promises, and in drawing near to God in prayer." The queen decided to spare her life; but fined her to the amount of half her property, and half her own value, if sold into slavery. Soon after, she found that she was very narrowly watched by her father and friends; and she determined to sell her house in the capital, and purchase one in a retired spot in the suburbs. The little band continued to meet, sometimes at her house, sometimes at the house of one of her friends, and sometimes on a mountain.

The number of those confiding in each other as Christians now rapidly increased; and many coming from Vonizongo made Rafaravavy's house their home while at the capital. In the early part of 1837, Mr. Johns wrote from Mauritius to some of the Christians at the capital, intimating his intention of visiting Tamatave in the course of the season. Rasomaka (Joseph) and others were deputed to meet him. They left their friends in peace and tranquillity. They carried with them a number of letters from the native Christians. The following extract from a joint letter of the whole band will show the spirit that animated them:

"When we consider our guilt and pollution, and the evil that dwells in our hearts, then we soon faint; but when we remember and reflect upon the mercy of God and the redemption there is in Jesus, and when we call to mind the promises, then our hearts take confidence, and we believe that Jesus can cleanse us and bring us to heaven; and when we meet there, we will tell you all that has befallen us by the way while yet here on earth. By the strength of God we shall go forward, and not fear what may befall us; but we will go in the power of the Lord, and if accused by the people, we will still go straight forward, for we know that if we deny him before men, Jesus will deny us before his Father. All the Christians are teaching others to read. There are ten with one friend, six with another, four with another, and so the number is quietly augmenting. The Bibles that were left in our possession have all been circulated, and many are wishing to obtain complete copies."

Some time after the departure of those who had been deputed to meet Mr. Johns at Tamatave, he heard that persecution had broken out afresh; and afterwards he received a letter informing him that fourteen of the Christians had been apprehended, and sold into slavery. It afterwards appeared, that while the brethren were at Tamatave, two women had entered a complaint against ten of the Christians, with the hope of getting a share of their property. Rafaravavy was immediately apprehended, and the next day all the rest of the ten, except Rasomaka, who had not yet returned from Tamatave, and Rafaralahiandrianisa, from Vonizongo, who was saved, because his accusers did not know his name. Some time intervened before sentence was pronounced; and Rafaravavy was frequently examined and importuned to disclose her companions. But while she freely confessed that she prayed to God who made all things; and whatever the queen might be pleased to do with her, she confessed that she had done this, but steadily refused to implicate others.

Paul, another of the accused, when the officers came to apprehend him, said, "I have certainly prayed to the God who created me and supported me, and who made all things, to make me a good man; to bless the queen and give her real happiness, both in this world and that which is to come; to bless the officers and judges, and all the people, and to make them so good that there might be no more highwaymen and liars in the country; and that God would make all the people wise and good." This discreet answer had some effect upon the officers; and some of them said they saw no harm in all that; and one said, "Let us do nothing rashly, lest we should advise the queen to shed innocent blood." But another said, "The queen has forbidden any to pray to Jehovah, and they have done it; and, having despised the command of the queen, are guilty."

The government was a fortnight considering what punishment to inflict on the accused. On the fourteenth day, the people in the market were summoned, and received a message from the queen to go and seize the property of Rafaravavy. She knew nothing of the order, till some of the people came rushing into her house, almost out of breath, and began to seize and carry away whatever they could lay their hands on; and, in a very short time, every thing she had was carried away, and her house pulled down, and the materials carried off. She was then ordered to follow four of the Tsiarondahy, the class employed in putting criminals to death. She expected to be immediately put to death. She went on, repeating to herself, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit," and feeling that she had done with the body. She was followed by several native Christians, who encouraged and comforted her. But instead of going directly to the place of execution, they turned aside into a house by the way, and put heavy irons on her, the queen having ordered her to be put to death before daylight the next morning. But that night a fire burst out in the capital, burnt down many houses, and created so much confusion, that the queen's order was neglected. The fire occasioned a good deal of remark. Many said it seemed like a judgment from heaven, on account of the persecution of the Christians; and it was thought to have had some effect upon the superstitious fears of the queen herself.

The rest of the company were divided among the officers, Paul being put in irons and placed in a separate house. At length, the judgment of the queen was given, in a public assembly, that they should be reduced to perpetual slavery, so that their friends should never be allowed to redeem them.

Rasalama, when deceitfully told that all the rest had informed of her companions, was induced to mention the names of several, who had not yet been impeached; and when she afterwards ascertained that she had been the means of their apprehension, she was deeply grieved. During her confinement as a prisoner she was overheard to express her astonishment that the people of God should be treated in this manner, and to say, "I was not afraid, but rather rejoiced that I was counted worthy to suffer affliction for believing in Jesus; I had hope of the life in heaven." This was reported to the judges, and she was put in irons and cruelly beaten. Referring to the information she had given of her companions, she said, "My life shall go for them." She was ordered for execution the next morning, and in the mean time, put in irons, which forced the extremities together, and put the whole body in an excruciating position. Being led to the place of execution the next morning, she expressed her joy that she had received the knowledge of the truth, and continued singing hymns on the way. On reaching the fatal spot, and having received permission to kneel down and pray, she calmly committed her spirit into the hands of the Lord Jesus, and while thus engaged was pierced through the heart by the spears of the executioners; and her body was left to be devoured by the dogs.

As soon as the two brethren had returned from Tamatave, they also were apprehended, their goods confiscated, and they and their wives reduced to slavery. They were divided among the officers of government, and treated in the most cruel and brutal manner, the object apparently being to make their condition as uncomfortable and wretched as possible; all which they bore with Christian meekness and resignation.

Rafaravavy was kept in irons for five months, expecting all the while to be led out for execution. It was supposed that the regard the government entertained for her father was the means of saving her life. Her friends did all they could to alleviate her sufferings, visiting her as often as they durst, taking with them Christian books and reading to her, the guards remaining outside; and they were not a little encouraged to find her sustaining her afflictions so cheerfully. Her conversation with the guards and with other persons who visited her, was so discreet and edifying as to produce a very favorable impression upon their minds. When asked if she was not sorry that she had brought this trouble on herself, she replied, "How can I be sorry for the pardon of my sins, and asking God to bless me and make me for ever happy?" She was at length sold into slavery, but, as it was supposed by design, she fell into the hands of a distant relation of hers, who treated her kindly, allowing her to go and come as she pleased, provided she punctually finished her work. During this time she was visited by her husband, a colonel in the army, who, hearing of her condition, had obtained liberty to spend a few months at the capital. The other Christians who had been sold into slavery, had been in the habit of meeting for prayer and religious conversation at the house of a young man named Rafaralahy, who had built a house for the purpose a short distance from the village where he resided. After being released, she found out the little band and united herself with them. But they were soon discovered, and Rafaralahy was put to death, and all who had met at his house, so far as they could be discovered, were apprehended. This was brought about by the perfidy of a man named Rafiakarana, who had received Christian instruction and baptism, and appeared zealous for the truth, but had apostatized on the suppression of Christianity, and become openly vicious. Rafaralahy having formerly received instruction from him, conversed with him, and thinking he had gained him, received him into partnership, and disclosed to him the facts respecting the meetings of the Christians; but his kindness was requited by being cruelly betrayed. Those who had not been apprehended before, were dealt with more leniently; but Rafaravavy, Paul, Joseph, and others who had been accused before, having nothing to expect but death, they were advised by their Christian friends to seek safety by flight. But they knew not where to go. At first, they thought of attempting to go to a neighboring province which was at war with Madagascar. But the dangers and difficulties in the way appeared insurmountable. Three of the company were concealed for several months in a forest near the capital, and fed by a friend in the city, until his means were exhausted. Others of the party, including the women, wandered about, from one village to another, concealed sometimes in houses, sometimes in pits, and in bogs, the country meanwhile being filled with soldiers in search of them. At length Mr. Johns having visited Tamatave, took measures to make it known through the country that he was there; and the refugees sent one of their number to ascertain whether they could not escape by sea; and a plan was arranged between him and a friend at Tamatave, who held a post of influence, to effect the object. A party of them immediately set out for Tamatave, where, after enduring incredible hardships, and experiencing many hair-breadth escapes, they arrived in safety, and embarked for Mauritius. Six of them, Rafaravavy, (Mary,) Razafy, (Sarah,) wife of Andrianilaina, Andrianomanana, (Simeon,) Rosoamaka, (Joseph,) Ratrarahamba, (David,) and Adrianisa, (James,) soon after embarked for England, where they arrived in May, 1839, and received the sympathies and friendship of British Christians. Six more remained at Mauritius, Andrianilaina, the husband of Sarah, separating from his wife and remaining behind, with the hope of being able to render aid to the Christians in Madagascar.

At the time of the martyrdom of Rafaralahy, an eminently pious young woman was apprehended and sold into perpetual slavery. Her husband had previously divorced her, and her father had disowned her; and her relations, preferring that she should die rather than disgrace them, procured her trial by the tangena, under the effects of which she perished. Many of the Christians who had effected their escape from the capital, but not out of the country, have continued to suffer innumerable hardships and difficulties; and it is supposed that many of them have perished through extreme fatigue, hunger, nakedness, disease, and anxiety.

At length, under the pretext of fearing that, if brought to the capital for trial, they might practice sorcery upon her, the queen issued orders to her soldiers to put the Christians to death at once, wherever they might be found, by digging a pit, tying them by the hands and feet, thrusting them head downwards into the pit, and pouring boiling water on them till they perished. Murder by the ordeal of tangena was proceeding on a large scale. On one occasion, it was administered to 600, 500 of whom perished.

The manner in which these Christians have borne their trials, and met the terrors of martyrdom, is worthy of apostolic times. When brought to the final test, not one of them has renounced the Saviour's name, from the terrors of martyrdom. Nominal professors, indeed, in great numbers, hastened to purge themselves, on the first breaking out of persecution; but none of those who adhered to their profession have been led to renounce it by the terrors of martyrdom.

But one great lesson forces itself upon our attention. The connection of the Madagascar mission with the native government has proved one of the greatest impediments to its success; and shows beyond question, what appears evident also in other missions, that the more entirely disconnected missions are from all political or governmental alliances, the less embarrassments they will meet with, and the more successful they will be. Christianity does not need the support of the state, and when allied with it, will always find itself oppressed.

The injustice and cruelty of the infatuated queen continued to rage with increased violence and fatal success. Many of her people sought a sanctuary on the tops of the mountains, or in the caves of the wilderness, where they might enjoy liberty of mind, and hold fellowship with each other and with God. In June, 1840, sixteen of them determined to seek under British protection in Mauritius, the liberty of conscience which they could not enjoy in their native land. But they were discovered on their journey to the coast, and conducted back to the capital. Two of them escaped on the way; five were condemned to perpetual slavery; and nine were doomed to die, and, after being led up in front of the deserted mission house, they were conducted to the place of execution, and, while kneeling down, were speared to death.

The following year, as appears by letters from some of the native Christians, 3,000 persons had been subjected to the ordeal of tangena at Ponizongo. But, amid these fiery trials they were sustained by the gracious presence and faithful promises of the Saviour, and not one of those accounted believers had proved traitor and denied Christ.

In January, 1842, four of the six Malagasy refugees who had visited England, returned to Mauritius with the hope of being able to benefit their people. Joseph and Mary were comfortably settled on Minow Island, a few miles from the western coast of Madagascar, where they were usefully employed among their own people. David was employed at Grand Bay, Mauritius, in the instruction of the Malagasy apprentices, and James was employed as interpreter on board a British vessel.

On the 1st of May, 1842, Rev. David Jones, one of the oldest surviving members of the Madagascar mission, died of paralysis, at Port Louis, on the island of Mauritius.

During this year, five new victims were added to the glorious company of martyrs; and there was no abatement, but rather an increase in the suspicion and cruelty of the queen and her government.

In 1843, Mr. Johns, another of the Society's devoted missionaries, met his death on the island of Nosibe, on the north-eastern coast of Madagascar, having been driven by the French authorities, at the instigation of a Catholic priest, from the island of Nosimitsio, where, in connection with the two Malagasy Christians, Joseph and Mary, he was attempting to establish a mission.

In 1847, the report of the society says, that though still persecuted, the native Christians of this afflicted island continue to increase and multiply.

By the blessing of God bestowed on the labors of a young and zealous convert, named Ramaka or Rasalasala, there had been a great awakening, and 100 new converts had been added to their number; and among them was Rakotondrama, only son of the queen, and heir presumptive to the throne. Five months after his conversion, the queen issued orders for the apprehension of all the new converts whose names had been reported to the government, 21 of whom were condemned to die. The young prince, then only 17 years old, nobly came forward, and used his influence to save their lives, in which he was successful. Nine of them, however, were obliged to submit to the ordeal of tangena, one of whom died; four escaped; and the rest were sentenced to slavery, three of whom were immediately redeemed by their friends, the prince contributing largely towards the object. He has continued to afford the persecuted followers of Christ the most conclusive evidence that he is a faithful brother in the Lord. In defiance of the laws, he assembled with them for worship in their places of retreat; and when their lives or liberties were in danger, he employed all the means in his power to warn them of impending danger, and effect their rescue. The prime-minister, addressing the queen, said, "Madam, your son is a Christian; he prays with the Christians, and encourages them in this new doctrine. We are lost if your Majesty do not stop the prince in this strange way." "But," replied the queen, "he is my son—my only—my beloved son! Let him do what he pleases; if he wishes to become a Christian, let him! He is my beloved son." It is thus that the "earth helps the woman." God, in this instance, makes use of the natural affections of this cruel woman to protect his people. But in a still more striking manner did he turn the heart of this same prime-minister. Being informed of a meeting of Christians at the capital, he sent his nephew to take down their names. The nephew went and informed them of the object of his visit, and begged them to break up and go home, which they did. He then returned to his uncle, who inquired, "Where is the list?" "There is none," he replied. "Why have you disobeyed my orders?" the uncle again inquired. "Young man, your head must fall, for you show that you also are a Christian." "Yes," he replied, "I am a Christian; and if you will, you may put me to death, for I must pray." At these words the cruel man's feelings gave way, and he exclaimed, "Oh, no, you shall not die;" and there the matter ended. Still the persecution did not cease. Christians continued to be despoiled of their goods, confined in chains, or sold into slavery. And those who escaped could only meet for worship in the night, or in solitary caverns, or in the deep recesses of the woods; and even there they were not safe from the government spies.

In 1850, a new persecution broke out with great violence. Nearly 2,000 were summoned to the capital to answer for the offence of worshipping the only true God, and believing in his Son. Three of the most distinguished for rank and devotedness were sentenced to be burnt to death; and three times while their bodies were consuming, the rain descended in torrents, and extinguished the fires. Ten others were thrown from a precipice near the city, and dashed in pieces. The prince now interposed, at the risk of his life, and boldly withstood the prime-minister, who was the author of this cruelty.

The native converts, in a letter describing this scene, say, "At the moment the first four sufferers were brought to the stake, a rainbow of an immense size, and forming a triple arch, stretched across the heavens. One end of it appeared to rest on the posts to which the martyrs were tied; the rain, the meanwhile falling in torrents. The multitudes were struck with terror and amazement, and many of them took to flight." In a letter requesting Bibles, the following direction is given: "Put them in the bottom of cases or small casks,—put some iron bars over them, and fill up with bottles or catables."

In reviewing the history of the Madagascar mission, it presents one of the most remarkable instances of the power of the Gospel on record. From the commencement of the mission, in 1819 to 1828, the society sent out fourteen laborers, consisting of six ordained missionaries, two missionary printers, and six missionary artizans. We have already given the results of the first 15 years of the mission, up to the time when the persecution commenced.

For seventeen years the same oppressive policy was continued. Many hundreds were degraded and impoverished; hundreds more doomed to slavery; not less than one hundred have been put to death, and a large number are still suffering exile, bonds and degradation. Yet, during this time of trial there has been an astonishing increase in numbers. As before stated, there were at the capital about 200 church members. It is now impossible to obtain an accurate statement of the number of Christians on the island; yet it has been ascertained, from reliable authority, that there are now in the capital and the immediate vicinity, 1,000 persons known to each other, and mutually recognized as the disciples of Christ, who meet regularly on the Sabbath and at other times, for the worship of God and the administration of the ordinances. Besides these, there are known to be considerable numbers in other places. The Christians comprise among them some of the most intelligent and reputable men in the community. Many of them hold offices of great responsibility.

because of their ability, integrity, and known worth. It is supposed that their Christianity is connived at, on account of the value of their services. And, among the converts are the heir to the throne and the nephew to the prime-minister, the most bitter persecutor of the Christians.

In January, 1853, the society received intelligence that the government had been committed to the young prince, and that the son of the late prime-minister had succeeded to his father's office; that the persecution had been suspended, and the restrictions upon foreign intercourse removed. In consequence of this intelligence, they issued an appeal to the Christian public for funds to recommence the mission, which was liberally responded to, and about £9,000 were raised, as the Madagascar fund. As a preparatory measure, the society resolved to send Rev. Mr. Ellis, in company with Mr. Cameron, one of the former missionaries, to visit Madagascar, and ascertain the true state of things on the island. These gentlemen reached Tamatave on the 18th of July, 1853, and were kindly received by the queen's officers. From that place they dispatched a letter to the queen, asking leave to make a visit of friendship and good-will to the capital, and to converse on such subjects as they thought would tend to the good of the kingdom. After 15 days, they received a courteous answer from the government, containing kind inquiries after the former missionaries; but advising them, as there was much public business, requiring considerable time, to return to the other side of the waters, lest they should be overtaken with the sickly season. They regarded the answer as by no means unfavorable.

While remaining at Tamatave, the deputation obtained all the information they could, in respect to the actual state of things. They learned that the rumor that the government had been put into the hands of the prince was incorrect. The death of the prime-minister, Rainiharo, however, was confirmed; and it was stated that the prince was first officer of the palace, and the son of the late prime-minister, (reported a Christian,) through the influence of the prince, had been appointed commander-in-chief of the army. It appeared, however, that there were two great parties in the kingdom, of nearly equal influence; the one favorable to education, improvement, and Christianity; and the other opposed to all innovation, and determined to uphold the superstitions and ancient customs of the country. At the head of the former party was the young prince, and some others holding the highest offices of the government. At the head of the latter was a nephew of the queen, cousin of the young prince, a shrewd, ambitious, daring man, of considerable business talent and large property, leagued with the patrons and supporters of the idols and their keepers, of divination and tangena, and of slavery and coerced labor. It was said that no efforts were spared by this chief and his party to prevent the accession of the young prince. They represented him to the queen as unacquainted with the business of government, and bewitched by the Christians. This was supposed to be the queen's own opinion; and she was said to be indignant at the Christians for taking advantage, as she considered it, of his youth and inexperience, to draw him over to their party. Still, the prince was firm; both he and his wife were members of the church, and true and constant friends to the most afflicted and suffering of the persecuted flock. He is represented as of an amiable disposition and honorable character, and possessing the intelligence and cultivation of an English gentleman. He is respectful and attentive to his mother, spends much time with her, and she is said to be exceedingly fond of him. There was, however, a most formidable conspiracy against his life; and the queen had taken the strictest measures to guard him from danger. Just before Messrs. Ellis and Cameron left the island, an officer of considerable rank and long service stated that the queen had resolved to retire from the government, and was making preparations for the coronation of the prince, who was to be constituted sole ruler of the country. Should this prove true, a great change may soon be expected in the whole aspect of things in Madagascar. But if, on the contrary, the other party should gain the ascendancy, there would not only be a great destruction of human life, but a revival of the persecutions against the Christians, in all probability more violent and cruel than any yet witnessed. The rival of the prince was the chief instigator in the last persecution; and he is the only one now who ventures to accuse the Christians to the queen, all others being deterred by the fear that the prince may remember it hereafter. But this man pursues them with unrelenting hatred.

Mr. Cameron makes the following statement respecting the young prince: "He is considered a decided Christian. In protecting the Christians and meliorating the sufferings of the persecuted, his efforts are eminently successful. His personal property is reduced, through his liberality, to less than $1,000, and that of his cousin, Ramonja, son of the late prime-minister, to less than $3,000. He is a person of intellect and good sense, and employs much of his time in visiting the Christians, and conversing privately with them, but is cautious about frequent attendance upon their meetings."

MADEIRA: An island lying off the western coast of Africa, between lat. 32° 22' and 33° 10' N. and long. 17° 30' and 16° 20' W., belonging to Portugal. It is about 60 miles long and 20 broad, and consists of one immense mountain, rising 5,000 feet above the sea, on the summit of which is an excavation, supposed to have been the crater of a volcano. The various branches of this mountain are separated by narrow glens, the sides of which are thinly covered with soil, but nevertheless fully reward the cultivation they receive. The lower slopes are covered with vines; the higher declivities with the chestnut and pine trees. The importance of Madeira is derived solely from its vineyards, producing annually about 20,000 pipes of wine, 15,000 of which are exported. The sugar-cane is cultivated on a small scale. The poorer classes chiefly subsist on the eddoe-root, sweet potatoes, and chestnuts. The island abounds with beautiful scenery, and its different elevations afford every variety of temperature.

Under the new constitution, promulgated in 1836, the islands of Madeira and Porto Santo were included in one district. At that time, these islands contained 45 parishes, 24,674 families, and 115,447 inhabitants; 108 families and 324 souls being English, and the remainder consisting, according to Conder, of a mixed race, sprung principally from Portuguese and Moors, with some sprinkling of English blood; though Com. Wilkes says there is little if any mixed blood among them. There are about 5,000 proprietors of the soil, of whom no more than 650 live on their rents; and there are about 400 who receive government salaries. Mendicants are numerous. The native inhabitants are meagre, sallow, and short-lived, which is attributed to their want of wholesome food, a life of drudgery and exposure to great vicissitudes of climate, and to a total disregard of cleanliness. They are infected with a species of itch, which they regard as incurable. In this connection, the following description of the mode of expressing the juice of the grape, on this island, given by Commodore Wilkes, may not be uninteresting to the lovers of "Old Madeira." "On our approach, we heard a sort of song, with a continued thumping; and on entering the rude shed where the men were employed, we saw six men stamping violently in a vat of six feet square by two feet deep, three on each side of a huge lever beam, their legs bare up to the thighs. On our entrance, they redoubled their exertions, till the perspiration fairly poured from them. After the grapes had been sufficiently stamped, and the men's legs well scraped, the pulp was made into the shape of a large bee-hive, secured by a rope made of the young twigs of the vine, and the lever being used for a press, the juice flows off and is received in tubs."

Funchal, the chief town of Madeira, has a very pleasing appearance from the sea, and its situation in a kind of amphitheatre, formed by the mountains, adds to its beauty. The contrast of the white buildings and villas, with the green mountains, forms a picture which is much heightened by the bold, quadrangular Loo Rock, with its embattled summit commanding the harbor in the foreground.—Conder's Dictionary of Geography; U. S. Exploring Expedition, by Com. WILKES, Vol. I. p. 6.

The Roman Catholic church is the established religion of Madeira, and no other is tolerated.

MISSION.

SCOTCH FREE CHURCH.—The mission, which was ultimately taken up by the Scotch Church, was the result of the private labors of Dr. Kalle, a Scotch physician, to benefit the native population. For most of the facts contained in the following sketch we are indebted to the Memoir of Rev. W. Hewitson. In the beginning of his intercourse with the people, Dr. Kalle met few who had ever seen a Bible, or who seemed to know that the New Testament was written by men, the companions of Jesus Christ. In 1839, a few persons began to manifest a desire to read and hear the word of God; and in 1840 this interest increased, and many adults went to school that they might learn to read the Bible. This interest continuing to increase, in 1841 it attracted the notice of the Government at Lisbon, who ordered it to be suppressed. But the popular feeling was such, that, for the time, the order was not executed.

In 1842, people came in large numbers to hear the Scriptures read and explained, many of them walking 10 or 12 miles, and climbing over mountains 3000 feet high. The meetings were held in the open air, a part of the time, on a ridge, between two valleys, on the east and west, a lofty mountain rising on the south. The numbers varied from 1000 to 5000. The people sat in a clear space near the house which Dr. K. occupied, and all around was covered with trees clustered with grapes. In some places, the general topics of conversation were, the word of God, the one sacrifice for sin, the free salvation, &c., and the hymns of the Sabbath were heard through the week in the fields and vineyards.

The manner in which this work commenced was remarkable. The gratuitous medical aid which Dr. K. rendered the people, induced many to visit him, and to regard him as a friend. He took the opportunity to converse with them about the disease of their souls, and direct them to the true remedy, the Great Physician, advising them to read the Bible, and explaining and enforcing its truths as he had opportunity. Many of them followed his advice, and while searching the Scriptures appear to have been truly taught of God. Some read the Scriptures for some time without perceiving that they condemned Popery; but when they perceived that masses, penance, purgatory, &c., were inconsistent with the One Sacrifice, they were alarmed, and consulted their priests, and by this means were exposed to persecution. This led them to further examination, confirmed them in the truth, and prepared them for heavier suffering. Upwards of 1000, between the ages of 15 and 30, learned to read the Scriptures intelligently, and were thus enabled to search for themselves.

But such a work could not go on long without attracting the attention of the ecclesiastical authorities. A pastoral letter was issued, denouncing the Bible as "a book from hell," and threatening all who should read it with excommunication. Then a letter was addressed to the registrar of each parish, directing him to summon before him the teachers of all the schools established in the parish, by Dr. Kalley, both male and female, and charge them in the presence of witnesses, "not to teach any living being;" and, in case they should disobey the charge, to cause them to be arrested. Two of the converts having partaken of the Lord's Supper in the Presbyterian church at Funchal, were formally excommunicated, and all persons forbidden to hold communication with them, or to "give them fire, water, bread, or any other thing that may be necessary for their support;" or to pay them their debts; or to support them in any case before the courts; under pain of the greater excommunication.

In January, 1843, the civil governor commanded Dr. K. to abstain from speaking to the Portuguese on the subject of religion. But as the command was arbitrary and illegal it was disobeyed. After that, the governor issued a proclamation, forbidding the people to visit Dr. K.'s house; and on Sabbaths and holidays, the police were stationed in the roads at his doors, to enforce the order. Many were beaten or taken to jail for disobedience. One wealthy gentleman, indignant at the priestly attack on civil liberty, came on purpose to have the case tried. He was prosecuted, and the legal authorities decided that no citizen could be hindered from entering any house, if he had the consent of the owner. The people continued to come, but came early to avoid the police. The officers also came earlier and earlier, till at last they came at four o'clock in the morning; and after that, many of the people came on Saturday night, and remained over the Sabbath to worship God and hear the truth.

At length, a prosecution was commenced against Dr. K.; but the judge, after examining into the case, decided that his proceedings did not violate any existing law of Portugal, and dismissed the prosecution. But, the judge having left the island, Dr. K. was arrested again, and refused bail, on the ground that the crimes laid to his charge were punishable with death! The jailor acted as a spy, and warned the people not to visit him, and took down the names of those who did, and expressly forbade any singing or reading the Bible in the prison. The British Judge Conservator, with other officials, visited the prison, searched for Testaments, and carried away one or two that he found among the prisoners, which were never returned. But they did not search the doctor's rooms, where was a large supply of the Scriptures; and the colporteurs continued to come for supplies, which they took away and sold as before. On the Sabbath from 70 to 100 persons visited him by threes; and as the cathedral was near the jail, the Romanists showed their zeal by spitting on the heretics, who showed their spirit by praying for their persecutors.

The bishop now issued a letter stating that there was scarcely a verse in the Old Testament or the New, in the Bibles circulated on the island, but what was adulterated. To answer this charge, Dr. K. caused the Bible thus circulated to be carefully compared with the authorized version, and the result certified and posted up in the streets, showing the falsity of the bishop's assertions; and at length a newspaper arrived from Lisbon, containing a royal mandate, sanctioning the circulation of the very same edition.

In January, 1844, Dr. Kalley was released from prison, and resumed his operations, the police being employed around his doors as before; the attendance on his services being about 600 on the Sabbath, and 30 on week day evenings. In the summer of that year one of the converts, Mrs. Maria Joaquina Alves, was snatched from her family of seven children, one of them an infant, and committed to prison. But she remained firm, and was often heard praising the Lord that she was counted worthy to suffer shame for his sake. After sixteen months she was brought to trial before the Supreme Court on a charge of apostasy, heresy, and blasphemy. But she was tried only on the last charge, the specification being, that she had refused to acknowledge that the consecrated wafer is the real body and real blood, and the human soul and divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ, and that she had also refused to adore it.

The Judge asked her, whether she believed this dogma, and she, knowing that her life or death depended upon her answer, calmly replied, "I do not believe it." The Judge immediately rose, and pronounced sentence of death upon her. This sentence was afterwards commuted by the court at Lisbon, on account of a technical error, but with the instruction that, if she had been tried upon all the charges, the sentence of death must have been executed!

No effort was now spared by the persecutors to inflame the public mind. Assassination was openly proposed in the public papers, as an easy way to be freed from annoyance; the free use of the cudgel was recommended; and even a repetition of St. Bartholomew's day, or the Sicilian vespers, was hinted at. Some of the converts were cruelly beaten; others were stoned; houses were set on fire, and some of them burned down; and for these injuries all redress was refused. Families were denied any place to bury their dead except the public highway; and when so buried the bodies were taken up and burned under the inspection of the police.

In the September following, fifty soldiers were quartered upon a portion of the parish of Antonio de Serra, and allowed to plunder and perpetrate every cruelty. Twenty-two of the most respectable men and women were taken to Funchal in a vessel, and cast into prison among the most depraved and degraded, without any allowance of food. Friends, both English and Portuguese, sent them food, but it was refused admission. Still, they were not only patient and resigned, but happy. The streets around the jail resounded with their hymns of praise. But this was soon forbidden, although obscene songs sung by other prisoners were not prevented. They were driven to mass at the point of the bayonet, and forced to kneel. After twenty months' imprisonment, they were brought to trial before a jury of their own countrymen, and acquitted. Still they were not allowed to return to their plundered homes till they would pay the jail fees!

Dr. Kalley now perceiving that he was likely to be brought to trial, and expelled from the country, though contrary to law, was desirous of avoiding such a result, and therefore sailed for London. Lord Aberdeen, Secretary of Foreign Affairs, demanded damages of the Portuguese government for Dr. K.'s false imprisonment, and to compromise the matter, it was agreed that all proceedings against him should be dropped, and he returned to Madeira. But not many days after his arrival a warrant was issued for his apprehension, in direct violation of the promises made by the Portuguese government.

But Dr. K. having been warned by Lord Aberdeen, that he would not be protected by the British government against any attempts on the part of the Portuguese government to remove him from the Island, if he permitted Portuguese subjects to assemble in his house for the reading of the Scriptures, he thought proper to resign the work into other hands.

Rev. W. H. Hewitson had, without Dr. Kalley's knowledge, been appointed in Scotland to labor in Madeira; and meeting with Dr. K. at Lisbon, he returned with him, and entered into the work with zeal, yet with prudence, avoiding unnecessary publicity.

In March, 1845, Mr. Hewitson administered the Lord's Supper in secret to 34 Portuguese converts. More might have been admitted, but there was not room for them. Not a few in different parts of the island were being taught to read the Scriptures; and those already converted were not slack in comforting one another and doing good to souls still in darkness. Many of them, through reading and prayer, had become intelligent members of society, and able to give a clear and distinct "reason of the hope that was in them." Some of them seemed to be altogether free from doubts and fears, and to be filled with joy and peace in believing.

But it was soon found that the meetings were attracting the attention of the priests and the authorities, and they were given up. The people now waited on Mr. Hewitson individually, or two or three at a time; and their hungering and thirsting after instruction in the Scriptures was remarkable and affecting. In this way, Mr. H. was usually engaged with different parties or individuals, for a great portion of the day; and those who waited on his instructions grew rapidly in knowledge and grace. After a course of instruction, Mr. H. received them one by one into the Christian church. At his first communion, twenty-two were admitted, and at the second, thirty. Some of them had made much progress in grace and holiness, and their greatest joy was to see the work spreading, and new converts coming into the fold; though they had nothing before them but the prospect of suffering for Christ's sake. Mr. H. took the lease of a house in a retired place, where he intended to live and hold meetings. But soon the police began to watch about it, and he was forced again, for a time, to discontinue his meetings, though he met a few persons at a time in private houses.

On the 10th of May, a man and a woman were put in prison for teaching their neighbors to read the Bible. Soon after this, at a dinner party, the Bishop of Madeira declared exterminating warfare against the Bible, and said he was determined to put down all dissent from the Roman Catholic church. The persecution which the converts had to endure in private from relations and neighbors, was growing fiercer and fiercer. Yet they were willing and even glad to suffer persecution for Christ's sake.

In June, Mr. H. moved into his house, and held small meetings in it almost daily. Though the authorities were seeking grounds for a prosecution against him, they could, as yet, find none. Before this time, he had baptized several children; and the suspicion of it going abroad, produced great excitement; in consequence of which, about 20 persons conspired together to assassinate Dr. Kalley. Notices were posted on the church doors, requiring all to confess to the priest, or attend church, within ten days, under pain of imprisonment. About this time, after an imprisonment of more than two years, Maria Joaquina was released.

In August, Mr. H. was visited by a public notary, who warned him to discontinue meetings in his house with Portuguese subjects, for religious purposes, under pain of being proceeded with, and handed over to the judicial power. But he continued to hold meetings, under cover of the night, till a serious illness interrupted his labors. After his recovery, he organized a theological class, in order to qual ify them to act as catechists, expecting, himself, soon to be obliged to leave the island. This class was composed of fifteen or sixteen of those who had made the greatest advancement in spiritual knowledge, some of whom came from the distance of twelve or fifteen miles. One of them was the father-in-law of one of the principal judges of the island. The regularity of their attendance, and the earnestness of their attention, were highly gratifying.

Under date of Dec. 17, 1845, Mr. H. writes that 28 persons were imprisoned for the crime of meeting one Sabbath evening for reading the word of God, and prayer. The usual practice in such cases, he said, was, first to prepare the sentence in writing, and afterwards to go through the empty form of trying the case, and hearing the evidence. A family of three persons, hearing that they were to be prosecuted for not going to confession, escaped to Demarara.

Under date of Feb. 6, 1846, Mr. H. says: "The people are hungering for the word. Some of them say to me occasionally, 'When shall we come, for we are very hungry?' On the 26th of February, he wrote, that he had heard it intimated that the civil governor had charged one of the judges to proceed against him; and expecting soon to be compelled to leave, he set about preparing the people for his absence. He administered the communion to 87, while about 100 more were ready for examination. His theological class he kept up from December to April, till he had gone over all the leading doctrines and duties of Christianity; and in the beginning of May he left, intending after a few months to return to his flock. Soon after, the persecution burst forth with fury. On the 2d of August, 30 or 40 converts were assembled in the house of an English family, to hear a pastoral letter from Mr. Hewitson, when one of the canons of the cathedral church mustered a ruffian mob and appeared at the gate as the people were about to retire, ready to attack them. The first person who came out was Arsenio Da Silva, who had been conducting the worship. The canon thrust in his face an image, and bade him kiss it and adore his God, knocking off his hat, and abusing him with foul language. With great difficulty he escaped with three or four others, who came out behind him. The females took refuge in the kitchen. The house was besieged by the mob, at the instigation of the canon and several other priests, till towards midnight, when they smashed in the doors and windows, and rushed into the apartments of the lady of the house, who was an invalid. After searching for some time, they found the Portuguese, and began to beat and otherwise maltreat them, when the police and soldiers entered, and asked them by what authority they had entered the house, when they declared that they did not care for authority or law. They had before said there were no laws for Calvinists. Two of them were arrested and sent to prison.

About 2 o'clock on the morning of Sabbath, August 9th, as Dr. Kalley was escorting a friend to his own house, he overheard the guard of soldiers, which had been sent at his request to protect him, in familiar conversation with persons disguised in masks, one of whom was sharpening a large knife, preparatory, as he said, to "the killing on the morrow." This convinced him that there was no safety for him but in flight; and, disguising himself as a country peasant, he hastened to the house of a friend.

About noon, after the services were over in the church, groups of people were seen in the streets, talking with evident delight of the work of the day. At last a rocket rose hissing in the air. It was the signal for proceeding. "Those who are in that house," said one of the people in the hearing of Mrs. Kalley, as she was escaping in disguise through the street, "would need to be sure of salvation." At length a dense mass surrounded the house. The ringleaders rushed in, the mob watching till their benefactor should be brought forth. Chagrined to find that he had escaped, they committed his library to the flames, and hastened away in search of him.

By this time, Dr. Kalley, disguised in female attire, and concealed in a hammock, was escaping for his life to the bay. As the bearers, attended by Mr. Tate, were hurried along, the cry was raised, "Kalley! Kalley!" The infuriated mob catching the cry, and raising three cheers, ran towards the pier. As they reached it, the hammock had just been lowered into the boat, and in a few minutes it was alongside the steamer, the hammock swung on deck, and Dr. Kalley was safe. The whole beach teemed with the ruffian crew.

The removal of Dr. Kalley was the signal for all manner of cruelty and oppression. Many of the converts immediately fled to the mountains; where they were hunted down like wild beasts. When discovered in their hiding places, they were mercilessly beaten, to extort from them the promise that they would go to confession. One man was brutally murdered, and several women sustained fatal injuries. About a hundred fled on board an emigrant ship, with the design of removing to some other land. Many of these humble disciples manifested a spirit of devoted attachment to the truth, of simple steadfast faith in Jesus, and of patience in the midst of great tribulation.

An English resident, who had been obliged to take refuge on board the ship that was to take two hundred of them to Trinidad, wrote to Mr. Hewitson, "The sound of the hymns is very sweet, as it rises from the hold. They never speak against their persecutors. They only mention them with pity. Sometimes I overhear them in prayer, praying for their enemies, and for those who have turned back again to the Casas d'Idolatria. They have all been in hidings on the mountains, their houses broken up and pillaged; and many of them have nothing left but the clothes they wear."

A woman was taken out of her house, beaten till she was seemingly dead, then dragged down and thrown on the graves of the Protestants, buried on the roadside. She revived again, and was carried by the police to the hospital. After dressing her broken arm, they ordered her to "confess," which she refused; in consequence of which she was taken to the police station, where she remained all day in a hammock.

Two hundred sailed on the 22d of August, for Trinidad; 350 soon followed, and others went afterwards, increasing the number to 800 in all.

Dr. Kalley, speaking of the converts, says, they were begotten of God, by his word of truth; they grew by the sincere milk of it; it was sweeter to them than honey, more precious than gold; the words of Jesus were spirit and life to them. They enjoyed peace through his blood. Sometimes the expression of their attachment to him was very striking, and their sympathy and affection for each other truly brotherly. Their enemies witnessed changes upon them, which appeared very strange and unaccountable, especially when they persecuted them. The gentleness and patience, the love and joy, of the sufferers, confounded even their persecutors, some of whom were reported to have used expressions like these: "We call these people ugly names, and they don't answer back; we spit upon them, and they don't get angry; we beat them, and they seem pleased; we break open their houses and destroy their property, and they are happy; we put them in jail, and they sing: we can't make them unhappy."

Mr. Da Silva, already mentioned, was a man of wealth and distinction; but he was obliged to forsake all, even his wife and children. He was afterwards ordained pastor of the exiles at Trinidad, where he died, after having witnessed the departure of a portion of them for the United States.

Mr. Hewitson, after remaining some time in Scotland, to recruit his health, visited the exiles at Trinidad, and labored for some time among them, preaching the Gospel, and seeking to establish them in the faith. After his return to Scotland, another missionary was appointed by the Free Church to labor among the exiles, who has since followed them to their settlement in Illinois.

Mr. Hewitson, on visiting his flock at Trinidad, says of them, "Though a few of the Portuguese in Trinidad have, under the powerful influence of new temptations, declined somewhat in spirituality of mind, yet I have discovered no good ground for suspecting the sincerity of any whom I was accustomed to regard in Madeira as having the things which accompany salvation. A considerable number seem to be truly desirous of growing in grace, light and holiness. The elders and deacons have been faithful and exemplary."

The Portuguese converts of Madeira are among the martyrs of the nineteenth century. They furnish a remarkable instance of the power of God attending the simple ministry of the word. The facts in this case show that there is no want of power in the Gospel, properly applied, for the conversion of the world. They furnish also, a living testimony to the changeless, persecuting spirit of Popery; and to see the identity of "Pope and Pagan," we need only compare the persecutions in Madeira with those of Madagascar.

As evidence that the blessed work is still in progress, we notice the recent arrival of a vessel at New York from Madeira, bringing 158 more religious exiles, on their way to the colony in Illinois.

MADEBLI: A town of the Bassas in Western Africa, situated on the Meclin river, about 20 miles from its mouth. It has been a seat of the African mission of the American Baptist Missionary Union.

MADRAS: The capital of the British possessions in the south of India, in lat. 13° 5' N. and long. 80° 81' E.; for two centuries the seat of Jesuit Missions in Hindostan. The population has recently been estimated at 630,000, of whom 530,000 are Hindoos, 80,000 Mohammedans, and 20,000 Europeans or descendants of Europeans. It is fortified to the north and west by a wall, having five gates, and on the south by Fort St. George. It is occupied by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, the London Missionary Society, the Church Missionary Society, the Wesleyan Missionary Society, the Church of Scotland, the American Board, and the Free Church of Scotland. (See Hindostan.)

MADURA: A city of Southern Hindostan, 136 miles north-east from Cape Comorin, and 270 miles south-west from Madras, and contains a population of 50,000. The district of Madura has a population of 1,300,000. The city itself is encircled by walls, and may be emphatically termed a city of temples. The largest, as described by Mr. Hoisington, missionary of the Board, in 1834, has at least 10,000 massive pillars of stone, presenting on every side, in full relief, curiously wrought images of every description—men, women, children, beasts, and creatures of the wildest fancy. This vast palace, covering ground sufficient almost for the site of a town, is in a dilapidated state, and the immense wealth that existed at the period of its construction has departed. Madura is the city of the ancient Tamil kings, and the seat of Brahminical pride in this part of India. The American Board commenced its mission here in 1834.

MAGEZZIN: A Karen village on the confines of Arracan, in Burmah, and an out-station of one of the Karen missions of the American Baptist Union.

MALTA: An island in the Mediterranean, 60 miles from Sicily, probably the ancient Melita, where Paul was shipwrecked. Pop. 70,000. A mission was commenced here by the London Missionary Society in 1811, and continued for several years. In 1815, Rev. William Jowett was sent to Malta by the Church Missionary Society, where he remained several years. In 1822, the American Board established a printing press in Malta, under the direction of Rev. Daniel Temple and Mr. Homan Hallock, which was removed to Smyrna, Dec. 23, 1838. (See p. 125). The Church Missionary Society have a college there. (See p. 633.)

MALCOM PETH: A temporary health station of the American Board upon the Ghauts, towards the south of Hindostan.

MALLIGAUM: A station of the Church Missionary Society, 150 miles north-east of Bombay.

MAMRE: Station of the United Brethren, in South Africa, on the Beka river.

MANEPY: A parish in the district of Jaffna, Ceylon, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles N.W. of Jaffnapatam, and 4 from Batticotta: a station of the American Board.

MANDAHASALIE: In Southern Hindostan, and one of the most recent stations of the American Board, in connexion with the Madura mission.

MAUBEE: A Karen village in the Bassein province of Southern Burmah, near Arracan, and an out-station of the Bassein mission of the American Baptist Union.

MANGAIA, or MANAIA: One of the Hervey Islands, having a station of the London Missionary Society.

MANGALORE: A station of the Basle Missionary Society, in the province of Canara, 440 miles S. S. E. of Bombay.

MANUA: One of the Samoa Islands, circular in form, and so elevated as to be visible at the distance of 40 or 50 miles. The inhabitants are regarded as a conquered people, and are despised and oppressed by the inhabitants of other islands. London Missionary Society.

MANONO: One of the Samoan Islands; a station of the London Missionary Society. Though small, it has obtained a kind of political supremacy over the whole group of these islands.

MANAARGOODY: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in Southern India.

MANEROO: An extensive district in Australia, on the south side of Murrumbidgee river, with a wide-spread pastoral population. Society for the Propagation of the Gospel.

MANTI: One of the Hervey islands;

about 15 miles in circumference. Population, 300.

MAPUMULO: A station of the American Board in South Africa, among the Zulus, near Port Natal.

MARE: One of the New Hebrides, where is a station of the London Missionary Society.

MARAETAI: A station of the Church Missionary Society in New Zealand, on the east coast, at the mouth of the river Waikato.

MARSOVAN: A station of the American Board among the Armenians, situated in Northern Asia Minor, not far from the Black Sea, S. E. from Samsoon.

MARTABAN: A province in Southern Burmah, annexed to the British dominions, in part in 1826, and in part in 1852. The city is near the mouth of the Salwen river, and is a seat of the missionary operations of the American Baptist Union.

MARONITES: A sect of Eastern Christians, who follow the Syrian rites, and are subject to the Pope; their principal habitation being on Mount Libanus, between the Ansarians to the north and the Druses to the south. According to Mosheim, the sect had its origin among the Monothelites, who, having been condemned by the Council of Constantinople, found a refuge on Mount Lebanon, which, at the time, formed an asylum for vagabonds of all sorts. About the conclusion of the seventh century they were called Maronites, after Maro, their first bishop. They retained the opinions of the Monothelites until the twelfth century, when they abandoned them, and were admitted into the church of Rome. The nation is divided into two classes, the common people and the sheikhs. (See Sheikh.) They live dispersed in the mountains, in villages, hamlets, and even detached houses. The whole nation consists of cultivators, living frugally, with many enjoyments and few wants. Though dependent on the Pope, they continue to elect a head under the title of Batrak, or patriarch of Antioch. Their priests marry, but must not marry widows, nor marry a second time. They say mass in Syriac, which they do not understand; but the Gospel is read in Arabic, and the communion administered in both kinds. They have about 200 convents for men and women, of the order of St. Anthony. There are Maronites, however, in Syria, who regard the church of Rome with aversion and abhorrence.

MARQUESAS ISLANDS: A group of islands extending from 7° to 10° S. lat. and 138° to 140° W. long. They contain two clusters, of five each.

MASULIPATAM: A town in the presidency of Madras, and capital of a district of the same name on the Coromandel coast, 230 miles N. N. E. of Madras. It is very extensive, and for a Hindoo town tolerably well built. It stands on the only part of the Coromandel coast which is not beat by a heavy surf. It is the residence of the district collector and judge. Population of the district in 1822, 454,754 persons. Church Missionary Society.

MATAH: A Karen village in Tenasserim, Burmah, and an out-station of the Tavoy mission of the American Baptist Missionary Union.

MATURA: A town in the southern extremity of Ceylon, 82 miles S. E. of Columbo. Population, 3,000; surrounded by populous villages. The Matura priests are famed for their knowledge of the Pali literature. The people are generally poor, ignorant, and superstitious, and addicted to the disgusting practice of devil-dancing. A station of the Wesleyans, and also of the Gospel Propagation Society.

MATANTU: A station of the London Missionary Society on Savaii; one of the Samoa islands.

MAUI: One of the Sandwich Island group, lying to the N. E. of Hawaii, being about 48 miles in length, 29 in its widest part, with a surface of about 600 square miles. The American Board have five stations on this island.

MAULMAIN: One of the Tenasserim provinces in British Burmah. The capital city bears the same name, and is situated on the Salwen river, twenty-five miles from its mouth. It is the seat of two missions—one for Burmans, and the other for Karens—of the American Baptist Union; and has hitherto been the residence of most of the American Baptist missionaries in Burmah. Dr. Judson resided here the greater part of the time from 1827 to the period of his death.

MAUPTI: A station of the London Missionary Society in the Society Islands.

MAURITIUS, or, ISLE OF FRANCE: An island in the Indian Ocean, belonging to Great Britain, situated between 19° 58' and 20° 32' South latitude, 70 or 80 miles N. E. of the Isle of Bourbon, and 500 E. of Madagascar. It is an irregular oval, about 36 miles long, by 18 to 27 broad; area, about 500,000 acres. The population in 1832 consisted of 13,000 whites, 26,000 free colored people, and 89,000 slaves, now freemen. Its appearance is in the highest degree picturesque and beautiful. There are several ranges of mountains in different parts of the island, from which flow numerous small rivers and streams. The whole coast is surrounded by reefs of coral, with the exception of a few openings through which vessels approach the shore. The capital is Port Louis, on the north-west side of the island, population 1830, 26,000. The thermometer in Mauritius generally ranges from 79 to 88 degrees. The soil requires but little labor to cultivate, and is particularly favorable to the sugar-cane; but most of the fruits of the temperate zones have been introduced and naturalized. It came into the possession of the English in 1810, by conquest from the French. It has several small dependencies, the chief of which are the Seychelles Islands, about 900 miles north of Mauritius.

Inhabitants.—Among the colored people of Mauritius, there are at present supposed to be about 5000 natives of Madagascar. The great majority of the Europeans, both at Mauritius and the Seychelles, are Roman Catholics.

MISSION.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—This Society sent out Mr. Le Brun, in 1814, who arrived at Mauritius in June of that year, and opened a school for the French children at Port Louis, and engaged in the circulation of the Scriptures and tracts. In the following year, he had gathered a small congregation, amid much opposition, and in connection with which was a prosperous Sunday-school of 50 children. He was countenanced by the Governor, who wrote to the Directors of the Society in 1816, expressing his approbation of Mr. Le Brun's labors, and stating that he had succeeded in inducing the free colored population to attend upon his instructions. In 1818, he had succeeded in organizing 25 persons into a Christian Society at Port Louis. He was also employed by Gov. Farquhar in the religious instruction of two brothers of a principal chief of Madagascar. In the following year he had gathered a church of 20 members, and six more were candidates for admission. Two of the converts he had appointed to preach in the suburbs of Port Louis. An auxiliary Missionary Society had been formed at that place, the proceeds of which were to be applied to the support of the Madagascar Mission. The inhabitants of Mauritius manifested a strong inclination to cast aside their superstitions. In 1820, Mr. Jones, a missionary under appointment to Madagascar, spent a portion of the year in the instruction of Mr. Telfair's slaves at Belombre, with great success. Mr. Telfair wrote to the Directors that a general spirit of religious feeling pervaded all classes of the numerous population on his plantation; and that there had been a proportionate improvement in their conduct and industry. The school was continued after Mr. Jones left, and many of the slaves learned to read. In 1821, the church at Port Louis had increased to 34, and the year following to 43. Mr. Le Brun continued his labors amid many obstacles, both from the superstitions of the people, and the opposition to the instruction of slaves. His church continued to increase, and he extended his efforts to several places around. But in 1832 his health failed; and, assigning the care of his flock to pious friends, he visited the Cape of Good Hope, with the hope of recruiting his health; but there he experienced a severe attack, and was obliged to return to England. The work which he had commenced and continued for 18 years, against much bitter opposition and persecution, had been successful beyond his expectation. Public worship had been maintained in several different places; the slaves had been instructed; day and Sabbath-schools had been maintained; a church had been gathered of about 50 members, two of whom were engaged in preaching the Gospel. The state of the island being peculiarly unfavorable to the successful prosecution of missionary labor, the Directors did not think it desirable to resume the mission; but Mr. Le Brun, after spending some time in Europe, returned on his own account to Mauritius, and took the pastoral charge of the people among whom he had formerly labored.

In 1836, when the missionaries were driven from Madagascar, Mr. Johns was instructed to remain at Mauritius, devoting himself to the instruction of the natives of Madagascar, whom he found on the island; and also to embrace every opportunity of keeping up a communication with Madagascar. And Rev. D. Jones, who had been a few years in England, returned to Mauritius, to make himself useful there, and await the changes at Madagascar. Two schools were established for Malagasy children, consisting of 52 boys and 23 girls. Public worship was maintained by them and Mr. Le Brun, in French and English. The door was at this time open for the instruction of all classes of the people of color. In October, 1837, Mr. Baker removed to Piton, 12 miles from Port Louis, where he was employing the press for the diffusion of the Gospel and promoting the cause of education.

In 1845, Mr. Le Brun reported a strong religious movement among the people at Port Louis; and the 200 free sittings in his chapel were insufficient for the accommodation of the negroes, who attended on the Sabbath. An adult Sunday-school of 80 to 100 persons had been formed, consisting of Malagasy, Africans, Malays, and Creoles.

Before Mr. Johns's death, he had purchased a piece of land at Moka, 12 miles from Port Louis, intending to form a settlement of the Christian refugees from Madagascar. After his death, Mrs. Johns, with the assistance of Mr. Le Brun, proceeded to carry out his plan. She afterwards returned to England, and the station was committed to the charge of a son of Mr. Le Brun, who soon gathered a congregation of more than 100 Malagasy, and on the 1st of January, 1845, he formed a church of seven members; and there were many earnest inquirers. With Ramiadina and Rafaralahy, both men of decided piety, he commenced a course of theological instruction. At the same time, they were appointed to labor at an out-station, in the neighboring mountains. Mrs. Le Brun had established a promising Malagasy school of 55 children. In the year 1847, six new members were added to the church at Moka, and there was a class of eight inquirers. Mr. Le Brun this year established another out-station, among several villages of Malagasy, at a place called La Nouvelle Decouverte. The people came with carts and donkeys for Ramiadana and his wife, the native teachers, and bore them away with joy. 60 or 70 of them commenced meeting for public worship on the Sabbath. They proposed to build a place of worship at their own expense, and a woman gave a piece of ground for the chapel and a house for the teacher. And adults as well as children commenced learning to read. On Christmas day, 1848, the new chapel was dedicated by Mr. Le Brun, in the presence of a crowded assembly.

In 1851 Mr. Peter Le Brun was appointed to the station at Moka, and Mr. J. J. Le Brun joined his father, in the pastoral office at Port Louis, especially for the purpose of taking charge of the theological instruction of some young men, natives of Madagascar, with the view of their becoming evangelists in their fatherland.

The latest intelligence from this mission is contained in letters from Mr. J. J. Le Brun, dated Port Louis, June 21, 1852, and from Mr. Peter Le Brun, dated Moka, Aug. 25, 1852. Mr. J. J. Le Brun says the people at Port Louis are sick of popery, and are everywhere asking for the pure doctrines of the Christian faith. The Bible is in great demand. At all the stations and out-stations, there is an increase of numbers, and many inquirers are coming to a saving knowledge of the truth. Mr. Peter Le Brun says the mission at Moka has made decided progress, both in numbers, and in moral and spiritual improvement. On the 21st of August, 1852, a new and commodious place of worship was opened at this station, and near the same time, 18 were added to the church.

The Malagasy refugees, numbering about 500, residing at Mauritius, have continued to share in the oversight of the Messrs. Le Brun; and it is believed that many of them will be raised up to be the future instructors of their countrymen in Madagascar.

The latest reports from these missions do not give the statistics. The following table gives the present number of stations and missionaries; but the number of church members at Port Louis is taken from the report of 1850, and at Moka the number has been collected from reports of additions from time to time, and may not from that cause be perfectly accurate.

MAVELICARE: A large and populous town, near the foot of the Ghauts, and much shut out from European intercourse. Population of the district, about 270,000. The pagodas are numerous, and there are 21 Syrian churches within a few miles of the town.

MEIGNAPOORAM: A station of the Church Missionary Society in the Tinnevely district, India.

MEKUATLING: Station of the French Protestants in South Africa, four or five days' journey N. W. of Morija.

MELBOURNE: The metropolis of Australia. In 1838, it contained but three houses deserving the name. It is now a large place. It is occupied by the Wesleyans and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel.

MERGUI: The name of a city and a province in British Burmah. The city is on one of the branches of the Tenasserim river, and is a station of the Tavoy mission of the American Baptist Union.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, MISSIONS OF: See Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

MEXICO: This country exhibits at the present time, a striking exemplification of the legitimate tendencies of unmitigated Romanism. After the revolution which separated Mexico from the mother country, a republican constitution was adopted, after the model of our own, with the important exception, that the Church of Rome was made the established religion, and no other was tolerated. The priests have borne rule from the beginning, having unlimited resources at their command; yet the people continue in abject ignorance, misruled by demagogues, and constantly convulsed by internal dissensions and revolutions, demonstrating, beyond a doubt, the utter incompatibility of Romanism and a republican form of government. At present, so far as we can ascertain, there is little if any opening for missionary efforts in that miserable land. The present government appears to be sold to the priests. Yet, in the unsettled state of affairs, we cannot tell what a day may bring forth; and it is to be hoped that the increasing intercourse of the people of Mexico with those of the United States, since the conclusion of the late war, may be preparing them for the reception of the Gospel, when the way shall be opened for its introduction.

MICHIPOCOTON: An Indian town on the northern shore of Lake Superior, formerly a station of the Ojibwa mission of the American Baptist Union.

MICRONESIA: The name Micronesia is derived from the Greek Mikros, small, and Nesion, a little island, signifying a region of small islands or islets. It is applied to a portion of the Central Archipelago, Pacific Ocean, including the Kingsmill Group. As this term is of recent application, it is not generally laid down on the maps, nor very well defined. The Kingsmill Group lies on both sides of the equator, and consists of 15 principal islands, all coral, densely covered with cocoanut groves, having a population of about 50,000. They are governed by independent kings, have a limited intercourse with each other, are resorted to by whalers, and occupied by a company of English traders, who export annually more than 1200 barrels of cocoanut oil from Pitt's Island alone.

Population.—The natives of these islands lead a life of indolence. The cocoanut, which everywhere abounds, supplies their few wants with little labor. Their chief employment is the manufacture of cocoanut oil, which is now a source of great profit to the few traders, and might bring a large revenue to the people. They also make an excellent kind of molasses from the cocoanut sap. From this tree almost every thing which they eat, drink, wear, live in, or use in any way, is obtained. The people are divided into three classes, chiefs, landholders, and slaves. They live in small communities, regarding the oldest of their number as a kind of patriarch. Polygamy is common. They are hospitable, and ready to share the last morsel with the needy. In each town is a "stranger's house," where travelers find a temporary home. Some of these are large, and serve as council chambers and places of amusement. Their religion scarcely deserves the name. They have, so far as is at present known, no idols and no priests. They have a loose system of spirit-worship—veneration for the spirits of the dead—but their confidence in it is weakened. When one dies, the body is placed upon mats, in the centre of the house, and rubbed with cocoanut oil till the flesh is gone; and then the bones are placed in the loft or thrown into the sea. A stone is placed near the house, as a resting place for the spirit, and offerings are made to it twice a year. The tabu system has little force. They have but few traditions, and cannot be said to be very superstitious.

MISSION.

AMERICAN BOARD.—The mission to Micronesia had its origin, in part at least, in the belief of some of the officers of the A. B. C. F. M. that something of this kind was needed, more fully to develop the benevolence and strengthen the Christian character of the Sandwich Islands Christians. Nov. 18th, 1851, Rev. Benjamin G. Snow and Rev. Luther H. Gulick, M. D., with their wives, sailed from Boston for the Sandwich Islands, and on the 17th of January, 1852, Rev. Albert A. Sturges and wife followed them. Dr. Gulick was born at the Islands, his father having been long a missionary there. The Hawaiian Missionary Society had been already formed in May, 1851, and was expected to coöperate with them in commencing a mission in Micronesia. The first company arrived at Honolulu, March 29th, and great interest was at once awakened. The churches contributed with very great liberality to their missionary society, and, by the end of its first year, $5,000 had come into the treasury from Hawaiian sources. It was then proposed to purchase a vessel for the new mission, and more than half the cost was raised at Honolulu alone. Two natives were wanted, at first, to be connected with the mission, and seven offers of service were soon received. A teacher, Daniela Oponui, and a deacon, Berita Kaaikaula, both from the second church in Honolulu, were selected, with their wives.

The company sailed from Honolulu, July 15th, accompanied by Rev. E. W. Clark, Secretary of the Hawaiian Missionary Society, Rev. Mr. Kekela, native pastor of one of the churches, and a brother of Dr. Gulick. They reached Pitt's Island, latitude 3° 20' N., and longitude 172° 57' E., of the Kingsmill group, on the 5th of August. These islands are of the low, coral formation, and it was thought best to form the mission on one of the high islands. On the 22d of August they reached Strong's Island, 600 miles north of west from Pitt's Island. Obtaining the cordial assent of the king, who, with some of his people, had obtained some knowledge of the English language from traders, it was arranged that Mr. Snow and the teacher, Oponui, should establish themselves there. The whole company, however, proceeded together to Ascension Island, or Bonabe, 300 miles distant, latitude 7° N. Here a station was selected for Dr. Gulick, Mr. Sturges and Kaaikaula, and they landed, Sept. 20th, under apparently favorable circumstances, encouraged by the king, and by a young man whose official title is Nanakin, and who seemed to have secured the full control of state affairs. Resident foreign traders also encouraged the formation of the mission, of one of whom a house was hired. Others of the company now returned to Strong's Island, where Mr. and Mrs. Snow, with their Hawaiian fellow-laborers, were cordially welcomed by the king, on the 6th of October, to their future home.

On the 13th of November, Mr. Snow took possession of a house built for him by the king and chiefs, and on the second Sabbath in December, he held his first public service with the natives. At the close of the first year, (Oct. 1853,) this service had been regularly sustained, the congregations varying from 75 to 150. The king used his influence to secure the attendance of the people, and was always present himself,—with his wife and family,—a very attentive listener. He had sent his youngest son, a bright boy about ten years of age, to reside with Mr. Snow. A school of about 30 boys and girls manifested much interest in learning to read and spell. But the mission company had been deeply afflicted by the death of Oponui, in August. Other trials, too, had been experienced, such as have so often and so sorely afflicted missionaries on the islands of the Pacific. In many instances, the deportment and the kindness of captains of vessels and other foreigners had been most cheering; but one vessel had been at the island, with plenty of brandy and other liquors, producing great evil; and about the close of the year, the presence of several vessels occasioned an outbreak of licentiousness which had been exceedingly trying.

Messrs. Sturges and Gulick commenced their labors in behalf of the people of Ascension Island, among the Kittle tribe. But, in June, 1853, Dr. Gulick removed to the Metalanim tribe, at Shalong Point, the landward extremity of Taman Island, which lies in the mouth of Metalim harbor, and is about four miles in circumference. He had previously visited the tribe, secured the protection of the chief, and built a house. In July, he had opened a school, some of his pupils being adults, and three of them chiefs. They seemed to have the entire confidence of the rulers, who afforded them complete protection. Their families had been remarkably healthy, but they had been afflicted with the loss of a friend, Mr. Lewis Corgat, a trader who had shown them great kindness, and of whom they had some hope that he was a true Christian. They had two of his children in their families, whom they hoped to bring up for usefulness.

MINISTERIAL EDUCATION : In every effort, looking to the spread of the Gospel among men, reference must always be had to the Christian ministry. In Christ's great plan for the recovery of our lost world, the ministry is made to hold a fundamental place, and this institution can never be set aside, or even lightly regarded, without the most injurious consequences. Any serious deficiency in this respect, paralyzes the whole movement of the church, in her great contest with the powers of evil. Hence it is, that the most far-seeing minds in every age of the church have given special thought to this subject. No question with them has been more vital than this—how shall a sufficient number of men, of the right stamp of character, be sought out and fitted for the responsible work of the Christian ministry?

We shall not now attempt any general history of this subject, as it stands connected with the growth and prosperity of the church at large. Our object will be simply to give some brief account of the methods by which the ministry has hitherto been supplied in this country, and more especially to set forth the present condition of this interest among the different religious denominations of our land.

The early ministers in this country were, almost without exception, men who had been educated and trained for their work, in the old world; and in the great majority of cases they had filled the pastoral office before coming hither. The intolerance and persecution which drove from their homes so large a portion of these early emigrants, would be likely to bear, with peculiar severity, upon non-conforming ministers; and hence it was, that so large a number of persons of this class were found in the early settlements.

At no period has this country been better supplied with religious teachers than during the first few years after these settlements began. It has been estimated that there was in the New England colonies, twenty years after the landing at Plymouth, a graduate of Oxford or Cambridge college, for every 240 inhabitants. A few of these graduates were employed in the civil administration of the colonies, but most of them were in the ministry.

But as the population of the country increased, and as an adequate supply of ministers from abroad could not be depended upon, the thoughts of good men began to turn toward some method for raising up, on these shores, a supply of Christian teachers. In the year 1636, the foundations of Harvard College were laid, amid much sacrifice and self-denial, with special reference to this sacred interest. From this time forward, as new churches were planted, or as the early ministers passed away by death, the ministerial office was supplied, in great measure, from among the graduates of the infant college. More than half of its graduates, during the first century of its existence, entered into the labors of the ministry. Cotton Mather, in his Magnalia, has given us a list of the churches in the New England colonies, for the year 1696, with their ministers, by which it appears that there were then 129 churches, having 116 pastors, of whom 107 were graduates of Harvard College. In the year 1692, the College of William and Mary, Va., was founded, and in 1700 Yale College, in Ct. To these three institutions the churches for a long time were wont to look for a supply of educated ministers. For almost fifty years no other college was added to the list. In 1746, the College of New Jersey, at Princeton, was founded, and from that time forward colleges have been springing up, numerous in all parts of the land. In the year 1800, we had 24 institutions bearing this name, and now the number has increased to 120. It must be confessed, however, that many of these institutions are hardly deserving of the name, though some of the smallest of them aspire to be called universities. Still they have, to a very great extent, been founded for the primary purpose of training up ministers of the Gospel for the several denominations to which they belong. Of these institutions the Baptists have the control of 24; the Methodists of 10; the Episcopalians of 7, and the Catholics of 9. The controlling influence in almost all the rest is Congregational or Presbyterian.

Until the beginning of the present century, the cause of ministerial education had but a slow growth. There was a sure, but at no time a rapid advance. From the early periods of the country, New England has borne a very prominent part in the work of raising up ministers; and the following table will show at a glance, the progress made in this cause, in New England, down to the year 1800. The table dates from near the time of the founding of Harvard College, and exhibits the number of ministers who have come forth from the N. E. colleges, arranged in periods of ten years:—

Ministers.		Ministers.
From 1640-1650 . . .	22	From 1720-1730 . . .	195

" 1710-1720 . . .	99	" 1790-1800 . . .	310

Soon after the beginning of the present century, a new and decided impulse was imparted to the whole cause of ministerial education. The population of the country, which until then had been found mostly along the Atlantic shores, began to pour westward, and take possession of the vast territories which had been kept ready for its reception. About the same time, too, the Foreign Missionary enterprise was started, creating an additional demand for Christian laborers. A new sense of responsibility was enkindled in the church toward the perishing millions of the heathen world. These causes conspired to produce a greatly increased activity in the work of bringing forward candidates for the sacred office. Under the pressure which was then felt upon this subject, the American Education Society was formed, in the year 1815, which very soon began to lend a powerful aid for the furtherance of this great work. The evidence of this progress may be distinctly seen, by continuing the table which we have given above, down to the year 1840. This table is confined, as before, to the New England colleges.

Ministers.
From 1800-1810	427
" 1810-1820	635
" 1820-1830	965
" 1830-1840	1077

This table, however, gives only a very partial idea of the advance which has actually been made since the beginning of the present century. Most of the large New England colleges were already in existence before the close of the last century, while, since that time, in other parts of the country, colleges have sprung up in great numbers. As already stated, there were in the year 1800, but 24 colleges in the whole country, and now the number has increased to 120. Almost all these institutions have been contributing, according to their degree, to the ranks of the ministry.

There is still another item, in this enumeration, which ought not to be overlooked. The two largest religious denominations in our land, the Methodists and the Baptists, the former numbering 12,484 churches, and the latter 9,659, have to a very great extent, been supplied with ministers, whose names are not found in the catalogues of our colleges or theological schools. And yet it must be confessed that the ministry, in both these denominations, has been remarkably efficient and useful. It has carried the Gospel, with its life-giving power, among the moving masses of our population, which might otherwise have been sadly neglected. Though, as was inevitable, there have been many things exceptionable in connection with a ministry of this sort, yet we may say with Paul, "Christ is preached, and therein we rejoice, yea and will rejoice." It is very greatly to the credit of these two denominations, that as the country grows older, and as their first rough work is done, they are turning their attention more and more to the great enterprise of rearing up an educated ministry. The Baptists already have some 24 colleges and 10 theological schools in different parts of the land, devoted to this work, and in many of the older portions of the country, their ministry, for dignity and culture, holds a most honorable position. The Methodists, though somewhat later in the process, are also giving earnest attention to this subject. They already number 10 colleges, some of them of a very efficient character. In the department of distinct theological study they have as yet done but little. They have one theological school, the "Biblical Institute," at Concord, N. H., recently formed, which is understood to be working very successfully. In the absence, however, of theological schools, the candidates for the ministry, in the Methodist Church, are now for the most part carried through a process of training, the details of which we cannot stop minutely to describe, but which serves as a partial substitute for a regular course of theological study.

The growth of theological schools in this country even among those denominations which have given most attention to thorough ministerial education, has been of comparatively recent date. In earlier times, the candidate for the ministry, after he had closed his course of college study, was accustomed to reside for a season with some settled pastor, where he could enjoy the benefit of books and conversation, and could accustom himself also to the practical business of the ministry. This course of training had its advantages and its disadvantages. It gave the student an ample opportunity to understand the details of the pastoral work, but in the department of intellectual and biblical training it was far less efficient than the present method. In many cases too it was unfavorable to breadth and liberality of sentiment. The teacher, especially if he was a man of decided force of intellect, was apt to impress his opinions, theological and practical, too bodily upon the mind of the pupil. In this respect, a theological seminary, with its several teachers and its diverse studies, and with the influence derived from the intercourse of students among themselves, is far more favorable to completeness of education.

The oldest theological seminary in the country is that at Andover, Mass., which was founded in the year 1807. The next in order is the seminary at Princeton, founded in 1812. Others soon followed, and now the number has increased to 44. The number of students connected with these seminaries in 1853 was not far from 1650. The three largest are the seminary at Princeton, the Union Seminary in New York city, and the seminary at Andover.

In our estimate of the progress of the cause of ministerial education in this country, as seen in connection with the colleges, we brought the reckoning down to the year 1840. About this time a reaction commenced, which has extended itself, to a greater or less degree, throughout all the religious denominations in the land, and which is now beginning to excite no little apprehension. Notwithstanding the very rapid growth of our population, and the prosperous condition of the country, in respect to almost all forms of secular enterprise, there has almost everywhere been an actual retrograde as regards this sacred interest. A few statistics will show how the case stands better than any general statements.

Let us take, in the first instance, the four Congregational seminaries of New England, Andover, Bangor, East Windsor, and New Haven. The number who completed their education in these four institutions

Take, again, the operations of the two New School Presbyterian Seminaries in the State of New York, Union and Auburn. Although the Union Seminary in New York city has continued to prosper, the Seminary at Auburn has materially declined, so that if we take their joint labors, there has been no increase upon the field where they operate. This table, it will be noticed, does not give the number who have closed their studies in these years, as in the previous tables. It includes all the theological students who are connected with the Old School seminaries. And although there is little actual retrograde, yet in a denomination numbering almost 3,000 churches, and rapidly extending, it is but a meagre number of candidates for the sacred office. In connection with this table, the "Record" says, "The statistics of our candidates for the ministry summon the church to the mercy-seat, with an urgency of appeal which no intelligent and zealous Christian will resist."

The statistics now given, though they do not cover the whole field, may doubtless be taken as a fair indication of the tendencies of the times in respect to the cause of ministerial education. It is exceedingly difficult, in regard to several of the religious denominations of the country, to present the results, year by year, as in the above tables, because so many of their candidates for the ministry are not found in their public institutions. Throughout the Congregational and Presbyterian fields, we may ascertain very accurately how the matter stands, by studying the catalogues of the theological schools. But the general statements which are made on this subject in the publications of almost all the religious bodies of the land, give ample proof that this downward tendency is well nigh universal.

The following table, made up in part from the census of 1850, and in part from statistics gathered still later by the several religious bodies to which they refer, is designed to give a complete view, as far as possible, of the religious state of the country in respect to the number of churches and ministers :

While in some of the smaller of these bodies there seems to be an adequate supply of ministers, in most of them, and especially in the large denominations, there is a very serious deficiency. There is doubtless a considerable number of ministers, who are not included in this reckoning. The colleges of the country, founded as they are upon religious principles, and with primary reference to the raising up of ministers, have always supplied themselves with teachers, mainly from the ministerial ranks ; and a large number of men are in this way withdrawn from the pastoral office. The religious press of the country, also, absorbs no small number of those who have once been settled in the ministry, yet in both these stations it is deemed highly important to have men of this class, so that this may be regarded as a part of the regular demand. Not a few also are temporarily out of employment, and their names may not appear in the statistics of the denominations to which they belong ; but, after making all due allowances, it cannot, we think, be doubted that there is already a real deficiency in the ministerial supply. The especial cause for alarm, however, is with reference to the future. The tendency, at present is clearly downward, and unless this is soon arrested, it will entail upon the churches the most serious consequences.

The Foreign Missionary enterprise has now become one of such growing magnitude as to demand a considerable number of men, efficiently to carry on its operations. The calls in behalf of this work were never more pressing than now. Although the number of ordained ministers employed by the several Foreign Missionary Boards in this country is not large, as compared with the number of ministers in the home field, yet it is one most important and growing item in the demand made upon the churches in this country for ministerial education.

The amount of agency exerted by education societies in this country in the work of training up men for the ministry, may be judged of by reference to the following items: The American Education Society, (including the parent society at Boston, and its Presbyterian branches,) since its formation, in the year 1815, has raised and expended in the work of ministerial education not far from $1,300,000. It has afforded aid to 4500 young men in their course of education for the ministry. The amount raised by this society for the year ending April 30, 1854, was $38,914, and the number of young men assisted for the same year was 432.

The A. B. C. F. M. since its formation has sent out into the great foreign mission field, not far from 325 ordained ministers. Of these 140 have been beneficiaries of the American Education Society. About one-third of the Congregational ministers of New England at the present time were aided in their education by this society, while more than one-third of that large body of men who have labored so efficiently in connection with the Home Missionary Society, were raised up in the same way.

The Board of Education of the Presbyterian Church (Old School,) has since its formation furnished aid to about 2200 young men. How many of these men have been employed in Foreign and Home missionary service, we have no means at hand for determining. The amount raised by this Board, from year to year, for the purposes of ministerial education, is not far from $35,000, and the number of young men now assisted yearly, is but little less than 400.

There is also an Education Society in connection with the Baptist churches, which has rendered efficient aid in the same great work, but the exact details we cannot give.

In view of the facts thus set forth, it is obvious that the churches of this country are drawing near to a time of serious embarrassment, unless the most speedy and efficient measures are employed to change the present tendencies. There is an earnest call upon all the friends of Christ to look above, to the great Lord of the harvest, entreating him, "that he would send forth laborers into the harvest."—
REV. I. N. TARBOX.

MIRUT, or MEEROOT: Capital of a district of the same name in Northern Hindostan, 30 miles north-east of Delhi. It is the residence of a revenue collector and judge, and the head-quarters of a military force of 20,000 men, of whom about 3,000 are Europeans. The Church Society have a mission there.

MIRZAPORE: A large and flourishing town in the province of Allahabad, and district of Mirzapore, situated on the south side of the Ganges, about 30 miles W. S. W. of Benares. It is one of the largest inland trading towns, and has long been the grand mart for cotton. The population is supposed to be about 60,000, and that of the whole district 1,000,000. The London Missionary Society commenced its labors there in 1838. The city was then comparatively new, and occupied much the same position in regard to trade and commerce, as Benares did with respect to religion.

MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH: This Society was organized in the city of New York, April 5, 1819, the following persons being chiefly instrumental in its formation, viz., Messrs. Freeborn Garrettson, Samuel Merwin, Joshua Soule, Thomas Mason, Laban Clark, Seth Crowell, Samuel Howe, Thomas Thorp, and Nathan Bangs. Four of this venerable band still linger among us, to witness, after 35 years, the growing efficiency of the enterprise they were the honored instruments of inaugurating. The General Conference, at Baltimore, in 1820, fully endorsed the Society, and adopted it as one of the institutions of the church.

The Society embraces, by its constitution, both foreign and domestic missions. The terms of membership are, the annual contribution of $2 to its funds, or the contribution of $20 at one time constitutes a member for life. The officers, (except the corresponding secretary, who is appointed by the General Conference, and a vice-president from each of the annual conferences,) are elected by the Society, but must be members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The Corresponding Secretary is under the direction and control of the Board of Managers. This Board consists of 32 managers chosen by the Society, together with the president, vice-presidents, secretaries, and treasurer; and all ordained Methodist ministers, who are members of the Society, are ex-officio members of the Board of Managers. Each annual conference has an auxiliary; and auxiliaries and donors are allowed to designate the mission to which their contributions shall be applied. The annual conferences are divided into mission districts, with effective superintendents, and a committee of one from each district, appointed by the bishop, constitutes a General Missionary Committee. This committee meets annually in the city of New York, with the Board of Managers, for fixing the amount to be drawn, and in the division of it between the foreign and domestic missions. This committee, also, in concurrence with the Board of Managers and at least two of the bishops, determine what fields shall be occupied or continued as foreign missions, the number of persons to be employed, and the amounts to be appropriated to each. The same committee also determines the amount for which each bishop may draw for domestic missions in these conferences over which he presides. But in the interim the Board of Managers, with the bishop in charge of the work proposed, may adopt a new field, or provide for any unforeseen emergency, not exceeding $5,000. The General Committee are amenable to the General Conference, to whom they are required to make full reports of their proceedings. There are also eleven standing committees, and rules and regulations prescribing the duties of officers, regulating the salaries of missionaries, &c. The Missionary Board holds their regular meetings on the third Wednesday of each month, at the committee rooms, in the city of New York.

The Society was incorporated by the Legislature of the State of New York, in 1839, which authorized it to hold property; and another act was passed in 1850, by which it was authorized to receive legacies.

The mode of proceeding in raising funds for the support of missions, the reader will find fully described in the article on HOME MISSIONS, under the head of Methodist Home Missions. The moneys appropriated are paid out to the missions under the direction of the Board, and the accounts and vouchers are returned to the treasurer by the superintendent of each mission. For the right use of the moneys appropriated, the Board is responsible.

When a foreign mission is authorized, the bishop having charge of foreign missions for the time being appoints the missionary or missionaries, making his selection from the whole body of the ministry in the whole church. One of the missionaries so appointed is made superintendent of the mission, and bears the same relation to it, as far as circumstances will permit, as a presiding elder to his district. Thus each mission is instantly organized on the organic principle of the church which originates it; namely, the principle of a responsible superintendent. The spiritual and disciplinary administration of each foreign mission is under the supervision of the bishop, aided by the Corresponding Secretary; but the estimates for the salaries and other expenses of the mission are under the supervision and management of the Board of Managers. Thus the spiritual affairs of the mission are committed to the bishops and its pecuniary interests exclusively to the Board. If, when a foreign mission goes into operation, the missionaries shall find it expedient to institute schools, or employ helpers or colporteurs, the authority of the Board must be had expressly, both as respects the persons, their salaries, and the objects contemplated. This places the responsibility of appointing the missionaries upon the bishops, who from their general acquaintance with the whole ministry in the church, and their facilities for ascertaining the character and fitness of any minister, can put their hands on the proper men; and the action of the bishop in making the appointments is wholly independent of the pecuniary considerations involved. He selects the man; the Board provides the means to meet the expenses; and yet the Board is restricted from going beyond the general appropriation or credit allowed by the General Missionary Committee for each particular mission for the year.

In all this movement for making appropriations, raising missionary funds, and instituting and carrying on missions at home and abroad, there is but one regular office under pay of the society for salary, and this is the Corresponding Secretary, who is required to give his whole time to the work. He is allowed a clerk in the office, to keep the records, to take charge of business matters in his absence, and to attend to out-door business. In like manner the Treasurer is allowed a clerk, to keep the books and attend to the proper business of the treasury; but the Treasurer receives no pay for his own services.

Notwithstanding the favorable reception which this society received at its inauguration in 1819, yet, at its anniversary in 1820, the amount of money reported was only $823 04. The amount expended was $85 76. The next year the amount reported was $2,328 76; and the expenditure $407 37. Indeed it then seemed more difficult to expend than to collect, though the collections were sufficiently small. So difficult was it to diffuse the missionary spirit among the ministers and members of the church, that the bishops seemed afraid to select and appoint missionaries, and to draw on the treasury, so that from the time of its organization to the year 1832, a balance in the treasury was reported each year, though the greatest amount for any one year was but $14,176 11. From that time, however,—which was the year the Liberia Mission commenced—it has gradually increased in its resources, and enlarged the boundaries of its operations by taking in new fields of missionary labor, until in the year 1840, the receipts amounted to $135,521 94, and the expenditures to $146,498 58; while last year the income was $339,072 06, and the disbursements $288,506 88, with $50,000 in the treasury Jan. 1, 1854, to meet the demands on the society for the quarter ending March 31. The annual income has more than doubled itself during the past twelve years.

Besides those noticed under the head of Home Missions, the Society has established Missions in Africa, China, South America, and among the North American Indians, particular notices of which will be found under the appropriate heads. They have also in contemplation missions to Turkey and Hindostan, for which $12,500 have been appropriated.

Up to 1831, the Methodist Episcopal Church had no foreign missions except to the North American Indians. That year, through the efforts of Rev. Dr. True, the Young Men's Methodist Missionary Society was formed at Boston, in order to enter upon the missionary work in foreign countries, and soon after commenced the mission to Africa; and the same year the Board sent a missionary to Africa. The Young Men's Society afterwards became an auxiliary of the Board. The first missionary prayer-meetings held by the Methodists of New England were suggested by the Young Men's Society.

The Methodist Episcopal denomination in the United States, according to the last census, has 12,464 church edifices, valued at $14,636,676, with an aggregate accommodation for 4,209,333 persons. With this array of numbers and wealth, it may be asked why they have not done more in the work of foreign missions? To this question it may be answered that, seventy-five years ago next Christmas-day, the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States had no organized existence. The church was organized in the city of Baltimore in 1784. Previous to that time, there were about 13,000 Methodists scattered over this country and the Canadas, with only about 100 licensed preachers, scarcely a dozen of them ordained, and probably not a single church edifice. The work of the church, from its first organization, was essentially missionary; but it had first to form a body from the materials immediately around it, before it could command the resources for carrying the Gospel to distant lands. The first 30 or 40 years after their organization was employed in the work of acquiring a communion of their own. Then symptoms of maturity began to manifest themselves; and the want of the institutions and arrangements of well-organized and established communions began to be felt and expressed. Hence, circuits began to yield up their towns as stations; city churches, which had been associated as circuits began to separate into distinct charges; conferences began to feel the need of schools and academies, and colleges, for the people born within their congregations or acquired from without. The Church in her growth had arrived at that state when these institutions necessarily arose within her limits, if she meant to maintain herself in the execution of her mission. And some thirty years ago she entered formally into the modern missionary enterprise, by the formation of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Her first formal missionary efforts were necessarily directed to her home work, and she did not enter upon the foreign work until Providence called her to establish a mission in Liberia, in Africa. Thus growing first by spreading among the people, and advancing into new countries, and then coming to maturity by beginning to grow vigorously and rapidly within herself, she, within a few years past, has become conscious of her mature and permanent existence in the land, and of her responsibilities and duties as a Church. Taking the whole body of Methodists in the United States, they have grown in 70 years from 13,000 to 1,200,000 members, besides the many thousands that have died during that time. Thus the condition of the Methodist Church since its organization has been one of unparalleled growth and expansion; and its whole attention and strength have been employed in advancing to its present maturity. But, having gained that maturity, it is now called to wider and more vigorous action in the foreign field.

In the year 1843—the year before the division of the Church—the number of foreign missionaries was about 60; with 5,085 members, of whom 3,851 were Indians. The amount collected that year was $109,452, and the amount expended $145,035; leaving a balance against the Society of $35,583.

After the division, the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was formed, its operations being conducted independently upon the same general principles as the original Society.

In 1846, one year after the division was consummated, the statistics (for Indians and Africa, as before,) stood thus:

In the address of the venerable Dr. Bangs, at the opening of the new Missionary Rooms, in New York, he stated, that from a close and anxious investigation, he was satisfied that, up to that time there had been at home and abroad, at least 60,000 persons converted to God through the instrumentality of this society, since its organization. To God be all the glory.

TABLEAU VIEW OF FOREIGN MISSIONS.
Methodist Episcopal Church.

Among the Indians both churches have several manual labor schools and four or five seminaries, not included in the above statistics. The Church South has 490 pupils in her superior schools.—Authorities: BANGS and STRICKLAND'S Histories of the Missions of the Methodist E. Church; the Annual Reports of both societies; the Christian Advocate; and Missionary Advocate.—REV. W. BOTLER.

MITIARO: A small island in the South Seas, belonging to the Hervey Islands. Pop. 100. A station of the London Missionary Society, with one native teacher.

MOA: One of the Banda Islands, a group of the Moluccas, in the Indian Archipelago.

MOGRA HAT: A station of the Gospel Propagation Society, 32 miles south-east of Calcutta, and 12 from Barripore.

MOKA: A station of the London Missionary Society on the Mauritius, about 12 miles from Port Louis. Moka is well adapted as a site for a permanent mission station. It occupies the centre of a large Malagasy village, and two other populous villages lie a few miles from it. The land is capable of a high state of cultivation. The station was established for the benefit of the Malagasy refugees. (See Mauritius.)

MOKAU: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in New Zealand, on the west side of the island.

MOLOKAI: One of the smaller of the Sandwich Islands group, lying to the north-east of Maui, 40 miles long by 7 broad, broken by numerous deep ravines, with little level land; on which is a station of the American Board.

MOLLAH: A spiritual and judicial officer among the Turks, who has civil and criminal jurisdiction over towns or whole districts, and is therefore a superior judge, under whom are the cadis or inferior judges.

MOMBAS: Station of the Church Missionary Society in East Africa, situated on a small island at the mouth of the Tuaca river, near the coast of Zanzibar, in lat. 4° S. It has the finest harbor on the coast.

MONGHIB: A celebrated town and fortress in the province of Bahar, situated on the south side of the Ganges, and distant from Calcutta about 300 miles. Population 30,000. Occupied by the English Baptists as a station in 1816.

MONROVIA: The capital of the republic of Liberia, so called in honor of the late President Monroe. It is a place of growing commercial importance, occupied as a mission by the American Baptist Missionary Union.

MONTEGO BAY: A station of the Wesleyans in Jamaica, W. I.

MONTROSE: A station of the London Missionary Society in Demerara, W. I.

MONTSERRAT: A fruitful and pleasant island, about 20 miles south-east of Antigua, agreeably diversified with hills and vales, with streams of water and a generous soil. Pop. 10,000. Society for Propagating the Gospel.

MONOPHYSITES: A general name given to all those sects in the Levant who own but one nature in Christ, and who maintain that the divine and human nature of Jesus Christ were so united as to form but one nature. They are also called Jacobites, after Jacob Baradaeus, who restored the sect after it had been suppressed by the emperor Justin. They are divided into two parties, one African, under the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Alexandria, the other Asiatic, at the head of whom is the patriarch of Antioch.

MONASTERY: A convent built for the reception of monks, mendicant friars and nuns.

MOOLKY: A station of the Basle Missionary Society, in the province of Canara, Hindostan.

MORANT BAY: A station of the London Missionary Society in Jamaica, W. I.

MORETON BAY: An extensive grazing district in Australia, occupied by the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts.

MORETY : One of the Molucca Islands, in the Indian Archipelago.

MORIAH : A station of the United Brethren, on the Island of Tobago, W. I.

MORIJA : Station of the French Protestants in South Africa, 160 miles east of Caledon, among the Bassoutos; commenced 1833. Inhabitants, 4,000. In connexion with this station are 280 villages, of 12,000 inhabitants, which, being divided into 28 districts, are placed under the instruction of the word of God by native teachers.

MORLEY : A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in Kaffraria, South Africa.

MOSUL : A walled city of Mesopotamia, in N. lat. $36^{\circ} 20' 17''$; E. lon. $43^{\circ} 10' 17''$. It stands on the western bank of the Tigris, where the high land, that generally lies some distance back, comes down to the river. This, at its narrowest point, is 305 feet broad, and is crossed by a bridge resting on 21 boats, which, during the season of high water, when the river is sometimes a mile wide, is detached from the opposite shore, and lies idle along the western bank. The average breadth of the river between Mosul and Bagdad, at its ordinary height, is 200 yards.

Directly opposite Mosul, and about three-fourths of a mile distant, lie the ruins of ancient Nineveh. These were first accurately surveyed by Claudius J. Rich, Esq., in 1820; and in 1843, Mons. P. E. Batta led the way in their excavation. His remarkable discoveries at Khorsabad have been followed by the brilliant achievements of Hon. A. H. Layard, at Nimrood, Khoyunjuk and other points in Assyria and Mesopotamia.

The population of Mosul was at one time estimated to be more than 100,000, but does not now probably exceed one-third of that number, if it amounts to that. 8,000 of the inhabitants are nominally Christians; the rest are Mohammedans, with the exception of about 150 families of Jews.

The nominal Christians belong mostly to three sects, viz. : Chaldeans, i. e. Nestorians, who acknowledge the Pope; Jacobites, and papal Syrians, who are seceders from the Jacobites. Of these sects the Chaldeans are by far the most numerous. A few Armenians and others reside in the city, but not enough to deserve a separate mention.

The Arabic is the prevailing language in Mosul, both among Moslems and Christians; but besides this, Kurdish is used by those who belong to that race, or have much intercourse with it. Turkish is the government language, and is spoken by those who transact business with the authorities; and Fellahi, a dialect of the modern Syriac, similar to that used by the Nestorians, in Kurdistan and Persia, is the language of the Christian villages around Mosul, though it is not much used among the Christians of the city.

The climate of Mosul is very hot, the thermometer averaging 67.80 Fahr. for the entire year. In summer it rises to 115° or 117° in the shade, and in winter does not usually sink below 30° . At one time during the heat of summer, the average temperature of 35 consecutive hours was 102° . But owing to the extreme dryness of the air, the city is considered healthy, notwithstanding so high a temperature.

The principal crops in the vicinity are wheat and barley. Rice is brought from the valleys of Kurdistan, while its mountain sides supply the city with an abundance of the finest grapes. Figs come mostly from the mountains of Sinjar, in Mesopotamia. Palm trees flourish in the plain near Mosul to some extent. The olive grows in the gardens; also pistachio nuts and other fruits. Beets, turnips, the egg plant, melons, cucumbers, and other vegetables are abundant; but barmia (hibiscus esculentus)—called in the United States okra—may be said, par excellence, to be the vegetable of the region.

The missionary field of which Mosul is the centre extends from Mardin to Bagdad and includes within its boundaries Jebel Tour, the stronghold of the Jacobites, which covers an area of 1400 square miles, the whole region of the Yezidees extending from Jebel Singar on the west as far east as Sheikh Adi on the borders of Kurdistan; a large part of the country of the mountain Nestorians, and almost the whole of the Chaldeans living within the limits of the Turkish empire. Telkeif, one of their largest villages, about 9 miles from Mosul, contains 5,000 inhabitants, and Elkosh 3,000 more. It is estimated that more than 40,000 nominal Christians in the valley of the Tigris speak the Fellahi. Some of the villages to the east of Mosul are inhabited principally by the Jacobites.

The diplomatic emissaries of Rome have been in this region for centuries, not preaching the Gospel, but straining every nerve to induce the oriental churches to acknowledge the Pope, and whenever they have succeeded they have only removed the people further from Gospel influences, though the change effected has not been so radical as to remove all danger of return to a purer faith; a result which their tyrannical measures in some instances favors rather than retards.

The Rev. Horatio Southgate, sent out by the American Episcopal Church, visited Mosul in 1838, on his tour of exploration through Turkey and Persia. But the first Protestant missionaries who resided here were Dr. A. Grant and Rev. A. K. Hinsdale, who occupied this as an outpost of their mission to the mountain Nestorians, in 1841. Rev. O. O. Mitchell had died on the way at the village of Mushtafia, near Mardin, June 27th. Mrs. Mitchell lived to reach Mosul, but died there July 12, 5 days after her arrival; when Mr. and Mrs. H. were themselves prostrated by disease. Thus was the mission baptized in suffering at the outset. On Mr. Hinsdale's recovery nothing but his ignorance of the Arabic prevented his laboring at once among the Jacobites, who, hard pressed by the Papists, were eager for instruction. Providence at this time sent to his aid a Jacobite ecclesiastic from Malabar, who, educated in the English College at Cottayan, was on his way to be ordained bishop by the Patriarch at Mardin. He preached the Gospel in the churches and had much religious intercourse with the people. On the 12th of November, 1842, Rev. Thomas Laurie and wife joined the mission; but on the 17th of the following month Mr. Hinsdale was called to his rest, leaving the mission even weaker than it was before.

The massacre of the Nestorians, in 1843, turned the attention of the missionaries more exclusively to Mosul, and "a great door and effectual was opened to them, but there were many adversaries." The opposition, however, did not originate so much among the people themselves as from men who came from Christian lands, with the avowed purpose of opposing the labors of evangelical Protestants. Yet, notwithstanding all, the truth was made known, and agitation only stimulated investigation. One man at least gave delightful evidence that he was taught of God, and others were intellectually convinced, if not savingly converted. But the trials of the mission were not yet over. On the morning of December 16, death removed Mrs. Laurie from among them; and on the 24th of April, 1844, the little band was again bereaved in the loss of Dr. Grant, the pioneer of the enterprise; but not till the Rev. Azariah Smith, M.D., had been sent to minister to his last hours, and aid the survivors by his practical faith and devoted spirit. The early history of this mission would thus seem to be little more than a record of the death of its members; but the field was so full of promise that the survivors would not have left it, nor would the Board have recalled them, but for the published intention of the American Episcopalians to occupy the field. Yielding to their prior claim, the missionaries reluctantly turned away from this interesting field on the 22d of October, 1844.

But the intentions of the Episcopal church were never carried out, and for 5 years Mosul received only brief visits at distant intervals from Rev. Messrs. Bowen and Sandreczki, English missionaries to the Jews in Bagdad. The report of the piety of the solitary disciple left there, led to the visit of Messrs. Perkins and Stocking, in May, 1849; and on the 22d of November following, Rev. J. E. Ford, of Aleppo, came, and remained till April 10th, 1850; and before he left, the Rev. D. W. Marsh entered on his labors (March 20) in very encouraging circumstances. Rev. W. F. Williams and family joined him May 16, 1851, and on November 3, a little church of 8 members was formed, which we hope is only the germ of better things to come. Rev. Henry Lobdell, M.D., joined the mission May 8, 1852, and the latest accounts, though they tell the usual tale of persecution from the papists, leagued with the civil government, yet indicate a preparation for an extensive reformation, which may take place at no very distant day. The political power of the nominal Christians in this region is much less than that of the larger communities nearer the capital. The Mohammedans, too, are much more accessible than elsewhere, and both these things encourage us to hope that there are glad tidings soon to issue from Mosul, to all who love the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Present Condition and future prospects of the Assyrian Mission—Rev. Mr. Marsh to the author.—"The field of the Assyrian mission includes the city of Diarbekir on the north with some 40,000 inhabitants, Mardin with 20,000, Jezirah with 7,000, Mosul with 45,000, Arhil with perhaps 10,000, and Bagdad with its 60 or 70,000. It includes a population of some 70,000 Christians, (beside a much larger Moslem population,) of whom about 35,000 are of Jacobite, 20,000 of Nestorian, and 15,000 of Armenian origin. But from these three sects large numbers have become papal—say of the Nestorians 17,000, of the Armenians 5,000, and of the Jacobites 3,000, making the papal element over one-third. Of course these numbers are only approximate, but they agree very nearly with the best authorities, though based upon a separate estimate. The strength of the Jacobites is in Jebel Tour, or between Mardin and Jezirah, near the middle of the field. The strength of the papal Nestorians is upon the plain east of Mosul; that of the Armenians of our field at Mardin and Diarbekir. There are some Jacobites in the whole field, but almost no Armenians in the southern part and almost no Jacobites in the northern.

"Stations are established at Diarbekir and Mosul, undoubtedly the best points for the present. Churches have been formed at each of these places, consisting now at Mosul of 12 members, at Diarbekir of 11. The average attendance for a few months past at the fullest Sabbath service has been at Diarbekir over 100, and here over 30. There is a flourishing school for boys at Diarbekir, and also one for girls, so promising that we have applied for a female teacher from America. There are in the schools at Mosul over 80 learning to read. There are schools also at Hince, near Diarbekir, and at Naherwan and Jezirah.

"At Diarbekir the great present want is a force upon the spot to cherish the little church and to guide and encourage the work. We have been obliged to abandon that station with little present prospect of occupation before at least next spring. I do not believe that a more promising point was ever temporarily abandoned by missionaries of the American Board. It will be supplied with native helpers who will sustain preaching, but it needs at least three missionaries. The occasion of leaving that point has been detailed in letters to the rooms to which you doubtless have access. The station remained half manned till the health of Mrs. Dunmore failed, and should Mr. Walker be left alone there a similar result must inevitably ensue. It should be borne in mind that in these interior stations we are cut off from the refreshment of occasional intercourse with travelers, and at Diarbekir there is no consular protection. We need the prayers of Christians that missionaries may be supplied for and protected in Diarbekir.

"So long as stations are half manned, the work must be expected to languish; and all Western Asia is half manned. All the members sympathize, for, whatever may be the division into missions, we are one body in Christ. So long as the Armenians are neglected and left to perish, while calling to American Christians for help, we are left unheard to plead from a greater distance for wants less obvious, requiring a more vigorous exercise of faith.

"The great want at Mosul and for the Assyrian field is a seminary for young men to train up preachers, to awaken mind, to prevent the waste of sending to Beirut, where, by the distance from his house, in case a boy turns out ill, the evil is greatly increased. For this we have urged the sending out of additional missionaries. But how shall they get here? They have a gauntlet to run. When Dr. Lobdell came, the wants of Aintab were so exceedingly pressing, that a petition and most urgent entreaties were used by the natives to detain him there. We are glad that that robbery of our field was not consummated. Had Dr. Lobdell known that the Committee at home would acquiesce in his stay there, he would have remained. I only allude to this to show that the apathy of the American church, in leaving that great Armenian field without any adequate supply of laborers, cripples us. We want the attention of American Christians drawn to their suicidal policy of neglecting vast immortal interests, whose momentous issues eternity alone can compute. How many a wealthy family is being ruined, especially in its younger branches, by the hoarded manna! How many I know personally, training up children in the worship of mammon, bowing down to the golden calf! Alas! though that manna would be bread of life to many famishing ones here, it comes not! We want, and must have for the success of our work, the sober, prayerful attention of Christians to the feebleness of their efforts. For want of one more man, in raising the timbers of a house, the joists and beams fell back, and crushed many of those toiling their utmost. Is it wise—is it prudent, to leave a few laborers to die with over-work?

"The occupation of Mardin is desirable, exceedingly desirable, provided we have faith. Some Christians seem to think that we are to wait till Satan comes crouching to us, laying down his arms, and offering us the keys of his strongholds. He has been forced to this in some cities of Western Asia; but shall we leave these other cities till they throw down their battlements and urge us in? Faith is the great want, that the kingdom of heaven may suffer violence and the violent take it by force. We want such a mighty moral movement behind us, that we shall feel that we are borne on to new efforts as by some silent gulf-stream flowing from our native land. If America were only enlisted for our success, and following us with eager wishes, as generals and soldiers were followed to the halls of Montezuma, then they would not withhold their reinforcements, nor that best of all gifts, their prayers.

"As to the future prospects of our work, my impression is, that if this effort making in Western Asia fail now, a century will not see it renewed under such promising auspices. If it fail, it can only be from the storms of lowering war, which seems not at all probable, or from the deadness of the American church. Were the American church now to call us back, old Assyrian kings would break the silence of ages and rise like muffled Samuels to reproach us. The very stones would cry out.

"Ultimately, these efforts cannot fail. Unless God's promises are a fable,—unless Christianity is a delusion, and God himself a being indifferent and neglectful of his creatures, this preaching of his Gospel cannot return void. With rapt anticipation we watch the great changes hursting upon the world—the opening seals of the vision of the church militant and millennial. The day seems at hand for Moslems to accept Christ. At our dispensary we shun not to point them to the great Physician. They listen with respect to that now, for which our blood would redden these streets, were they what they were twenty years since. Their spirit is broken; they expect the downfall of their religion. Their expectation upon this point is in advance of the Christian church. It is not for mortal man to be wise upon what God has sealed; but we wait in hope. Hope thrills in our hearts and rises to full assurance. Let the cannons roll on; let swords gleam and drip, and the spears and chariots of war. The King of many crowns is marching forth. We expect the fall of distant Rome; and that fall will make freemen of her slaves here. Our hearts anticipate glad things. We rejoice in the God of our salvation. With sincere esteem, your brother in Christ,

"DWIGHT W. MARSH.

"Mosul, May 8, 1854."

MOTEE: One of the Molucca Islands, in the Indian Archipelago.

MOTITO: A station of the French Protestants among the Bechuanas of South Africa, 9 miles south-west of Old Lattikoo, and about 19 miles from the frontier of the colony. It has five out-stations. Rev. J. Frédoux, the missionary at this station, has married the second daughter of Rev. Robert Moffat, of the Kuruman.

MOUNT COKE: A station of the Wesleyans in Kaffraria.

MOUNT VAUGHAN: A station of the Episcopal Board, at Cape Palmas, West Africa.

MOUNT ZION: A station of the American Board among the Cherokee Indians.

MUFTI: The chief of the ecclesiastical order, or primate, of the Mussulman religion. The authority of the mufti is very great in the Ottoman empire; for even the Sultan himself, if he will preserve any appearance of religion, cannot, without first hearing his opinion, put any person to death, or so much as inflict any corporeal punishment. When the mufti comes into his presence, the grand seignior himself rises up before him. Yet the grand seignior appoints him to office, and the honors paid to him have become little more than form. If the Sultan does not like his decision, he dismisses him and appoints another.

MUSSULMAN: A professor of the religion of Mohammed.

MUTTRA: A celebrated city, of great antiquity, situated on the western bank of the Jumna, about 30 miles N.N.E. from Agra, and 80 miles S.S.E. from Delhi. Population, 80,000, of whom about one-eighth are Mohammedans. Mr. Philips, of the English Baptist Mission, removed to this place in 1844.

MYNPURIE: A station of the Presbyterian Board in Northern India, 40 miles west of Futtehghurh.

MYSORE: A station of the London Missionary Society, and capital of a province of the same name, in Southern Hindostan, near the western coast, to the north-west of Madura. It is also occupied by the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

NAGERCOIL: A town in Southern India, in the Travancore district, a little north-west of Cape Comorin. A station of the London Missionary Society.

NAGPORE: A large town in the province of Gundwana, the capital of the Boonsla Mahrattas, lat. $20^{\circ} 9' N.$, long. $79^{\circ} 11' E.$ It is elevated 4,104 feet above the sea, and in the hot season, has a decided advantage over other stations, the night being almost invariably cool and pleasant; and in the winter season, it is so cool as sometimes to produce hoar frost and ice. Population in 1825, 115,000. A station of the Free Church of Scotland.

NAIN: A station of the United Brethren in Labrador.

NANKING: The capital of the Kiangsu province, and former capital of the Chinese empire, situated on the southern banks of the Yangtze-kiang, in lat. $32^{\circ} N.$, and long. $119^{\circ} E.$ (See China.)

NAMAQUALAND: See Africa, Southern.

NARSINGDARCHOKE: A station of the Baptist Missionary Society in Bengal.

NASSAU: The capital of the island of New Providence, W. I., and the seat of government. It is situated on the north side of the island. A station of the Baptist Missionary Society, and also of the Society for Propagating the Gospel.

NASSUCK: A large town and place of pilgrimage on the Godavery, principally inhabited by Brahmins. Population in 1820, 30,000. Near Nassuck, the seat and centre of Brahminism in the Deccan, are extensive Buddhist excavations, which extend round a high conical hill, five miles from the town, with many Buddhist figures and inscriptions, without the slightest Hindoo vestiges. Church Missionary Society.

NATAL: The colony of Natal lies in the S. E. part of the continent of Africa, between the latitudes of $31^{\circ} 31'$, and 28° south. It is bounded on the north by the river Tugela, which divides it from the country of the Amazulu; on the south by the river Umzimkulu, separating it from the territory of the Amponda; on the east by the Indian Ocean; and on the west by the Quathamba range of mountains. Its length is about 180 miles, and its width 125 miles. The white population of Natal at present, November 1853, is estimated at 10,000; most of whom have immigrated from England since 1845. The colored population, Zulus (or Zulu Kaffres, as they are sometimes called), is about 120,000. Most of them are remnants of tribes which originally occupied this territory, but were conquered and dispersed by the tyrant Chaka. When the British established their authority in Natal, multitudes, from all sides, returned to the land of their nativity for protection. Most, however, have come from the country of the Amazulu within a few years past, and the number of refugees is increasing. Natal, for several years past, has been in a state of quiet and safety, though apprehensions have been entertained by some that Umpandi, the present King of Amazulu, would invade the colony. These fears, for the most part, are now laid aside; for Umpandi, with his present force is unable to cope with the Dutch Boers who are settling, without his permission, in the northern part of his territory. So numerous have been the refugees from his dominion, that it is doubtful whether the tyrannical chief can muster more than 50,000 warriors. Ufaku, the king of the Amafonda, is more pacific than most of the Kaffre chiefs, and endeavors to live on good terms with his white neighbors. He is far more powerful than Umpandi, and commands an army of 80,000 fighting men. The natives of Natal are split up into numerous petty tribes, each tribe having a chief of its own, who, however, is amenable to British authority. Constant jealousies and animosities exist among these tribes, and nothing but fear of the English Government prevents them from destroying each other. The greater part of the natives in this colony dwell on locations assigned them by Government, and over each location is placed a white magistrate, to keep order, to collect the annual tax, which is seven shillings per hut, settle their numerous disputes, &c. When cases presented by the natives are not satisfactorily settled by the magistrates, they have the privilege of appealing to the Lieut. Governor of the colony.

Natal Harbor.—The coast is skirted by a dense "bush," or forest of thorn trees, vines, and brambles, and the monotony of the scene is relieved only by the mountains of silvery spray which indicate the mouths of the numerous rivers. The only elevated and striking object is the bluff, a rocky promontory, designating the entrance to the port. At its foot is a great sand bar, the dread of all comers to Natal, and the chief barrier to the prosperity of the colony. The people of Natal are exerting themselves to construct a break-water far enough into the sea, not only to break the violence of the waves, but to check the drifting of the sand into the harbor.

D'Urban.—An hour's walk or ride from the harbor, in an ox wagon, through the sand, brings one to the only seaport town in this colony, which is called D'Urban, in honor of Sir Benjamin D'Urban. The streets of this town which were laid out by the Dutch at right angles, are wide and convenient for trading with large wagons, but intolerably sandy. Many of the houses are one story high, and made of "wattle and daub"—that is, long sticks woven together between posts and plastered with mud. The roofs are thatched with long grass. Some nice brick buildings are now going up, and the appearance of the place is rapidly improving. The Wesleyans, the largest religious society in Natal, have here two houses of worship, one for the whites, and one for the colored population. The Episcopalians, the Congregationalists, the Baptists, and the Roman Catholics have also their sanctuaries. New churches for the troops are about to be erected, at an expense of £10,000. The people of D'Urban are mostly merchants and mechanics. But few among them are wealthy. Some of the oldest residents in the colony, who occupy farms, are agriculturists or graziers, possess large herds of cattle, and are in comfortable circumstances. The Natal Bay abounds in fish, with which the market of D'Urban is supplied; and there is no lack of good beef, pork, mutton, venison, and fowls. D'Urban suffers for the want of good water. All that is suitable for drinking is brought in hogsheads from the Uniqui river, which is about three miles distant, or caught from the roofs of the houses when it rains. The water of the wells is brackish, and induces cutaneous diseases. This deficiency of good water, it is supposed, may be remedied by turning the Uniqui river across the long flat on which the town is built. The experiment will doubtless be made if Natal continues to prosper. D'Urban is a place of great importance, as all the trade with the tribes on the northern borders of Natal passes through it, and most of the trade with the Dutch farmers over the Quathamba Mountains, and beyond the Orange river, amounting to many thousands of pounds.

Two weekly newspapers are published in D'Urban, and are well conducted. There is also a day school for children, supported by government. Intemperance and horse-racing are quite prevalent.

Pietermaritzburg.—The town next in importance to D'Urban in Natal, is Pietermaritzburg, or Petermauritzburg, as it is sometimes spelled, the capital of the colony. It is about 50 miles from D'Urban, situated in a large valley nearly surrounded by high hills, and presents a beautiful appearance. Its streets, like those of D'Urban, are laid out at right angles, are broad, and shaded on each side by large and beautiful trees. Water, which never fails in the driest season, is conducted through the streets on each side, from which every house may be supplied, and every garden irrigated. The Lieut. Governor of the colony, his Secretary, and other chief officers of Government, have their residence at this place. Extensive barracks have been erected for British soldiers, and part of a regiment is quartered in them.

The Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Independents, Wesleyans and Catholics have their houses of worship. A large and flourishing school is supported by Government. Three papers are published, the "Independent," "Government Gazeteer," and "Witness for the People." The morals of this place are far in advance of those in D'Urban, and for healthfulness of climate and beauty of appearance, it is not surpassed by any locality in the colony.

The trade of Pietermaritzburg is principally with the Dutch farmers who come from beyond the Quathamba Mountains, some ten days' journey with the ox wagon, and exchange their ivory, wheat, and wool for groceries, clothing, &c.

Scenery—Climate—Prospects of the Colony.—Natal is preëminent for the beauty of its landscapes. Along the coast, the surface is for the most part level; but inland, at the distance of about 15 miles, rugged in the extreme. A chain of high table lands extends the whole length of the colony, intersected by numerous rivers which have worn deep chasms to the low country. During June and July (the winter months) the natives burn off the long grass, and the hills and valleys assume a dark and mournful aspect. But in September and October the rain descends copiously, and the whole country is covered, as if by magic, with a carpet of green. The scenery is then truly magnificent. Natal is acknowledged to be one of the healthiest places in Africa. The tops of the Quathamba Mountains are supposed to afford a cooling medium for the hot winds which come from the interior, and hence Natal is exempt from that debilitating atmosphere which is the scourge of other warm climates. The Natal climate is mild and temperate, the atmosphere delightfully clear, and those noxious vapors which prove so unfavorable to health and longevity at Delagoa Bay, on the Gaboon and Zanzibar coasts, are here unknown. During the summer, the heat is seldom so great as to render out-of-door labor oppressive; and in winter, it is rarely cold enough to render a fire necessary. It is the united testimony of foreign residents, that this colony is remarkably free from those diseases which are common in their fatherlands. In no English colony exist in a greater degree the elements of prosperity, viz., abundance and cheapness of labor, fertility of soil, plenty of food, healthfulness of climate, &c. Natal is yet in its infancy. It is but recently that the tide of immigration has turned towards its shores. But from what has been already seen of the production of sugar, cotton, rice, coffee, indigo, wheat, barley, and corn, of her wool growing districts, and her animal market, it is reasonable to conclude that the increasing exports will give an impetus to trade and industry, and thus the colony will ere long be filled with Europeans.

NAVIGATORS' ISLANDS: See Samoa.

NAZARETH: One of forty native Christian villages, formed in Tinnevely by the Native Philanthropic Society, in order to shelter converts from persecution. Also, a station of the Moravians in Jamaica, W. I.

NEGAPATAM: A town in the Madras Presidency, and district of Tanjore, the residence of the British collector for the district, situated on the shore of the Bay of Bengal, 162 miles south by east from Madras. The native town is extensive and irregular, and on its north side there is a remarkable ruin of very massive brick masonry, about 80 feet high, called by mariners the Chinese Pagoda. It is supposed to have been a Jain temple. A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

NEGOMBO: A town on the west coast of Ceylon, 20 miles north from Colombo. A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

NEGROES: The term Negro is the Spanish and Portuguese word for black. The Negro race inhabit that portion of the continent of Africa which commences at the Great Desert of Sahara, extending southerly to about 20° of south latitude, and embracing both the eastern and western coasts of the continent.

The skin and eyes of the Negro are black; hair black and woolly; skull compressed laterally and in front; forehead low, narrow, and slanting; cheek bones prominent; jaws narrow and projecting; upper front teeth oblique; chin receding; eyes prominent; nose broad, thick, flat; lips very thick; palms of the hands and soles of the feet flat; knees turned in, toes turned out. The stature and physical strength are equal to the European. Many of them have made considerable progress in the useful arts and cultivation.

It has been said that no Negro nation ever possessed a literature, or had the ingenuity to invent an alphabet, and until recently this was probably true; but the missionaries of the Church Missionary Society have discovered a tribe in Western Africa, named Vei, which possess a well-constructed written language, with books, the invention of one of their number still living, which presents a case as remarkable as that of the invention of the Cherokee alphabet. Among the Negro race there is a great variety, greater, perhaps, than among any other family. For accounts of the civil, social, and religious condition of the Negro race, and of missions among them, see WESTERN AFRICA, GABOON, FERNANDO PO, YORUBA, and LIBERIA.

NELLORE: A station of the Church of England Mission, in the northern part of Ceylon, about two miles from the town of Jaffna. Also, a large city near the northern extremity of the Carnatic in Bengal—the principal station of the Telooogo Mission of the American Baptist Union.

NELSON: A town in New Zealand, situated at the bottom of Tasman's Bay, on the northern shore of the middle island, with a population of 2,100 inhabitants. The town is extremely pretty, situated on a small plain surrounded by lofty hills. The climate is delightful. It is a station of the Church Missionary Society.

NENGENENGE: Station of the American Board at the Gaboon, West Africa.

NESTORIANS: Nestorius, from whom comes the name Nestorians, was a native of Syria, and a presbyter of the church at Antioch, "esteemed and celebrated," says Neander, "on account of the rigid austerity of his life and the impressive fervor of his preaching." He was made patriarch of Constantinople, A. D. 428. Possessed of an honest and pious zeal, he was wanting probably in that prudence and moderation by which his zeal should have been governed; and while his intemperate efforts to suppress various heresies provoked, his unguarded language laid him open to the attacks of some who were jealous of his influence, or aspired to his position. Cyril of Alexandria became his fierce antagonist, and Nestorius was soon himself accused of heresy; first, in denying that Mary was the mother of God, and second, in holding that there were two persons as well as two natures in Christ. He denied both the charges, as they were brought against him; but he was deposed by the third general council at Ephesus, A. D. 431, and was banished first to Arabia, and then to Lybia, and finally died in Upper Egypt. His friends denied the fairness of his trial, and the justice of his condemnation, and his opinions were warmly defended, especially among his countrymen in the East. The flourishing school for the education of divines at Edessa, in Mesopotamia, to which many Persian youth resorted, became eminently the seat from which the sect extended into Persia. This school was broken up on account of its Nestorianism by the emperor Zeno, in 489, but the consequence was only the transfer of the school to Nisibis, where it could fully develop itself under the Persian government, and where for many years, Barsumas, a zealous Nestorian, had been bishop. Having now its principal seat in Persia, the sect was fostered by the rivalry existing between the governments of Persia and Constantinople, and on the death of the archbishop of Seleucia, A. D. 496, Babæus (or Babacus) a Nestorian, was chosen his successor. He declared himself Patriarch of the East, and held a synod, or council, A. D. 499, at which the whole Persian church professed itself as belonging to the Nestorian party.

From A. D. 485 to A. D. 640 the Nestorians were under Persian authority, generally favored, but sometimes persecuted. From 640 to 1257 they were subject to Arabian caliphs. In 1258, on the taking of Bagdad by the grandson of Gengis Khan, the power was transferred to the Tartars. The patriarchs resided at Seleucia until A. D. 762, when Bagdad becoming the capital of the Saracenic empire; it became also the seat of the patriarchs, who now took the title of patriarch of Babylon and Bagdad.

"The Nestorians," says Mosheim, (Ec. Hist., vol. I. p. 93,) "after they had obtained a fixed residence in Persia, and had located the head of their sect at Seleucia, were as successful as they were industrious in disseminating their doctrines in the countries lying without the Roman empire. It appears from unquestionable documents, still existing, that there were numerous societies in all parts of Persia, in India, in Armenia, in Arabia, in Syria, and in other countries, under the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Seleucia during this (the 6th) century." (Of the 7th century he says, (Ec. Hist., vol. I. p. 199,) "The Christian religion was, in this century, diffused beyond its former bounds, both in the eastern and western countries. In the east, the Nestorians, with incredible industry and perseverance, labored to propagate it from Persia, Syria, and India, among the barbarous and savage nations inhabiting the deserts and the remotest shores of Asia. In particular, the vast empire of China was enlightened, by their zeal and industry, with the light of Christianity."

At this time, from the 5th to the 9th century, the Nestorians had schools, some of which were quite celebrated, designed especially, though not exclusively, for the education of ecclesiastics. "Previous to the overthrow of the caliphs, the Nestorians had become widely extended. They occupied, almost to the exclusion of other Christian sects, the region which forms the modern kingdom of Persia, in all parts of which they had churches. They were numerous in Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Arabia. They had churches in Syria and in the island of Cyprus. They had churches among the mountains of Malabar in India. They had numerous churches in the vast regions of Tartary, from the Caspian sea to Mount Imaus, and beyond, through the greater part of what is now known as Chinese Tartary, and even in China itself. The names of twenty-five metropolitan sees are on record, which of course embraced a far greater number of bishoprics, and still more numerous societies or churches."

But at this time Christianity, as exhibited in the lives of its professors, had lost not a little of its purity and its power; and even if we suppose the Nestorians to have been more correct in doctrine and more Christian in life than other sects, there can be no reason to believe that they published the pure Gospel, or that they exhibited, generally, the light of a holy life. Of the tenth century Mosheim says, "All are agreed that in this century the state of Christianity was every where most wretched, on account of the amazing ignorance, and the consequent superstition and debased morals of the age, and also from other causes." Early in the eleventh century a Mogul prince, in Cathay, (the northern part of China) was converted to Christianity by the Nestorians, and perhaps, taking the name of John upon his baptism, he was called Presbyter John, or Prester John. Under this name his successors became widely known and celebrated. The last of this race of Christian kings—Christian, with their subjects, in name, doubtless much more than in reality—was slain by Gengis Khan, about the year 1202. Gengis, who had a Christian wife, the daughter of Prester John, and several of his successors, appear in some measure to have favored the Christians, of whom numerous bodies were still scattered over all northern Asia and China. In the mean time, however, Mohammedanism had been gaining not only in Persia, but upon all the countries west of Mount Imaus where the Nestorians commenced their missionary labors. After the descendants of Gengis had extended their conquests and a branch of the family had overthrown the Arabian caliph and destroyed Bagdad, one of them became a Mohammedan and engaged in a bitter persecution of the Christians. About the close of the fourteenth century the sword of Tamerlain completed the overthrow of the western Tartar churches, and Nestorian Christianity was fully crushed in the principal seat of its life and power. A little earlier than this, in 1369, the descendants of Gengis Khan were expelled from China by a revolt of the native Chinese; about the same time Romish missionaries were banished, and the Nestorians, though permitted to remain, suffered under inauspicious circumstances, and their numbers gradually diminished. Still a metropolitan was sent to China in 1490, and some bishops in 1502. But when papal missions were resumed in China, in the sixteenth century, the missionaries stated that they could find no distinct traces of Christianity in the empire. Thus the Nestorian church, once so extended, whose missions in Central Asia were continued from an early period to the sixteenth century, has been crushed at its centre, by Mohammedan power, and has gradually died out in more distant regions, in great measure, doubtless, because of its want of true Christian vitality. For three centuries past it has been shut out mostly from the Christian world, and degraded in its political, social, intellectual, and moral condition. During this period defections have taken place from time to time, growing out of dissensions among themselves and the efforts of the Jesuits, and a considerable part of the Nestorians have submitted to the Pope of Rome. These are governed by a patriarch appointed by the Pope, and constitute what is called the Chaldean church. The orthodox Nestorians, if this title may be thus used, are reduced to a moderate number, perhaps 80,000, about 40,000 inhabiting the plain of Oroomiah, in the western part of Persia, and about the same number the Koordish mountains between Persia and Turkey. Their patriarch, Mar Shimon, resides in the mountains.

The mountain districts inhabited by the Nestorians of Koordistan are exceedingly wild and rugged; in some cases almost inaccessible. Having but small patches of arable land the people subsist mostly from their flocks, and are miserably poor. In the rudeness, wildness, and boldness of their character they resemble their Koordish neighbors.

The city of Oroomiah, the ancient Thebarma, the reputed birth-place of Zoroaster, is situated on a beautiful, fertile plain, about 40 miles in length, and in its broadest portion 20 miles wide. The staple productions of this plain are wheat, rice, cotton, tobacco, and the vine. It abounds also in a great variety of fruits, and has naturally one of the finest climates;

yet artificial causes, particularly the means used to irrigate the fields and gardens, producing not only a great amount of evaporation, but numerous pools of stagnant water, make it unhealthy, particularly to foreigners. The city contains a population of about 25,000, of whom less than 1000 are Nestorians; but the Nestorians are numerous in the villages of the plain, and most of them are employed in the cultivation of the soil. The number of this people on the plain, Mr. Perkins gave in 1843 as between thirty and forty thousand. These "partake much, in their manners, of the suavity and urbanity of the Persian character. By the side of their rude countrymen from the mountains, though originally from the same stock, they appear like antipodes."

As Christians, up to the time when missionary operations were commenced among them, a few years since, the Nestorians, though they might have a name to live, were dead. Their religious belief and practices were more simple and scriptural than those of other Oriental Christian sects. They abhorred all image worship, auricular confession, the doctrine of purgatory, and many other corrupt dogmas and practices of the Papal and Greek churches. Though not free from errors and superstitions, their doctrinal tenets were generally correct, and the Scriptures were fully acknowledged as of supreme authority. But "the life and power of Christianity had departed. Scarcely a symptom of spiritual vitality remained." They clung with great tenacity to the forms of their religion. Many of them would rather die than violate their periodical fasts, which are very numerous, covering nearly half the whole year. Yet, even their most intelligent ecclesiastics seemed to have hardly any idea of the meaning of regeneration. Lying and profaneness seemed universal, and intemperance existed to a fearful extent. "Education was at an ebb almost as low as vital religion. None but their ecclesiastics could read at all, and but very few of them could do more than merely repeat their devotions in an unknown tongue, while neither they nor their hearers knew any thing of the meaning." There was among them little if any thing that could be called preaching; their public services consisting of chanting the Scriptures and their prayers in ancient Syriac, a language which but few of the priests, and none of the people, understand. Very little attempt had been made to reduce the vernacular language of the Nestorians to writing, and the printing-press was unknown among them. What few books they had, and they were very few, were manuscripts in the ancient Syriac, a dead language.

The canons of the Nestorian church require celibacy in all the episcopal orders of the clergy, i. e. all from the bishop up; lower orders may marry. They reckon nine ecclesiastical orders, viz., sub-deacon, reader, deacon, priest, archdeacon, bishop, metropolitan, catholikos, and patriarch; but two or three of these are now little more than nominal. Monasteries and convents do not exist among them. "They have no relics such as are common in the Church of Rome," says Mr. Badger (Nestorians and their Ritual, Vol. II. p. 136), yet "they believe the remains of the martyrs and saints to be endowed with supernatural virtues;" and they invoke the virgin and the saints, asking for their prayers to Christ. They have no pictures or images in their churches, and are much opposed to the use of them. The only symbol among them is a plain Greek cross, which they venerate highly. The sign of the cross is used in baptism and in prayer; a cross is engraved over the low entrances of their churches, and kissed by those who enter, and the priests carry with them a small silver cross, which is often kissed by the people.—Missionary Herald for August, 1838; Dr. Grant's Nestorians; Mosheim and Neander's Church History; Badger's Nestorians and their Ritual, Vol. II. pp. 132–6.

MISSION.

AMERICAN BOARD.—In the spring of 1830, Rev. Messrs. Smith and Dwight, while on an exploring missionary tour, in accordance with instructions which had been given them by the Prudential Committee of the A. B. C. F. M., visited the Nestorians. They found it not safe to attempt to penetrate the Koordish mountains, but spent a few days at Oroomiah, and became much interested in the condition of the Nestorian church, and satisfied that a favorable opening for missionary effort was there presented. Their report led to the formation of the mission. In January, 1833, soon after the report was presented to the Prudential Committee, Mr. Justin Perkins, then a tutor in Amherst College, was appointed to commence the mission. In the instructions given to him the main object of the mission was defined to be to bring about a change which would "enable the Nestorian church, through the grace of God, to exert a commanding influence in the spiritual regeneration of Asia." Considering the past history of that church, its present state, and the character of the people embraced in it, it was hoped that, brought again to a fuller knowledge of the truth, and to feel the regenerating and sanctifying power of truth attended by the influences of the Spirit, the members of that church would again become, not only themselves true disciples of Christ and heirs of life, but efficient laborers in the great work of building up the Redeemer's kingdom throughout the world.

Mr. and Mrs. Perkins sailed from Boston, Sept. 21, 1833. The Committee had not been able as yet to find a physician for the mission, and it was not thought best to delay their departure on that account, as Mr. Perkins could, while waiting for a colleague at Constantinople, avail himself of facilities which he might there find for acquiring the language of the Nestorians. They reached Constantinople on the 21st of December, and on the 17th of May following, feeling constrained, without waiting longer for associates, to proceed on their way, they sailed for Trebizond, the port on the Black Sea from which their land journey must commence. They left this place on the 16th of June; but, owing to the incursions of Koordish robbers upon the Turkish frontiers, they were much detained and annoyed on their journey, were obliged to take a circuitous route through Russian provinces, and did not reach Tabreez until the 28th of August. Sir John Campbell, British ambassador at Tabreez, to whom Mr. Perkins had written, stating their detentions and perplexities, sent a courier to meet them, and also a kind of litter borne by mules, for the accommodation of Mrs. Perkins (who had been brought by hardships into a critical state of health,) with a supply of provisions. The next day, August 21st, they were also met by Dr. Reach, the physician of the British embassy, whose kind regard for their welfare had brought him about sixty miles, that he might render them assistance.

As no European resided at Oroomiah it was not thought prudent for Mr. Perkins to proceed there until he should be joined by an associate, and he resolved to remain at Tabreez. Anxious, however, to be making all possible progress in acquiring the modern Syriac language, he went to Oroomiah in October, accompanied by Rev. Mr. Haas of the Basle Missionary Society, who was residing at Tabreez, to procure a teacher. He obtained Mar (bishop) Yohannan to return with him to Tabreez as his teacher, and the bishop took, as his "servant" and companion, priest Abraham, an intelligent young man, who became from the first one of the most valuable native helpers in the mission.

On the 11th of May, 1835, Dr. Grant, leaving a large and lucrative practice, and a circle of warm friends at Utica, N. Y., sailed from Boston with his wife to join this mission. They reached Tabreez Oct. 15. After resting a few days Dr. Grant proceeded to Oroomiah to make arrangements. Comfortable houses were soon provided, and on the 20th of November, Mr. Perkins arrived with his wife and Mrs. Grant. The first missionaries to the Nestorians had now reached their destination, and their coming was greeted by the people with great cordiality. Dr. Grant's professional character served to secure the favor of the Persian governor, and the Nestorian bishops and priests at once gave them their cordial co-operation in the prosecution of their missionary labors, regarding them not as rivals, but as coadjutors with them in a necessary work of instruction and improvement among the people. A school was soon projected for educating teachers and other native helpers, to be taught by priest Abraham under the supervision of Mr. Perkins. It was commenced on the 18th of Jan., 1836, with seven pupils from the city, and the next day 17 boarding scholars were received from abroad. Among the pupils were three deacons and one priest. It is a singular fact that these new favors conferred upon their Christian subjects excited the jealousy of the Mohammedans, who resentfully asked, "Are we to be passed by?" and to quiet their minds Dr. Grant was obliged to devote a few hours each day to teaching a school of Mussulman boys.

In presenting some view of the subsequent history and the success of the mission thus commenced, a topical and not a chronological arrangement will be followed. The subjoined table will show what laborers have been sent from the United States to the mission, who of these laborers have deceased, and who have returned to their native land. Mr. Merrick accompanied Dr. Grant to Tabreez in 1835, to commence an experimental mission among the Mohammedans of Persia. He resided some years at Tabreez, but no such promise of usefulness was found as to warrant the continuance of a distinct mission, and in 1841 he removed to Oroomiah. In 1845 he returned to the United States.

Object aimed at.—Coöperation of Ecclesiastics.

—From the commencement of the mission there has been reason to hope that pure religion might be revived in the small Nestorian community without seriously disturbing the existing ecclesiastical constitution. The missionaries have not sought to form a new Christian community, but to bring individuals, both among the ecclesiastics and the common people, to a full and saving knowledge of the truth, hoping that such a change might be brought about by the grace of God as should cause the forsaking of false doctrines, so far as such were held, the laying aside of whatever was superstitious or unscriptural, and the establishing of a pure church upon existing foundations. It seemed at least best to make the experiment, and to leave the question as to the necessity or propriety of forming new churches to be decided by time and providential circumstances. There has been the more reason, and the more encouragement, for pursuing such a course, from the fact that many of the leading ecclesiastics, so far from setting themselves in opposition to the missionaries and to their instructions, as has been done so generally among the Armenians and the Greeks, have been decidedly friendly, and in not a few instances have earnestly coöperated in every effort to elevate and evangelize the people. The four bishops on the plain, Mar Yohannan, Mar Elias, Mar Joseph, and Mar Gabriel, exhibited friendliness, and a disposition to favor the objects of the mission from the first, and the missionaries early made it an object of special attention to instruct and benefit these and other ecclesiastics. The four bishops named were placed in the relation of boarding pupils to the mission, and for several years the three first received daily instruction in a theological or Bible class, forming, with some priests and other promising young men, the first class in the seminary. They were also soon employed as native helpers to the mission, and as early as 1841 Mr. Perkins speaks of some of the ecclesiastics as "enlightened, and we trust really pious." "They not only allow us to preach in their churches, but urge us to do so; and are forward themselves in every good word and work." It is an important fact that through the schools which have been established, almost the entire education of ecclesiastics is now in the hands of the missionaries.

British and Russian protection.—Kindness of British officials.

—The kindness of Sir John Campbell to Mr. Perkins has been already mentioned. In 1835, at the suggestion of the Rt. Hon. Henry Ellis, British Ambassador to Persia, the missionaries asked and obtained from him English protection, and the ambassador and his suite ever extended to them all possible kindness. When the English embassy was withdrawn from Persia, with a prospect of war in 1839, the missionaries applied for protection to the Russian consul-general at Tabreez, who cheerfully gave them passports, and took other measures to insure their safety, and for many years Russian protection was extended to them. In 1851, at the suggestion of Mr. Stevens, British Consul at Tabreez, British protection was again solicited, and at once granted. The many instances in which Mr. Stevens has manifested the kindest interest in the welfare of the missionaries, and has rendered them assistance, can here only be alluded to, but are worthy of most grateful notice, as are also the self-sacrificing and earnest efforts made in behalf of suffering native helpers of the mission during recent difficulties in the mountains, by Col. Williams, British Commissioner for settling the boundary between Turkey and Persia. Persian officers, also, have often manifested much readiness to afford protection and prevent violence and wrong from opposing ecclesiastics, Jesuit or Nestorian, as also at times from rude and abusive Mohammedans.

The Press—Translating.—When the missionaries commenced their labors at Oroomiah they at once felt the want of a press and a printer. Very few books were to be found among the people, and these were in a language not understood. Excepting the Psalms, the mission had discovered in 1838 but one copy of the Old Testament Scriptures, and that was in three or four separate volumes, the property of different individuals. The British and Foreign Bible Society had printed the Gospels in the Nestorian character, but scarcely more than one copy of the Acts and of the Epistles could be found, and none of the Book of Revelations in that character. Much delay, however, was experienced in finding a printer. At last, on the 21st of July, 1840, Mr. Breath sailed from Boston, taking with him an iron press, constructed of so many pieces that it could be transported on horseback from Trebizond to Oroomiah. He reached Oroomiah, Nov. 17th, and the press was immediately put in operation, exciting great interest among both Nestorians and Mohammedans. 1,600 volumes, and 3,600 tracts, amounting in all to 510,400 pages, were reported as having been printed in 1841. In 1843 a new font of type, cut and cast expressly for the mission, modeled after the best Syriac manuscripts, was forwarded from the United States. The printing, up to the close of the year 1850, had amounted to 6,228,200 pages. Probably more than 2,000,000 of pages have been printed since that time.

On the 15th of February, 1836, the missionaries commenced the great work of translating the Bible into the modern Syriac, the spoken language of the Nestorians. In 1846 an edition of the New Testament, with the ancient and the modern Syriac in parallel columns, was carried through the press. Near the close of 1852, the whole Bible was printed in a language which the people could understand. The Old Testament has been printed like the New, with the ancient and modern languages in parallel columns, and thus the living and life-giving Word of God is going abroad among the people in an attractive form, and "in their own tongue wherein they were born," though a few years since, that was not a written language. Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress also, Baxter's Saint's Rest, and other valuable religious books are given to the people. For the last three or four years a monthly paper, "The Rays of Light," has been published, containing a great amount and variety of valuable reading matter. Thus a literature has been already created for the Nestorians. Small, indeed, as yet, if we except the Bible, which alone is not small; but of immense value, and steadily increasing.

Schools.—In the mean time the schools established have been raising up a community of readers. Mention has already been made of the opening of a seminary for the education of native teachers and preachers, on the 18th of January, 1836. The next Sabbath the pupils requested permission to attend the English worship of the mission, and this they continued to do with much interest. For some years this seminary was, of course, in an incipient state, giving instruction only in the elements of knowledge; but it had from the first, deacons, and priests, and bishops among the pupils, and was gradually rising in its character as a literary institution. There were 50 pupils in 1838. Early in 1841 the school was re-organized and improved; the qualifications for admission were raised; the primary department was excluded, and a better system of instruction was introduced. The two teachers were "deacons from the mountains," and were "among the best scholars of the nation." The number of pupils was thus for a time diminished, but soon increased to more than the former number. In 1845 it was again entirely re-organized, with the design to "reduce its numbers, make the instruction more systematic and thorough, and exert a stronger religious influence over the pupils;" and in 1846 it was removed from Oroomiah to Seir, the health retreat of the mission. It has exerted a great influence for good, and has been highly esteemed by the people—the desire to obtain admission having been often very great. In 1852, the report gives 40 as the number of students "of whom 30 are hopefully pious." Regular instruction in theology is now given to the most advanced class. One of the pupils "is designed to succeed the present bishop of the largest diocese in Oroomiah; several are from mountain districts, and one from Bootan, in the extreme western part of the field."

In March, 1838, a female boarding-school was commenced in the mission premises. A few girls had previously been in the seminary, and in some village schools, already commenced, but the idea of female education was strange to the Nestorians, and until about this time the missionaries had not ventured to commence a school exclusively for girls, fearing it might excite prejudice. Now the Nestorians had become acquainted with them, had learned to confide in them, and seemed fully prepared to sustain such a measure. The ecclesiastics connected with their families, were active in recommending it, and the missionaries at once looked upon this female school, in which there were some 16 girls, as one of the most hopeful departments of their work. Since 1843, this school has been under the care of Miss Fidelia Fisk, from Shelburn, Mass., who has shown herself eminently fitted for the place, and has been eminently useful in it. Miss Rice, from Lincoln, Mass., has been for several years associated with Miss Fisk. Though a few years since, it was a novelty, and considered as disgraceful to teach Nestorian females; now, "an examination of this female seminary draws together all the principal men and women of the Nestorian community, who sit and listen with unwearied interest for two days together." There were 42 pupils in 1852, and Mr. Stoddard "doubts whether he ever attended an examination of greater excellence" than that of this institution. Both this and the male seminary have been repeatedly favored with large measures of the special influences of the Holy Spirit.

The first village free school of which notice is found in connection with the mission, was commenced about August, 1836, at Ada, the residence of Mar Yoosuph (Joseph) about 15 miles from the city. Three months after it was commenced, Mr. Perkins visited it, and says: "It now numbers about 40 children, and is as well regulated as any school I ever visited." It was attended by girls as well as boys—"a great novelty among the Nestorians." This school, and others which began now to be formed, were collected, and taught by those who had been under the instruction of the missionaries in the seminary. In 1837 there were three free schools. In 1841 there were 17, in 16 different villages. The number rapidly increased, and in 1843 there were 40 schools in 36 villages, with 635 male and 128 female pupils, and 56 teachers, of whom 22 were priests and 26 deacons. In June, 1844, it was judged best, from circumstances growing out of the opposition of the patriarch to the mission, and other difficulties, to dismiss all the schools, but they were again commenced in October, 1845, in compliance with the earnest wishes of both ecclesiastics and people. The character of these village free schools has been improving; the Bible is the prominent text book, and their influence is great and most happy. In April, 1851, Mr. Stocking, who had then the superintendence of the schools, reported 45 schools, with 871 pupils, of whom 203 were females. The teachers, with but few exceptions, had been members of the seminary; many of them were hopefully pious, and all were regarded as evangelical in sentiment. In June, 1853, the number of schools had increased to 78.

About the first of January, 1840, a regular school was commenced for Mussulman boys, and soon numbered 10 promising boys and young men as pupils, but it does not seem to have been long sustained.

Preaching—Native Helpers.—The preaching service on the mission premises at Oroomiah, on the Sabbath, was attended by the pupils of the two seminaries, from the commencement of these institutions. The missionaries had preached also extensively in their village schools, during the week, but they were taken quite by surprise, when in February, 1838, Mar Yohannan, requested Mr. Perkins to go into their church every Sabbath and feast days, and preach the Gospel to the people, stating, that he and other priests had often spoken on the subject, and unanimously desired that he would do so. The invitation was complied with, at first with some reluctance, as they had not supposed that ecclesiastics and people were yet ready for such a measure.—(Perkins' "Residence in Persia," p. 333.)

A regular Sabbath service by the missionaries, in a Nestorian church, in Oroomiah, does not appear, however, to have been commenced until March, 1840. (Missionary Herald, 1840, p. 493.) At this time, to meet the wishes of such as could not find seats at the mission house, inquiry was made for a private house, in which they might hold a service. But deacons, and priests, and three bishops, who were consulted, all insisted that the service should be in the church. There would be no jealousy, they said. "Do you think," asked Mar Yohannan, "that we do not know lambs from wolves?" The missionaries had before preached at times in different churches in the city and villages, at the request of the officiating bishop or priest; but now this work seemed fairly commenced, and calls for preaching multiplied. Within a short time those who were able to use the language, preached usually three times each on the Sabbath, to as many different congregations, in villages, some miles apart. There were 7 regular preaching stations before the close of the year. A great door for usefulness was thus opened, and it has not been closed. The missionaries have entire access to the people on the plain, preaching in their churches, wherever they can go.

But the Gospel is now preached among the people not by the missionaries only. When the mission was commenced, the ecclesiastics were not preachers, and their public religious services were not preaching services. But bishops and priests have been pupils in the schools, and bishops and priests have felt the force of truth,—have become new creatures in Christ Jesus, and are now, in some cases, zealous and impressive preachers. And some young men who have been educated at the seminary, and have become apparently devoted Christians, have been ordained by the bishops of their church, and are thus fully introduced into the work of the ministry. In 1844, five intelligent native preachers aided the missionaries in maintaining "preaching, more or less, at a score of places." The patriarch has at times opposed, and some of the bishops, in 1837, prohibited the pious helpers of the mission from preaching in their dioceses; but, to a great extent, the whole field is, and has been, open to them, and among them are some who make extensive tours, not only on the plain, but in the mountain districts, as zealous and able evangelists. At a meeting of the mission, in September, 1851, a plan was devised, by which it was hoped the Gospel would soon be carried to all the Nestorians of Persia. For the month ending January 16, 1852, there were reported 29 places where there had been at least one preaching service each Sabbath, and in several of these places two or three services. In 13 other villages there had been preaching once or oftener within the month. Seven of the native helpers of the mission are now regularly employed as preachers, and others, though they have other employment, preach every Sabbath, and at other times. "The line of demarcation between an evangelically reformed church and a mere dead Christianity, is becoming more and more distinct." Mar Yohannan boldly discards many customs of the church, and seems disposed, as do the native helpers of the mission and those who have been educated in the schools, to go on with the work of reformation.

Opposition from Papists and the Patriarch.—The missionaries have not prosecuted their work without meeting with obstacles and trials, as well as with encouragements. Jesuits and others of the Romish church, whose missionaries have so often, for many centuries, tried to induce the Nestorians to come under allegiance to the pope, were not idle after the American missionaries commenced their labors. In 1837, a Roman Catholic bishop, from Salmas, came to Oroomiah, professing to have a large sum of money to aid Nestorians who would join his church. Other emissaries of Rome followed, and earnest efforts were made to undermine the influence of the mission, and secure among the people the ascendancy of popery. Such, however, were the folly and rashness of the proceedings of French Jesuits among the Armenians of Isfahan and Tabreez, that, in 1842, they were expelled from Persia, and an order was passed by the government, prohibiting all proselyting from one Christian sect to another. Remaining quiet for a while, some of the Jesuits soon made their way to the province of Oroomiah, and recommenced their proselyting career among the Nestorians, with even greater zeal and assurance than they had before used, resorting to the most unprincipled and hazardous expedients, which led to their second expulsion. The French government sent an envoy to Persia to obtain permission for them to return. Failing in this, every effort was made to procure the banishment of the American missionaries, on the ground that they, too, were violating the law, in making proselytes. It seemed necessary that Messrs. Perkins and Stocking should go to Teheran, in November, 1844, to counteract the influence which was exerted; and, for a considerable time, much solicitude was felt; but, aided by the kind offices of the Russian ambassador, the missionaries and their friends satisfied the government that the charges against them were not true, and they were permitted to remain. In 1851, an edict of toleration was promulgated by the Persian government, granting equal protection to all Christian subjects, and permitting them to change their religion or denomination at their pleasure. Of course, the Papists are again active, and will do what they can. It is ascribed by the people to the influence of the mission, that their efforts have been, as yet, so unsuccessful, and, as they have now truth, and light, and piety, to meet, it is not to be supposed that they can now do what they might once have done.

The Nestorian patriarch, Mar Shimon, residing in a region almost wholly inaccessible, had never been visited by any of the missionaries until Dr. Grant penetrated the mountain districts in 1839. He was cordially received, and was, for more than a month, the guest of the patriarch, who then urged that schools and missionary labor should be commenced in the mountains. Up to this time, the Nestorians of Koordistan had been, in their mountain fastnesses, as they were called, independent; but in 1843, determined hostilities were commenced against them by Koordish chiefs, encouraged by the Turks, which resulted, after some months of terrible warfare, in their entire subjugation. The patriarch fled to Mosul, and some of his brothers escaped to Oroomiah. Here, in necessitous circumstances, they threw themselves upon the hospitality of the missionaries, and when the hospitality afforded was more limited than were their desires, and they were informed that no more could be done for them, they attempted to coerce by opposition. In the mean time, an influence hostile to the mission had been successfully exerted on the patriarch himself at Mosul, and he sustained his brothers in their course. By such influences, some of the higher ecclesiastics at Oroomiah were led also into more or less decided opposition, for a time. In June, 1844, it was thought best, in view of the difficulties thus brought about, to dismiss all the village schools. As the male seminary needed re-organization, the necessity for dismissing this also was not so much regretted; but when, in the course of the summer, it became necessary as was then supposed, to disband the female seminary, "the tears and sobs of the pupils told, more expressively than language could have done, the bitterness of their hearts." The missionaries could not restrain their tears, and the stoutest Nestorians who were standing by were melted. Both seminaries were, however, soon reopened. Ecclesiastics and others, who were for a time led to oppose by the patriarch and his family, were again cooperating with the mission with apparent cordiality in October of this year, (1844,) and not long after, the brothers of the patriarch were themselves apparently wishing to regain their standing with the missionaries.

In June, 1847, the patriarch, distrusting the motives of the Turkish government, by which he had been invited to visit Constantinople, fled from Mosul to Oroomiah. Two of his brothers then there, Deacon Isaac and Deacon Dunka, had now been, Deacon Isaac especially, for two years, apparently decided friends of the mission, and for some months the patriarch himself put on the appearance of friendliness; but in April, 1848, he took the stand of open and decided opposition. Not satisfied to use persuasion only, and not content with ecclesiastical interdicts, he employed the most abusive language towards the pious Nestorians, threatening imprisonment and the bastinado. His servants and Koords, instigated by him, resorted to violence; and some of the pious native helpers of the mission were cruelly abused. During these troubles, Mr. Stevens, the British consul at Tabreez, exerted himself in the most efficient manner for the protection of the mission. Through his influence mainly, the Persian government interfered decidedly, in September, to put a stop to the violence of the patriarch and his most active instruments. In these difficulties, the prominent Nestorian ecclesiastics did not hesitate to oppose the course of their own patriarch, the head of their church, giving their sympathy and co-operation to the mission. In 1849 the patriarch returned to the mountains. There he has remained, sometimes making professions of friendship; but instigating, probably, to the opposition which has been made to recent efforts to plant a permanent missionary station in the mountain district of Gawar. His influence, especially with the Nestorians of the plain, has been greatly diminished, as the influence of the truth has increased among the people.

Revivals.—In January, 1844, this mission was favored with some tokens of the special presence of the Holy Spirit. A few, mostly young men of promise, who had long been members of the seminary, or in some way connected with the mission, gave cheering evidence that they had passed from death to life. In the summer of 1845 there was an interesting state of religious feeling at Geog Tapa, the largest Nestorian village on the plain, which has since been greatly favored. The first great revival, however, commenced in January, 1846. The first instances of hopeful conversion were in the female seminary, but in a short time, many in both seminaries were inquiring what they should do to be saved. The feeling became general and very deep, continuing for many months in the seminaries, and extending to many not connected with these institutions. John and Moses, two young men, native helpers of the mission, labored with deep interest and much solicitude among the people of Geog Tapa, of which place it was said in March, by Dr. Perkins, "a great work in the conversion of souls is in progress." Not far from 50 persons in this village, besides pupils in the two seminaries from the village, were hopeful subjects of renewing grace during the progress of this work. In the two seminaries there were believed to be also now about 50 truly pious youth, many of whom manifested great interest in efforts for the conversion of others. In the village of Scir, where the male seminary was located, there was much interest, and within a few months it was stated that hopefully pious persons were to be found in not less than eleven villages on the plain. The work extended also, in some measure, to the mountain districts. Deacon Guergis, "an untamed mountaineer," came to visit his daughter, who had become hopefully a Christian in the female seminary, and was soon himself bowing with penitence and faith, before the cross of Christ. Returning to his mountain home, he exerted at once a most happy influence. Others from the mountains were hopefully converted at Oroomiah, and during the year several excursions were made in mountain districts, by members of the mission and native helpers; especially "the young evangelist, John," who made extensive missionary tours, with happy results. Thus did light break in soon after the difficulties with the papists and with the brothers of the patriarch; "whose powerful influences from without and from within had combined to embarrass, and, if possible, to destroy the mission." Eight months after the commencement of this work, not less than 150 hopeful converts in all were reckoned, including several ecclesiastics. Early in 1847, the female seminary again experienced a work of grace, when it was hoped that 9 others of the pupils were "born again." Again, in 1849, following the night of darkness occasioned by the bitter opposition of the patriarch in 1848, a precious revival was experienced, commencing, as in 1846, in the two seminaries in January, and extending, as then, to Geog Tapa and many other Nestorian villages. During this work, Mar Yohannan and Deacon Isaac, the friendly brother of the patriarch before mentioned, were both, it was hoped, truly born of God. Another work of grace was enjoyed in 1850, commencing, as before, in the seminaries and extending itself abroad. Though not as powerful as the revival of the previous year, it had all the marks of a true work of the Spirit, and quite a number, before impenitent, were hopefully renewed, while Christians were greatly quickened. In 1851, also, there were indications of the special presence of the Spirit at about the same period; and in March, 1853, Dr. Perkins speaks of a "precious refreshing from the presence of the Lord, which has been in delightful progress in our male seminary, and in the village of Seir, during most of the past month." Few modern missions have been more favored with such tokens of God's presence, than this mission to the Nestorians. A few years since, none could be found among the people who gave evidence of piety; now, hundreds are heirs of the grace of life.

Efforts for the Mountain Nestorians.—In 1837 the Prudential Committee of the American Board said, in their annual report, "The Committee look with great interest to the day when a branch of this mission shall exist among the independent Nestorians. Among these fierce mountaineers the life of the missionary might be in some peril, but sanctified by grace they would make excellent soldiers of the cross." It having become obvious that Dr. Grant could not endure the climate of Oroomiah, instructions were sent to him to commence, if possible, a station on the western side of the Koordish mountains, in the hope that from there access might be gained to the mountains themselves. These instructions he received in Feb. 1839, about one month after he had been called to bury his wife. His own wish was to attempt to enter the mountains from Persia; but overruled in this he started on the first of April for Erzurum, where he expected to meet Mr. Homes, of the Armenian mission, who was to be his temporary associate. Learning that Mr. Homes would not meet him at Erzurum, he went to Constantinople, and there finding that Mr. H. could not at once be spared from that station, with characteristic energy he proceeded alone to Mesopotamia, it being understood that he should remain at or near Diarbekir until his associate should join him. He reached Diarbekir May 30, and "found the public mind in a state of suspense and expectation, like the calm which precedes an overwhelming storm." The Turkish army had been defeated by the Koords, who were now in a state of commotion, and a reign of violence and anarchy at once commenced. He was joined by Mr. Homes on the 3d of July, and they proceeded together to Mardin. Here they were in great danger, and once very narrowly escaped with their lives, during a popular tumult. Finding themselves beset with dangers, and learning also that there were no Nestorians on the west side of the mountains, as there seemed hardly any hope of doing good in that vicinity, after remaining two months, Mr. Homes escaped in disguise to Diarbekir, and returned to Constantinople. Dr. Grant resolved to spare no effort to obtain access to the mountain tribes, and proceeded to Mosul, 200 miles distant on the Tigris, where he arrived Sept. 20. Here he found the country more quiet. On the 7th of October he left the city, and in a few days was in the heart of the mountain region of Central Koordistan. Riding a hardy mule, and when even a mule could not traverse the steep and broken mountains, going on foot, he visited the Nestorians, by whom he was cordially received; spent a month with the patriarch, and proceeded through the country of the Hakary Koords, by way of Salmas, to Oroomiah, where he arrived on the 7th of December. He was now prepared to urge the immediate commencement of missionary effort in the mountains, and regretted exceedingly that he could not at once enter upon labors there. In May, 1840, he again crossed the mountains with his little son, four years of age, accompanied by Mar Yohannan and Mar Yousaph, on his way to the United States. He reached Boston Oct. 3.

January 18, 1841, Rev. Messrs. Hinsdale and Mitchell, with their wives, sailed from Boston for the field among the then independent Nestorians. Dr. Grant followed on the 1st of April, hoping to overtake them. Learning at Constantinople that they would probably be detained at Aleppo by the disturbed state of the country on the route which they had designed to take, he determined to go by way of Trebizond and Erzurum. From Erzurum he went to Van, and from there took the shortest route to the country of the Nestorians, and on the 8th of July he was at Julamerk, the residence of the patriarch, by whom he was again cordially received. Messrs. Hinsdale and Mitchell left Aleppo on the 28th of May, to go by way of Diarbekir and Mardin to Mosul. On the journey, which was too late in the season for traversing the hot plains of Mesopotamia, Mr. Mitchell was attacked with a fever and died on the 27th of June. Mrs. Mitchell, overcome by fatigue and grief, also died on the 12th of July, a few days after reaching Mosul. Mr. and Mrs. Hinsdale both suffered much from fatigue, watching, and exposure, and greatly needed assistance. Dr. Grant, hearing of these trying circumstances, hastened to Mosul, where his arrival, on the 25th of August, was most seasonable, as Mr. Hinsdale was then suffering from a dangerous relapse of fever.

In the spring of 1842, hostilities having arisen between the Turks and the Koords of Amadiéh, it was not safe to attempt going into the mountains. Dr. Grant however passed to Oroomiah by way of Ravendoooc. Mr. Stocking started to go with him from Oroomiah to the mountains, but was taken sick at Salmas, on the way, and obliged to return. Dr. Grant, however, having obtained assurance of protection from the Hakary chiefs, the confidence of one of whom, Nooroolah Bey, he had gained three years before, for the fourth time determined to traverse the wild fastnesses of Koordistan, without a missionary associate, but accompanied by Mar Yoosuph. Finding the patriarch at an encampment of one of the maleks of Tyary, where he had taken refuge, on a mountain summit overlooking the Zab, they descended together to Ashita, where arrangements were made for a missionary station. The war on the west side of the mountains being ended, Mr. Hinsdale left Mosul the last of September, and arrived at Ashita in ten days, where he was welcomed by the people with all cordiality. In November he returned to Mosul, and was soon taken sick of typhus fever. Dr. Grant came to his relief, but on the 26th of December he rested from his labors.

Mr. and Mrs. Laurie left the United States for this mission July 29th, 1842, and reached Mosul November 11th. Remaining at Mosul for the winter, in April, 1843, Messrs. Laurie and Grant went to the new station at Ashita, where it was hoped a mission-house would be in readiness for the removal of the females in June. A school was opened, with 20 pupils, and the patriarch seemed as cordial as ever. Mr. Laurie's impressions in regard to the field as one for present cultivation, were not, however, altogether favorable.

About this time it became obvious that the Turkish government was not willing that measures should just then be taken to elevate the mountain Nestorians, as they wished to bring them under subjection to the Sultan. At least they were not willing to grant firmans, engaging the protection of the government, to other laborers who were on their way to the field, if they were going as missionaries to this people. A storm was gathering which soon burst upon the poor Nestorians with terrible effect. The Koords commenced hostilities in June. Dr. Grant fearlessly visited the hostile chiefs, Bader Khan Bey of the Buhtan Koords, and Nooroolah Bey, or Noor Ali Bey, of the Hakary Koords, who made no secret of their designs, but promised protection to the mission property at Ashita. The scenes which now commenced, and continued with intervals of comparative quiet for several months, were fearful in the extreme. Thousands of the Nestorians, men, women and children, were massacred, often with horrible tortures; others were taken to a terrible captivity, and others fled. Their villages were utterly destroyed, and what remained of the people in central Koordistan were entirely subdued, and reduced to a state of yet deeper poverty and wretchedness than they had known before.

The devoted Dr. Grant, who had so often gone, as few men could have done with impunity, and gaining favor, among wild mountaineers and savage Koords, was now about to rest from his labors. He died at Mosul, on the 24th of April, 1844. Mrs. Laurie had preceded him to the grave, in Dec. 1843. Doctor Azariah Smith joined the company at Mosul, in March, 1844, and the following summer Messrs. Laurie and Smith once more explored the mountain district of Tyary, looking upon a scene of painful desolation. The Prudential Committee, in view of all the discouraging circumstances of the case, now forwarded definite instructions to discontinue this branch of the Nestorian mission, and in October the three who remained of the missionary company left Mosul; Dr. Smith and Mrs. Hinsdale to join the mission to the Armenians, and Mr. Laurie, the Syrian mission. Good had been done at Mosul, and in 1849 missionary operations were resumed there, under favorable circumstances, but not with special reference to the Nestorians. That city is now the centre of what is called the Assyrian mission. (See Mosul.)

In May, 1846, Dr. Wright, from Oroomiah, visited Bader Khan Bey, at the request of the emir himself, who wished the benefit of his professional services. He was accompanied by Mr. Breath and the Nestorian deacon Tamu. They found the Nestorians in the districts which had been ravaged, again slowly collecting flocks and herds and resuming the cultivation of the soil; but another scene of slaughter and rapine from the Koords soon followed, reducing them again to deep destitution. At length, in 1847, the Turks conquered the Koords and garrisoned the mountains, subjecting both Koords and Nestorians to taxation.

Repeated excursions have been made during the past few years, to some of the mountain districts, by the missionaries at Oroomiah, and more frequently and more extensively by some of the devoted Nestorian helpers of the mission, some of whom are natives of these districts. In 1851, a station was taken by Messrs. Coan and Rhea, with three native helpers, in the district of Gawar, among the mountains, about 70 miles N. W. from Oroomiah. Much opposition has been experienced, and unwearied efforts have been made to drive them away, instigated, doubtless, by those high in office in the Nestorian church, with the patriarch at their head, and too willingly joined in by the local Turkish authorities. Deacon Tamu, one of the native helpers, upon an utterly groundless charge of murder, was seized in July, 1852, and kept a prisoner at Van, until September, 1853. His Christian deportment during all his trials, is worthy of great praise. The station has been maintained with increasing promise of usefulness; and in the autumn of 1853, Messrs. Coan and Rhea made a preaching tour among the Nestorians of Koordistan, going to Mosul, and visiting Ashita, the place where a station was commenced in 1843. They urge that effort should now be again commenced, without delay, on the west side of the mountains, by at least two missionaries, believing that the field is now open, and that if it be not occupied, the enemy, from Rome, will sow tares.—See PERKINS' "Residence in Persia;" GRANT'S "Nestorians, or the Lost Tribes;" LAURIE'S "Dr. Grant and the Mountain Nestorians;" The Reports of the A. PRESENT STATE AND FUTURE PROSPECTS OF THE MISSION.—LETTER FROM REV. DR. PERKINS.

OROOMIAH, May 16, 1854.

MY DEAR SIR:—Your favor of January 1 was received a few days ago. I had before seen notices of your contemplated enterprise, and rejoiced in view of it. The work you propose is exceedingly desirable and important, and judging from the fruits of your pen, which I have from time to time been so much favored as to receive, through our common friends, Mr. and Mrs. ———, I am happy in the belief that this great undertaking is fortunate in having fallen into your hands. With all my heart, I wish you the fullest success.

You request me to give you a sketch of the present aspect of our field and mission. This I will now briefly do with pleasure; but owing to the pressure of missionary duties, it must be very brief; which, however, is the less to be regretted, as our Reports to the Prudential Committee of our Board, to which you doubtless have access, have at all times been ample.

Our mission Press has given to the Nestorians the entire Bible, in both the ancient and modern Syriac; and an edition of the New Testament, in the modern language only, is just completed. Into this language, which, as you will recollect, was first reduced to writing by our mission, we have also introduced many valuable books besides the Holy Scriptures, as Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, Baxter's Saint's Rest, the Dairyman's Daughter, the Young Cottager, the Shepherd of Salisbury Plain, and other tracts, and many school books; and we are now printing a third edition of our hymn book, the first edition of which consisted of only four hymns, attached to a small spelling book, while the present edition contains about two hundred hymns. Our monthly periodical, entitled "The Rays of Light," holds steadily on its way, having entered on its fifth year. It is an exceedingly interesting auxiliary in our schools and among the people, each monthly number embracing a spice of matter in the various departments of religion, education, science, missionary intelligence, juvenile instruction, miscellanies, and poetry.

It is impossible for any statement or description to convey an adequate impression of the blessed influence of the press among this people, in whose vernacular tongue, twenty-one years ago, not a syllable of printed or written matter existed.

Passing from the press to our schools, we meet with corresponding phenomena. Where but a single small school existed, and that not worthy of the name, when our mission was commenced, we have had more than seventy village schools in operation, during the past winter; differing, of course, in the comparative competency and fidelity of their teachers, and corresponding progress of the pupils, but all contributing to multiply readers of the Holy Scriptures and other good books, and operating as important centres of evangelical light and influence.

Among our most interesting and promising labors are those of our male and female seminaries—the former under the care of Messrs. Stoddard and Cochran, and the latter under the care of Misses Fisk and Rice. I do not believe these two institutions of learning are surpassed, in the order, industry, and improvement of the pupils, and especially in their religious training, by any seminaries on the face of the globe. They each contain about forty-five pupils, the present year, the most of whom are hopefully pious. The male seminary is soon to graduate a class of twenty, the largest class that has ever left it at one time. The influence of the pious pupils and graduates of both these seminaries, on their people, is alike blessed and incalculable.

During the few past years, Sabbath-schools have been multiplied among the Nestorians, and with very happy effect. In these schools many adults have learned to read, and thus been qualified to go right to the fountain of God's word, for themselves, and draw from thence the waters of salvation. Here, as elsewhere, the Sabbath-school is found to be a very efficient and precious instrumentality in the diffusion of Scripture knowledge, and in preparing the minds and hearts of men for the saving work of the Holy Spirit.

Last in order of means employed, but first in importance, I may mention the preaching of the Gospel. Under all the pressure of our other arduous labors, we endeavor to keep fresh in mind the cardinal truth in the work of missions, that it hath pleased God, by the foolishness of preaching, to save them that believe. The clerical members of our mission, unless sick, or otherwise providentially prevented, preach at least twice on the Sabbath, or conduct religious services, tantamount to preaching, either at the stations or abroad among the villages, and more or less during the week. And we have now many able and faithful Nestorian fellow-laborers, from Mar Yohannan and Mar Elias, down to graduates of our seminary, engaged in the same way, some of them itinerating, and others at out-stations. And few are the Nestorians in Persia who do not thus have the Gospel brought to their villages, if not to their doors, at frequent intervals, a great many of them every Sabbath, and hundreds every day.

The pious Nestorians are also doing something in the line of missionary effort. For several successive years they have united with us in sending Nestorian missionaries to the district of Bootan, on the river Tigris, about 300 miles westward from Oroomiah. To give a missionary character to this ancient church, once so celebrated for its missionary efforts, has ever been the strong desire of our hearts; and it possesses good materials for that purpose.

But while Paul may plant and Apollos water, it is God who giveth the increase. You have doubtless been made familiar with the unspeakably precious revivals with which our field has been graciously visited in former years. The present year, the Lord has again mercifully visited this missionary vine. The recent work of grace here has been more quiet in its progress than some previous revivals; but I believe not less pure and pervading in its influence, nor less hopeful in its results. A precious harvest has thus been gathered, the present year, in our two seminaries, in the large village of Geog Tapa, and to some extent in smaller villages.

This refreshing from the presence of the Lord is the more interesting at this time, from the ominous political aspects that lower in these Eastern lands. We have in this visitation a most comforting pledge that God has not forgotten to be gracious to our Zion, and that he will not forsake his missionary servants and the holy cause in which they are engaged, "though the earth be removed, and the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea."

Under the operation of these various missionary means, and especially under the repeated showers of heavenly grace with which our field has been visited, it would be strange if evangelical light and truth were not making rapid progress among the Nestorians. Such is the fact; and the result is that the pious, and many of the enlightened who are not pious, are casting off the senseless and unscriptural doctrines and practices with which their worship had been more or less encumbered, and rapidly verging toward the Gospel standard. Hitherto we have, as you are aware, labored in the Nestorian church without "let or hindrance." How long we shall continue thus to labor in the church, we still leave for the Lord to decide, ever endeavoring carefully to watch and implicitly to follow the guidance of his hand.

The members of our mission are all severely worked. It cannot be otherwise; but eight in number, as we are, with the great amount of labor we have constantly on our hands, in the departments of preparing matter for the press, printing, education, and preaching the Gospel. We need more reapers, and the harvest must suffer for the want of them, especially as the vigor of youth and manhood is departing from some of us.

Among the obstacles to the progress of the Gospel here, the efforts of the wily French Papists to lead astray the Nestorians should be mentioned as the most serious. No means are too low or too iniquitous for them to adopt; and among an ignorant and corrupt people, it would be strange if such means and motives, constantly pursued, and shamelessly and doggedly urged on their mercenary feelings, in their low state of morals, did not meet with a measure of success. In view of the corrupting and destructive efforts of these unprincipled emissaries of Rome, we often feel like uniting our cry with that of the witnesses under the altar, "O Lord, how long?"

Our mission station in the wild Koordish mountains is manfully occupied by Messrs. Rhea and Crane. They greatly need the services and the influence of a physician in that self-denying field. Their labors are gradually becoming more and more extended in those dark regions, and we have every reason to hope that the day is not distant when the handful of corn thus lodged in the top of the mountains shall shake like Lebanon; the light there kindled, mingling with that rising from the plain, and both unitedly blazing upward and onward to aid in the illumination of benighted Central Asia.

I have alluded to the warlike aspects in eastern lands. As yet, Persia perseveres in refusing to declare war against Turkey, though long and strongly urged to do so; and we hope that, in the good providence of God, the Shah will continue to maintain this neutral ground. Should there be a rupture between Turkey and Persia, our position would of course be disturbed, and more or less unsafe, near as we are situated to the boundary of these two empires, and that boundary infested with hordes of bloody Koords. But it is always safe to trust in the Lord. We know that the cause of missions is infinitely dearer to him than it can be to us, and we will trust that He who rides on the whirlwind will direct the storm. I am, dear sir, with much respect, very truly yours,

J. PERKINS.

NETHERLANDS MISSIONARY SOCIETY: The Netherlands Missionary Society was established in December, 1797, at Rotterdam, through the instrumentality of Dr. Van der Kemp. This remarkable man, after his appointment by the London Missionary Society to South Africa, visited his native country to settle his affairs. There he translated into Dutch and published an address of the directors of the London Missionary Society to the religious people of Holland, which led eventually to the establishment of the "Netherlands Missionary Society." The founders of the society having been principally ministers and inhabitants of Rotterdam, the chief seat of the Netherlands Missionary Society has remained at that place. The members of the society belong principally to the established church, which is Presbyterian in its form of government, and Calvinistic in its doctrine. Those ministers who have imbibed Neologian sentiments, take scarcely any interest in it, nor in anything connected with missionary work, thereby confirming the often-made observation, that the orthodox, evangelical faith is that which alone produces true and disinterested love to God and zeal for his glory, and prompts men to exert themselves actively and perseveringly in promoting the spiritual and eternal welfare of their fellow-creatures. The General Synod, however, of the Dutch Church has no control over the missionaries nor over the funds collected for missionary undertakings. But all the missionaries sent out by the society are examined and ordained at the Hague by a committee of ministers appointed for that purpose by the General Synod from among its members. The parish churches are everywhere freely granted for missionary meetings and other missionary purposes. The society is supported by regular monthly and annual subscriptions, and by donations and legacies; but no list of subscribers is ever published. The principal supporters of the society belong to the poorer and middle classes; few of the great and wealthy being found willing to assist the good cause. A body of directors, both lay and clerical, is annually chosen from among the subscribers, who manage the affairs of the society.

Wherever there are clergymen members of the society, the monthly prayer-meeting on the first Monday of the month is publicly and regularly held in the parish churches. In some places it is very well attended, 1,000 and even 2,000 sometimes being present in the large towns. The directors publish monthly a report of the most interesting missionary events which have come to their knowledge during the month, which is always read at the meeting, the officiating minister interspersing it with suitable remarks.

The annual general meeting takes place in July, and is held in the Cathedral Church of Rotterdam, which can accommodate between three and four thousand people, and is generally filled on the occasion. Pious laymen and clergymen from almost every part of Holland attend. A report of the proceedings of the year is read and a missionary sermon preached; but speeches are never made.

The society has its foreign secretary, who corresponds with the missionaries on official topics. But, in addition to this, every one of the leading directors chooses one of the missionaries he may like best, and becomes his particular and regular correspondent, and also his advocate and that of his station at the Board. This arrangement has proved very useful to the Netherlands Missionary Society, and most advantageous both to the directors and the missionaries. The society has a college of its own, at Rotterdam, for the instruction, theological and scientific, of the candidates for the missionary work. Of these, the smallest proportion generally are Dutch, whilst the greater number are Germans and Swiss.

At first the funds of the society were too small to admit of its sending missionaries to foreign lands, and that it might not be idle, various plans were formed and carried into execution for doing good at home, especially by the publication and distribution of religious books, the establishment of Sunday-schools, visiting prisons and hospitals, and assisting some congregations to sustain ministers. In such courses of labor the society went on till the year 1800, when they began to hope they might enter on the field toward which their eye was originally turned.

In a short time their funds increased rapidly. Numbers of young men also offered their services as missionaries, several of whom after having gone through a proper course of instruction, were ready to occupy any field that might be pointed out to them in the heathen world. The political circumstances of the country, the subjugation of Holland by France with the consequent loss of its colonies, rendered it impracticable for the directors to send these young men abroad themselves; they therefore entered into a friendly agreement with the London Missionary Society, which engaged to send them forth under its auspices, and selected first South Africa as the most suitable sphere for them, owing chiefly to their being acquainted with the Dutch, which language is generally understood and spoken by the Hottentots and other tribes. For many years afterwards, nearly all the missionaries whom the London Missionary Society sent to that part of the world, were young men they had obtained from Holland.

In 1804 the London Missionary Society sent Messrs. Vos, Erhardt, and Palm, three missionaries transferred to them by the Netherlands Missionary Society, to the island of Ceylon, encouraged by the accounts they had received of the vast numbers of natives who professed themselves Christians, but who were now in a great measure destitute of religious instruction. The first-named of these missionaries was greatly thwarted in his efforts among the natives by the English government, instigated it is said by the Dutch consistory of the island whom he had offended by his faithfulness and zeal. In consequence, he was soon compelled to leave the country. Messrs. Palm and Erhardt continued at Ceylon until their death, which happened several years ago, and were successfully employed in the superintendence of schools and the pastoral care of two churches to which they had been appointed by government. It does not seem that they were able to accomplish much among the heathen.

About the year 1812, the directors of the Netherlands Missionary Society, anxious to exert themselves for the benefit of the former Dutch settlements in the East, transferred again for that purpose three missionaries to the London Missionary Society; for Holland being as yet under French rule, and Java and the Eastern Islands being occupied by the British, it was not practicable for the Netherlands Society then to undertake that mission directly. These three missionaries were superior men and thoroughly qualified for their work. They were the Rev. Messrs. Kam, Supper, and Bruckner. These brethren were at the outset of their career exposed to considerable difficulties and dangers; for the French government having strictly prohibited their leaving the country for England, they were compelled to assume the attire of traveling mechanics, and in this disguise, succeeded, after having had many narrow escapes from the French gendarmes, to reach Christiania in Norway, from whence they embarked for London. This place they left for Java in the commencement of 1813. On their arrival at Batavia they separated, Mr. Supper having been appointed to that capital, Mr. Bruckner to Bataharang, and Mr. Kam to the Molucca islands. Mr. Supper died not long after his arrival, and Mr. Bruckner, (who is still living and actively employed in the translation of the Scriptures and other missionary duties,) joined the Baptist Missionary Society.

Mr. Kam fixed his residence at Amboyna, and met there what his heart so greatly longed for—a most extensive field of labor. There are in the Eastern Archipelago thousands of Malay native converts who embraced Christianity during the dominion and by the exertions of the old Dutch East India Company. In propagating Christianity in these parts, there is nothing which the Dutch aimed more at than to furnish the inhabitants with the Holy Scriptures. As early as 1733, the whole Bible in Malay and several parts of the sacred writings in other dialects of the East, were translated and published by order, and at the expense of the Dutch government, and widely disseminated throughout the islands. It is true, however, that the best means to promote the conversion of the natives, were not always used, nor the best motives always held out, neither was sufficient caution always exercised in receiving candidates into the church.

In 1814, Holland having resumed its independence, and received back its colonies, the directors of the Netherlands Missionary Society deemed it time to pursue operations for the future, directly, and without the intervention of other societies. They placed their Missionary Seminary upon a more regular footing, and in 1819 sent out five young men trained in it to join Mr. Kam, who meanwhile had been appointed by the Netherlands Missionary Society one of its foreign directors.

These young men, after having obtained some knowledge of the native language at Amboyna, were placed in various islands, as Celebes, Oeram, Ternate, Banda and Timor, and have been since from time to time reinforced by fresh arrivals of laborers from Holland, the Netherlands Society viewing at present that part of the world as its principal sphere of action.

In July, 1838, the zealous missionary Kam died, at the age of sixty-three years, from over exertion, occasioned by an extensive missionary tour he had made. He was a most active and devoted servant of the Lord. Until his death, he continued twice or thrice in the year, in a small brig of his own, which he managed himself with the assistance of a few native lascars, to travel in that burning clime for several months together, from island to island, exposed to storms and dangers of various kinds. On such occasions, he often added to his duties of a preacher of the Gospel those of a peace-maker among the native tribes, and was the means of preventing much bloodshed. As Schwartz had been on the continent of India by the British government, so was he frequently employed by the Netherlands government in allaying disturbances and quelling rising rebellions among their Malay subjects, in which endeavors he seldom failed. His judicious views of things, good temper, perfect integrity, and the holiness of his life, rendered him greatly respected by the chiefs of the Eastern Islands, and made the humble missionary a far more successful instrument in maintaining peace among them, than large bodies of troops could ever have been.

The Netherlands Society twenty-five or thirty years ago, made an attempt to contribute to the evangelization of the Chinese, and sent out the celebrated Mr. Gutzlaff and some other missionaries, for that express purpose.

In the year 1822, the Netherlands Society sent a missionary (the Rev. Mr. Vix,) to the Dutch colony of Surinam, in Guiana, who has labored there ever since (not without fruit,) among the negro slave population. His church amounts to about 700 members. The society has another missionary in the West Indies, stationed at the island of Curaçao, who is employed much like Mr. Vix.

In 1820, the late Dr. Vos, being on a visit to Holland, called the attention of the directors to the destitute state of the Hindoos in a spiritual point of view, upon which they resolved on commencing two missions in these parts, one at Chinsurah in Bengal, and the other at Pulicat on the coast of Coromandel, both of which places belonged then to the Dutch government. Rev. A. F. Lacroix was appointed to the former, and the Rev. Mr. Kindlinger, a most pious and devoted man, who, up to his twenty-fourth year had been a bigoted Roman Catholic, to the latter. Dr. Vos and G. Herklots, Esq., of Chinsurah, had, previous to their departure from Holland, been elected foreign directors of the society.

Mr. Kindlinger on his arrival at the station, had great difficulties to contend with on account of the exceedingly degraded state of the native Christians, great numbers of whom he met at Pulicat and the vicinity. These had embraced Christianity through the instrumentality of the old German missionaries who had preceded Schwartz and had been more than a quarter of a century without teachers and without instruction. By patient endeavors, however, he succeeded in course of time in collecting a numerous and regular congregation, established several schools, and spent much of his time in preaching to the heathen. In 1823, he was joined by two other laborers from Holland, the Rev. Messrs. Irion and Winckler, the former of whom remained with him at Pulicat, and the latter was stationed at Sadras, a small Dutch settlement near the seven pagodas between Madras and Pondicherry.

In 1825, the Dutch settlements on the continent of India having been ceded to the British government in exchange for its possessions on the island of Sumatra, the directors of the Netherlands Society informed their missionaries that circumstances would not permit them to continue their missions in those settlements, and left them free either to proceed to the Eastern Archipelago to join their brethren there—or, if they preferred, to connect themselves with any one of the English societies laboring in India. All four, having already at the expense of much time and labor, attained a knowledge of the native languages and the native customs and habits, felt unwilling to relinquish so great an advantage, and therefore deemed it their duty to accept of the latter proposal; in consequence of which Messrs. Kindlinger and Winckler joined the Church Missionary Society. Mr. Irion joined the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts; and Mr. Lacroix connected himself with the London Missionary Society, which made an end to the Dutch mission in these parts.

The receipts of the Society for 1850 were about $37,000. The institution for training missionaries at Rotterdam is continued. At that time, the Society had 17 stations in the Indian Archipelago, manned by 19 missionaries, besides having furnished a large number of missionaries for other societies.

NEVIS: A small, but beautiful and fertile island in the West Indies. A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

NEW-BARMEN: A station of the Rhenish Missionary Society in South Africa, 200 miles north-east of Scheppmansdorf.

NEWASSE: A station of the American Board in Hindostan, connected with the Ahmednuggur mission.

NEW-HEBRIDES: A group of islands in Western Polynesia, or Australasia, where the London Missionary Society have eight stations. Erromanga, one of this group, is the place of the tragical death of the martyr missionary, Williams. Population, 150,000.

NEWERA ELLA: A station of the Gospel Propagation Society in Ceylon.

NEWVILLE: A Karen village, in the northern part of Maulmain province, in Burmah, and an out-station of the Maulmain Karen Mission of the American Baptist Union.

NEW-RABBAY: Station of the Church Missionary Society among the Wonikas, in East Africa, situated on the coast, a short distance W.N.W. of Mombas.

NEW-AMSTERDAM: The capital of Barbice, situated 50 miles up the Barbice river. It is a pleasant town, intersected with canals, and a considerable portion of ground attached to each house. It is occupied by the Society for Propagating the Gospel.

NEW-HERNHUT: The first station occupied by the Moravians in Greenland. Also, a station of the same on the island of St. Thomas, W. I.

NEW-HOLLAND: See Australia.

NEW-PROVIDENCE: One of the Bahama Islands, about 25 miles long and nine broad, and considerably in advance of the other islands in cultivation. Wesleyan Missionary Society.

NEW-BRUNSWICK: One of the provinces of British America. The latest census was taken in 1851. The population was at that time 192,800; but no religious statistics are given in this important public document, and there are no denominational records, from which the numbers, character, and condition of the Christian community can be accurately ascertained. The following items have been collected from documents under date of 1854. The number of Catholic clergy is almost the same as in Nova Scotia, and the circumstances would appear to indicate that the proportion of Catholics to Protestants in New Brunswick must be greater than in Nova Scotia.

Church of England.—1 bishop, 1 archdeacon, and 5 clergymen.

Church of Scotland.—1 synod, 2 presbyteries, 8 ministers, 11 congregations, and several missionary stations.

Reformed Presbyterian Church of Ireland.—2 ministers and 1 missionary.

Wesleyan Methodists.—30 ministers, 22 congregations, and 2 supernumeraries, besides 3 ministers employed as principal and teachers of Sackville Academy.

Baptists.—2 associations, 52 ministers, and 7 licentiate.

Free Christian Baptists.—16 ministers and 2 missionaries.

Congregationalists.—3 ministers.

NEW-ZEALAND: Two extensive and beautiful islands in the Southern Pacific, stretching from latitude $34^{\circ} 30'$ to $47^{\circ} 20'$ south, and from 167° to 178° east longitude, being nearly 900 miles long and over 700 broad; together with a small one to the south, called Stewart's Island. New-Zealand is distinguished for its rich and varied scenery, and for every thing which naturally strikes the eye as beautiful or sublime. Some of the mountains in the northern island rise more than 14,000 feet above the level of the sea; their sides covered with forest timber; their summits girt with clouds or capped with snow; and their whole appearance strikingly rich and grand. The country is remarkably hilly and broken, the hills being studded with caves, deep, dark, and frightful. New-Zealand has several large and noble lakes. The Thames is the principal river; the others being mostly insignificant streams. The forests are so extensive and so dense, that no sound from without disturbs the traveler; and yet no beasts of prey infest these retreats to put him in fear. New-Zealand has a number of harbors, which are visited for supplies by a vast number of whaling vessels.

The northern island is divided into fourteen districts, viz.: Kaitia, Bay of Islands, Thames, Tauranga, Rotorua, Bay of Plenty, East Cape, Poverty Bay, Wairoa, Entry Island, Taranaki, Waikato, Kaipara, and Hokianga.

Climate.—The climate of New-Zealand is temperate, salubrious, and congenial to European constitutions. North of the Thames snows are unknown, and frosts are off the ground by nine o'clock in the morning. During six months of the year, the country is exposed to heavy gales of wind and tremendous falls of rain. The spring and autumn are delightfully temperate. Spring commences the middle of August, summer in December, autumn in March, and winter in July.

Soil and Productions.—These islands afford almost every variety of soil, which produces wheat, barley, maize, beans, peas, and various grasses in abundance. Most of the trees are evergreens, and vegetation is scarcely ever suspended.

Inhabitants.—When first discovered, the New-Zealanders were a savage and barbarous people. When a child was born, it was wrapped in a coarse cloth, and laid in a verandah to sleep; and in a few hours, the mother pursued her ordinary work in the field. The child suffered much; and if its mother did not furnish it nourishment enough, it must perish. Large holes were slit in the ear, and a stick, half an inch in diameter, thrust through. When five days old, the child was carried to a stream of water, and either dipped or sprinkled, and a name given to it; and a priest mumbled a prayer, the purport of which was said to be, an address to some unknown spirit, praying that he may so influence the child that he may become cruel, brave, warlike, troublesome, adulterous, murderous, a liar, a thief, disobedient, in a word, guilty of every crime. After this, small pebbles, about the size of a pin's head, were thrust down its throat, to make its heart callous, hard, and incapable of pity. The ceremony was concluded with a feast.

The system of tabu, or consecration, common to the Pacific isles, nowhere prevailed to a greater extent than at New-Zealand. (See Tabu.)

With the New-Zealander, superstition took the place of medical skill. When a person had a pain in the back, he would lie down and get another to jump over him and tread on him to remove the pain. A wound was bruised with a stone, and afterwards held over the smoke. In internal acute diseases the patient sent for a priest, lay down, and died.

Dreams and omens were much regarded, and had great influence over their conduct. On important occasions, when several tribes were going to war, an oracle was consulted, by setting up sticks to represent the different tribes, and watching the wind to see which way the sticks would fall, in order to determine which party would be victorious. But the person performing the ceremony, by a little juggling, could determine the question as he pleased. The belief in witchcraft, also, almost universally prevailed, and was productive of all the suspicion, cruelty, and injustice which generally accompany it among a barbarous and superstitious people. Polygamy was allowed to any extent; being the fruitful source of jealousy, strife, and murder. Marriages were generally confined within the tribe. The people were affectionate, but desperate and revengeful when roused to anger. For an uncivilized people, they were industrious. Their food consisted of a variety of vegetables, and some kinds of animal food. They were warlike, and ate their enemies killed in war; and prisoners who were not killed and eaten were reduced to slavery. The heads of their enemies were preserved as trophies of victory. They formerly preserved the heads of their friends, and kept them with religious strictness.

Tattooing was practised, and was made a much more painful operation than in the other Pacific Isles. The operation was performed with a small rough chisel, with which an incision was made by a blow with a mallet, the chisel being first dipped in coloring matter made of the root of flax, burnt to charcoal, and mixed with water, the stain of which is indelible. The flax is cultivated extensively in New Zealand, of which they make gar ments, nets, and lines. The houses of the better class were snug and warm, ornamented with carved work. They were built of bulrushes, lined with the leaves of the palm tree, neatly platted together. They were about 16 by 10 feet, and four or five feet high. The entrance was by a low sliding door, and there was one window 9 by 6 inches, with a sliding shutter. Their houses were without furniture, and their cooking utensils a few stones. Their villages were scattered over a large plot of ground without any order or arrangement.

Religion.—The New Zealanders, though remarkably superstitious, had no gods that they worshiped, nor anything to represent a being whom they called god. They imagined that it was a great spirit (Atua) who thundered; but all their thoughts of him were those of fear and dread. Sickness, they supposed, was brought on by him, coming in the form of a lizard, entering the side, and preying on the vitals. Hence they used incantations over the sick, threatening to kill and eat their deity, or to burn him to a cinder, unless he should come out. Their idea of Waro, the evil spirit, was more in accordance with the Scriptural idea of the Evil One. They believed in a future state; but their ideas of it were vague and sensual; and as they supposed all the functions of life were there performed, slaves were killed upon the death of a chief, that they might follow and attend upon him; and widows often put themselves to death that they might accompany their departed husbands.

MISSION.

Church Missionary Society.—The attention of the Church Missionary Society was directed to New Zealand, by Rev. Saml. Marsden, senior chaplain to the colony of New South Wales, and they sent out three missionaries to labor under the direction of Mr. Marsden, who arrived at New Zealand towards the close of 1814, and commenced a station at Rangihoua, on the N. W. side of the Bay of Islands. But for a long time they were treated with taunts and jeers and threatenings, while their message was neither understood nor regarded, and they were subjected to great privations, from want of shelter, food and companions. But an influential chief named Hongi, visiting England and returning loaded with presents, the missionaries rose in the estimation of the natives, and were beloved and protected by the chiefs. The station was afterwards removed to Tapanua, on the other side of the hill; and on the arrival of a reinforcement, another station was commenced at Kerikeri, near which was a large native village, occupied by Hongi and his people. But it was with great difficulty that they could form a school, or secure attendance on public worship. When the Sabbath bell caught their ears, they would run away, and employ themselves in fishing, or some of their native sports. Sometimes they would come into the chapel dressed in the most fantastic style, and at other times, naked; and in the middle of the service they would start up with the cry, "That's a lie! that's a lie! Let us all go."

Another station was commenced at Paihia, in 1823, on the south side of the Bay of Islands, where the people were in an exceedingly wild and uncontrollable state.

The mission was reinforced from time to time, and a schooner was built to ply between the mission and Port Jackson, in order to furnish supplies. She was lost in 1828, but another was built, and launched in May, 1830, called The Messenger.

Schools were commenced at Paihia, in 1823, and at the same time the missionaries began to visit the natives in the neighborhood, for religious instruction. In 1824, these instructions were blessed to the conversion of the chief Waitangi, who was baptized under the name of Christian Rangi; and by June 1831, 20 adults were baptized at this station, with 10 children.

For 15 years the natives had steadily refused to allow any one to reside near their villages, in the interior. But having become convinced that the missionaries were their friends, in 1830 a station was commenced at Waimate, the centre of a large district in the interior, to which roads have been cut by the natives to their residences, for thirty-five miles; and chapels have been erected in most of the numerous villages in this district, capable of holding 150 to 200 persons, in which services are regularly held on the Sabbath, by assistant missionaries, and they are occasionally visited by the resident clergyman; schools have also been established in these villages, with the sanction of the chiefs. Four schools are in operation at Waimate.

In January, 1834, a settlement was formed at Kaitai, at the earnest solicitation of the chiefs and people of the Haurua tribes, in the vicinity of the North Cape; and another subsequently at Parahi, south of the Bay of Islands.

Although the missionaries labored at these stations under great discouragements, for many years, yet after mastering the language and acquiring the confidence of the natives, the usual results of the introduction of the Gospel into pagan lands began to be seen. One of them, Rev. Mr. Yate, in speaking of this change in 1835, says, "Instead of the noisy merriment, the blustering excitement to mischief, which used to prevail on the Sabbath, all is peace. Sabbath schools in many of the native villages are established, and regularly carried on; work of every description is laid aside; Christian worship is punctually attended; and the day as strictly regarded as in any well-regulated village in England. In this, I am speaking of the Christianized villages in the interior; not of those in connection with the shipping; in which, as the sailors on that day have frequently liberty to go on shore, the holy day is made a season of far greater iniquity than any other."

A report of the Waimate station for 1832, stated that the chapel was every Sabbath crowded to excess; that the natives rejoiced at the approach of every Sabbath; and that the preached word had its effect upon many of the hearers. On the 4th of May, 1834, just before embarking for New South Wales, to superintend the printing of some translations, Mr. Yate baptized four chiefs, and several other persons; and on the 8th of June, he baptized 38 adults, the greater portion of them chiefs. They had been candidates for many months. The next Sabbath they were admitted to the communion. Mr. Yate gives an account of the deaths of several heathens, who met death in darkness and horror of mind, one of them, a chief, declaring, with his last breath, that he was "going to hell;" and a number of native Christians, who had died in peace and comfort, in the faith of the Gospel. He also publishes a number of letters, which he received from the converts, which were full of affection and pious feeling, expressive of a deep insight into their own hearts, and a simple faith in Christ.

At this stage in the progress of the mission, the natives manifested a strong desire for knowledge; and though their facilities for instruction were small, yet a great many of them had learned to read. And, captives from distant tribes, having been sold into slavery, had attended the mission-schools; and by some means gaining their liberty, they had carried the knowledge thus acquired to their distant homes, and taught it to their friends.

A great change had been effected by the Gospel in the domestic character of those who had embraced it. Polygamy was diminishing; and husbands and wives did not quarrel as formerly. The inhuman practices of former times were being suppressed. It was once the custom for the relations of a chief to kill one or more slaves at his death; to wait upon him in the world of spirits; but, when the great chief Hongi died, not one was slain. The tabus and other superstitions, also, were falling into disuse. And industry, regularity, and a desire to make improvements in their land, their habits and customs, were on the increase among the great body of the people. Mr. Yate gives the following speech of a chief to his people, who seems to have caught a correct idea of the power and influence of the Gospel: "What," he inquired, "what are these missionaries come to dwell with us for? They are come to break in two our clubs, to blunt the points of our spears, to draw the bullets from our muskets, and to make this tribe and that tribe to love one another, and sit as brothers and friends. Then let us give our hearts to listening, and we shall dwell in peace."

The following incident shows how the heaven works when it once finds its way to the heathen mind: Two of the missionaries, as they were traveling to a new and distant part of the island, rested on the Sabbath, and collected an assembly of natives to hear the Gospel. They commenced by singing a hymn; and, to their astonishment, the whole congregation joined with them. The responses also were correctly given. They afterwards found three boys who had lived for some time in the mission family, who had acted as their teachers.

In December, 1837, a Roman Catholic bishop and two priests landed in New Zealand, and located themselves in the midst of the Wesleyan mission. Thus it is that the Church of Rome follows the track of Protestant missionaries, like an evil spirit, to counteract the good work. In 1839, they had eight priests and two catechists; but one chief is represented as having become more deeply attached to the missionaries, being disgusted with what he had seen and heard of the Papists.

In January, 1839, the Bishop of Australia visited the mission; and in a letter to the committee, he bears the following testimony to the character of the missionaries, and the results of their labors: "I must offer a very sincere and willing testimony to their maintaining a conversation such as becomes the Gospel of Christ. Their habits of life are devotional. They are not puffed up with self-estimation, but appear willing to learn as well as apt to teach. And among themselves they appear to be drawn together by a spirit of harmony, prompted by that Spirit of which love, gentleness, and goodness are the most delightful fruits."

"At every station which I personally visited, the converts were so numerous as to bear a considerable proportion to the entire population; and I was informed that the same was true at other places. In most of the native villages in which the missionaries have a footing, there is a building set apart for religious worship. In these buildings generally, but sometimes in the open air, the Christian classes were assembled before me. The gray-haired man and aged woman took their places to read and undergo examination among their descendants of the second and third generations. The chief and the slave stood side by side, with the same holy volume in their hands, and exerted their endeavors each to surpass the other in returning proper answers."

The bishop states that the native population is rapidly diminishing, even more so than during their savage warfare—a fact for which he is at a loss to account.

The activity of the natives in teaching their countrymen, and in building places of worship, forms an important feature of this mission. Mr. Williams states, June 3, 1839, that on his visit to the East Cape, he found three na tive teachers actively engaged, and that the degree of attention paid to them by the natives generally was astonishing. At one place they found a chapel, 60 by 28 feet, which had been erected by the natives, and a congregation of 500 assembled in it on the Lord's day. At another place, where no missionary had ever been, they found the natives assembling for Christian worship, in a regular and orderly manner.

The following account of a native prayer-meeting, is related by Mr. Brown, in a letter dated July 21, 1838: "After evening service I found that a few natives had met to hold a prayer-meeting. They commenced by singing a hymn. A native then engaged in prayer. That was followed by reading a chapter. Another hymn was sung; and, after an address by a native, the meeting was closed by another extemporaneous prayer."

In relation to general improvement, it is stated that at this time (1839) the missionaries had introduced among these savages agriculture and gardening; the use of the spade, the plow, and the mill; cattle, sheep, and horses; built houses and chapels; cut roads through forests; built bridges, &c., changing a country from a wild and savage state to a condition of incipient civilization. In all the 14 districts of the island, Christian congregations had been gathered, with an aggregate attendance on public worship of 8,760, and 233 communicants; and the entire Scriptures had been translated and printed in the native tongue. But so rapid was the increase of interest, that in a letter dated May 5, 1840, Rev. W. Williams says that the population, as a body, professed Christianity; that the number attending public worship had increased to 27,000; that the baptisms could not be less than 2,000; and the number of communicants during this short period had more than doubled.

In 1841, the British Government made New Zealand an independent colony, and appointed Captain Hobson Governor.

In September, 1840, Mr. Williams gives a most encouraging view of the state of things in the Eastern District. He says his parish extends two degrees and a half; that almost all the people are inquiring after the truth; and that more than 8,000 assemble regularly for worship.

In 1841, New Zealand was erected into an Episcopal see; and Rev. G. A. Selwyn, D.D., was consecrated bishop at Lambeth, England. In June of the same year, the first missionary meeting in New Zealand was held at Kaitia, attended by 500 natives and a number of Europeans. The resolutions were each moved by a European and seconded by a native. Several of the native addresses were appropriate and striking. The amount of the contribution taken on the occasion was £46 5s.

The good work in the Eastern District progressed so rapidly, that in July, 1841, the communicants had increased in that district alone to 878, among whom were included a large proportion of the leading chiefs. The whole fabric of the old superstitions was gone, the idols cast away, weapons of war laid aside, and petty quarrels settled by arbitration.

In the Western District, in September, 1839, two young chiefs traveled 500 miles with a request for missionaries from their father, a noted chief and warrior, at Kapiti, an island in Cook's Straits. To the astonishment of the missionaries, it was found that they could read well; and from their statements it appeared that, in many villages, the Lord's day was observed, public worship regularly held, and great numbers were anxious for instruction; and all this was the result of the labors of one native, named Mataban, who had gone there of his own accord, and was actively engaged in diffusing a knowledge of the Gospel.

The zeal of the native converts for the conversion of their countrymen has been remarkable. In many parts of the country where the missionaries have journeyed over ground never before trodden by Europeans, they have been astonished to find chapels built, some of the natives able to read, and many in the habit of assembling for worship. Mr. Ashwell says that in a tour of 400 miles, in every village he found some one who could read, and in all but one of them he found the Testament.

In their report for 1843, the committee say, "The blessing of God continues to be vouchsafed in a marked degree to the labors of the missionaries and native teachers, and the circulation of the Scriptures. Within the last four years, the number of natives who have embraced Christianity has increased from 2,000 to 35,000." And although they do not speak confidently of the saving conversion of the great mass of them, yet they say there is every reason to entertain the hope that not a few of this multitude have truly embraced the Gospel. War and cannibalism had almost, if not entirely, ceased; ancient superstitions had been forsaken; and many were making rapid progress in spiritual knowledge. Dr. Sinclair, surgeon of the British Navy, who visited New Zealand at the end of 1841, gives the following testimony:

"By means of the well-directed labors of the missionaries, the natives have become exemplary Christians, and now show an intellectual capacity which strikes with surprise every one who goes among them. Perhaps no people in the history of mankind has been so completely changed in their religious and moral condition, as these natives have been, in such a short time, and more particularly by such a small number of men, and by such peaceful means. Frequently have I heard a Christian native, when asked to buy or sell on the Lord's day, or break any other commandment, make the decided answer, 'No—the missionar;' and that when the temptations were great."

The new bishop arrived at Auckland, May 30, 1842, where he was received with demonstrations of joy by the inhabitants. And, in his letters to the society, he confirms the statements already made respecting the progress of the Gospel. The committee say, in 1844, that they can speak with increased confidence of the extent to which the Gospel has spread among the natives of New Zealand, and the essential change which it has produced in all their moral habits. The message of salvation had been conveyed to nearly, or quite, all the settlements on the northern island; and in many places unvisited by the missionaries, the Gospel was read and public worship maintained. War had almost entirely ceased; and where it had occurred lately, it had been carried on in a very mitigated form. Theft and murder were of rare occurrence. The bishop states that, among the Christian natives, he had met with the most pleasing instances of the natural expression of the deep and earnest feelings of religion.

The bishop rented the mission farm at Waimate, and commenced a collegiate establishment for the training of candidates for the ministry.

The following incident, related by Rev. C. P. Davis, and which occurred in 1844, shows, in a very striking manner, the power of the Gospel to tame the most savage tribes. He entered a village belonging to two Christian chiefs, Perika and Noa, and found them surrounded by their armed followers, engaged in prayer, expecting an attack from Ripa, a chief who had made an unjust demand of them, with which they refused to comply. They had a white flag raised over their heads, as a token of their desire for peace. Mr. Davis went out to meet Ripa and his party, whom he found naked and their faces painted red, listening to addresses urging them to vengeance and slaughter. Noa walked between the two parties, telling the enemy that they were acting contrary to the word of God; and that, while his party were not afraid of them, they were restrained by the fear of God. Ripa and his party were but 20, while the Christian party were 100. After many speeches on both sides, one of Ripa's men, in brandishing his hatchet, accidentally hit Noa's head. As soon as his men saw the blood flowing, every man's musket was leveled. In another moment Ripa's whole party would have fallen; but the wounded chief sprang forward, and exclaimed, "If you kill Ripa, I will die with him;" and then throwing his own body as a shield over Ripa, saved him from destruction. Peace was then made between the two parties, and there was great rejoicing. "Some years ago," says Mr. Davis, "the very sight of blood would have been a signal for a dreadful slaughter."

In the year 1845, the mission was seriously interrupted by a collision between some of the natives in the northern district and the British forces, which led to a serious war for some time, some of the natives ranging themselves on one side and some on the other, and thus threatening a general civil war. Some of the stations in the northern district were broken up and destroyed. But the natives engaged in this outbreak, though not generally professing Christianity, were very far from manifesting the savage cruelty which formerly characterized their warfare. In a number of engagements, the natives were victorious; but the governor states that, in these circumstances, European troops would not have behaved better, or shown less vindictiveness. Their forbearance towards European settlers, especially the missionaries, was remarkable. Yet, the effects of the war upon missionary operations, and upon the religious condition of the Christian natives, were lamentable in the extreme. Such was the demoralizing influence of the example of the British soldiers at Waimate upon the natives with whom they came in contact, that some of them had given up even attending upon Christian ordinances, and others had shown great lukewarmness. And, in many instances, those Christian natives who took part with the heathen against the English, relapsed into heathenism.

However, Rev. O. Hadfield, under date of March 8, 1847, writes: "I certainly have a much stronger conviction of the reality of the hold that religion has upon the professing natives, since the late disturbances, than I had previously. Last winter, while war was going on in the neighborhood, Governor Gray visited Waikanae on the Lord's Day, and attended the native church and school. It was conducted by a native catechist, Levi Te Ahu, a man who has conducted himself invariably in the most Christian manner, ever since his conversion, seven years ago. On his return to Wellington, the governor came to me, and expressed himself as altogether astonished that such a change could have taken place in a barbarous people in so short a time. I believe that Christianity is extending itself in New Zealand."

At a missionary meeting of native teachers, held at Wanganui the day after Christmas, four of them offered themselves as missionaries to a heathen tribe at war with the English. On the 6th of February, 1847, they set out on their mission. Knowing that it was at the risk of their lives, they went directly to the hostile chiefs, preached to them the Gospel, and endeavored to dissuade them from their warfare; but on their way to the third, they were waylaid and murdered. Rev. Mr. Taylor soon after visited the tribe by whom this murder was committed, and had an interview with the chief. After a number of addresses on both sides, an agreement was made between Mr. Taylor, in behalf of the tribe to whom the murdered men belonged, and the chief of the tribe to whom the murderers belonged, that they should make peace with each other; Mr. T. assuring the latter that, as the former were Christians, they would not seek revenge. But he found some difficulty in restraining the Christian tribes, they were so indignant at the baseness of the act. Two other native teachers offered to go on a mission to the same tribe. One of them being dissuaded by his friends, replied: "What if a canoe be upset at sea? Will it hinder all other canoes from going to sea for fishing, lest they likewise should be upset? I shall go to Tupo, because the object is good—to make peace." He did go, with his associate, and they were well received.

In 1849, an institution was commenced by Rev. Mr. Burrows at the Waimate station, for training up native teachers. The institution opened with five pupils, and the hope was entertained that it would prove a great blessing to the mission.

To show the rapid growth of Christianity in these islands, we give the following table, showing the number of communicants in the eastern district, from the year 1840, when the church consisted entirely of natives who came from the Bay of Islands, principally as teachers.

1841 . . . 133	1846 . . . 1668
1842 . . . 451	1847 . . . 1960
1843 . . . 675	1848 . . . 2054
1844 . . . 946	1849 . . . 2893

Here we have illustrated the fact seen in almost all missionary history, that while during the first years of a mission the results are scarcely perceptible, and the prospects discouraging, yet, when the Gospel fairly gets a lodgment in the minds of a people, however desperate their case might seem, its progress will be rapid and powerful. After 20 years' labor in New-Zealand, the number of communicants reported was but 8, and they were all at one station; but here is an increase in ten years, in one district, from 29 to 2,893!

The Committee, in the report for 1852, state that the native population of New-Zealand is estimated at from 80,000 to 120,000; that more than three-fourths of these are Protestant Christians, and that those connected with Romanists do not exceed 5,000. The rest refuse to join any Christian party, though they have laid aside, for the most part, their heathen practices. The number of natives connected with the missions of this society may be estimated at 50,000, and of communicants between 5,000 and 6,000. And every one who is admitted to the Lord's table undergoes a strict examination, in presence of their native teachers and neighbors.

Since the appointment of the Bishop of New-Zealand, the mission has been put under the direction of a Central New-Zealand Committee, with the Bishop at its head.

The Church Missionary Record for October, 1853, contains the following general view of this mission. On the 8th of August, 1822, Rev. William Williams, now Archdeacon of New-Zealand, received his instructions, on his departure for the mission. On the 6th of August, 1853, the archdeacon's son, Rev. Leonard Williams, received the instructions of the committee on his departure for the same mission. The instructions delivered Aug. 8, 1822; expressly stated that there was not a single Christian convert among the natives of New-Zealand. At the present moment, the remnant of heathenism among them is so small as not to interfere with their being pronounced a Christian people. A corresponding influence has been exerted on their native character. Cannibalism is extinct, and the sanguinary spirit that gladly availed itself of every pretext to break forth in deeds of blood is laid. The New-Zealanders have exchanged the spear and club for the plowshare and the reaping-hook; and tribes which once wasted the districts of their neighbors, are diligently employed in cultivating their own. Christian Sabbaths and Christian ordinances are generally observed over the island, and this national profusion is inclusive of a large proportion of genuine godliness. If it be asked by what means this change has been accomplished, we answer, by the preaching and teaching of "Jesus Christ and him crucified;" and God's promised blessing on the same. The work has been a rapid one. Fifteen years back, the main portion of the island was lying in unbroken heathenism.

The following statement, taken from a recent number of the "Australian and New-Zealand Gazette," shows what has been done in a single district:

"Fourteen years ago the natives of Otaki were among the most dreaded classes of New-Zealand. Their leaders were Rauperaha and Rangihaita, par excellence the two most blood-thirsty men in the whole islands; men whose whole lives were literally spent in shedding blood, and as literally in drinking it, for both were determined cannibals, and gloried in what is now the shame of their followers.

"Mark the scene at Otaki at this day. The natives have built a church 80 feet long, 36 feet wide, and 40 feet high. Its principal beam they dragged 12 miles from the depth of their forests, the choicest tree therein. The pillars were brought from the same spot, and with the same amount of labor. The church is lighted with lanced-shaped windows, four of which occupy the east end. The railing of the communion table is elaborately carved by the natives, and those who know what their skill in carving is will bear us out in saying that the tabernacle work of many an English church is greatly inferior to that of the native church at Otaki. For the ground on which the church stands, the natives are indebted to the former cannibal, Te Ranperaha, who died a Christian.

"On the south side of the church stands the school, equally substantial with the church itself, and larger than the school in Wellington. The instruction here given is equal to that given in country places in England; in one respect superior, for the natives are taught music, of which they are exceedingly fond, 'looking forward to the music lesson as a regular treat.' Their teacher may not be a Costa, but he is a native who has become sufficiently skilled in the art, as taught at the Bishop's College, to become the instructor of others.

"But the native boys are widely scattered; and, therefore, on the west side of the church, stands a boarding-house for the boys attending the school. The dining-hall—native work too—is 50 feet by 25, and 15 feet high. The building contains dormitories for 100 children, who will be received in this establishment, educated, clothed and fed. On the north side of the church will stand a similar building for native girls. The cost of this was defrayed by the natives, who have also erected the whole, with the assistance of an English carpenter.

"The school possesses a valuable estate, given by the old cannibal chiefs. Of this estate 60 acres are cleared and thoroughly drained; 20 acres are cropped with wheat, and another portion with potatoes. The establishment already numbers 70 head of cattle, four iron plows, and four teams of oxen; the lads being the plowmen. Portions of the estate are let to other natives, who pay their rent in produce, and pasture on the estate 200 head of cattle, and 70 horses. The cost of all the buildings is between £5,000 and £6,000, of which the government has, at different times, contributed £2,000; the remainder, as well as materials and labor, has been found by the natives themselves.

"One of the most enterprising patrons of this establishment is the former savage Rangit-haiata himself, who has survived Te Ranperaha, his partner in the wholesale slaughter of his species. What this slaughter was may be judged by one instance. Where the Canterbury settlement now stands, 20 years ago stood a large pa, peopled by a numerous and happy population. An English ruffian, for hire, carried the above chiefs and their forces in the hold of his vessel to the present Lyttelton. On the pretence of trade the natives were thrown off their guard and became an easy prey to Te Ranperaha and his followers, who did not leave a man alive. The women were carried into slavery or eaten.

"On the voyage back the ship's coppers were used for cooking human joints, the people being slain on board as they were wanted. The ruffian commander of the English vessel admitted this. Yet from those very chiefs mentioned as the leaders of this fearful slaughter, and from their followers, have sprung the Otaki church and schools.

"Many of our readers will remember Pirahawa, long the guest of Mr. Halswell, at Kensington. That man was, when a youth, one of the perpetrators of the horrible massacre we have just spoken of. He was, while with Mr. Halswell, educated at the British and Foreign School, through the influence of Dr. Hodgkin, and is now a pioneer of civilization in the responsible post of chief of the native police in the Wellington district. The above progress of civilization among savages is unparalleled in history; but these savages far surpass all others in intellectual character. Despite the former cruelties of the race, toward each other, it would be difficult to find a New-Zealander of the superior caste—for there are two distinct races—upon whose features it is not unmistakably stamped that he is one of 'nature's gentlemen.' The inferior caste are the aborigines of the islands, who have little in common with their superiors beyond their cunning at a bargain."

The following table gives the statistics of the mission, as they appeared in the report of the society for 1853:

SOCIETY FOR PROPAGATING THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS.—This Society's first missionary to New-Zealand was sent out in 1839. Eight are now maintained by an annual grant of £1,000, placed at the disposal of the bishop. Since the appointment of the bishop, the society has paid £7,000 to meet an equal amount given by the New-Zealand Company for the permanent endowment of the church. This grant has been the means of endowing three chaplains in perpetuity.

WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—In the year 1819, the Wesleyan Missionary Society had a young man (Mr. Samuel Leigh) stationed at New South Wales. Having suffered in his health, he was advised by Mr. Marsden to visit New-Zealand, which he did. He became acquainted with the missionaries, who had been introduced by Mr. Marsden; saw the natives, and witnessed many horrible scenes of cannibalism; and was so affected with the appearance of things as to cherish an ardent desire to commence a Wesleyan mission in the country. The excellent brethren of the Church of England supported and encouraged him in his project. He returned home to England; obtained the sanction and authority of the executive committee; and in 1821 returned with Mrs. Leigh for New-Zealand.

At the request of one of the most influential chiefs, Mr. Leigh determined to fix his residence at Mercury Bay, near the river Thames, but this design was frustrated by the outbreak of a war, in consequence of which, he and his excellent wife were under the necessity of remaining for some time at the Church Missionary settlement, where they employed themselves in acquiring the language and instructing the natives, as they had opportunity.

Mr. Leigh's simplicity, courage and hardihood eminently fitted him for the work to which he was called; but mere natural resources would have utterly failed in such scenes. He had faith in his Divine Master, and in his gracious declaration, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." And this was his strength and stay when human fortitude and endurance would have utterly failed him. He dared their pointed muskets; stood undaunted while clubs were sometimes whirled around his head and spears were thrust close by his side, and felt that he only lived from hour to hour, as sustained by the invisible power of God. He mingled with the people in their villages and huts; bartered with them for animal food, having been four months without any; conversed with them in the most familiar manner, and endeavored to win their confidence as well as sound the depth of their superstitions. At length he was joined by the brethren Turner and White, and the whole mission party proceeded to Wangaroa, on the north-east coast, and north of the Bay of Islands, where they were received with apparent kindness by the chief, George. This

George was a very notorious person. In the year 1809 he had cut off the crew and passengers of the "Boyd," a fine ship of five hundred tons burden; on which occasion, at least seventy persons were murdered and feasted upon by the blood-thirsty savages, and the ship was burnt down to the water's edge. From this time George had a lurking fear of the Europeans, though for selfish purposes he wished to have traffic with them, even to the extent of encouraging, in some degree, their settlement in the country. But the vague idea of a possible retribution overtaking him, made him distrustful, overbearing, and violent; and the missionaries, while endeavoring to erect their temporary dwelling by the aid of hired native labor, were subjected to endless trouble and annoyance. He came and drove the natives away; used ill-language to Mr. Turner; threatened to level the house to the ground, and said it was his; but all this turbulence was to obtain some gift or gratuity. Afterwards three spades were forcibly taken away by some of his people. Others came in canoes, with fencing timber for sale, which Mr. Turner bought of them, making payment in various articles of hardware, though almost bewildered by their violence and vociferation. Another of the chiefs brought a pig for which he had previously received payment; but he demanded to be paid again. Mr. Turner did not yield at first, but afterwards gave him an iron pot, which he coveted, when he claimed another article also. This was refused, and he fell into a violent passion, dashed the pot to pieces, followed Mr. Turner, who was leaving him, and with all the rage of a fiend pointed his musket twice to shoot him, but was restrained by an invisible hand. However, he pushed Mr. Turner very roughly about, until Mr. Hobbs, the assistant missionary came up. He charged them with the design of making the New-Zealanders slaves; and said, the only thing they gave him was Karakia ("prayers,") upon which he poured the greatest contempt. He did not want to hear about Christ; he wanted muskets, powder, tomahawks, tobacco, and the like. He then went back to the house, and threatened to kill Mrs. Turner and the servants; saying, he would serve the whole mission family as his people had served the crew of the "Boyd." The maid screamed with terror, but Mrs. Turner preserved her composure; and when the excited savage had taken several articles from the mission store, she took them back from him with calm resolution, and felt her mind kept in peace, being stayed on God. After a while the storm ceased, but such scenes often occurred during their first month's residence at Wangaroa. One morning the missionaries heard that the heads of an adjacent tribe had killed one of their own slaves, and were preparing to eat the body. Mr. Turner went down to the place, and found the chiefs sitting round the fire, and apparently glad to see him. After the usual salute he went towards the fire, and found to his horror a human being laid at length, and roasting between two logs. He told them that his heart was very sore at such a sight; and as guilt and shame were evidently depicted on their countenances, he made use of the opportunity severely to rebuke this enormity, warning them of the just judgments of Almighty God.

The natives, who disliked toil, could not be induced, even in their most friendly moods, to build a school-house; and therefore the missionaries were content for a while, in their fine climate, to collect the people and their children in the open air, and there teach them letters, catechisms, prayers, and hymns. Nor were their efforts fruitless; for many of the New-Zealanders have dated their first impressions from these primitive exercises. Towards the end of 1824 the mission premises were pretty well completed. They stood upon a jutting point of land on the south side of a beautiful vale, through which ran a fine serpentine river of fresh water, before emptying itself beyond into a safe and commodious harbor. The vale was bounded by hills and mountains of almost every size and form, generally covered with excellent pines, many of which were from 60 to 100 feet to the lowest branch, and from three to six feet in diameter. The soil of the valley was exceedingly rich. The missionaries, having purchased the land, had built a good wooden house, with brick chimney—the bricks having been made on the premises, and the lime obtained by calcining cockle-shells. They cleared about three acres of ground, enclosed it with a log fence, sowed it with wheat and barley, and likewise set out a good garden with vegetables and fruit trees: all these were for the mission families. Besides this the missionaries had, with their own hands, at two of the principal villages, raised buildings to the honor and service of God, and for the purposes of his worship. By this time the natives began to listen with attention; the children were learning to read in their own language; and Mrs. Turner's girls began to make progress in needle-work. The little settlement was visited by Messrs. Bennet and Tyerman, the deputation of the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, by whom the brethren were greatly cheered. The missionaries had been instrumental in quelling an outbreak of jealousy on the part of the natives in their ship, while she was lying off the shore, and thereby saving their lives. Prospects of usefulness seemed to be opening in a very pleasing manner, when, all at once, a dark cloud gathered around them. A fresh series of native outbreaks took place, which ended in the total destruction of the mission premises and property; and the suspension for a while of the mission itself.

About this time an English ship, the Mercury, had been taken and plundered by the natives of the Bay of Islands, which was afterwards rescued and conducted out to sea by two of the missionaries. The natives were apprehensive of retribution from other English vessels, and this made them jealous of the missionaries. The chief, George, was now dangerously ill, and likely to die. His father had been killed in the affair of the Boyd; and it was reported that George had requested the natives of Hokianga, in case of his death, to come and strip the Wangaroa Wesleyan missionaries of every thing they possessed, if not to kill them, as utu, or "payment," for the death of his father, for which he said he had never received satisfaction. The death of a chief is a day of reckoning, when all the quarrels of his life have to be avenged. These sources of uneasiness made the more wicked natives very overbearing and annoying. They broke over the mission fence and committed petty depredations on the property; and on being reasoned with, proceeded to acts of violence against Mr. Turner and his assistants, assaulting him with spears, and menacing his life. But God protected him.

The Church missionaries evinced the liveliest sympathy with their Wesleyan brethren; and with true Christian love, the Rev. Messrs. Williams and Kemp came over, and urged that at least Mrs. Turner and the little ones should be removed to one of their settlements for a season. They were removed accordingly to Mr. Kemp's, at Kerikeri, where they received every kindness and attention; but nothing could induce Mr. Turner and his fellow-laborers to forsake their posts. For a time their circumstances were most critical; but they endured hardness as good soldiers, and repaid evil with good; till at length the old chief, George, sunk under his malady, and died. The people upon whom had devolved the task of exacting satisfaction for the death of his father, according to his last will, assembled to deliberate, and for that purpose approached the mission premises; but, after they had spent some time in mutual conference, they agreed to accept the blood of a bird as a sufficient compensation. One of the party then jumped over into the mission premises, bore off a duck, and killed it as a sacrifice to the manes of the chief's father. Mrs. Turner and the children now returned to Wangaroa, and it was hoped all would be well; but very soon far worse troubles arose. The valley of Wangaroa was suddenly invaded by Shungoe, one of the most sanguinary New-Zealand chieftains. On the 4th of January, 1827, while the mission family were engaged in domestic worship, they received intelligence of his approach. For several days all was alarm and confusion. Canoes began to drop down the river, bearing the natives to the various scenes of conflict. Early on the morning of the 10th a party of natives were descried by the servant, approaching the mission-house

The missionaries had hardly time to put on their clothes, when twenty savages, armed with muskets, spears, hatchets, &c., entered the mission-ground, and were proceeding towards the house. It was demanded of them what they wanted. Oro, the chief, said, "We are come to make a fight; your chief has fled, your people have left the place, you will be stripped of all your property before noon; therefore instantly begone." At the same time he gave orders to his party to commence the work of spoliation. They fired several guns as a signal; and others came and joined them.

Mr. Turner began to prepare for quitting the place, though he lingered to the last extremity, from his reluctance to leave a spot upon which he had bestowed so much labor and care. The native youths who had been under the instruction of the missionaries were much alarmed, and urged a speedy departure, begging that they might be allowed to accompany the family. At 6 o'clock in the morning, when all hope of remaining in safety was extinct, the sorrowful and affrighted household began to move, saving scarcely anything from the wreck but the clothes they wore, and a change or two for the children. The company, apart from the native young people, consisted of Mr. and Mrs. Turner, three children, the youngest of whom was an infant five weeks old; Luke Wade, the assistant, and his wife; Mr. Hobbs, and Miss Davis, a young lady from the Church settlement of Paihia, who had come to spend a few weeks on a visit. Their flight was most perilous, through scrub and fern, drenched with heavy dew, and obliged to ford the river with the helpless children in their arms. Behind were blood-thirsty savages, who were only restrained from murder by their selfish fears; and all around were hovering hostile parties, who, from various motives, were quite ready to exterminate, in this time of excitement, the mission household; but, looking to God for help and deliverance, the fugitives directed their steps toward Kerikeri, the nearest Church settlement. As they went on they were met by one of their own principal men, and also a very friendly old chief, Ware Nui, from the Bay of Islands. To the latter Mr. Turner made his appeal for help and protection, to which he immediately responded, and all the group moved on under his guidance. Twice more they crossed the river, and on turning a sharp bend of the channel, all at once they came upon a formidable body of fighting natives from the Hokiangas, orderly, compact, and ready for action, variously armed, but chiefly with muskets and bayonets. They were headed by several chiefs, the principal of whom was Patuone, long known to be most friendly to Europeans. He caught a glance of the missionaries, and loudly called upon his people to stop. He then invited them to sit down, and came with several of his principal companions and rubbed noses with the fugitives in token of friendship and good-will. After some words of explanation between the several chiefs, they formed a guard around the mission party, and then commanded the armed band to march forward to the other side of the river; thus another peril was passed. The travelers then plunged into the woods. Soon after they were met by a party from Paihia, consisting of the Rev. H. Williams, Messrs. Davis, Richey, and a dozen natives. The Apostle Paul at "the Appii Forum and the Three Taverns," could hardly have more fervently thanked God and gladly taken courage, than the Wesleyan missionaries here. From these excellent persons, and at Kerikeri, where they soon arrived, they received every kindness that sympathy and Christian brotherhood could suggest. On Thursday, Jan. 17, they removed to the Paihia settlement, where they remained until the captain of the ship "Rosanna," hearing of the disasters of the mission party, most kindly offered them a passage to Sydney; and thus they removed to the colony, and for a while the mission was suspended. While they were sheltered at Paihia, the Hokianga party, whom they had met on the 10th, proceeded to Wangaroa, came in conflict with the plunderers at the mission-house, who belonged to Shungee's people, drove them away with savage fury, and seized upon the remainder of the booty themselves; burned the house and barn, with the wheat crop in straw, to ashes; killed the cattle, goats, and poultry; and, worst of all, the body of Mrs. Turner's infant child, which had died and been buried there, they dug up for the purpose of obtaining the blanket or wrapper in which they supposed the tender babe had been buried, and left the cherished remains of this little one to moulder on the surface amid the other monuments of this sad and desolating outbreak.

Patuone, the chief who interposed on behalf of Mr. Turner's family, and shielded them from native violence as they fled from Wangaroa, seems never to have been easy at the removal of the Wesleyan missionaries. Towards the latter end of the year 1827, he earnestly invited them to return; and they, not wishing to entertain the thought of finally abandoning the country, very willingly accepted the invitation; and in January, 1828, we find them established at Mangungu, on the river Hokianga, in Patuone's district. This locality was selected in mutual council with the Church missionaries, and purchased and paid for to the satisfaction of the natives. The soil was suitable for the production of such articles as were needed; and a vessel of 500 tons might lie opposite within 100 yards of the premises.

So far this mission had been one of sorrow and discouragement. Ten years of hard toil and danger had been passed through, and much money expended, and yet up to the year

1830, there seemed to be no visible results. But the faith of the missionaries was unshaken, and they were resolved to persevere. We now come to a turn of affairs. The Gospel day began to dawn, and the glorious light has been brightening ever since. During the year just mentioned, the natives had narrowly watched the brethren, keenly scrutinized their temper and conduct, and become convinced that they were real friends, who only sought to do them good. They now began to hear instruction with great attention, and to renounce their superstitions. One of the missionaries writes, May 26th, 1834: "On the preceding Sabbath the native chapel was crowded to excess, and great numbers had to sit outside, all panting for the Word of Life. Such was the desire to get there in the evening, that they almost trampled on each other, and some of them had come in canoes from places forty miles distant, and anxiety for salvation appeared to possess a great proportion of this interesting multitude. Their earnest singing, prayers, attention to their classes, and other ordinances of religion, left no doubt on the minds of the missionaries as to their sincerity. In reverential behavior in the house of God they were a pattern even to Europeans; almost every Saturday some eminent stranger would arrive, in order to be ready for worship on the Sabbath, and would there profess his attachment to Christianity; wherever missionaries went on errands of mercy to the surrounding villages, the natives were all ready to receive them; and it was manifest that a glorious work was breaking forth in New-Zealand."

Several chiefs and other natives had declared in favor of Christianity. Tawai and Miti, the former one of the most celebrated and successful warriors in the land, with some old gray-headed cannibals, were sitting "at the feet of Jesus," anxious to learn and ready to do the will of God. Various alterations had now taken place in the mission establishment. Mr. Hobbs had been removed by the committee for a while, to the Friendly Islands, to strengthen the work there. But Mr. Whitely and Mr. Wallis, with their wives, had been sent out to New-Zealand to join in occupying those gracious openings which now seemed so numerous and promising; and these were joined in 1836 by Mr. N. Turner, who returned from Van Dieman's land to the scene of his former labors and sufferings. In 1836 and 1837, Mr. and Mrs. Woon and Mr. and Mrs. Buller were respectively appointed. A printing-press was employed, under the management of Mr. Woon, in supplying the mission with books for circulation.

At this time native teachers were extensively employed, so far as their gifts and graces qualified them for the work, initiating missionary operations in the interior and along the coast. They were visited by the brethren at the head stations of Mangunga, Newark and Kaipara, as often as possible, and were thus more fully instructed in the way of the Lord. No less than five deputations came to Mangunga and Kaipara, from the south, to request missionaries, bearing tidings that the natives had already built themselves several chapels, and begun regularly to assemble and worship God, according to their best knowledge.

In 1839, an attempt was made to pass through the British Parliament a measure for the colonization of New-Zealand. The missionaries of the Church and Wesleyan Missionary Societies, believing that some of the provisions in this measure would compromise the character of England, by violating the independence of the New-Zealanders, and prove detrimental to the labors of the missionaries, earnestly entreated the committees of those societies to petition the Parliament against that bill.

In 1840, the Wesleyan Society sent six additional missionaries to New-Zealand, in the missionary ship Triton, to strengthen the older stations, and to answer some of those calls for new stations.

The Rev. John Bumby was one of this reinforcement. Having been eminently useful in home circuits, he offered himself for the missionary work; and in March, 1839, landed in New-Zealand, where he labored with great zeal, diligence and enterprise, until June 26, 1840, when he was drowned by the upsetting of a canoe in the Bay of Thames. His missionary career was short, but laborious and self-denying. He was the first Wesleyan minister whose life had fallen a sacrifice in the New-Zealand mission.

When the New-Zealand mission was commenced at Wangaroa, there was no written or printed book in that language. In a comparatively short period, however, the missionaries were able to hold conversations with the people, and to form schools for the instruction of the children; and they were cheered by the effects of their labors soon becoming apparent among both young and old. In 1842, the following works had issued from the mission press: 5,000 Scripture lessons; 3,000 copies of an elementary school-book; 6,700 catechisms, and prayers and hymns. At this period, the missionaries occupied 13 stations; there were 3,259 persons in church-fellowship, and 4,000 children in the schools. The British and Foreign Bible Society had also sent out 15,000 copies of the New-Zealand Testament from England. However, neither the liberality of friends at home, nor the labors of the mission press, could keep pace with the progress of the natives, and the increasing demand for teachers and books. The natives were also rapidly adopting the manners and habits of civilized life. Many of the chiefs appeared dressed like gentlemen, and supported the character by their behavior.

About the middle of 1842, the Rev. Dr. Selwyn arrived as Bishop of New-Zealand. As he was known to possess "High Church principles," the missionaries, especially the Wesleyans, foreboded evil from the possible rise of new controversies in the infant community. These forebodings were too soon realized; for the bishop began to teach and enforce the doctrines of baptismal regeneration and apostolical succession, as understood and explained by the High Church party; thereby casting discredit upon all ministers not episcopally ordained, and by implication denying the validity especially of the pastoral acts of the Wesleyan missionaries. This was a serious hindrance to the work of God. The missionaries of the Wesleyan Society and the Church brethren had labored together hitherto, in the utmost harmony and love; and it was with the greatest reluctance that the Wesleyan missionaries were compelled to act on the defensive, against the hostility of that church which the bishop represented. The Great Head of the Church had put his seal upon their labors, and they could turn to thousands of converted New-Zealanders, rescued from cannibalism and sin, and say, "Ye are our epistles." As the Wesleyan flock was disturbed and scattered by these dissensions, the Rev. H. H. Hanson Turton, at Taranaki, deemed it his duty to address a spirited, yet Christian remonstrance to Dr. Selwyn on the subject, in three letters, published some time afterward in one of the country newspapers. There was no great amount of sympathy with this exclusivism, however, in the colony generally; and as mutual difficulties multiplied, Dr. Selwyn acquired juster views of the Wesleyan cause, and these ill-judged and divisive proceedings were gradually abated; not, however, without weakening that blessed bond of attachment and respect which had formerly united both societies.

On the 30th of March 1842, the Rev. John Waterhouse, of Hobart Town, the General Superintendent, was summoned to his eternal rest. His last sickness was brought on by exposure to the heavy rains of Van Dieman's Land; but his death was eminently edifying and triumphant.

In Kaipara, two circumstances of a most gratifying character have lately transpired, both illustrating the value of Christian missions. On occasion of the distressing shipwreck of a vessel belonging to the French navy, nearly 200 persons were cast naked and destitute upon the shores of New-Zealand, about thirty miles to the north of Kaipara Heads. They constructed temporary huts upon the beach, and sent out a party in quest of help, which, after two days, fell in with a few natives from Okaro, who received them kindly, and encouraged them to send for the main body of sufferers to refresh themselves at the Christian village. Accordingly they came, and received from a people, who a few years before would have murdered and perhaps eaten them, a kind and Christian welcome. The Union Jack was hoisted on the approach of the party, and the houses, the blankets, and the provisions of the natives were placed at their service for about ten days, until arrangements could be made for their removal. For this hospitality they neither asked nor desired a recompense: but the Lieutenant-Governor of New-Zealand, knowing how largely their winter stores had been encroached upon by this unexpected demand, gave them his high commendation, and a handsome present likewise. It is hoped and believed that the unfortunate Frenchmen would carry with them to Tahiti a practical lesson of the value of Protestant missionary labors.

Nor is it only for the bodies of their fellow-men that these newly reclaimed savages have learned to care. Concern for their own souls has taught them the value of the souls of others; and their own experience of Gospel blessings has made them solicitous for the evangelization of the world. Few missionary documents possess a higher interest for the thoughtful mind than a narrative forwarded by Mr. Bullers, of a missionary meeting held at this place. About 300 natives were assembled. The Lord's Supper was celebrated on the Lord's day, and a love-feast on Tuesday morning concluded the services. Monday was occupied by the missionary meeting, at which 16 native speakers bore their testimony to the value of the Gospel, and urged on their brethren the duty and privilege of contributing to the Missionary Society. A collection of £13 bore witness that they did not plead in vain. But the true value of the meeting must not be estimated by the collection. The strong sense, the cogent arguments, the clear perception of Christian duty, the union of purpose, and the grateful acknowledgment of their obligations to British Christians, which marked the proceedings of the meeting, gave to it a high importance, both as a trophy of the past and a pledge of the future.

In 1845 and 1846, the gracious spirit of awakening that spread over all the Wesleyan stations in the South Sea, visited also the stations in New-Zealand; and a great extension of the Redeemer's kingdom was the consequence. The Wesleyan Institution for training a native ministry was established in 1844, making the second of these institutions in New-Zealand. And about the same time, a college and seminary were also established at Auckland, the capital, for the purpose of educating the children of the missionaries who are stationed in Australia, New-Zealand, and the islands of the South Sea.

Neat and commodious chapels were raised in all the peopled localities around the principal stations, and thus those stations became circuits, as in England; native young men, in great numbers, as soon as their piety and in telligence were of an order to warrant such an arrangement, were sent forth among their heathen countrymen, to lead them to the knowledge of the truth. An awful earthquake which happened in Wellington, October 14, 1848, destroying some lives and much property, was the means, in the Divine hand, of greatly deepening the serious impressions.

Such are the present results and aspect of the New-Zealand mission. It is a territory that has been won for Christ by the united exertions of the Wesleyan and Church of England missionaries. To the Wesleyans especially, it has been a sphere of unparalleled toil, carried on for 33 years, at the cost of several thousands a year, and yet yielding glorious fruit. The fields are "white unto the harvest," and Christian reapers are filling their arms with the sheaves.

It yet remains to be seen whether the aborigines will be borne down and lost under the surging tide of colonial immigration, or whether they will stand like a rock amid it all. Native tribes have generally disappeared where mere aggressive or commercial colonization has taken place; but here, where cupidity has received a check, where the clear lines of right have been revealed, where the native mind has been elevated, and the trading spirit overawed by a more than usual amount of Christian influence and appliances, the results may prove more cheering. Wise and experienced men, such as the senior missionaries, give it as their opinion, that the slave population of New-Zealand, the lowest in the physical scale, will die off and become extinct; while the chieftain families, changed in their habits, and raised by religion and educational training, will be preserved and increase, partly, and for a while, as a separate people, and then perhaps, ultimately, as commingled with the Europeans of the country.

Their euphonious but poor language is now impressed with great Gospel conceptions, with words that shall stir the hearts of generations yet to come. With them the Sabbath is "a delight and honorable;" and, notwithstanding the number of those who still "walk according to the course of the world," there is nothing to hinder the ordinary progress of the Gospel through this fine and interesting country, or to prevent it from becoming a fair, prosperous, and Christian land.—Barrett's Life of Bunby; Wesleyan Notices, and Annual Reports.—REV. NEYOOR: A station of the London Missionary Society, at the southern extremity of Hindostan, in the Travancore district.

NGATANGAI: A station of the London Missionary Society on the island of Rarotonga, one of the Hervey Islands.

NGABANTANG: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in Sierra Leone.

NGAMOTU: A station of the Wesleyans in New-Zealand.

NICOMEDIA: An out-station of the American Board among the Armenians, situated at the head of a gulf bearing the same name, stretching out from the eastern extremity of the sea of Marmora, about 50 miles east of Constantinople. It was formerly the capital of Bythia, and was also the residence of Constantine, and several of his successors, at least during a part of each year. Here Dioclesian also held his court, when he issued his first edicts against the Christians, and here the horrid work of persecution first began. Population 30,000; of which 6,000 are Armenians.

NINE: One of the New Hebrides, where is a station of the London Missionary Society.

NINGPO: One of the five ports in China open to European and American commerce, situated in lat. $29^{\circ} 55' N.$, and long. $121^{\circ} 22' E.$, on the river Tatsieh, 12 miles from the sea. Several societies have missions there. (See China.)

NINA TUBU-TABA (KEPPEL'S ISLAND): One of the remote out-islands of the Friendly Isles, occupied by the Wesleyans with native teachers.

NINA-FO-OU (SAVAGE ISLAND): This island is about 130 miles from Keppel's Island. It is a cinder island, every portion of it bearing marks of fire. It is occupied by native teachers, as a station of the Wesleyan Society.

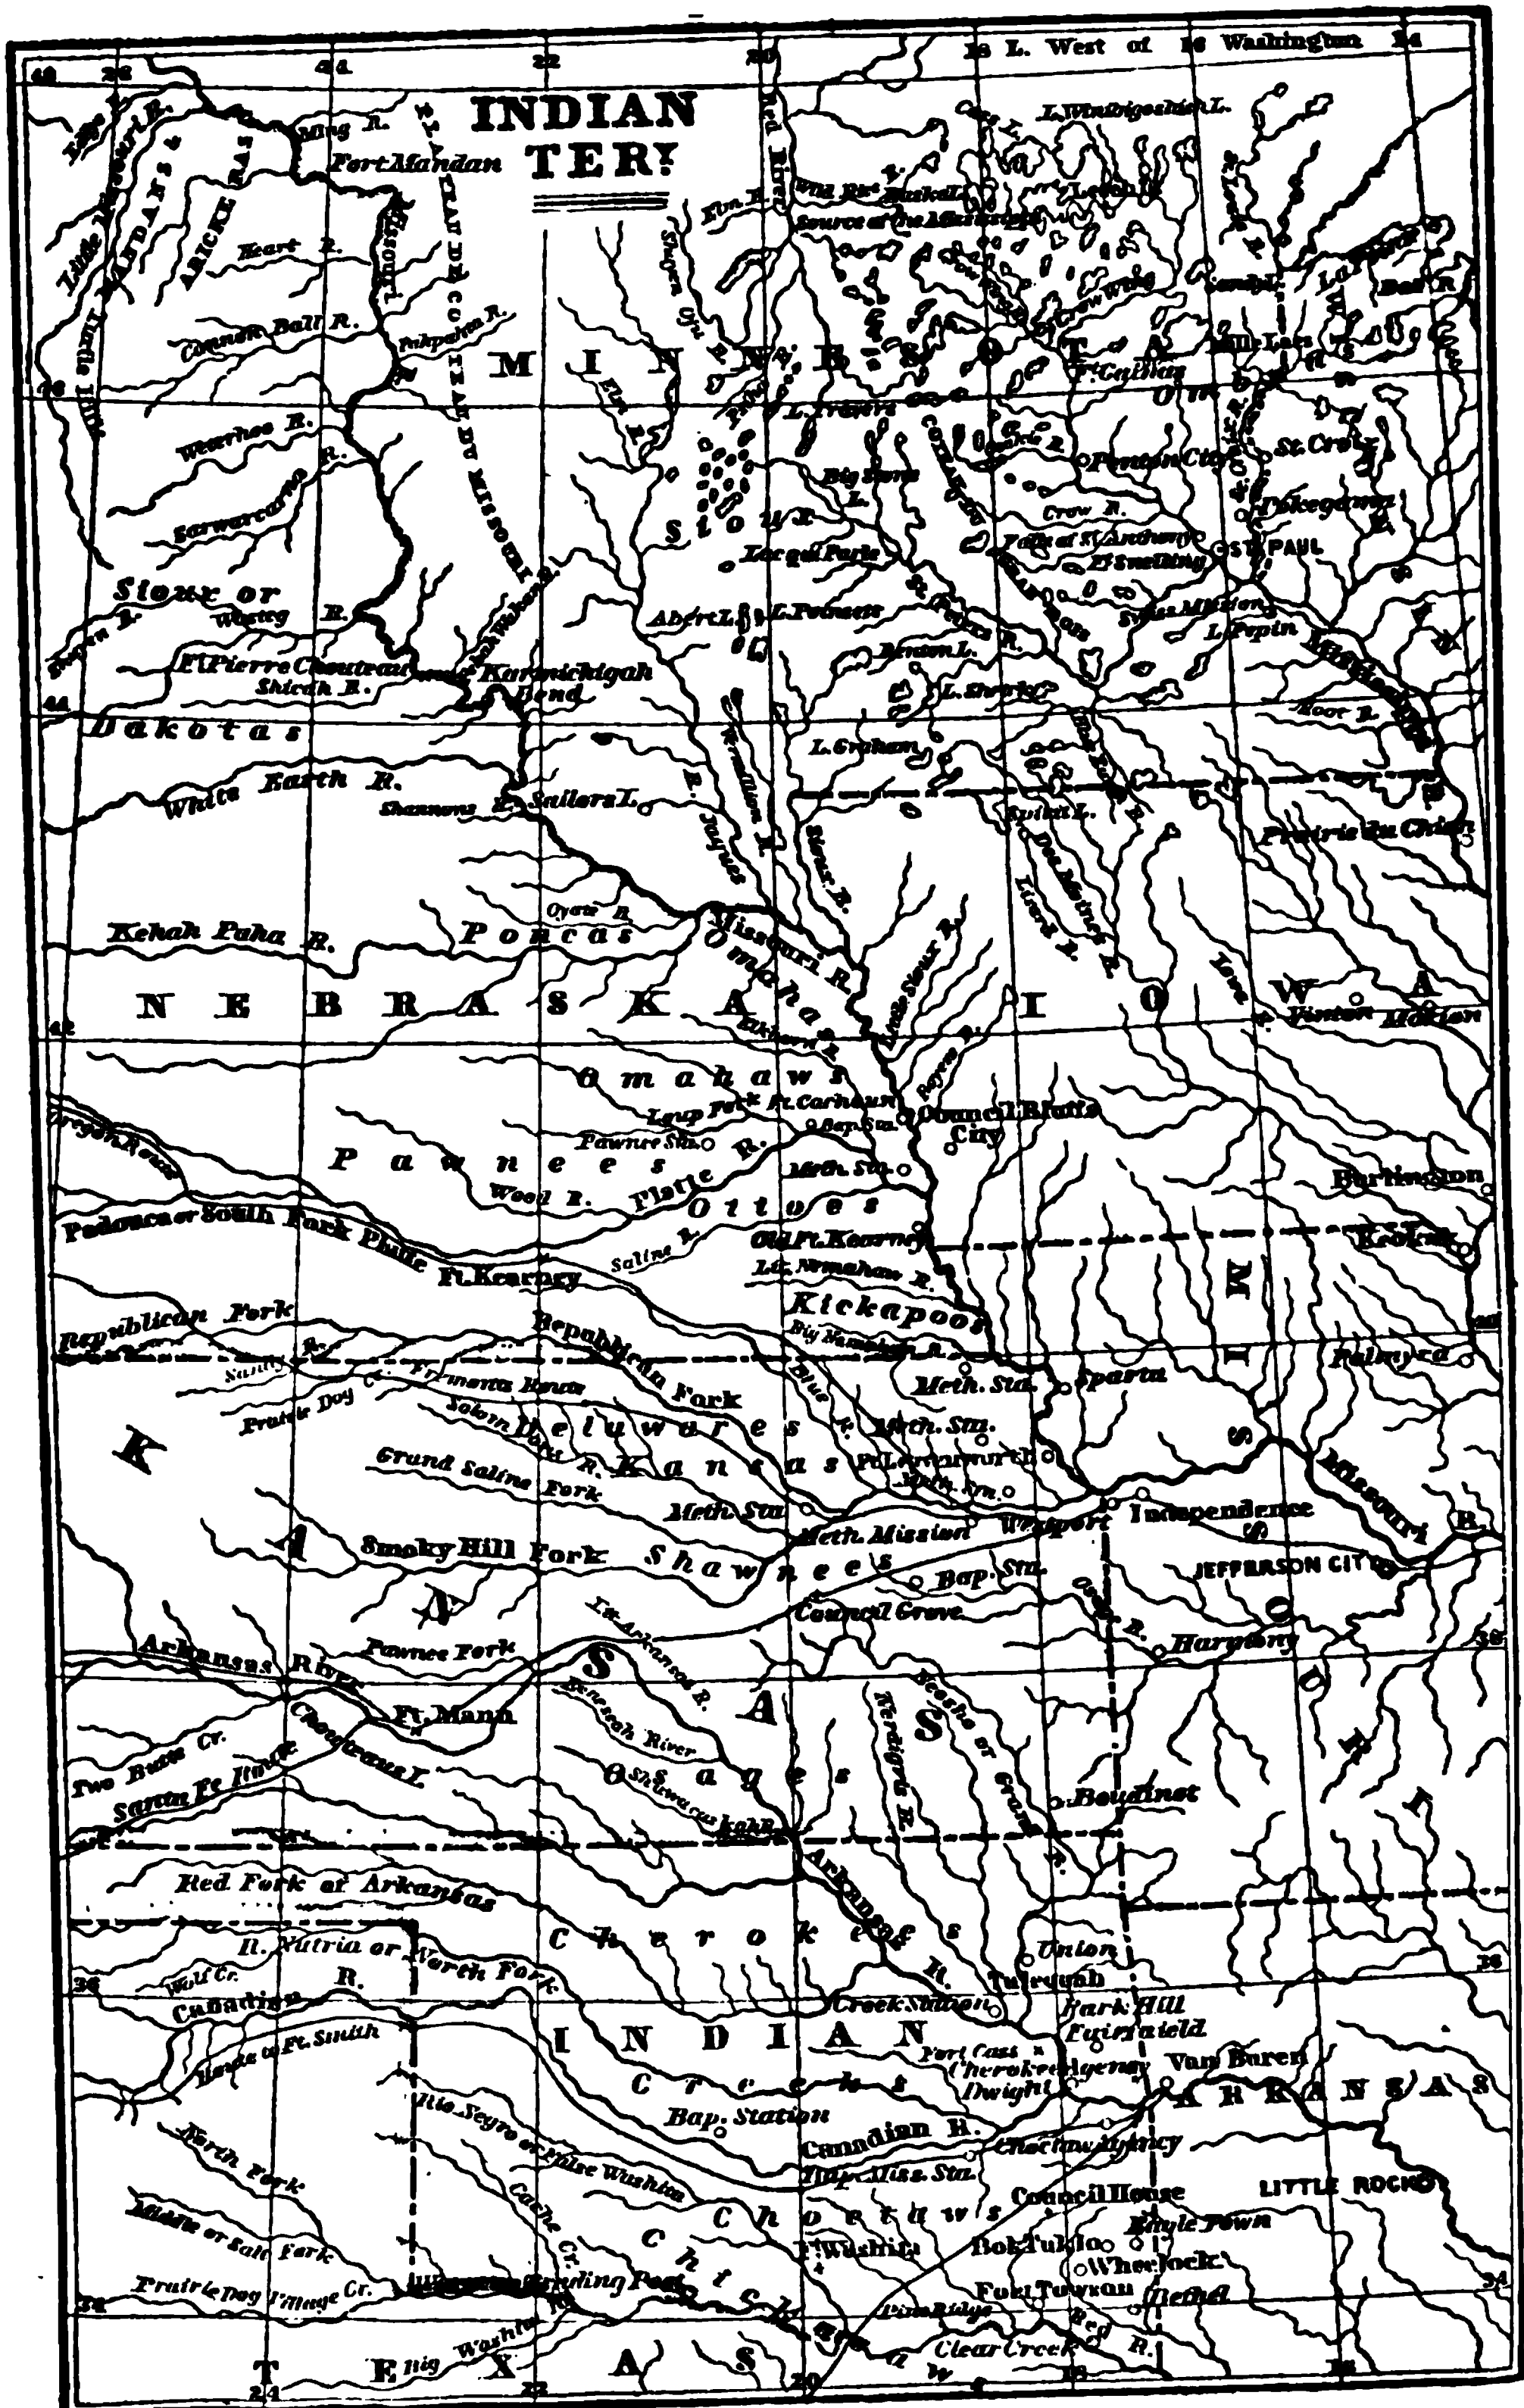

NISBET BATH: The seat of an extensive district in Namaqualand, South Africa, occupied by a mission of the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

NORTH AMERICAN INDIANS: The American Indians of this day may be divided into two classes,—those who are now partially civilized, and live in a somewhat settled state, and those who are yet savage. They are all the remnants of once powerful nations. Some of them are found in the western part of the State of New York, some in Michigan, but the larger portion of them live in the territory west of the Mississippi river, known as the "Indian reservation," a territory lying west of the States of Arkansas and Missouri, between Red river on the south, and Platte river on the north, being about 500 miles in length from north to south, and about three hundred miles in breadth from east to west. Here are collected together the remnants of the Chickasaws, Choctaws, Creeks, Seminoles, Cherokees, Osages, Wyandots, Putawatomes, Weas, Pianke-shaws, Peorias, Kaskaskias, Ottawas, Chippewas, Shawnees, Kansas, Delawares, Kickapoos, Iowas, Foxes and Sacs, Otoes, and Missouries. Immediately north of the reservation, the Omahas, and some other tribes have an uncertain abode. And as we look up to the Minnesota, and to the north and west of that territory, we shall find the Sioux, the Ojibwas, and others. And further west, to the Rocky mountains, and over that barrier to Oregon, and then to California, and out through the northern and western parts of Texas, we shall encounter many savage tribes where property and life would not yet be safe. Most of the Indian tribes now living on the reservation, once lived east of the Mississippi river, and some of them in the Atlantic States. It was supposed that the interests of these States demanded their removal, and it was urged, and finally carried by the General Government. It was a hard case, and the right of it has been very justly questioned. It has, however, been overruled for good.

MISSIONS.

PRESBYTERIAN BOARD.—An Indian Mission, under direction of the Presbyterian Church, was commenced in 1833, by the "Western Foreign Missionary Society," and established among the Weas, a small band, of not over two or three hundred persons, who occupied a part of the reservation, near its northern boundary. The Rev. Joseph Kerr, and the Rev. Wells Bushnell, and their wives, with several teachers, both male and female, labored here in a faithful and self-denying manner, and much good was accomplished. But another denomination established a mission in a small kindred tribe near by, and it was thought expedient to relinquish this. At the present time the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church have missions among the Chickasaws, Choctaws, Creeks, and Seminoles, who occupy the southern part of the reservation; the Iowas and Sacs, near the northern part; the Omahas and Otoes, in the vicinity of Council Bluffs, on the Missouri river; and some bands of the Chippewas and Ottawas, on the Grand and Little Traverse Bays, in Michigan. The Iowa and Sac Mission is the oldest on this list, having been established in 1835. At that time the Iowas numbered about 1100 souls, and the Sacs about 500. They have decreased since that, owing principally to intemperance, which has grown upon them from their intercourse with the whites, from whom they are separated only by the Missouri river. Still the missionaries have prosecuted their work among this people, and done good, though in the face of great discouragements. The language of the Iowas was reduced to writing in 1843, when a grammar was prepared, portions of the Scriptures translated, a hymn-book, and some elementary works prepared and published. It is deemed however most expedient to teach the natives English at once, and thus give them access to the whole range of our literature. In 1846 a boarding-school was established, which continues in operation.

Next in date is the mission among the Chippewa and Ottawa tribes, in the State of Michigan. This mission was commenced in 1838, by the Rev. Peter Dougherty. A church was organized in 1843, to which over thirty natives have been admitted. Two stations are now occupied by this mission, one at Great Traverse bay, where a small boarding-school is established, and the other at Little Traverse bay, where there is a flourishing day-school. A further notice of this mission will be found at the conclusion of this article.

The mission among the Creek Indians was next established, and was commenced in 1842, by the Rev. Robert M. Loughridge. The Creek Indians number over 20,000 souls, and the district of country which they occupy lies in the Indian Territory, directly west of the State of Arkansas, between the Choctaw district on the south, and the Cherokee on the north. Missionaries had been sent among this people in former years, by different societies, but their labors not being altogether acceptable they left the country, and for several years no missionary had resided in the Creek nation. Mr. Loughridge spent some months in 1841 and 1842, in visiting the leading chiefs of the nation, explaining fully his object, and securing their confidence and coöperation. The result was a written agreement signed by both parties, in which the chiefs agreed on their part to allow him and others free access to the people, to teach them, and to preach the Gospel, granting lands for all necessary mission premises, &c., Mr. Loughridge engaging for himself and others, that they would not interfere with the government schools, nor with the national affairs. Mr. Loughridge then returned, and in the early part of 1843, went on with his wife. He was most cordially received by the natives, and was soon settled in his new home. A church was organized in January, 1845, and a boarding-school was established in the same year. A second station was formed in 1848, and a large building erected for a boarding-school. The whole missionary work in the Creek nation is in successful progress.

The mission among the Choctaws is next in date. The Choctaw people are perhaps more like a Christian nation than any other Indian tribe. Missions were commenced among them by the American Board in 1818, while they were living east of the Mississippi river, and one of their early missionaries, the Rev. Alfred Wright, a Presbyterian, has but recently gone to his rest. The progress of civilization among the Choctaws, though somewhat hindered for a time by their removal, has advanced until they have now a regular civil government, a written constitution and laws, courts of justice, and schools. The mission of the Presbyterian Board to this nation grew out of an offer by their National Council to transfer to the Board an important school called "Spencer Academy," which was established in 1842, and the transfer was effected in the summer of 1845. In the spring of the next year a missionary and his wife, with one female teacher, commenced operations there. In 1847, a church was organized there, and both church and school are in successful operation.

The mission among the Otoes and Omahas stands next in date. The Otoes are divided into six bands, and number about 1,160. The Omahas number about 100 less. It was in 1846, when the Rev. Edmund McKinney and his wife removed from the Iowa station to the vicinity of Council Bluffs, on the Missouri river, and commenced a school for the children of these tribes, with some scattering Pawnees, Puncas, and half breeds. A building for the mission premises was completed in 1848. It is yet the day of small things with this mission, but not on that account to be despised.

A mission among the Seminoles was commenced in 1848, and is an off-shoot from the Creek mission, in which territory the Seminoles now reside. Mr. Loughridge visited this tribe in 1846, and the experiment of a mission was attempted. There are many obstacles in the way, especially as this feeble remnant of a once powerful and warlike tribe consider themselves more deeply injured by the white man than most others. At the same time, they have no school funds, and are generally poor and discouraged. One fact, however, is peculiarly encouraging: one missionary teacher, Mr. John D. Bems, is himself a Seminole Indian, and has been laboring among his people faithfully for several years.

The Chickasaw mission is the last that has been planted among the Indians by the Presbyterian Board. This mission was resolved upon in 1849, but did not go into operation until 1852. Two stations in this tribe are occupied, but the results can hardly be looked for at this early day.

The complete returns of these Indian missions, as stated in the Report of 1854, are:—8 ministers of the Gospel; 58 male and female assistant missionaries, of whom four are natives—teachers, farmers, the wives of missionaries, &c.; 96 communicants; and 517 scholars, mostly in boarding-schools.

For the support of these missions, the sum of $43,457 was expended in the year ending May 1, 1853, a part of which was on account of the buildings for the Chickasaw and Ottawa boarding-schools. The sum of $23,240 was received from the government in aid of the schools, being mostly moneys appropriated to this object by the Indians, out of their annuities. This leaves a little more than $20,000 as the amount furnished by the Presbyterian Church to the cause of missions among the Indians.

The foregoing narrative shows that the:

boarding-school system has been largely adopted in these missions. It is a system that has some drawbacks, and yet greater advantages. It involves a considerable expenditure of money, for buildings, the support of teachers, food and clothing of scholars. This consideration will always prevent the establishment of such schools in all tribes alike. Some of the tribes are very poor; others are not willing to appropriate their annuities for this or any other good object. No part of the missionary work, moreover, requires so large an amount of care and labor, on the part both of the missionaries and of the executive officers of the Board, in providing supplies of every kind for large families, living far in the interior of the western wilderness. It is no light matter to furnish all the different kinds of food, clothing, and domestic service required by a household of 150 inmates, at a place far distant from markets, stores, and the usual conveniences of civilized life. Nor is it a small thing to keep all the accounts of such purchases, with a voucher for every item, however minute. Yet with all this complex and difficult labor, and with the more serious discouragements of the impaired health of many engaged in the work, and of too frequent changes of scholars and teachers, the system of boarding-school instruction is nevertheless attended with the greatest benefit to the Indians—making it well worthy of adoption, as a part of missionary agency. The scholars in these institutions are trained up under Christian influence, instruction, and example. They live in the missionary household, and are clothed, plainly but comfortably, after our fashion. The boys are taught to work in the garden and on the farm; the girls to knit, sew, and attend to the common duties of housekeeping. They are taught the English language, and the usual branches of common-school learning. They are assembled morning and evening at family worship, and on the Sabbath they unite together in the services of the sanctuary. Thus they are in training for the duties of life under the happiest circumstances. Many of them have already become the subjects of divine grace. A few are already looking to the work of the Christian ministry; some are already, and others probably will be teachers; others still will occupy posts of influence in their respective tribes, as magistrates or council-men. The boys will grow up to revere the laws and institutions of civilized society; the girls, to exert a hallowed influence in the domestic circle as Christian daughters, wives and mothers. In all this we see principles or elements of civilization of a high order—the beginnings of a Christian life in the wilderness—the desert blossoming as the rose.

The happy influence of these missions on the Indians may be shown by an example. Fifteen years ago, the Rev. Peter Dougherty, on leaving the seminary at Princeton, went among the Chippewa and Ottawa Indians in the neighborhood of Grand Traverse Bay, on Lake Michigan. He found them living in a sad condition, dwelling in small bark huts or wigwams, poorly clad, and deriving a precarious subsistence from fishing, making sugar from the maple tree, and the cultivation of little fields of Indian corn by the women. They were exposed, moreover, to the pernicious arts of the whisky-trader, who reaped the greater part of their small annuities. They were thus fast traveling on the road to extinction.

Mr. Dougherty mingled freely with this poor people, and gained their confidence and goodwill. He built a small log-cabin for himself and another for a school-house, doing most of the work with his own hands. He then taught the children during the week, and preached to as many as could be collected on the Sabbath. After some months he returned to his friends on a short visit, and was accompanied back by his wife, who did not hesitate at the call of duty, to exchange the comforts of refined Christian society for a home among the children of the forest. Gradually an impression was made on the minds of the Indians. One family after another was induced to build small cabins of rough logs, near the dwelling of their missionary; little fields were opened and fenced; fruit trees were planted, and vegetables raised in the gardens. A suitable church building was erected, with a sweet-toned bell to call the worshipers to the house of God. The unwonted sight of a Christian village appeared on the shores of the bay.

The means of grace administered in this humble village were followed by the influences of the Holy Spirit; hopeful conversions among his Indian congregation cheered the heart of the missionary. A church was organized in 1843, and to its communion, at different times, over thirty of the Indians have been admitted after receiving Christian baptism. Some of these have finished their earthly course, in the enjoyment of a good hope through grace, and they are now at rest with Jesus. Surely no doubt can be entertained as to the benign influence of this work of faith and labor of love. Its fruits are beautiful here, and in the world of glory they will be forever perfect.

The christianization of these Indians was followed by their civilization. Of this a marked proof is now to be mentioned. The land occupied by the settlement on Grand Traverse Bay had been ceded by the Indians in former years to the Government, and, being a reservation, it was not yet in market. Mr. Dougherty's Indians, as they may be called, in distinction from the unevangelized part of the same bands, were now anxious to obtain land for permanent possession and improvement, so that they might have a settled dwelling-place, and leave the fruits of their labor to their children.

They were the more encouraged to desire this, by the wise and liberal legislation of the State of Michigan, giving to the Indians the rights of citizenship. After long consideration by the Indians and their missionary, and no small degree of attention on the part of the Executive Committee of the Board, including repeated references to the Indian Department at Washington. it was eventually deemed best that they should remove from their first settlement, purchase small tracts of land on the other side of the bay, and thus begin life anew. They had carefully husbanded their small annuities and earnings, and some of them were able, in 1852, to purchase little tracts of forty, sixty, or eighty acres each, to which they have now removed, and they are hard at work clearing their lands, and putting up their houses.

It is gratifying to add, that they were most anxious to have their benefactor accompany them to their new abode. A memorial was sent by them to the Committee, signed by a large number, requesting that Mr. Dougherty might be transferred to their new settlement.

He is now there, pursuing his work under new and more hopeful circumstances. It has become expedient to form a small boarding-school, as the families are now at considerable distances apart; and two more stations have been occupied on Little Traverse Bay, where interesting day-schools are supported.

This narrative exemplifies the working of our Indian missions, and shows clearly the result to which they directly tend. Their aim is to save the Indians for this life and the life to come. They promote their civilization, and thus fit them to become eventually incorporated with the other inhabitants of this country,—who can have a better right to be enrolled as native citizens under our government? And they point their minds to that life and immortality which the Gospel alone brings to light. What has been accomplished among these bands of Chippewas and Ottawas, is precisely what we hope to see accomplished among all the Indian tribes.—REV. J. GREENLEAF, and Lowrie's Manual of Missions.

AMERICAN BAPTIST MISSIONARY UNION.—The history of these missions is so blended with the changing fortunes and declining destiny of the Indian race, that it can be fully narrated only with considerable difficulty, and at a length greater than is compatible with the limits of this sketch. These missions were formerly established in portions of the country from which the Indians have long since disappeared, and are now, with a single exception, concentrated in that territory lying westward of the states of Missouri and Arkansas, which is the home appointed by the American government for the feeble remnants of this once powerful race.

In the autumn of 1817, Rev. Isaac McCoy was appointed by the Board of Managers of the General Convention, a missionary among the Indians, at that time scattered in great numbers over many of the states and along the entire western frontier of the United States. In accordance with the instructions he received, he repaired to Fort Wayne, in Indiana, on the banks of the Wabash, then one of the remotest settlements of the West. In the region lying around this military establishment were the Miamies, the Kickapoos, the Putawatomes, and the Ottawas—tribes speaking substantially the same language, and existing in the same social condition. In the relations then existing between the two races, he found these people exceedingly averse to everything belonging to white men. After many persevering efforts he was able to conciliate their good will, and by the end of the year to collect a small school of native children to be boarded and instructed in his own family. In 1820 the school contained 48 pupils, and had become instrumental in establishing relations of confidence between the missionary and several chiefs of the tribes. In 1822 the station was removed 200 miles westward to the borders of Michigan, to a spot situated far from any settlement of white men, and which now received the name of Carey, in honor of the celebrated English missionary at Serampore. Two assistants were now added to the mission, and the school was the means of gathering a little community in which the arts of civilized life began to be practiced, and the influences of Christianity were exerted. The members of the church were now 30 or 40 in number, many of whom were Indians, and the public worship maintained by the missionaries often drew together large companies of the Putawatomes, who alone had hitherto evinced any interest in the agencies of the mission.

The Ottawas, who had opposed the efforts of the missionaries, soon began to relax their hostility. Two pupils from that time were sent to the school at Carey, and their chief, Noonday, offered a tract of 600 or 700 acres of land to the mission, in case a missionary could be sent to the settlements of his people on the Grand river. The proposal was accepted, and a new station established, which was conducted for a year by different members of the mission at Carey; but in 1826, on the arrival of other missionaries, Mr. McCoy temporarily removed his family to the new settlement, and immediately founded a school and the other agencies usually connected with a mission for the improvement of the natives. This station received the name of Thomas, and in 1827 it was placed by the Board under the charge of Rev. Leonard Slater, who was appointed for this purpose, and Mr. McCoy returned to Carey. This station, however, was already beginning to decline, and the Putawatomes, who had offered that field of the earliest missionary effort, entirely disappointed the hopes which had been cherished in their behalf. They yielded to the corrupting influences of the white men who came to them, ceded their lands to the government, and ceased to practice the rudiments of civilization which they had learned from the missionaries. In these circumstances, in 1829, Mr. McCoy and his associates removed to Thomas, leaving only a single missionary, Rev. Mr. Simerwell, to teach the school and preach to the church at Carey.

The Ottawas at this time presented a much more inviting field of philanthropic labor. Their chiefs were more intelligent, and their settlements were further removed from the regions occupied by white men. In the summer of 1830, the station was composed of five missionaries, a superintendent of the farm, and six female assistants, who were engaged in instructing the Indians around them in the doctrines of Christianity, and the rudiments of useful knowledge. But the labors of the mission were at this time too much directed to the mere outward improvement of the people, and its members soon felt the importance of addressing themselves more directly to their religious welfare. For this purpose new prominence was given to the daily religious worship, and the services of the Sabbath, so that the character of the people began to improve, and in 1832 several of them gave evidence of piety, and were received into the church by baptism. Among these earliest converts was Noonday, the chief of the tribe who had invited the missionaries to come among them, and who now attempted to unite the people in an association for preventing the sale of whiskey, and for promoting the morals of the settlements. Every year witnessed improvements in their condition, and the enlargement of the church and the mission. Eight Indian youths were sent to the Academy at Hamilton, N. Y., to receive a fuller education, and the prospects of the tribe began to brighten. But the settlements of the white men were gradually approaching their remote domain, and already beginning to exert upon them their unfailing mischievous influence. In 1836, their territory having become covered with English settlements, was ceded to the government of the United States, and the mission was removed to Richland, about 50 miles south of Thomas. Here Mr. Slater continued to reside, though the great body of the Ottawas had long since migrated to the Indian territory beyond the Mississippi. A small settlement, however, remained till near the close of 1853, who then joined their brethren, and the property of the mission has been sold and the services of Mr. Slater discontinued, at his own request.

The improvement of the Indian race had early engaged the attention of the government of the United States. Special appropriations had been made, and different plans had been recommended by successive presidents, and various schemes had been devised by philanthropic citizens in their behalf. At length, in 1819, a bill was passed by Congress, placing at the disposal of the president the sum of $10,000, as an annual appropriation for their instruction and civilization. The schools at Thomas and Carey had from the beginning been supported by moneys derived from the government, and in accordance with the plan adopted by the president for disbursing the $10,000, the Board in 1825 began to receive a portion of this appropriation, which, varying with the amount of service which has been rendered, they have continued to receive to the present time.

In 1828, the Board appointed Rev. Abel Bingham to establish a mission among the Ojibwas at Sault de Ste. Marie, an ancient French settlement, about 15 miles south-east of Lake Superior. The president, in accordance with what was now the settled policy of the government, had placed at their disposal the sum appropriated for this tribe, and Mr. Bingham immediately commenced a school with fifty scholars, and began to preach in English at the neighboring garrison, and through an interpreter to the Indians of the settlement. Suitable houses were soon erected for the accommodation of the members of the mission and the boarding-school; a temperance society was formed, a church was constituted; and, in 1830, two persons were baptized. Others, both in the Indian and the English congregations, soon became decided and active Christians, whose good influence was felt in the improved morals and social habits of the community. Early in 1832 special meetings were held at frequent intervals by the members of the mission, which were also attended by other ministers in the neighborhood, and which contributed largely to the religious instruction and benefit of the people. Forty persons were soon afterwards baptized, and added to the church of Mr. Bingham, of whom eleven were Indians; the others being principally officers and soldiers of the neighboring garrison. Among them were Dr. Edwin James and Mr. Cameron, and Shegud, an Ojibwa chief, the two latter of whom were subsequently assistants in the missions. Dr. James also had translated the New Testament into the Ojibwa language, with which he had long been familiar, and after a careful revision it was printed, in 1833, at Albany, under the direction of the translator. At this time also Messrs. Meeker and Merrill were appointed missionaries of the Board, and passed some time at Sault de Ste. Marie, but were afterwards removed—Mr. and Mrs. Merrill and a female assistant, to the Otoes, and Mr. and Mrs. Meeker to Thomas, and afterwards to Shawanoe in the Indian territory beyond the Mississippi.

But the station at Sault de Ste. Marie soon began to suffer from the presence of immoral and unprincipled traffickers, and from the wandering habits of the Indians. The pious soldiers of the garrison were removed to a distant post, and the school and congregation were both greatly reduced in consequence of the intrigues of Roman Catholic priests, who had come into the settlement. Messrs. Bingham and Cameron, however, still continued their labors, and made frequent excursions to other native settlements, and soon established a subordinate station at Tikumina bay, which was placed under the charge of Shegud, the converted chief already mentioned. Mr. Cameron, who was ordained in May 1837, visited Michipocoton, an Indian town in Upper Canada, on the shore of Lake Superior. He repeated his visit in successive seasons, baptizing several Indians, whom he at length formed into a church which, in 1842, numbered thirty members. The station, however, did not long thrive, in consequence of the changing habits of the people, and it was, after a few years, entirely abandoned, and Mr. Cameron returned to St. Mary's. This latter station also has been gradually declining for several years, while that at Tikumina bay has become more important.

In the year 1821, the Board assumed the general care of the mission established by the Hamilton Missionary Society, among the Seneca, Tuscarora and Oneida Indians, in the remoter counties of New York. This mission was conducted in three separate stations, which at length were reduced to two, but both of them gradually declined in the waning fortunes of the race, and have since become extinct.

We have thus far sketched those missions of the Board which were established among the tribes of the north. Similar missions were also planted in the south, among the Cherokees and Creeks, in the States of North Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama. Of these missions, that among the Cherokees has been attended with a degree of interest and success, that has placed it at some periods of its history among the foremost Baptist missions of the country. It was established in 1817, when the territory of the tribe embraced a large tract lying on the borders of the States of North Carolina, Georgia, and Tennessee. The Cherokees were already beginning a career of civilization, and by being more widely separated from the settlements of white men, had maintained an independent national existence. They had, in former years, been visited by Moravian missionaries, and by agents of the Presbyterian Synod of Tennessee, by whose influence much good had been accomplished. In 1817 also the mission of the American Board of Commissioners was commenced among the Cherokees, and a few months later, Rev. Humphrey Posey was appointed the first missionary of the Baptist General Convention, as the society was then styled. In consequence of much time being spent in journeys of exploration, and the selection of a suitable locality, the labors of the missionary were not begun till the spring of 1820, when Mr. Posey, with a few assistants, went to reside at Valley Towns, on the banks of the Hiwassee river, just within the State of North Carolina. The station was commenced, in accordance with the views at that time prevailing, by enclosing a large piece of ground of eighty acres, as a mission farm, which was supplied with the necessary implements and stock. Buildings were soon erected; a school of 50 children was opened for instruction in the Scriptures and in the lessons of useful knowledge. In the following year a second station was commenced at Tinsawatee, a settlement sixty miles south of Valley Towns, where was already residing a missionary, supported by the Sarepta Baptist Association in Georgia. In September of the same year, Rev. Thomas Roberts was appointed superintendent of the mission, and several teachers for the schools and artisans for the farm and the workshop were added to its stations, and under the influence of their arrangements, the Indians made evident progress in the arts and morals of civilized life.

Among the members of the mission at Valley Towns at this time, was Mr. Evan Jones, who, with his wife, had, for several years, been engaged in the instruction and management of the schools. In 1825 he was ordained as pastor of the church at Valley Towns, and soon after, on the resignation of Mr. Roberts, was appointed superintendent of the mission. He soon had the happiness of seeing several of his former pupils settled around him, as heads of Christian families, and illustrating the virtues of a well-ordered society. In 1826, the civil organization of the tribe having been altered, a new code of laws was adopted, and their progress, as a people, was greatly promoted. Their language had already been reduced to writing, by George Guess, one of their own people. Many hymns were composed in it, in the singing of which the natives especially delighted; and in 1825, the New Testament was translated according to the alphabet of Guess, by David Brown, a Cherokee of superior education. A printing-press was soon purchased by the council, and in 1828 the "Cherokee Phoenix" was published weekly, both in Cherokee and in English. The New Testament and the hymns were also printed.

But the labors of the mission were thus far devoted too much to the civilization and social improvement of the nation, and by the direction of the Board, the missionaries now began to give themselves more fully to the work of preaching the Gospel to the people, and leading them to repentance and faith in Jesus Christ. The mission farm and its kindred arrangements were gradually abandoned, and the attention of the Indians was directed especially to the claims of the Gospel, with results that fully justified the wisdom of the change. A religious awakening soon commenced, which spread widely through the nation, and continued for several years to exert its beneficial influence upon the character of the people. Mr. Jones established new out-stations, and organized new churches, and at the close of 1833 the mission numbered 200 communicants, three-fourths of whom had been baptized in the three preceding years. Many of these Indian converts were men of superior intelligence and standing in the tribe, and two of them subsequently became respected and useful ministers of the Gospel. These were Oganaya and Kaneeka, who adopted the names of John Wickliffe and Jesse Bushyhead. The latter had gained his knowledge of Christianity from the Bible alone, and apart from all other instruction, had become a Christian of the firmest faith and the loftiest character. Both he and Wickliffe were ordained to the ministry in 1833, and became pastors of churches at different stations, where, for many years they devoted their efforts to promoting the religious welfare of their own people.

The station at Tinsawatee was never equal in importance to that of Valley Towns. It was under the faithful superintendence of Rev. Mr. O'Briant; but the Indians in that district declined in numbers; and at length in 1831, at the recommendation of the United States government, they removed to the territory which had been assigned them, beyond the Mississippi. Mr. O'Briant accompanied them, but he soon after died; and though his place was supplied by others, this mission was abandoned in 1836, and the remaining missionaries removed to Shawanoe.

From the year 1822 a mission had also been established among the Indians known as the Creek nation, in the States of Georgia and Alabama. The attention of the Convention was called to the wants of these people, and the establishment of a mission recommended by Governor Rabun, of Georgia,—also by Rev. Messrs. Mercer and Mosely, eminent clergymen of the same state. In 1822, Rev. Lee Compere, of South Carolina, was appointed to commence the mission at Withington, on the borders of Alabama. But the Creeks were far less civilized than the Cherokees, and were, withal, sadly degraded by the unprincipled traders who came among them in great numbers, to teach them the vices of civilized life. Troubles were also arising between them and the government of the United States, and they were constantly exposed to depredations from their white neighbors, which provoked the fiercest passions of their savage natures. In this condition of the Creek nation, it was impossible that the mission should accomplish any high success. A school was maintained for a few years, and a small band of Creeks were baptized; but in 1829 a large part of the nation migrated beyond the Mississippi, and Mr. Compere withdrew from the service of the Board.

In 1830, John Davis, a former member of the school at Withington, who had accompanied his people in their removal westward, was appointed a missionary, and immediately began his labors as a preacher. Two years later, Rev. Daniel Lewis was sent to the mission, the chief station of which received the name of Ebenezer. He soon organized a church, composed of those who had been baptized in Alabama, and those who had been more recently instructed in the Gospel by John Davis. The school was well attended, and a weekly congregation of three hundred Creeks was assembled for public worship. Mr. Davis was subsequently ordained, and in the autumn of 1834, the mission was placed under the care of Rev. David Rollin, who, with two assistants, went to reside among the Creeks. In 1836, a second station was established at Canadian Creek, and an attempt was made to prepare a Creek version of the New Testament. But the passions of the tribe were too easily inflamed to admit of much social progress, or of any settled and uniform modes of life. Many of the chiefs were opposed to the introduction of Christianity among the people, and the nation soon became distracted with tumults, which threatened the safety of the missionaries. Mr. Rollin and his associates accordingly withdrew to Shawanoe, and the mission was broken up. It was afterwards resumed by Rev. Messrs. Kellam and Mason, who maintained the government schools and kept together the churches; but in 1840 they were obliged to leave the nation, on account of threatened violence. The churches, however, continued to be visited by members of other missions in the Indian Territory, until 1843, when Rev. Eber Tucker, lately a government teacher among the Choctaws, was appointed missionary among the Creeks. In the course of two years, he baptized more than a hundred of the tribe; and the church, at the end of that period, numbered 250 members, of whom many were African slaves owned in the nation. In 1845, Mr. Tucker abandoned the mission, on account of the sickness of his family, and it subsequently passed into the hands of the American Indian Mission Association.

In May, 1830, the bill for removing the Indians from their lands within the states to the territory of the United States beyond the Mississippi, passed the national Congress. This measure had been early advocated by Mr. McCoy, and repeatedly commended to the government by the General Convention, as the best mode of relieving them from the evils to which they were exposed within the jurisdiction of the states. Many of them had already consented to remove, and other portions were only waiting for some definite arrangements to be made by the government. But the Cherokees in Georgia, and other tribes in the neighboring states, claimed to be each an independent people, occupying lands which had been repeatedly guarantied to them by treaties with the United States. It was while this claim was still a subject of angry dispute between the Cherokees and the State of Georgia, that the bill for removing the Indians became a law of the land. It provided for an equitable exchange of the lands of the Indians; for their removal at the public expense; their full indemnification for the losses they might sustain, and their entire support for one year after their arrival in the territory which was set apart for them, beyond the western borders of the states of Arkansas and Missouri. The act imposed on them a virtual necessity, and was ultimately carried into execution by the troops of the United States, under the command of Major-General Scott. Several other tribes, seeing the necessity which they could not escape, acceded to the terms of the government, and exchanged their lands for portions of the new domain. Not so the Cherokees. They clung to the promises of the government, and to the guaranties of their treaties. At length, however, on the submission of a portion of them, the President of the United States felt obliged to compel their removal by the array of military force. It was commenced in the summer of 1838 by the enforced departure of 3,000 of the tribe; but the remainder having obtained permission from General Scott to remain till the sickly season of summer was over, removed of their own accord, in companies of about a thousand each, under the conduct of leaders of their own selection. It was to them a season of unprecedented national calamity and humiliation. They were, in a great degree, a civilized and Christian people, and they felt with the keenest sensibility the pressure of the iron power which tore them from their ancient seats, and the graves of their dead. But, amidst all their deep afflictions, the religious influence which had begun to show itself some years before, still continued to be experienced among them. In 1835, not less than 300 had been baptized, and during the protracted period of their adversity, and, even on their sorrowful march to the western territory, they manifested a religious sensibility, and developed a religious faith, which not only sustained them in all their sufferings, but awoke a thrill of sympathy in every pious heart throughout the land. Among the persons chosen to conduct the several parties of the migrating nation, were Rev. Messrs. Jones and Bushyhead, and it often happened that their evening encampments resounded with the prayers and hymns of devout assemblies, engaged in the worship of God; and the streams which they crossed were sometimes consecrated by the holy rite of Christian baptism.

In this manner were the Cherokees removed to their present home in the Indian Territory. The missionaries went with them in their long and wearisome journey, and did all in their power to alleviate their sufferings, and breathe into them the spirit of cheerful Christian resignation. The interests of the mission, though they had suffered a serious shock in the changes which had befallen the nation, yet soon revived on the arrival of the Cherokees in their new home, and in a little time its labors again were prosecuted with their wonted regularity. At the close of 1839, Mr. Jones returned to the States, and visited the managers at Boston. In the course of his visit, he narrated in the cities of the east the sufferings of the Cherokees, and the spirit with which they had endured them, and made the public more fully acquainted with the progress they had made in the knowledge of the Gospel, and the arts of civilized life. His narratives awakened new interest in the prosperity of the mission, and on his return in 1841, he resumed his labors with new zeal and encouragement. He found that during the eighteen months of his absence, upwards of two hundred had been added to the churches—a number which was soon increased by the baptism of nearly 100 more. The wilderness was blooming with the industry and care of the people, and the Cherokees became pioneers and exemplars to the other tribes that occupied the territory.

There were at this period within the territory nine missions of the Board, embracing in all twenty-four missionaries and assistants, and twelve native preachers. Most of them were of recent origin, and some were little more than government schools, placed by the President of the United States under the direction of the Board for the benefit of the several tribes among whom they were established. This number of laborers was soon increased by additions to the Cherokee mission, and the missionaries and teachers stationed among the Shawanoes, Ottowas, Putawatomes and Delawares, were in 1841 united in a single mission, the principal seat of which was at Shawanoe, with a subordinate station in each of the tribes. At Shawanoe there had been a press since 1833, at which the Gospel of Matthew, together with many Christian hymns and school-books had been printed, and from which, for several years, had been issued a weekly newspaper, called the "Shawanoe Sun." Since then other school books, and other portions of the New Testament have been added to the number. In 1842, the operations of a portion of the mission were suspended for a time, in consequence of the jealousy and threatened violence of the Indians. At about the same time also, it was visited by Rev. J. S. Bacon, D. D., a member of the Board, who had been appointed to visit the several missions in the Indian Territory. Dr. Bacon extended his observations and inquiries to all the leading tribes in the territory, and his report to the Board contributed largely to their information respecting the condition of the people, the influence of the missions, and the modes in which they should be conducted. Since that time the labors of the mission have been conducted without interruption, though amidst the unceasing decline of the Indian race in all the tribes with which it is connected—a decline which of necessity spreads its shadows not only over the prospects of the people, but also over the agencies that are employed for their improvement. At Shawanoe, Mr. and Mrs. Barker with one native assistant, and, within the past two years Miss Doty, a teacher, have conducted the station. The church numbers thirty-one members. At Delaware, the church has also thirty-one members, and is under the charge of the Rev. J. G. Pratt, who, with Mrs. Pratt, Miss E. S. Morse, Miss E. P. Gookin, and one native assistant, has also the entire charge of the schools, and all the interests of the mission in the Delaware tribe. At Ottawa, the station is under the charge of Rev. G. Meeker, who, with his wife and one native assistant, is employed among the Ottawa people. The church here numbers forty members. Around each of the stations, the natives are making gratifying progress in morals and the arts of civilized life. The members of the churches maintain an exemplary Christian character, and for some years past have made considerable contributions for the support of the mission. Each year, also, witnesses additions to their numbers, and an increase of intelligence among the children of the schools.

The only other mission of the Union now remaining in the Indian territory is that among the Cherokees—a mission which from its commencement, while the Cherokee nation were still in the State of Georgia, has been signally blessed of heaven, and has been productive of the most gratifying results in the civilization and religious improvement of the people. Its principal seat is at Cherokee, which is three miles west of the boundary of Arkansas, and its operations are extended over a district occupied by the tribe, of forty miles in extent to the west, the south, and the north. Since 1843 the mission has been furnished with a press and printing establishment, which until recently was under the care of Mr. H. Upham, a printer by trade, who retired from the service of the Board in 1851. In addition to Rev. E. Jones, the faithful friend of the natives who has remained with them through all their disasters, the mission was strengthened in 1843 by the arrival of Rev. W. P. Upham, and these two are now its only managers. They have, however, employed at different periods a number of intelligent and educated Cherokees as assistants and coadjutors in their labors, and these have in most instances proved themselves efficient and faithful in carrying forward the work of the Gospel. The translation of the New Testament was completed by Mr. Jones in 1847, and some books of the Old Testament have been translated by other members of the mission. School books have been prepared in large numbers, and the Pilgrim's Progress has been translated and extensively circulated among the people of the nation, everywhere awakening the deepest interest, and producing the most beneficial results. In 1844 Mr. Upham established the "Cherokee Messenger," a periodical which has been continued by members of the mission, or by natives of the tribe. The people have occasionally been distracted by civil feuds,—some of them having their origin in questions and events connected with their removal from Georgia—which have sometimes affected the interests of the mission, but its course has been one of unusual prosperity, and its agencies have conferred inestimable benefits on the Cherokee nation. The national council has adopted a liberal policy in the administration of its public affairs, and its enactments and decrees have for a considerable period been such as become a civilized and Christian people. Its school system is in advance of those of some of the neighboring States, and the schools of the mission are no longer needed, except for religious instruction. The churches which, on the migration of the Cherokees in 1839, contained 500 members, in 1849 numbered upwards of 1200. They very nearly support the institutions of the Gospel by their own contributions, and have often sent liberal sums to the treasury of the Missionary Union. In 1854 their contributions to this treasury amounted to $409, and it is believed that were the missionaries now withdrawn, the churches would still go on in maintaining the faith of the Gospel, and spreading it more widely among the people. The mission is now established at five stations, Cherokee, Delaware Town, Dsiyohee, Taguohce, and Flint, and at eight out-stations. Its missionaries are Rev. Messrs. E. Jones and W. P. Upham, who with their families reside at Cherokee, while the native assistants are distributed among the other stations or out-stations of the mission.

The only mission of the Union now remaining among the Indians east of the Mississippi, is that among the Ojibwas, near Lake Superior. Its origin and early progress have already been narrated. It has from the beginning been under the charge of Rev. Abel Bingham, assisted for many years past by Rev. G. D. Cameron. Its stations still continue to be, as they have long been, at Sault de Ste. Marie and Tikuamina bay, with an out-station at Michipicoton, in Upper Canada. A flourishing school is maintained at Tikuamina bay, which contains, by the latest reports, sixty-nine pupils, and the church numbers twenty-one members. The Ojibwa tribe, however, is constantly diminishing in numbers, and must soon either be removed to the western territory, or be merged in the tide of population that is advancing from the east, and a few more years must terminate the existence of the mission. And even in the Indian territory itself—the domain which the government solemnly set apart as the perpetual home of these ancient masters of the whole land—the horizon of the future is shutting darkly and gloomily upon the fortunes of the Indian race. Already have the guarantees to which they trusted been set aside, and the titles which they fondly thought would be valid for ever, are about to be extinguished by the legislation of Congress, and the lands for which they abandoned their ancient seats in the States of the East are about to be merged in the territories of Nebraska and Kansas, to which the tide of emigration is rapidly rolling. The destiny of this once powerful race is one of the saddest in the annals of mankind, and happy will it be, if, before their final extinction, they shall find in the Gospel of the Son of God a solace and a balm for all the mighty wrongs which they have been forced to endure at the hands of the American people.

STATISTICS OF INDIAN MISSIONS FOR 1854.

Ojibwa Mission.—2 stations, 2 out-stations, 2 missionaries, 1 female assistant, 1 native assistant, 1 church, 21 members; 1 boarding-school, 6 pupils; 2 day-schools, 74 pupils; total, 3 schools, 80 pupils.

Shawnee Mission.—3 stations, 3 missionaries, 5 female assistants, 2 native assistants, 3 churches, 100 members; 2 boarding-schools, 45 pupils.

Cherokee Mission.—5 stations, 8 out-stations, 2 missionaries, 2 female assistants, 6 native assistants, 10 churches, 1,250 members; 1 boarding-school, 85 pupils.

Total.—3 missions, 10 stations, 10 out-stations, 7 missionaries, 8 female assistants, 9 native preachers and assistants, 14 churches, 1,371 church-members, 4 boarding-schools, 136 pupils; 2 day-schools, 74 pupils; total 6 schools, and 210 pupils.—PROF. W. GAMMELL.

MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—This Society was led by a very peculiar providence to undertake the missionary work among the Indians. John Steward, a free colored man, who was born and bred in Powhattan county, Va., was converted, and became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Though of slender education, yet he became deeply impressed with a conviction that it was his duty to call sinners to repentance; and, at the same time, his mind appeared to be drawn somewhere in a north-west direction, he hardly knew where, among a people to whom he was a stranger. So strong were his convictions on this subject, that, though unauthorized by any body of Christians, he arose, forsook all, and went alone and unprotected; crossed the Muskingum river, directing his way sometimes through a wilderness without any road; nor did he suffer himself to be diverted from his purpose, though many with whom he fell in company by the way endeavored to dissuade him from it, until he arrived at Pipe Town, on Sandusky river, where a tribe of the Delaware Indians resided.

He was conducted to one of the Indian cabins, and seated. Finding, however, that they understood but little of his language, he could attract but little attention by his conversation. They were moreover preparing for one of their dances, and did not like to be diverted from it by the arrival of a stranger, but commenced their barbarous exercises with such energy and violence, that poor Steward thought they were about to kill him. Finding, however, that his fears were groundless, as soon as they desisted from their dance, he pulled out his hymn-book and commenced singing. Profound silence reigned in the assembly while Steward proceeded with the hymn. And when he ceased, one said, in English, "Sing more." He complied, and then asked if they could furnish him with an interpreter; when an old Delaware, named Lyons, was produced, and Steward delivered to them a discourse on the subject of religion, to which they listened with attention; and, at the close of it, they prepared for their guest an entertainment, after which, he retired to rest.

Thinking he had discharged his duty here, it was his intention to visit some friends in Tennessee. In the morning the people wished him to remain another day; but a secret impulse seemed to urge him to proceed still further to the north-west; and so, disregarding his own inclinations to visit his friends, and the solicitations of the people, he traveled on to the house of the United States sub-agent of Indian Affairs, at Upper Sandusky.

At first suspecting Steward to be a runaway slave, Mr. Walker questioned him very closely. But Steward related to him his first experience of the grace of God, his subsequent impressions, and the way in which he had performed his journey and come among them. The artless and unaffected manner in which he narrated the dealings of God with him, soon removed the scruples from Walker's mind, and he gave him encouragement, directed him to the house of Jonathan Pointer, a colored man, who had been taken prisoner in his youth by the Wyandots, and who had learned to speak their language with ease and fluency. When Jonathan learned the object of Steward's visit, he endeavored to dissuade him from his enterprise, telling him he need not attempt to do that which many great and learned men had failed in accomplishing before him; Steward, however, would not be diverted from his purpose without a thorough trial, and the same day, with the reluctant consent of Jonathan, he attended a feast with him. A large number of Indians were assembled, and the feast and dance were conducted as usual, with great mirth and hilarity. Permission being granted at the close of the amusements, Steward, by the aid of Jonathan, as interpreter, delivered a discourse on the subject of Christianity; dwelling principally on its experimental effects upon the heart and life. They listened with profound attention, and then gave them their hand in token of hospitality to a stranger. He made an appointment for a meeting the next day, at the house of Jonathan, but how surprised and disappointed was he to find, instead of a large assembly, only one old woman. Not disheartened, however, at this, Steward imitating the conduct of his Master at Jacob's well, preached the Gospel as faithfully as if there had been hundreds present to hear him. The next day his congregation was increased by the addition of one old man, and these two soon became converts.

The next day being Sabbath, 8 or 10 assembled in the council-house, who seemed much affected under his sermon, and a work of grace commenced, which terminated in the conversion of many. This was in the month of November, 1816. Steward continued his labors, visiting the families from cabin to cabin, talking, singing, and praying with them, and preaching to them on the Sabbath, in the council-house. Very soon large crowds flocked to the meetings, and such was the deep concern manifested, that for a season they almost entirely neglected their secular affairs. This gave occasion for the mercenary traders residing among them to speak reproachfully of Steward, and accuse him of being instrumental of starving the Indians, by preventing them from hunting. But it was very manifest that the true reason of their opposition was, that "their craft was in danger." Yet, although they threatened him with imprisonment, he persisted in his preaching. One of his greatest difficulties was with his interpreter. Being unaffected with the truth, though he interpreted faithfully whatever Steward delivered, he would often add, "so he says; but I do not know whether it is so or not, nor do I care; all my mind is to interpret faithfully what he says. You must not think that I care whether you believe it or not." The word, however, took effect, and at length Jonathan himself, wicked and thoughtless as he had been, yielded to the power of truth, and was afterwards apparently hearty in the work.

The greater part of the Wyandots had been under the instruction of some Roman Catholic missionaries; they had embraced the Roman Catholic religion, and had become attached to its superstitions and unscriptural ceremonies, without any visible reformation of manners, or any saving influence of Divine grace upon their hearts. These things added to the difficulties with which Steward had to contend. While the heathen party were offended at having the religion of their fathers called in question, those who had become attached to the idle ceremonies of the Church of Rome felt themselves abused by being told that the worship paid to the Virgin Mary and to saints and angels was rank idolatry. Truth, however, triumphed over all opposition, and gained the ascendancy in the hearts of some of these savages.

The following circumstance contributed not a little in its results, to confirm the wavering faith of such as doubted of Steward's sincerity, as well as to confound many of his open enemies:—When he so boldly denounced the peculiarities of the Church of Rome, and taught doctrines so different from what they had been taught by the Romish priests, they concluded that there must be a discrepancy between his Bible and that used by the priests. To decide this question, it was by mutual agreement submitted to Mr. Walker, the sub-agent. He accordingly appointed a day for the examination. Steward and the chiefs appeared before him. Many being present of both parties, and all deeply interested in the issue, a profound silence reigned in the assembly. Mr. Walker carefully examined the Bible and hymn book used by Steward, while all eyes were fixed upon him. The Christian party gazing with intense interest, hoping for a result favorable to their desires, and the others no less anxious to be confirmed in their opposition to Steward and his party. At length the examination closed. Mr. Walker informed the assembly that the only difference between the Bible used by Steward and the one used by the Roman priests was, that the former was in the English language, and the latter was in the Latin; and as to the hymn-book, he informed them that the hymns it contained were all good, the subjects having been taken from the Bible, and that they breathed the spirit of religion. His decision therefore was, that the Bible was genuine, and the hymns good. On hearing this decision, the countenances of the Christian party instantly lighted up with joy, and their very souls exulted in God their Saviour, while the opposers stood abashed. During the whole transaction Steward sat calm and tranquil, fixing his eye upon the assembly with an affectionate regard, as if fully conscious that truth and innocence would triumph.

Being foiled in this unrighteous attempt to interrupt the progress of the work of reformation, they next objected to Steward that he had no authority from any body of Christians to preach. To this Mr. Walker replied by asking them whether he had ever performed the rite of matrimony or of baptism. Being answered in the negative, he told them that there was no law, either of God or man, violated, as any one had a right to talk about religion, and try to persuade others to embrace it. He then dismissed the assembly, who "had great reasoning among themselves concerning these things." Steward, however, was permitted to prosecute his labors with but little opposition for about three months, when he proposed leaving them for a season, and gave them a farewell discourse in the council-house, when such was their attachment to him, there was a universal weeping. Promising to return to them "when the corn should shoot," he made a journey to Marietta. During his absence they continued their meetings for singing, prayer, and exhortation, and religion prospered, so that on his return at the appointed time he was hailed by the Christian party with cordiality and great joy.

Steward, in trying to introduce Christianity, had to encounter the usual difficulties with these people—their idolatry, their traditional customs, their belief in witches, their scattered and migratory condition, their wars, their ignorance, and their prejudices against the white man. He felt them most sensibly among the Wyandots. He, however, persevered in his work, and God blessed his labors. But though a number of them had received the Gospel, strong efforts were made by the Pagan and Popish parties to oppose the work. Yet, confiding in God and in the goodness of his cause, he persevered in his labors. It was some time, however, before opposition ceased. Two chiefs especially, Mononcue and Bloody Eyes, manifested particular opposition to the Gospel. With a view to obviate the objections against him, for want of proper authority to preach the Gospel, after laboring among them for two years with considerable success, assisted occasionally by a colored man from Mad River Circuit, and by Moses Hinckle, Jr., Steward obtained a license as a local preacher at a quarterly conference held at Urbana in March, 1819, and was appointed a missionary to Upper Sandusky. His excessive labors, together with the numerous privations he was called to suffer, with his fastings and watchings, had in the year 1821 induced various afflictions of body, and no doubt laid the foundation of his premature death. With a view to afford him aid in his work, several local preachers volunteered their services, and were instrumental of much good. At the Ohio Conference, held in Cincinnati, August 7, 1819, the Rev. James B. Finley was appointed to the Lebanon District, which included the Sandusky mission, of which he took the oversight.

On the 13th and 14th of November, at a quarterly meeting held for the Mad River Circuit, 42 miles from Upper Sandusky, about 60 of the natives, among whom were four of the chiefs, Between-the-logs, Mononcue, Hicks, and Scuteash, attended with their families, together with two interpreters, Jonathan Pointer and Armstrong, both of whom were happy in the love of God. It seems notwithstanding the former opposition of two of these chiefs to the Gospel of Jesus Christ, that through the patient and indefatigable labors of Steward and those who assisted him in the work, they had yielded to the power of truth and grace, and were now heartily engaged in building up the good cause. Between-the-logs was one of the chief councilors of the nation—a man of strong powers of mind, and of great eloquence and influence. Mononcue was grave, dignified, deliberate in counsel, with a charming voice, and a commanding eloquence. The others, though somewhat inferior to these, were much respected by their people and compeers. The conversion of such men to the Christian cause could not but have a most happy influence in favor of the mission.

The mission was continued as a regular appointment, and increased in prosperity; many of the chiefs embraced religion; several of them subsequently became preachers, and labored with great zeal and success among their brethren. A mission-school was established in the Wyandot Reserve, mainly supported by the general government, which in its treaty with the tribe reserved a certain portion of land for this purpose.

Some time during the year 1820, reports had reached a portion of the Wyandot tribe who were living near Fort Malden, in Canada, of the great change wrought among their brethren in Sandusky. They were visited by two native preachers, who made known to them, "in their own tongue, the wonderful work of God." Several were converted, and a mission was subsequently established among them. The labors of John Sunday, a converted native, were of great service in this good work. The missions in Canada, however, were all conveyed to the Canada Conference in 1828.

In 1826, being a period of about ten years after the commencement of the mission, 303 had become members of the church. In the mission school there were 77 scholars acquiring a knowledge of the English language, and being instructed in the useful arts. In 1830, a branch was added to this mission, composed of Wyandots and Shawnees, on the Huron river, in Michigan, and continued to prosper for several years. An interesting revival of religion was enjoyed by the Wyandots during the fall of 1837, and many were added to the church. From this time to the period when the Wyandot nation determined to sell their lands to the general government, and remove beyond the Mississippi, nothing occurred of any special interest. Preachers were regularly sent, and mission schools were sustained. By the treaty, all the missionary improvements which had been made were appraised and paid for by the government, the avails of which were to go into the treasury of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. They accordingly removed to their new home in the west, many of them carrying their religion with them. After the separation of the southern conferences from the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the organization of a separate and distinct ecclesiastical connection, the Wyandots falling within the range of that jurisdiction, they were supplied with preachers by the Church South.

The next mission was established in 1822, among the Creek Indians, entitled the Asbury mission. This tribe resided in the bounds of the States of Alabama and Georgia. Another mission was commenced among the Mohawks on Grand river, Upper Canada, who occupied a reservation of land, 60 miles in length and 12 in breadth, on each side of the river.

In 1823, an interesting revival of religion commenced under the labors of Rev. Messrs. Torrey and Crawford, Methodist ministers, a very interesting account of which is to be found in the annual report for the year 1823. A number of Mississaugas were brought into the mission-house and baptized. They afterwards removed to the Credit river. Several Chippeways were also subjects of this work. An interesting incident is connected with the introduction of the Gospel among the Mississaugas. In 1801, the Rev. Joseph Sawyer was holding a quarterly meeting at the house of Mr. Jones. Mrs. Jones, who was a Mohawk princess, presented herself for Christian baptism, and, with her husband, united with the church. Their son, an Indian youth, was at the same time solemnly dedicated to the Lord in baptism, and while the minister was concluding the ceremony with a prayer, he most fervently besought the Lord to make that youth the first fruits of a harvest of souls among that people. The father of the youth, having embraced Christianity, and being in possession of two wives, he married the Mohawk princess, renounced the mother of the boy, who was a Mississauga, and turned her away from his tent. The boy followed his mother to the woods, and remained with the Mississauga tribe in the wilderness until he was twelve years of age, when he entered an English school, where he made rapid progress in the language, and was soon able to converse fluently in English. With a ready knowledge of both languages, he was made an interpreter, became a convert to Christianity, and was called to preach the Gospel to his countrymen. His young and ardent spirit urged him to proclaim the glad tidings of salvation to his kindred and friends. His clear and rich experience in the things of God, announced in strains of simple eloquence, subdued and melted their hearts; and many were brought through his ministrations to the foot of the cross. That prayer was heard, and that mother, like Hagar driven out into the wilderness, was not forgotten nor forsaken of God. The labors of this remarkable youth were wonderfully owned and blessed of God. The great change which was wrought among the Mississauga Indians, was followed by the most blessed results on other fragments of the same tribe. An additional number of 22, who professed faith in Christ, and were baptized in the year 1826, were formed into a class at Bellville, Upper Canada. Their subsequent deportment gave evidence of a radical change.

In 1827, a new mission was commenced among another branch of the Mississaugas, residing on Snake and Yellow Head Islands, in Upper Canada. They spoke the Chippeway language, and were about 600 in number. A Sabbath-school was established among them; they were supplied with a missionary; and so successful was the mission that in 1829 there were 350 that had renounced heathenism, and become members of the church, and 100 of their children were regularly taught in the schools.

In the year 1822, a mission was commenced by the Methodist Episcopal Church among the Cherokee Indians, who inhabited a tract of country included in the States of Georgia and North Carolina on the east, Alabama on the west, and that part of Tennessee south of Ho-wasse and Tennessee rivers, comprising ten millions of acres. The work of God among the Cherokees was so great that in 1828 the number of converts had increased to 800; and the number of missionaries employed was increased to seven. The white missionaries were greatly assisted by the services of a young converted Cherokee, who acted as interpreter. In 1832, the Cherokees were removed beyond the Mississippi; and the faithful, self-denying missionaries accompanied them to their distant home. In 1846, this Indian mission was embraced in the limits of the Church South. In 1825, the Mississippi Conference established a mission among the Cherokees, under the superintendence of the Rev. William Winans; and the Rev. Wiley Ledbetter was appointed the missionary. For three years this mission gave but little promise, and fears were entertained that it would be necessary to abandon it altogether; but just at the darkest period of its history the star of hope and promise arose. A camp-meeting was held in the month of August, 1828, and the Lord poured out his Spirit, and his work revived; and multitudes, among whom were four captains, were converted and joined the church. At another camp-meeting, held a few months afterward, a great number of Indians united with the church. From this time the work progressed, till, in the year 1830, the number reported as in communion with the church, was 4,000. All the principal men of the nation, chiefs and captains, were members of the church. Three missionaries, three interpreters, and three school teachers were connected with the mission.

A proposition made by the general government to the Choctaws, in regard to their removal west of the Mississippi, cast a gloom over the mission about this period. In the midst of great division of sentiment and conflict of feeling, at a council, held in the month of March, the nation succeeded in obtaining a majority of votes to sell the land, and accordingly made arrangements for removal. The Rev. Mr. Tally accompanied the emigrants to their new and distant home, in the vicinity of the Rocky Mountains. In 1831, 500 had arrived at the Choctaw mission west, most of whom were members of the church. The removals became so extensive that the old mission east was nearly broken up. In 1836, there were reported 960 members, an English school, and ten Sabbath-schools, taught by native teachers in the Choctaw language, containing 373 scholars. There were two white missionaries, five native preachers, three exhorters, twenty class leaders, and five stewards. At the general council of the natives an act was passed, providing for the establishment of seven literary institutions within their national limits. Two of these, Fort Coffee Academy and Nunnawaya Academy, were placed under the supervision of the Methodist Church, with an annual appropriation to the former of $6,000, and to the latter of $6,500. The Rev. William H. Goode was appointed to take charge of Fort Coffee Academy, and the Rev. Wesley Browning of the Nunnawaya Academy. The Indian Mission Conference having been formed, the Choctaw mission was embraced as one of its districts. The Choctaw mission, by the plan of separation, passed into the jurisdiction of the Church South in 1846.

A mission was established among the Putawatomies, a small tribe in the vicinity of Fort Clark, on Fox river, in the year 1823. The Rev. Jesse Walker was appointed missionary, and a school was established. In 1837, upwards of one hundred Putawatomies were converted, and joined the church among the Kickapoos.

In 1829 the Oneida mission commenced. A young Mohawk, who had been converted in Upper Canada, prompted by a love for souls, came among them, and in a short time, 100 made a profession of faith in the Redeemer. Through the influence of the Oneida Christians, a work of grace was commenced among the Onondagas, a neighboring tribe, twenty-four of whom were converted, and became members of the church. The Oneida mission, in 1835, was reported as enjoying a state of prosperity, having been blessed with a revival. This mission extended its labors among the Menominee and Kewawenon Indians, and was successful in establishing churches and schools among them. The whole number of church members,—including the mission above specified, and those in the Green Bay district,—amounted to 788. The number of missionaries was 15. There were 9 week-day schools, with 9 superintendents; 23 teachers, 267 scholars, and 280 volumes in the library. These missions have continued to prosper, down to the present time.

In 1830, an effort was made by the Missouri Conference to introduce the Gospel among the Shawnee and Kansas Indians. In 1841, the mission reported 130 members, and was represented as prosperous. These missions also passed under the supervision of the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

In 1830, a mission was established among the Iroquois, including the tribe of the Kickapoos within the bounds of the Illinois Conference. A prophet had risen up among them, who acknowledged the true God, and was zealously engaged in instructing the people in religion. His religious notions were mixed up with much that was superstitious. He, however, afterwards embraced Christianity, and became useful among his brethren in promoting their temporal and spiritual welfare. In 1834, the Kickapoo mission was reported to have 230 members, and a school consisting of 24 native children.

The Peoria mission was organized in 1833, and 40 natives were received into the church. The report for 1835 states that the mission had doubled its numbers, and the mission school was prospering.

A mission was established among the Sioux, *Winnebago*s, and Chippeways, by the Rev. Alfred Bronson, who, in 1834, went out on an exploring tour through the regions bordering on the Mississippi. The same year, the South Indian missionary district, in the Arkansas Conference, Koon Town, Oothcalooga, and Valley Town, were visited with a powerful revival, and 120 natives were added to the church.

In 1845, the following statement was given of the numbers of church members in the various districts included in the Indian Conference :

Kansas River District	700
Cherokee District	2,057
Choctaw "	800
Rock River Conference	130
Michigan Conference	338
Oneida "	90
Holston "	109
Mississippi "	115
Total	4,339

The most of these Indian missions having fallen within the jurisdiction of the Church South, in 1847 there were but nine Indian missions, 15 missionaries, and 778 church members left to the Methodist E. Church. In connection with these missions, there were nine week-day schools, embracing 200 pupils ; 8 Sabbath-schools, 9 superintendents, 23 teachers, 267 scholars, and 287 volumes in the library.

MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF THE METHODIST E. CHURCH SOUTH.—Full three-fourths of all the Indian missions of the Methodist E. Church, lay within the jurisdictional limits of the Church South, at the time when the Church was divided in 1844. The Kansas, Cherokees, Choctaws and some others falling over to the Church South, the Oneidas, Onondagas, Ojibwas, and others remaining with the Methodist E. Church. During the past year, a portion of the Cherokee mission has again come under the supervision of the Methodist E. Church. The Church South having taken up her share of the Indian missions, has pursued her duty to these sons of the forest with a commendable zeal. In 1848, encouraged by the liberal assistance of the U. S. Government, the Board of missions of the Church South, greatly enlarged the means of education through their Indian missions ; and they were privileged to see a growing prosperity in all departments of this portion of their labors. Last year the Rev. J. C. Robinson, Superintendent of the Chickasaw Manual Labor Academy, paid a visit to the Carldoes, and tried to introduce the Gospel among this remnant of their nation. The work of this church among the Indians, constitutes a regular Conference, with the exception of the Echota mission, which is within the bounds of the Holston Conference. Their work among these people bears a very compact aspect, and seems formed on a model which ought to work well. They have a regular Conference, several of the members of which are Indians ; and a Missionary Society, with male and female seminaries, and many day and Sunday-schools in vigorous and very successful operation. God has given them some noble specimens of living Christianity among these people, and every provision seems to be made for a wide diffusion of the Gospel among them, and the tribes which lie adjacent to the scenes of those missions.

The Kansas District was detached from the "Indian Mission Conference," by the General Conference of the Church South in 1850, and was attached to the St. Louis Annual Conference. The Kansas district now embraces the Shawnee, Delaware, Wyandot and Kickapoo missions, and also the Fort Leavenworth Manual Labor, and the Kansas schools. This district is under the superintendence of the Rev. J. T. Peery. There are six missions within the bounds of this district, with 263 members, and 405 children in the schools, and 135 pupils in the two seminaries. The Echota mission is situated among the North Carolina Cherokees, in the north-western corner of that State. The Holston Conference established missions among this people ; and although there is but one missionary (Rev. Ulrich Keener,) laboring among them, yet such has been the divine blessing upon this one agent of the Board, that last year he was able to report 200 members of the church, 60 children in the school, five or six conversions, and 22 admitted on trial.

The Indian Mission Conference in the "far west," embraces the larger portion of the Indian missions of this church. This Conference is situated in the Indian Territory, in lat. 34° N., and long. 97° W. We believe the Chickasaw station in this territory, is the most distant of any of the missionary stations, until we reach the Pacific coast. The seminary at this place is very efficient, and boards and educates 120 pupils. The Indian Mission Conference contains three districts, the Cherokee, Creek, and Choctaw. The last report of this Conference with a letter from the presiding bishop, will give the reader a good general impression of this most interesting field of missionary labor. The report states that general good health has prevailed through the mission during the year 1853, and then gives a view of the religious condition of the different districts. The Cherokee district has five circuits, with five white, and seven native preachers. The number of church members is 1,518 ; showing an increase from the last year of 130.

Christianity has made, and is still making a powerful impression upon the Cherokee people. About thirty years since, Richard Neally, the first Methodist missionary sent to the Cherokees, entered upon this work ; since then, thousands of precious souls have been "translated from the power of darkness into the kingdom of God's dear Son;" and while hundreds of these have died and are now in heaven, others are being converted, and ministers have been raised up, who "count not their lives dear unto themselves," and are preaching the Gospel "with the Holy Ghost sent down from Heaven." The Creek district comprises five circuits and one school. There have been, during the past year, five white, and four native missionaries. They number 728 church members, showing an increase of 100 over the past year. A great and effectual door is now open in this nation, and almost every town and neighborhood are inviting the missionaries to enter and preach to them "the unsearchable riches of Christ." The Choctaw district contains five circuits and seven academies. There are eight white and six native preachers. Number in society 1,533 ; making an increase over last year of 166. This work is now in good condition, and bids fair to yield a rich harvest of immortal souls.

The late Chickasaw Council made an appropriation of $1,000 for the purpose of extending the buildings of the Bloomfield Academy, in the Chickasaw nation, so as to accommodate 45 scholars.

We add some interesting extracts from a letter of Bishop Andrew, who presided at the last session of the Indian Mission Conference :

"VAN BUREN, ARK., Nov. 5, 1853.

"DEAR BROTHER—I bought a little carriage and a pair of ponies in St. Louis, shipped them up the river, and at the close of the Missouri Conference, started for the Creek agency, the seat of the Indian Conference. A heavy ride of about 450 miles brought me to that place the evening before the Conference began. The agency is located 12 miles beyond Fort Gibson, not far from the Arkansas river. The situation is handsome, commanding an extensive prairie view. The weather is good, and the site I should judge a healthy one. Colonel Garrett, the United States agent, we found a gentlemanly man, who seems disposed to do all in his power to promote the improvement and happiness of the Indians ; and I am glad to record that he seems to be quite popular with both Indians and whites. The Creeks are steadily improving, and manifest great interest in having their children educated.

"The schools in the Indian Conference are, I think, with a slight exception, doing well. We greatly need some dozen good zealous preachers—white men—to travel in this Conference. We have a number of good native brethren, and might have more ; but these, though valuable assistants, yet, with some few exceptions, are not well prepared to govern the church, and very few Indians have the energy and enterprise necessary for the work of church extension. The Indians themselves greatly prefer white men to teach them, and there are many neighborhoods, and they are constantly increasing, in which the people all understand English, and prefer to hear preaching in English. This process must steadily progress, until that language is spoken universally, and the sooner the result is accomplished the better ; for never till then will the Indians be generally enlightened, converted, and prosperous. Meanwhile, for the sake of the old people, translations of the Scriptures and elementary works in the native dialects will be important. But our grand aim is, to lead the young into an entire abandonment of the language, and whatever is distinctly Indian ; for after all the sentimentalism of poets and tourists, there is very little which belongs to the original savage character that is worth retaining.

"The Conference closed on Tuesday evening, and on Wednesday, in company with Brothers McAlister and Harrell, I left on my way to Tulip, the seat of the Arkansas Conference. I visited, on the way, the interesting Choctaw schools at Fort Coffee and New Hope, numbering about 50 each. They seem to be doing well. I preached here last night, and to-morrow expect, God willing, to dedicate our new church at Fort Smith, and then away for Tulip. Yours, very affectionately,

"JAMES O. ANDREW."

The Church South have 30 missions among the Indians, 28 missionaries, 4,232 members, 35 churches, 34 Sabbath-schools, 1,394 scholars, 9 manual labor schools, and 490 pupils.

Total for both churches—44 missions, 46 missionaries, 5,359 members, and 1,884 scholars.—Authorities: BANGS and STRICKLAND'S Histories of the Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church; the Missionary Advocate and Annual Reports.—REV. W. BUTLER.

WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The Indian missions in Upper Canada arose, in the providence of God, from the labors of the Methodist Episcopal Church among the aborigines within the United States. Some time during the year 1820, reports had reached a portion of the Wyandot tribe, living near Fort Malden, in Canada, of the great change which had taken place among their brethren at Sandusky. Two native preachers also visited them, and the result was the establishment of a mission among them. In 1832, there were nine missionary stations among the natives of Upper Canada, all of which were reported as in a prosperous state. They were located at Grape Island, River Credit, Lake Simcoe, Rice Lake, Grand River, Macdurb, Muncey Town, Carnard, and Bay Quinte. In each there was a missionary and a school teacher. Mackinaw and Leegeeng were also occasionally visited by native teachers. Christian instruction was given to 2,000 adult Indians, and in 11 schools there were about 400 youth. The labors of John Sunday, an Indian preacher, and of another Indian preacher, Peter Jones, were of great service in the establishment and carrying on of these missions.

In 1828, the Methodist Episcopal Church entrusted these missions to the care of the Canadian Conference; and that conference, in 1833, placed them under the fostering care of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. And the following year, the committee in London sent out Rev. J. Stinson to take the general superintendency of them. He soon visited each station, and was able to transmit to the committee a very encouraging report of their condition. He found no less than 1,200 of the native Indians, chiefly Chippeways, united in church fellowship, and by their consistent conduct, as well as by their progress in the arts and enjoyments of settled and civilized life, they strikingly manifested the great change which had taken place among them. 2,000 of their children were under a course of educational and Scriptural instruction. Six missionaries were sent out by the Wesleyan Society in 1834. And in the report some time after, the following pleasing testimony is rendered to the efficiency of these Christian labors: "The Indian missions are eminently owned of God, and furnish the most undoubted evidence of the tendency of the Gospel to diffuse the blessings of civilization, in connection with those spiritual and everlasting benefits which it is destined to communicate to all the nations of the earth. Hundreds of these once wretched wanderers have been raised from the lowest state of degradation to sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, and are living in such a state of peace and purity as affords the most delightful evidence of the reality of the outward and spiritual change which they have experienced. It is, indeed, the Lord's doings, and it is marvellous in our eyes. That form of paganism which once enthralled them has given place to Christianity; and the Indian who spurned all human restraint and control, bows his neck to the authority of Christ, and meekly carries the burden which the Redeemer has placed upon his shoulder. A state of brutal ignorance has been broken up by the force of evangelical truth; and minds from which all that tends to elevate human nature was utterly secluded, have been enriched, not only with the knowledge of letters, but with the saving knowledge of God, and of his Son Jesus Christ, our Lord. Habits of intemperance, indolence and irregularity, have been succeeded by sobriety, industry, and order. 'The songs of Zion' are now sung in those forests where, for ages, the war-cry of the savage, and the growling of wild beasts, were the only sounds that were heard. Instead of lodging in the wretched wigwam, and depending for a scanty subsistence upon their success in hunting and fishing, the converted Indians occupy comfortable houses near the River Credit, and at other stations, and these are surrounded with gardens and fields, which they themselves cultivate."

Exertions had been made during a period of forty years, to educate and civilize the Mohawk tribe of the Six Nations, established on the banks of the Grand river, and some of them had been taught to read and write; but, instead of any improvement having been effected in their moral and social state, they were more vicious and degraded in their habits than the neighboring heathen tribes, who were entirely ignorant of letters. Yet, as soon as these half-educated, but ferocious and depraved, Mohawks embraced the Gospel, they became the happy subjects of a change as extraordinary and salutary as that which had been experienced by their converted brethren of the Chippeway, and other tribes of Indians. Thus, while every attempt (and many such have been tried,) to improve the condition of the Indians by merely human expedients, has invariably and signally failed, the "Gospel of the grace of God," in the hands of missionaries, and applied by the Holy Ghost, has triumphed among them, and "created them anew in Christ Jesus unto good works."

The labors of the six missionaries sent out by the Committee in 1834, were greatly owned and blessed of God, and they were enabled to report most pleasing statements of their success. An increased attention was given to education, and also to the qualifying of native teachers to preach the word of life to their fellow-countrymen. In 1835 a whole tribe of pagan Indians had been converted at the River St. Clair, an event so extraordinary and unexpected that His Excellency Sir John Colborne remarked to one of the missionaries that, "after the gracious effects produced by the Gospel on the wretched Indians of St. Clair, there was no room left to doubt that all the tribes in British North America may be converted to the faith of Christ." This excellent man, then Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada, proved himself a true friend to the Indians. He had several small villages built expressly for them, with comfortable houses and good gardens for their occupation. Mr. Stinson, on entering one of these comfortable cottages one day, was met at the door by the father of the family, and while the tears of gratitude ran down his face, he remarked, "When I came here, nine years ago, I was a poor drunken Indian. I had nothing but one dirty blanket; but now," pointing to the various articles of furniture and provision in the room, "now I have all these good things that you see; and, what is best of all, I have the love of Christ in my heart."

In 1836, the missions not only maintained their ground, but also made considerable inroads into the territories of Satan, and paganism was forced to retire a considerable distance before the bold and rapid advances of Christianity. The mission schools also were in a good state, and this year some of the more advanced pupils were sent to the academy at Cazenovia, N. Y., there to gain that additional information and training which would fit them to be useful as instructors of their countrymen.

About the same period it also pleased God to crown the patient labors of the native teachers employed among the Tuscarora and Onondaga Indians with considerable success. Many of these pagans had been awakened, and turned to the Lord, among whom were two of their principal chiefs. The Onondagas were exceedingly intemperate and wretched, as well as strongly addicted to the worship of idols, the war-dance, and other abominations, and had long withstood the zealous efforts made by their converted brethren to turn them from the error of their ways. But among these stones did God raise up children unto Abraham.

Shahwundias, otherwise John Sunday, a converted chief of the Chippeway tribe, and an assistant-missionary among his people, during the year 1837, made a visit to England. He attended the anniversary missionary meetings of some of the principal auxiliaries through that kingdom, and by his artless and Scriptural account of his conversion and Christian experience, and of the progress of the Gospel among the Indians, he was the means of greatly increasing the zeal of the friends of Indian missions. The Committee, in conducting these missions, have been constantly tried and annoyed by the selfish and wicked designs of many unprincipled traders among these tribes; men who have habitually used all the means in their power to deceive, pollute, and rob the Indians with whom they had intercourse. But in the midst of these and other afflictive circumstances, our Indian brethren have been sustained and encouraged in the path of improvement. God raised them up friends and protectors, who from time to time warded off the evils which beset them. But, about this time, a new difficulty arose, which was likely to produce a most unfavorable influence. It was the want of a title deed of their reservations. They justly feared that at some future period, those small portions of territory, which constitute all that remains to them of the vast possessions of their fathers, would be wrested from them, and that they and their children would thus be deprived of the fruits of their industry. The Committee of the Wesleyan Missionary Society pressed the matter on the attention of the Colonial Department of the British Government, in consequence of which, and of other representations on the subject from the missionaries and chiefs, a dispatch was addressed by the Colonial Secretary to the Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada, on this subject, which was productive of the best results. Very valuable aid was rendered in accomplishing this result by Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Aug. d'East. A variety of circumstances, however, which occurred about that time, endangered the advantages thus gained, and it was found necessary by the Committee, if they would save these missions, to make another special effort on their behalf. Accordingly, the visit of the Rev. Dr. Alder, one of the missionary secretaries to Canada, about this period, had a special reference to these Indian missions. Besides the insecurity of their titles, the annual grant promised by the British Government to this society, as a fixed charge on the casual and territorial revenue of the upper province, to enable the Committee to support and extend their Indian and other missions in that colony, had been withheld; and the Committee felt it to be a duty which they owed to the society to urge their claim to a part at least of the arrears due to them, and the punctual payment of the grant, at the rate fixed by Lord Glenelg, for the future. These and other matters of importance were brought under the notice of the colonial government during the visit of Dr. Alder, by the kind and active interference of Sir George Arthur; and the representations which were made were attended with much success. £1400 were received from the colonial treasury by Mr. Stinson, and several plans for the benefit of the Indians engaged the earnest attention of the head of the Indian Department. The results of these exertions were soon witnessed in the peace and contentment with which the Indians applied themselves to the improvement of their holdings; in the increased attention which they paid to the instructions of the missionaries, and in the efforts which they made for the education of their children.

In 1838, Kah-ke-waquonaby or Peter Jones, a missionary and chief, visited England, and performed a similar service for the missions to that accomplished by Shahneundias, some time before. The tribe, of which the latter is the principal chief, removed about this time from their former residence at Grape Island, to a tract of land near Rice Lake, which was laid out in farms of 50 acres each, to which were attached snug cottages and gardens. All of these Indians profess Christianity; no vestige of paganism remaining among them. Their number is 214. In 1839, a new and extensive field of labor and usefulness was opened to this society in that part of north-western America, known as the "Territories of the Hudson's Bay Company." In the southern portion of this territory there was an Indian population of over 10,000. In the northern department, extending north and west from the height of land which divides the waters that flow into Lake Superior and the St. Lawrence from those that fall into the tributaries of the Mississippi, to the high land that divides the waters which fall into the Polar Sea from those that flow into Hudson's Bay, and in a westerly direction from Hudson's Bay to the Rocky Mountains—there is an Indian population of 100,000. To these long-neglected children of the forest the way was opened in consequence of arrangements into which the committee of this society had entered with the governor and committee of the Hudson's Bay Company, who made them most liberal offers of assistance to commence these missions. For the missionaries which this society might send, whether married or single, the Company agreed to provide board and lodging, interpreters, servants, and the means of conveyance from place to place, free of all expense to the society. And in addition to this, the governor and company generously contributed £100 toward the passage of the first missionaries to be sent out. In March, 1840, Rev. Messrs. Barnley, Mason, and Rundle sailed for this trying and extensive field of toil, and on their arrival were joined by that experienced and successful laborer in the work of Indian evangelization, the Rev. James Evans. The stations they occupied were Michipicton, Moose Fyrt, Norway House, Lac la Pluie, and Rocky Mountain House. In this immense field they itinerate from the longitude of Moose Factory, on the shores of Hudson's Bay, back N. W., by Lake Winnipeg, to Edmonton and the Rocky Mountains, a distance of more than 2000 miles from east to west, in a latitude as high as that of Labrador.

The general superintendent of these scattered missions, in one round of visitation, has sometimes been from home more than three months, traveling by snow shoes, dog-carriage, &c., during which time he has passed over about 6,000 miles. Situated as these missions are, it is hardly to be expected that they can present large statistics for a long time to come, inasmuch as from the scattered and migratory condition of the Indians, the missionaries can do little more than visit and preach for a few days, and then pass on, perhaps from 100 to 300 miles to the next post, there to do the same, and so on, all round. For these 200,000 Indians this is the only evangelical agency employed, and should this be withdrawn, they would be left in total darkness, or to the superstitions of popery. In this distant sphere of labor the missionaries are of course widely scattered, being from 400 to 1,500 miles separated from each other, with no opportunity for a personal interview, and no facilities for correspondence, save twice in the year; and of these they are by absence from home, and other causes, sometimes unable to avail themselves. A very efficient agent in this mission is Thomas Hassel, an educated Indian. He can speak English, French, Creek, and Chippewayan—the latter being his native language. He has been very useful as a school teacher and interpreter. Another Indian, Peter Jacobs, has done good service as a preacher. In 1845 there were 11 classes, containing 121 members, all of whom gave good evidence of piety. But this was only a part of the membership under the care of the missionaries, it being almost impossible from the isolated and scattered condition of the work in these regions, to obtain anything like complete statistics of them.

The Wesleyan missions among the Indians in Upper Canada continue to prosper. Schools have been established, and translations effected into the Mohawk, the Oneida, the Ojibwa, and the Munsey languages. Much is being accomplished for the elevation of these people by means of industrial schools, particularly those at Alnwick and Mount Elgin; and a great deal more might be done were the pecuniary means at the disposal of the Society. It is very affecting to read the appeals frequently made to the missionaries by tribes in their vicinity, who are uttering the Macedonian cry. As an apt illustration of the anxiety of the people to receive instruction, Mr. McDougall reports the following speech of a chief of the Garden River band of Indians, which was addressed to him before leaving his station to attend the Canadian Conference:

"Black Coat, I want to say a few words. I want to say them strong. We want you to repeat them to the Big Black Coat, and to the black coats assembled in council. The Indians down south have fathers and mothers. We are orphans. The Great Spirit has done a great deal for them; he has given them a rich country. He has also sent them missionaries, who have been parents to them. The great Woman Chief (the Queen of England) has been a mother to them. She has assisted their missionary in building large schools among them, and in teaching them how to work. They are not poor; they have plenty of kind friends. Not so with us; we are orphans—we who live on the north shore of Huron and Superior. The Great Spirit has not given us a rich country ; the missionary has not taught us the white man's religion ; no teacher has been sent us, nor school-house built for us. We are poor. We have no kind great fathers or mothers to protect us ; we are worse than our forefathers were many years ago. Our forests were full of wild animals—deer, bear, beaver, &c. ; but the white man came and induced us to kill off all our furs. He brought his steamboats and large nets, and drove the fish from our shores. We are poor, and we are becoming more so every year. Now we want you to say to the big black coats that we ask them to help us. We want them very much. We want our sons and daughters to understand paper, and to learn to work. Tell them that we live in a very large country, and that there are a great many of us. Tell them about this place, that it lies between Huron and Superior ; that the land is good ; that we raise potatoes, oats, turnips, &c., and all sell for a great price ; but that the Indian knows little about making gardens. Tell them we ask for a school like the one some of us saw at Alnwick, when we went to Moneyaung (Montreal) three years ago. We are willing to give some of the best of our land for a farm, and assist in building the houses ; but we must have white man to teach us the way.”—AUTHORITIES: Wesleyan Missionary Notices and Annual Reports.—W. AMERICAN BOARD.—At the anniversary of the American Board, in Sept. 1816, measures were reported preparatory to the establishment of a mission among the Cherokee Indians, located chiefly within the bounds of the State of Georgia. In January, 1817, Rev. Mr. Kingsbury arrived at Chickamauga, in the Cherokee nation, and commenced preparations for an establishment there. In March following he was joined by the Rev. Messrs. Hall and Williams, with their wives. Before the close of the year they were joined by other missionaries, and the name of the station was changed to Brainerd, in honor of that devoted missionary. This place is situated one mile N. of the 35th parallel of latitude, and seven miles S. E. of the Tennessee river ; consequently in that part of the Cherokee country, which falls within the limits of Tennessee. It is about 250 miles from Augusta, Ga. At the close of about a year they had a mission-house, a school-house, and 45 acres of cultivated land. Forty-seven Cherokee children were under a successful course of instruction.

In 1818, a mission was commenced among the Choctaws, by the Rev. Messrs. Kingsbury and Williams, from the Brainerd station. The place selected for the station was called Eliot, situated within the bounds of the State of Mississippi, near the Yazoo river, and 400 miles W. S. W. of the Brainerd station, in the Cherokee nation. In August of that year they felled the first tree on the mission ground, and in the following April they had erected eleven log dwellings, a mill-house, stable, store-house, and several outbuildings. They had also cleared 35 acres of good land, and enclosed it with a substantial fence, besides enclosing gardens and yards for cattle, and constructing several roads and bridges. In this work they were assisted by the Choctaws, who had never before been instructed in any such arts. Meanwhile they had preaching every Sabbath, attended by a number of natives, and some half-breeds, and negroes. During this year some preliminary steps were taken towards establishing a mission among that portion of the Cherokee nation who had removed to the Arkansas, on the west side of the Mississippi river, and also among the Chickasaws, whose country lay partly between that of the Cherokees and Choctaws.

The report of the Board for 1820 speaks of the conversion of several natives among the Cherokees at Brainerd, and of the gathering of a church of 20 members, including 8 or 4 negroes. Particular mention is made of Catharine Brown and her brother David, two Cherokee converts of great promise. Having occasion to visit their father, who was sick, David read and explained to him the Bible, and maintained family worship, and also conversed freely with their friends and neighbors, warning them to flee from the wrath to come. Several were thus led to inquire for the way of truth.

The station at Eliot, among the Choctaws, is reported this year, 1820, after an existence of two years, as having eight commodious log-cabins, a mill-house, and a blacksmith's and joiner's shop; a lumber-house, granary, and stable; more than two hundred neat cattle, teams of oxen, and horses; wagons, carts, plows, and other implements of husbandry, sufficient for a large plantation. The importance of these things to a tribe entirely savage, till the missionaries went among them, and without the least knowledge of agriculture, will be readily understood. They had also a school of seventy or eighty youths, male and female, taught in the elementary branches, and in agriculture and domestic labor. It was a most encouraging fact, that the Choctaw chiefs, from the first, manifested the most friendly disposition towards the mission. They contributed for the support of the mission-school $2,000 a year for sixteen years, from each of the three districts of their nation, making $6,000 a year, or a total of $96,000. This large sum was their proportion of the proceeds of land sold to the United States government. Such a gift, freely made, shows a surprising appreciation of the importance of education, among a people, till lately, ignorant of every thing but the simple arts of fishing and hunting.

In January, 1821, Dr. Elzur Butler, physician, and Rev. William Potter, arrived at Brainerd, as missionaries among the Cherokees. The mission had been extended, and was to embrace 3 out-stations, viz., Talonney, Chatooga, and Creekpath. In connection with Creekpath is mentioned one of the most remarkable displays of Divine grace which the history of missions affords, viz.: the conversion of the entire family of Mr. John Brown, consisting of eight persons. The conversion of Catharine and David Brown, and their visit to their sick father, have already been mentioned. The father was converted, and subsequently the mother, a son's wife, and three sisters of Catharina. Thus a whole family emerged in a short time from pagan darkness into the light of the glorious Gospel.

The Choctaw mission was strengthened during this year, by the arrival of several additional laborers. Besides the station at Eliot, three others, viz., at Mayhew, 100 miles east from Eliot, the Six Towns, and the French Camps, were commenced. Rev. Dr. Worcester, corresponding secretary of the Board, died this year, while on a visit to the Choctaw missions.

In 1822 there were 218 Cherokee children in the school at Brainerd, rapidly improving in their studies, and in various departments of industry. The oldest class of girls sustained, it was said, a better examination than most girls of the same age who have attended school constantly from their early years. Several of the most promising scholars had become pious, and others were anxiously inquiring the way of salvation.

Rev. Mr. Butrick, of the Cherokee mission, reported this year, 1822, considerable progress in the acquisition of the language. He found it "very artificial and complicated, evincing, beyond a doubt, that it was once spoken by a highly-cultivated people." Mr. B. had made translations into Cherokee of several portions of the Scriptures, a summary of Christian doctrines and duties, and several hymns for public worship.

The report for 1823 shows an extension of the Cherokee mission; three new stations having been occupied, viz., Hightower, 60 miles S. S. E. from Brainerd; Willstown, 60 miles S. W. from Brainerd; and Haweis, 60 miles south from Brainerd. In connection with the Creekpath station, is noticed this year the death of Catharine Brown. She had been an ornament to religion since joining the church in 1818, and died a happy death. An important and solemn transaction occurred this year—the admission to the church of four brothers, named Sanders, their mother, the wives of two of the brothers, and one sister. These having been baptized, proceeded to dedicate their household to God in the same ordinance, to the number of 21, some of them adults. Says Mr. Hall, one of the missionaries, "It was a melting scene; scarcely was a dry eye in the house. It was not without exertion that some kept from weeping aloud. The aged mother and the rest of the family appeared deeply affects." Two or three other members of this family were soon afterwards converted.

Many interesting facts are stated this year, 1823, by the missionaries among the Choctaws. In the school at Eliot were about 40 children, the greater part of whom could read the Bible and write a legible hand. Some were expert in translating from English into Choctaw, and from Choctaw into English; others had made considerable progress in arithmetic and in drawing maps. Messrs. Byington and Wright had made some progress in reducing to form the elements of the Choctaw language, assisted by Mr. David Felson, who had spent four years at the Foreign Mission School at Cornwall, Ct. They had agreed upon an alphabet, and assigned the powers of the vowels, marks of accent, &c. To adopt a uniform mode of spelling was extremely difficult, owing to the variations of speaking among the natives, who used various letters interchangeably, as b for m, and m for b, &c. Some thousands of words, however, had been collected, and Mr. Byington had acquired some facility in speaking "this strange language."

The Mayhew station experienced a severe bereavement this year, in the death of Mrs. Kingsbury. She was a woman of rare qualifications, and a devoted missionary. She had left a father's house, abounding with all the comforts of a New England home, for the superintendence of a large mission family, among the ignorant and neglected children of the forest; yet she never once regretted her decision. On her death she only lamented that she had not done more for Christ.

The station called French Camps, received this year the name of Bethel. It is about 60 miles S. W. from Mayhew, and the same distance S. E. from Eliot. Another Choctaw station was commenced about this time at a place called Emmaus, 140 miles S. E. from Mayhew, near the line which separates Mississippi from Alabama, and not far from the white settlements of the south. Another station was commenced at Yokana Cha-kama, 115 miles S. W. from Mayhew, and 120 miles N. W. from Mobile.

Two important laws were passed by the Choctaw nation during the year 1823; one was for the suppression of intemperance, and the other related to infanticide. For a long time the Choctaws had carried on a great trade in whisky. Those who could, paid money for it, others gave cattle, clothes, blankets, guns, and every species of property. Their love of whisky exceeded all bounds, and there were white people from the States, unprincipled and vile enough to furnish it to them. The consequence was, poverty, wretchedness, quarreling and murder filled the country. The law passed by the chiefs nearly suppressed this great evil.

The inhuman practice of infanticide had existed among the Choctaws from time immemorial, though this fact was not known till the missionaries went among them. A father or mother, to get rid of the trouble or support of an infant, would kill it by burying it alive, stamping on its breast, strangling it, or knocking it on the head. This horrid custom the chiefs, enlightened by missionary efforts, put an end to by very stringent laws. The first punishment under the new law was that of a woman who had killed her infant by knocking it on the head with a pine knot. She was tied to a tree and whipped till she fainted; and her husband, who instigated the deed, was punished in the same manner.

Supposed witchcraft was another cause of much suffering to this people. They experienced imaginary terrors from the apprehension that evil spirits exerted a supernatural power to do them harm; and besides this, application was often made to a conjurer that he would designate a witch, and for some paltry fee he would fix upon some person, generally a woman, as the cause of the calamity complained of. The devoted object was then hunted down and slain, or obtained safety by flight. But this evil disappeared as the light of the Gospel increased.

The mission among the Cherokees on the Arkansas was now in successful operation. The seat of the mission was at a place called Dwight, on the Illinois Creek, about four miles north of the Arkansas, and nearly 500 miles, following the course of the stream, from the junction of this river with the Mississippi. There were at this station, in 1823, two missionaries, two teachers, and one mechanic.

It may be proper to state here the reason why some of the Cherokee tribe were found on the other side of the Mississippi. In the first place some of them wandered thither for the purpose of hunting. Afterwards, as they grew more numerous, a treaty was made with the United States, by which these Indians exchanged their lands in Georgia and Tennessee, for lands on the Arkansas river. This led to a considerable migration, so that nearly one-third of the Cherokee tribe removed to a place 700 miles west of the place of their nativity. They were composed chiefly of that portion of the Cherokees who were least inclined to look with a favorable eye upon missions, schools, and civilization, so that the prejudices to be encountered among them were peculiarly strong. A school was, however, established, and gradually the jealousy of the Indians gave way, and they rejoiced in the education of their children. As the system of education included manual labor at agriculture, or the mechanic arts, many objections were raised on this ground, but the great utility of such arts was at length seen, and opposition died away.

From the very commencement of missionary labors among the North American Indians, doubts were very extensively entertained as to the possibility of their conversion, or even civilization. They were looked upon as wild men, savages, incorrigibly addicted to hunting, fishing, and wars among themselves, and the attempt to make them an agricultural, sober, and Christian people, was regarded by many good men as hopeless. The common remark was, "The Indian will be an Indian in spite of all that can be done for him." This deep prejudice, however, gradually gave way before the facts which were circulated through the reports of the Board and other publications. In their journal for 1823, the missionaries, alluding to the prevailing impression, say, "We think it would be impossible to show any substantial reasons for thinking that the aborigines of America are in a more hopeless state than the inhabitants of Asia or Africa. That such a belief is erroneous is incontrovertibly manifest, from the labors of Eliot, the Mayhews, Brainerd, and the United Brethren." In noticing these remarks the Board say, "Beyond all reasonable doubt, divine truth is as likely to be efficacious upon the heart of a Cherokee, who has arrived at mature age, as upon any other man who has grown up in ignorance and sin."

The above facts are important as showing the peculiar embarrassments of the Board in its early efforts among the Indian tribes of this country. Missions to the Islander and the Hindoe might be successful, but not those to the red man of the forest. But the Board and its missionaries had more faith, and pursued their object with a steady purpose.

The Cherokee mission in 1823 and 1824 was marked by a steady progress, and the Board were led to remark, in their review, that the Cherokees were "making advances in civilization and a well regulated society. The dwellings are made more comfortable from year to year, regular industry is more pursued, laws are enacted and executed which restrain from immorality and secure a respect for civil government, and a desire for acquiring an education is becoming more prevalent."

The Choctaw mission was enlarged this year by the occupancy of several new stations. Mr. Byington, Mr. Wright, and some other members of the mission, were giving special attention to the language, in order that they might communicate religious instruction to those who could not understand English. Whisky drinking had been very much diminished, and the woe of a drunken Indian had not been heard for some months. This change had been effected in great measure by the laws of the Choctaws themselves. A dreadful mortality prevailed among this people during 1823 and 1824, and 2,000 are supposed to have died in 18 months, which was about one-tenth of the whole population. The prevalent disease was the measles.

The mission among the Cherokees of the Arkansas was more systematic and regular in its operations than the others, owing to the fact of its having but one station, that at Dwight. The school contained 60 scholars, and the missionaries say, "The number might be increased to 100 or 150 within a few days, if we would open our doors for their reception. But our limited resources forbid our enlarging the number." In their report this year the Board say, "As the missionaries become more acquainted with the state of this tribe, especially by holding intercourse with the more aged, and making inquiries respecting former times, they are convinced that anciently the people had the knowledge of the true God; but a long period must have elapsed since the glory departed from them. In many instances the adult natives have never heard of the immortality of the soul. In others they entertain a vague notion that the good and the bad go to different places in the future world. But how it is possible for a bad man to become good they do not know. Indeed they have no clear idea of what goodness or badness is, no just views of sin, no idea of forgiveness, no conception of a holy God or a universal Providence."

A highly favorable mention is made this year of Mr. John Brown, a Choctaw who joined the Foreign Mission School at Cornwall in 1820, and subsequently spent two years at Andover, making at both places very rapid progress in his studies. After lecturing to crowded audiences in the principal cities of the north on the condition of his nation, and spending a season at Washington, he returned to his countrymen and to his father's house, near Dwight, where he was received with much kindness and attention.

As the missions among the various tribes of Indians begin to assume at this period a more distinct and important, as well as complicated character, in the reports and journals, and as the number requiring notice is from time to time increased, a separate and continued account of each down to the present time will, it is thought, be a matter of convenience to the reader, and this method will be hereafter adopted. In pursuance of this plan, we take up, as first, in the order of time.

The Mission among the Cherokees.—The progress of the work from its commencement, in January, 1817, down to 1824, has already been briefly sketched. At the period last named, we find the mission to the Cherokees in the Southern States occupying seven stations, viz., Brainerd, Carmel, Creekpath, Hightower, Willstown, Haweis, and Gandy's Creek. The geographical position of Brainerd, Hightower, Willstown, and Haweis, has already been designated. Carmel is within the chartered limits of Georgia, 62 miles from Brainerd, and 46 miles north-west of the Chatahochee river. Creekpath is within the State of Alabama, four miles south of the Tennessee river; Hightower is in Georgia, 35 miles S.S.W. of Carmel; Willstown is in Alabama, 10 miles from the western line of Georgia, and Candy's Creek is in Tennessee, 25 miles N.E. of Brainerd. The number of laborers at these seven stations at this period (1824,) including missionaries, teachers, farmers, mechanics, and the wives of these several classes, amounted to 30.

The number of scholars in the mission schools among the Cherokees was less at this period than in some former years, partly because more discrimination was used in taking children into families. The good done was at no time greater.

It was in this year that the missionaries, and the churches under their care at Brainerd, Carmel, Hightower, and Willstown, were received into the Union Presbytery of East Tennessee. It was expected that this would naturally increase the interest felt in missions by the ministers and churches in the adjacent new settlements.

Another event of importance to the mission and to the whole Cherokee nation, was the invention of a form of alphabetical writing by George Guess. He was a Cherokee, and could neither speak nor read English, yet he became acquainted with a leading principle of the English language, viz., that marks or characters can be made the symbols of sound, and he conceived the notion that he could express all the syllables of the Cherokee language by separate characters. On collecting all the syllables which, after long study and trial, he could recall to memory, he found the number to be 82. In order to express these, he took the letters of our alphabet for a part of them, and various modifications of our letters, with some characters of his own invention, for the rest. With these symbols he set about writing letters: and very soon a correspondence was actually maintained between him and his countrymen beyond the Mississippi, 500 miles apart. This soon became a matter of great interest, and young Cherokees traveled great distances to be instructed in this new and easy method of writing and reading. In three days they were able to commence letter writing, and return home to their native villages prepared to teach others. Subsequently, either Guess or some other person, discovered four other syllables, making all the known syllables of the Cherokee language 86. It is a curious fact that all syllables in Cherokee end with vowels. The same is true of the language of the Islanders of the Pacific Ocean. But in the Choctaw language syllables often end with consonants.

The mission among the Cherokees of the Arkansas has, as already noticed, only the station at Dwight, which is near the Arkansas river, about 200 miles from its mouth in a direct line, and 500 miles by the course of the river. There were at this place, in 1824, 12 white persons; including two missionaries, a teacher, a steward, a farmer, and a mechanic, and their wives. There was a school for boys, and one for girls, which were making very encouraging progress, and the missionaries expressed the opinion that many of the pupils would not suffer by a comparison with scholars of their age in any of the states. These children were but a little while before wandering in the forest, totally without mental and moral cultivation.

In 1825, Rev. Samuel A. Worcester and his wife joined the mission at Brainerd, and, at the same time, two farmers, with their wives and a female teacher, went out to be employed at different stations. The schools at Brainerd were in a fine condition. As evidence of capacity in the Indian youth, it was stated that a boy, ten years old, who had been in school less than five months, not having previously learned the English alphabet, was spelling in words of three syllables, and had never missed but a single word. To master in so short a time a foreign language, and one so arbitrary in its mode of spelling, indicates very unusual quickness and strength of mind. The education of females was found to be of great assistance in the work of civilization. At the Willstown station, an important moral reformation had taken place. When the first missionary came there; in 1823, the intemperate use of ardent spirits was almost universal; but, now, intoxicating liquor was entirely disused by a great majority of the people, and riotous assemblages were unknown.

The knowledge of Guess's alphabet was increasing, and many adults who had never learnt the English letters, and never would, it was thought, would immediately read the New Testament, if printed and written in this character. As an evidence of the progress of civilization, the trial by jury was introduced this year, and conducted with great solemnity. The national council also appropriated money for the establishment of a printing-press, with English and Cherokee types, and for laying the foundation of a public school. In aid of these objects, Mr. Elias Boudinot visited the northern states, and received liberal patronage.

As the Cherokees occupied portions of several states, and the question of boundaries and titles was one of great importance, the secretaries took occasion this year to state, in their report, that the Indian titles were in no way affected by the limits of different states, whether fixed by the states themselves, or by Congress. The national authorities had uniformly admitted that the tribes of Indians in North America had a perfect right to the soil of their ancestors, now in their own occupancy, unless that right had been voluntarily relinquished for a good consideration. "When we speak, therefore, of Indian territory, as lying in the State of Tennessee, or in the State of Georgia, it is not intended that the Indians there residing are subject to the laws of the whites, or that the running of a line through their country, or marking it upon a map, has any effect to impair their claims, or dispossess them of their patrimonial inheritance. The only way in which this inheritance can be alienated, is by treaties fairly and honorably made, and with the full assent of the present owners." These remarks will enable the reader to judge, not only of the rights of the Indians, but of the manner in which those rights were subsequently treated by the national government. It may be added, that large tracts had already been sold by treaties, to the United States, and the territories which remained to the Cherokees contained about 12,000 square miles, or 8,000,000 acres. About two-thirds of this country lay in the north-west corner of Georgia, one-fifth in the north-east part of Alabama, one-tenth in the south-east part of Tennessee, and a small portion in the south-west corner of North Carolina. The Cherokee population was supposed, in 1825, to be about 14,000. They had already made great advances in learning, and in agriculture and mechanic arts. The national council met annually for the exercise of legislative functions, and government was administered according to the usages of civilized countries. A regular constitution, however, had not been adopted, and in the summer of 1826 a council was held, and a committee appointed to draft a constitution. Measures were also taken this year at Boston, to prepare types in the peculiar character invented by Guess, and to provide a printing-press for the nation.

In the autumn of 1827, Mr. David Greene was appointed to visit all the missionary stations among the Indians in the south-western and western parts of the United States, which service he performed,—traveling 6,000 miles, inspecting 30 stations, and reaching Boston in July, 1828. His report, so far as it related to the Cherokees, authorized the statement, that nearly all the adult population, and in the tribe at large more than half, were actually capable of reading their own language, a fact almost incredible, but for the facilities afforded by the alphabet of Guess. There was a wonderful improvement, also, in regard to houses, dress, style of living, industry, &c.; the men being found upon well-cultivated farms, and the women spinning and weaving cotton, and providing garments of their own manufacture. More than 500 children had been taught in the mission schools, and 160 communicants belonged to the churches of the seven stations. This was justly considered by the Board and the missionaries very great and encouraging progress to have been made in ten years, and it ought to have silenced forever the objection that the Indians could not be civilized and Christianized. Rarely, if ever, has missionary labor been productive of greater results, within the same period, in any heathen country.

In 1828, Mr. Worcester occupied a new station at New Echota, not far from Brainerd and devoted himself chiefly to the translation of the Scriptures, and the preparation of religious books and tracts. A printing-press had been put in operation at this place, at the expense of the Cherokees.

Among the Cherokees of the Arkansas, during the few years just noticed, operations were continued with general success. At Dwight a house of worship had been erected, and there was no family in which some were not hopefully pious. Within 25 miles of this place there was a population of 1,200, not including the whites, and stated preaching was maintained in various neighborhoods among these people. Schools were sustained, and the progress made in education, husbandry, &c., was similar to that among the Cherokees in the southern states. A United States agent, Major Duval, residing near Dwight, declared to the corresponding secretary, that a single school for girls at that place, had done more to improve the condition of the Indians, than all the sums of money expended by the government, in furnishing them with implements of husbandry, and annual distributions of clothing.

In 1829, we find the Cherokees possessed of a regularly organized civil government, and of a written language, unlike any other that ever existed, and yet complete, by the use of which adults could learn to read their native tongue in ten, five, and even three days; and this language the invention of an uninstructed Cherokee! For a considerable time this mission had attracted special attention, both because it was the first mission of the Board to the American Indians, and because of the success which had attended it. But now the eyes of America and of many people in Europe began to be directed with new interest to this tribe, on account of the measures which were in contemplation for their removal. The Cherokees themselves began to be in great fear and anxiety lest they should be driven from the lands received from their fathers, and constrained to migrate to a country for which they had no attachment, and which, in their view, would be only a resting-place for a few years, when they would be again driven off, dispersed, and destroyed.

In September of this year the nation was deprived of one of its most useful and valued men, Mr. David Brown. He became pious in 1820, acquired his education at the north, and traveled much in the United States, receiving everywhere the esteem and affection of the people. He had been much engaged in public business, but at the time of his last illness was studying with a view to preach the Gospel. He was the fifth member of the same family who had died in the triumphs of the Christian faith.

In 1830, we find the Cherokee nation in an increasingly troubled and distracted state. A treaty for their removal had already been formed between the United States government and leading men of the tribe, in opposition, however, to a large majority of the Cherokees. The subject was engrossing the attention of Congress and of the nation, and it seemed a fitting time for the secretaries to record publicly their views of the subject, as it related to the Cherokees; and accordingly, in their report of this year, they said, "Whatever may be thought of some questions relating to this matter, the following points are indisputable, viz., that treaties in existence between the United States and the Cherokee nation guarantee the inviolability of the Cherokee territory and of the Cherokee government; that the words in which these engagements are expressed are perfectly plain, not admitting of doubt or cavil; and that these words express what was the real meaning of the parties at the time, and what was understood to be the meaning by both parties for more than forty years. It is true, also, that the Cherokees conceive themselves to have a perfect right to their own country, and that they are unwilling to leave it. The few who have consented to emigrate, have done so from the apprehension that all would be compelled to remove, and that those who remained longest would be in the most unfavorable circumstances." In March of the same year, Mr. Worcester wrote a letter on the subject of the advancement of the Cherokees in civilization, and their feelings with regard to a removal, and addressed it to a member of the Cherokee deputation at Washington. It was printed by the Senate, and appended to a report from the War Department. It gave a fair and candid account of the actual condition of the Cherokees, and may be found in the Herald of May, 1830.

Amid all these disturbances, public religious meetings were held at all the stations as usual, and the schools and printing-press were kept in operation. At the beginning of 1831 there were eight churches, embracing in all 219 members, at the stations occupied by this mission, of whom 167 were Cherokees, and the remainder were of African descent, or white persons residing in the nation. The number of scholars in all the schools was 150, which was less than usual, the school at Braiuerd having been broken up by the burning of their school-house. A Cherokee Sunday-school Union had been organized, embracing six schools, eight teachers, and 113 scholars. During the year, the mission had also printed 1,400 copies of the Cherokee hymn-book, 1,000 copies of the Gospel of Matthew, and 3,000 copies of a tract of twelve pages, consisting of extracts from the Old and New Testaments. These had all been prepared by Mr. Worcester, assisted by Elias Boudinot, who was at the same time editor of a well-conducted and useful paper, called the "Cherokee Phoenix."

At the period just named, fourteen years from the commencement of the mission, the secretaries could say, "The mass of the people, in their dress, houses, furniture, agricultural implements, manner of cultivating the soil, raising stock, providing for their families, and in their estimate of the value of an education, will not suffer by a comparison with the whites in the surrounding settlements. The mass of the people have externally embraced the Christian religion. Intemperance, the bane of the Indian as well as the white man, has been checked; the laws of the nation rigorously exclude intoxicating liquors from all public assemblies; and numerous societies for the promotion of temperance have been organized." But in spite of these improvements and these laws, the secretaries were obliged to add, in their report for 1831, that "the nation has been made to experience nearly all the political and domestic evils with which, for two or three years, they had been threatened. Their government has been nearly prostrated; their council has been forbidden to assemble; their laws have been declared null and void, and their magistrates prohibited, under severe penalties, from enforcing them; intoxicating liquors have been introduced without restraint; their country has been traversed by armed troops; their property has been plundered, their persons arrested and imprisoned; the land which they know is theirs by immemorial possession, and which has been guaranteed to them by numerous and perfectly explicit treaties, has been claimed by others, and surveyed, and they themselves threatened with immediate ejectment. These and other vexations and sufferings to which they have been subjected, have filled the nation with anxiety and alarm." In this condition of discouragement, and almost of despair, some, as was to be expected, gave themselves up to idleness and intemperance, and ceased to cultivate fields and erect buildings, not knowing who should possess them. The future was all dark, for if they could not hold their present country they could be secure of no resting-place, however it might be secured to them by solemn treaties. The Board had already addressed a memorial to Congress on this subject, the preparation of which was the last official act of the Corresponding Secretary, Rev. Dr. Cornelius. It was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, but was not known to produce any important results.

In addition to all the other embarrassments thrown in the way of the mission, and the distresses caused to the Cherokees, the missionaries themselves began, in 1831, to be arrested and imprisoned. In January of this year, the missionaries at Carmel, Hightower, Haweis, and New Echota, the four stations lying within the territory claimed by Georgia, were served with copies of a law, then just passed, declaring, in substance, that all white men found within the State after the first of the following March, without having taken an oath of allegiance to the State, would be imprisoned in the penitentiary at hard labor, for a term of not less than four years. But there were important and obvious reasons why the missionaries should not abandon the field; and they could not take the prescribed oath without an admission that Georgia was right. They therefore concluded to remain at their posts and abide the consequences. They were unmolested till the 12th of March, when a detachment of the Georgia guard, consisting of twenty-six armed and mounted men, proceeded to each of the four stations named, and arrested three of the missionaries, viz, Messrs. Proctor, Worcester, and Thompson. The fourth, Mr. Buttrick, was absent. They were taken to the head-quarters of the guard, where they employed legal counsel, and were set free by the judge of the Superior Court of Gwinnet county, on the ground that they were under the patronage of the United States government, and were in such a sense its agents that the laws of Georgia did not apply to them. They therefore returned to their stations, anticipating no further troubles of this nature.

A correspondence was now held between the Governor of Georgia and the President of the United States, the result of which was a statement by the president, that he did not consider the missionaries as being in any sense agents of the government. Upon this the missionaries received letters, informing them of their exposure, and giving them ten days to remove out of the State or take the required oath. Messrs. Buttrick, Proctor and Thompson thought it expedient to remove with their families. Dr. Butler was arrested, but released on account of sickness in his family, upon a promise that he would deliver himself up at the proper time. Mr. Thompson, who continued to visit his station at Hightower, was subsequently arrested and treated in the most brutal manner. Though seriously ill, and offering to furnish himself a horse, he was compelled to walk, and when he could walk no longer he was thrust into a most offensive and uncomfortable wagon. At one time he was chained. After being locked up in jail awhile he was dismissed, and told to go where he pleased, but no provision was made for his return. A month later, Mr. Worcester and Dr. Butler were again arrested, and subjected to cruelties and indignities such as savages themselves would scarcely inflict upon their captives. The shocking and painful details of the treatment which they received from the military, both on the march and in the filthy and wretched prison into which they were thrust, are given at length in a letter written by Mr. Worcester, and published in the annual report for 1831. They were finally taken out of the hands of the military, and released, on giving bonds to appear at the superior court of Gwinnet county, in September. On the 25th of that month they were tried, and Mr. Worcester and Dr. Butler, with eight other white men, one a missionary of the Methodist Episcopal church, were sentenced to four years hard labor in the penitentiary. On arriving at the door of the prison they were all offered a pardon and release, on condition of their removing from the State, or taking the oath of allegiance to the laws of Georgia, and all but two of them accepted of these humiliating terms. Mr. Worcester and Dr. Butler, believing that obedience to such laws would be treason against God, conceded nothing, and were committed to the penitentiary.

Measures were taken to bring the matter before the Supreme Court of the United States, and a writ of error having been granted by the justices of that court, the case was brought up and ably argued, in February 1832, by Messrs. Wirt and Sergeant in behalf of the plaintiffs in error. The decision was pronounced by Chief-Justice Marshall, on the 3d of the following March. It reviewed the whole subject of Indian titles, the treaties which had been made with the Indians, and the recent laws of Georgia, which extended the jurisdiction of the State over the Cherokee country, and these laws were pronounced repugnant to the Constitution, to treaties, and to the laws of the United States. The mandate of the Court was immediately issued, reversing and annulling the judgment of the Superior Court of Georgia, and ordering that all proceedings on the indictment against the prisoners do forever cease, and that the prisoners be, and hereby are dismissed therefrom.

But the Superior Court of Georgia refused to obey the mandate, or to discharge the prisoners. A memorial to the President of the United States was prepared by the counsel for the prisoners, praying him to interpose his authority for enforcing the decision of the Court. Upon consultation, however, it was thought inexpedient to present the memorial; neither was it thought advisable to prosecute the case by a second appeal to the Supreme Court; for it was well understood, that though that Court would sustain its own decision, the President, (Andrew Jackson) was not inclined to enforce it, and therefore the result would be doubtful. Further, the missionaries had the assurance of an unconditional release, provided they would desist from the attempt to obtain that release by a military enforcement of the decision of the Supreme Court. This assurance came not from any solicitations on their part. They made "no solicitation, no overture, no compromise." But they were often and earnestly solicited by persons in the confidence of the Governor of Georgia, to desist from the prosecution, and assured that if they did so, they should not long remain in prison. Even after they had given notice, as they did at one time, of their intention to move the Supreme Court for a further process, they were waited upon by two members elect of Congress, whose names are given, and told officially, that they had conversed with the Governor on the subject, and knew his views, and that they might regard it as certain, if they withdrew the suit, that they would be discharged without any concession, or condition, or even an application to the Governor. These repeated pledges induced the prisoners, by their counsel, to drop all further proceedings, and on the 14th of January, 1833, the keeper of the penitentiary received a proclamation from the Governor of the State, directing him to set Messrs. Worcester and Butler at liberty. This he communicated to them forthwith, and discharged them. They immediately returned to the stations which they had respectively occupied in the Cherokee country, and resumed their missionary labors.

The reasons which determined the conduct of these brethren from first to last, were stated by them with great clearness and force, and published in the report of the Board for 1833. In the same report may be found the decision and mandate of the Supreme Court; the reply of the Court of Georgia; the memorial of the Board, praying for the protection of the missionaries, and several other important documents relating to this subject.

During the year and four months that Messrs. Worcester and Butler were in prison, they were permitted daily to read the Scriptures, and pray with the prisoners confined in the same building; and during the last six months or more, Mr. Worcester preached once every Sabbath to all the prisoners. A spirit of inquiry was awakened, and many, it is believed, were savingly benefitted.

It is painful in the extreme to dwell upon such facts as have been recorded in the preceding pages; and it seems scarcely credible that they could have occurred in a country like ours, and in an enlightened Christian State. It is not surprising that missionaries should occasionally fare thus at the hands of benighted Brahmins, or proud Mussulmans, but that in the United States, and within 25 years, they should have been dragged from their fields of labor by an armed soldiery, and treated like felons; under laws, too, enacted for the very purpose of extinguishing Indian claims, and getting possession of their lands, in violation of treaties and of the Constitution, and all this persisted in against the decision of the highest judicial tribunal in the land, — this is surprising and deeply humiliating; and it forms a chapter in our country's history, which, for naked injustice, mercenary aims, and bold contempt of national faith and honor, is scarcely equaled by any of the public wrongs and oppressions laid to her charge.

During the period of these troubles there was no regular instruction at the four stations within the limits of Georgia, and at the other stations the work was prosecuted under great disadvantages. Previous to the release of Messrs. Worcester and Butler, the whole Cherokee country, lying within the chartered limits of Georgia, had been surveyed and divided into lots of 140 acres each, and distributed by lottery among the citizens of that State. The laws of Georgia had begun to be enforced, counties had been organized, courts held, and magistrates and civil officers appointed. In this state of things, the Cherokees were divided on the question of ceding their lands by treaty to the United States; but whether they did so or not, it had become evident to all that they must remove, either peaceably or under a despotism which they could not resist. In the beginning of 1834, the number of white settlers on the Indian lands was estimated to outnumber the Indians themselves, and no art was left untried by the whites to draw them into intemperance and every kind of debauchery. The depression of morals was deplorable, and yet not so general as might have been expected. Most of the influential men of the nation manifested much firmness and dignity of character, and remained the steadfast friends of the mission, and of the intellectual and moral improvement of these people.

After repeated negotiations and conferences between the Indians and the government at Washington, the details of which it is unnecessary to give here, a treaty was at length agreed upon, Dec. 1835, by which the Cherokees ceded the whole of the country which they occupied, and consented to be removed to a territory west of the Mississippi within two years. For their lands, improvements, buildings, &c., they were to receive $500,000, and $650,000 to defray the expenses of their removal, and of sustaining them one year after their arrival at their new homes. This treaty was negotiated with the representatives of a party or section of the Indians, and against it Mr. Ross and his friends protested in all the stages of its progress, as being unsatisfactory in its provisions, made contrary to the will of the nation, and with persons wholly unauthorized to transact such business. All attempts to annul or improve it, however, failed, and nothing remained but its rigid enforcement.

The time allowed the Indians to remain expired on the 23d of May, 1838, and immediately after that day the military commenced their operations. Families were taken from their houses and farms, leaving their furniture, fields and flocks as they were, unprotected, to be possessed by they knew not whom, and were marched under strong guards to camps selected to be their starting places for a distant, and to them a strange land. In June nearly the whole tribe had been taken from their houses to the camps, and some thousands were started off on their dreary march westward. Owing, however, to the extreme heat of the season, emigration was soon suspended, and the great body of the Indians remained till the coming autumn.

On the Sabbath, Aug. 19, the Lord's Supper was administered for the last time by the missionaries, to as many as could be collected at Brainerd; and early in October the Cherokee people bid a mournful and reluctant adieu to the country of which they had long and strenuously, but in vain, been endeavoring to retain possession. They were divided into fourteen companies, embracing nearly 16,000 persons. Their route lay through the States of Tennessee, Kentucky, Illinois, Missouri, and Arkansas, a distance of six or seven hundred miles, and all the companies but one made this journey by land, consuming from three and a half to five and a half months on the way. Dwelling, as they had, within the narrow limits of encampments for four months before starting, and sheltered only by tents on the way, and much of the time without adequate food or clothing, it is not wonderful that great suffering and mortality were experienced among them. According to the most careful estimates, there was an average of from 13 to 15 deaths a day from the time they started, and by the time the last company had reached its destination, between 4,000 and 5,000 persons had died, or more than one-fourth of the whole population in the space of ten months. This, it was admitted by the friends of the Cherokees and of the mission, resulted from the nature of the case, and not from any unnecessary exposure or bad treatment on the part of those who were employed in carrying the deplorable measure into effect.

The dissensions which prevailed among the Cherokees before their removal were not less annoying in their new home. In June, 1839, after the close of a council during which there had been much party heat, Major Ridge, his son, John Ridge, and Elias Boudinot, were assassinated. They had taken a leading part in the treaty of Dec. 1835, and fell victims to the enmity awakened by that measure in the minds of the opposing party.

Omitting, for want of space, the details of re-settlement, and the reorganization of the mission, we find them, in 1840, occupying four stations, viz., Dwight, Fairfield, Park Hill, and Honey Creek. Dwight, as already explained, is a few miles north of the Arkansas river, about 500 miles from its junction with the Mississippi, or 200 miles in a straight line. This had been the centre of missionary operations for several years among the Cherokees who early removed to that country. The other stations were at no great distance from this, and there were in this field, in 1840, five missionaries, one physician, three male and fifteen female assistants, two native preachers, and one native printer, making a total of 27.

Among the missionaries were Messrs. Worcester and Butler, and several others who had labored in the old Cherokee country.

In 1841, when full returns began to be received, there were five churches, and over 200 communicants. There were also five schools, embracing 225 pupils. The school fund of the Cherokees was sufficient to support teachers and furnish books, stationery, &c., for eleven public schools, and the system was ready to go into operation as soon as teachers could be procured. A mission press was in operation at Park Hill, and a Cherokee almanac, an edition of Cherokee laws, and the epistles of John, had been printed. Large meetings had been held for the promotion of temperance, and about 1,000 of the Cherokees were living in conformity to the temperance pledge. The amount of printing executed at the mission press in 1843, was reported to be 140,000 pages. The congregation at Fairfield erected this year a large and convenient house of worship, the old one having become too small.

In 1844 the mission press executed, in the Cherokee language, the following works, viz.: Acts of the Apostles, 5000 copies; Gospel of Matthew, 5000 copies; Select Passages of Scripture, 5000 copies; Evils of Intoxicating Drinks, 5000; a tract, Poor Sarah, 5000; Christian Almanac, 1000; making a total of 26,000 copies, and of 1,586,000 pages. Besides this, over 50,000 pages of various works were executed in the Choctaw language.

During the years 1846, 1847, and 1848, no very marked changes were reported. Party strifes continued, and outrages on property and life were prevalent, but they were not of such a nature as to interrupt missionary labor at either of the stations. The general sentiment of the people was against the sale of intoxicating liquor, and some 3000 persons were enrolled as members of total abstinence societies. The cause of education also has an upward tendency, and two high schools, one for boys and one for girls, were established, and the necessary buildings erected, at an expense of fifteen or twenty thousand dollars each, all which was defrayed by the Cherokees themselves. The structure of their alphabet afforded great facilities in the acquisition of knowledge, and the name of George Guess will ever be held in grateful remembrance by the friends of Cherokee learning.

In 1850 there were scattered over the territory occupied by the Cherokees, 22 free public schools, besides a boarding-school at Dwight, three day schools, and the two high schools. The communicants numbered 209, and the printing for the year amounted to 1,354,000 pages.

The latest period to which definite information has been received is 1853, and from the reports of that date the following table is compiled:

In concluding this notice of the Cherokees, it seems desirable to add the following editorial passage, from the "Herald" of Sept. 1854: "The prospects of the Cherokees seem to have brightened, in certain directions within the past year. The committee employed Rev. Marcus Palmer, M. D., formerly a missionary of the Board among these Indians, to act as an itinerant during the winter and spring; and he says, in closing his labors, 'The Cherokee nation is increasing fast in numbers, wealth, intelligence, and civilization. The public political mind is settled and calmed. The intemperance and frequent murders which now take place, are the effects of the storm which years since went by. The causes being removed, the evils are evidently subsiding, and a better state of things seems to be coming over the people.' It must be confessed, however, that some clouds still darken the horizon of this interesting people. A powerful revival of religion is greatly needed. If the influences of the Holy Spirit shall be much longer withheld, the Christian will have great occasion for solicitude and fear."

Choctaws.—The events of this mission, from its commencement in 1818 to 1824, have been sufficiently noticed. The Choctaws occupied the central part of Mississippi, extending entirely across the State, and numbering about 20,000. The nine stations occupied by the mission were considerably dispersed, and were supplied with missionaries, teachers, and farmers, to such an extent as to carry the blessings of religion, education, and the arts of agriculture, to nearly all the people.

In 1827 a highly favorable report was made of the schools. That at Eliot had 38 native pupils, many of whom were studying geography, arithmetic, and book-keeping, besides attending to writing and composition. Some of them could answer 400 questions on the maps of various countries, and could describe the boundaries of the several States. A similar progress had been made in all the schools. In the spring of this year there was considerable religious interest at Mayhew, as the fruits of which nine persons were admitted to the church in June. The whole number of children instructed in the Eliot school, from its commencement to 1828, was 185. In the Sabbath-school at Eliot this year, 7,732 verses of Scripture and of hymns were committed to memory by the boys, and 2,688 by the girls. Great improvements had been made within four or five years in the cultivation of land and the manner of living. The introduction of whisky was, however, a great impediment to civilization, leading to many vices, and often to violence and bloodshed.

In 1829, the chief of one large district resolved to suspend the laws forbidding the importation of whisky for two moons, and to drink himself and permit others to drink without restraint. For this abuse of power he was removed from office, and a man appointed in his place who favored the cause of morality and religion. During this year there was a more general attention to religion among the Choctaws than at any former period. The three chiefs of the nation took a very active part in favoring religious inquiry, and in several instances meetings of three or four days' continuance were held at convenient places in the wilderness. Many hundreds manifested great anxiety to be instructed, and to become experimentally acquainted with the Gospel, and fifty or sixty native converts were added to the churches. It was regarded as a wonderful display of divine power and grace, and was a subject of praise and joy both to the missionaries and to the churches, which had aided them in their work. At the same time school-books and hymn-books, which had been printed in Boston, in the Choctaw language, were furnishing the elements of knowledge to as many as were prepared to receive and use them. In each of the three districts into which the nation was divided, intemperance received a powerful check, the laws against whisky were rigidly enforced, the people were better clothed, the lands were better tilled, and in every respect the improvement was very striking.

In the early part of 1830, the Choctaws began to be seriously disturbed with the question of their removal to a country west of the Mississippi. In March of that year a treaty was made between the Choctaw nation and the government; but it was not ratified, and was of no effect. In the following September, a deputation from the government visited the Choctaws, and tried to persuade them to sell their country, and remove across the Mississippi river. The Choctaws, in council, appointed a committee of sixty, twenty from each district, to consider the subject and make a reply, and their report was unanimously against making any treaty. Their report was approved by the whole body of the nation assembled; and, supposing that the matter was at an end, most of them returned to their homes. The next day the commissioners for the government assembled the few who remained, and by various threats and promises induced them to sign the treaty. When it was known by the people that their country was sold, it produced a general feeling of indignation. A large majority of the captains and warriors were strongly opposed to it, and the chiefs who were instrumental in forming the treaty were turned out of office, and others elected in their places.

By the treaty the Choctaws ceded to the United States all their lands east of the Mississippi, and agreed to be removed to lands provided for them west of the Arkansas territory; one-half as soon as the fall of 1832, and the remainder in one year from that date, at the expense of the government; food to be furnished to them on the way, and for one year after their arrival. No provision was made in the treaty for refunding any part of the money expended by the Board, in establishing and sustaining the mission, amounting, since its commencement, to more than $60,000, besides the labors of some 30 missionaries and assistants, for 12 years. Besides, the missionaries of the Board were expressly forbidden by the commissioners, in writing, to be present at the treaty ground, though the presence of all other persons was allowed. The treaty was ratified at Washington, and its effects were sadly visible on the Choctaw nation, producing, as among the Cherokees, distress and despondency among some; idleness and intemperance among others; and extensive divisions and confusion in all the affairs of the nation. The influence of this state of things on religious meetings, schools, agriculture, and all the means used for the improvement of the people was disastrous.

Many had been received to the churches as the fruit of the late revival, and the whole number of communicants in the spring of 1831, was estimated at 360, and the number of baptized children at 244. The number of scholars in all the schools was about 235; of these, 144 were boys and 91 were girls; 112 were full blood Choctaws, and 109 were mixed; 86 read in the New Testament, and 75 in any English book; 37 used only Choctaw books, and 165 both Choctaw and English; 74 studied geography, 63 arithmetic; 148 wrote; 16 composed in Choctaw, 49 in English, and 24 in both languages. Besides these, a large number of adults were taught to read their own language with ease, and many of them learnt to write. The Choctaw Sunday-school Union embraced 6 schools, 20 teachers and 180 scholars, of whom 7 had been recently received into the church. The Gospels of Luke and of John had been translated by Mr. Wright; a work on Scripture history had been prepared by Mr. Williams, and printed, and other works were in a state of forwardness. The missionaries at this period were Rev. Cyrus Kingsbury and Rev. Cyrus Byington, assisted by 4 farmers, 2 teachers, 3 catechists, and the wives of the missionaries and others.

Such was the general state of the mission at the time of the treaty. Such was the degree of elevation and forwardness which had been secured by the thirteen years of missionary labor which had been bestowed upon the Choctaw nation; enough certainly to warrant the belief that another such time of service in that field, could it have been uninterrupted, would have rendered that people in a high degree intelligent, civilized and Christianized.

The spring of 1832 found a large body of the Choctaws on the other side of the Mississippi. They had been removed, through forests and swamps of 500 miles, during a winter of great severity, and great suffering had been endured; men and women, the old and the young, the decrepid and the sick, were all included in this melancholy exodus from the homes and improvements which they had cherished; and multitudes of them were poorly clothed and fed; bare-footed; without shelter, and in this condition often overtaken by snow-storms in the dreary forests of that region. In crossing the swamps of the Mississippi large numbers, with their horses, were surrounded by the rising waters, from which there was no possibility of escape. The captain of a steamboat who rescued one company of Choctaws who had been six days in this perilous condition, said that he saw at least a hundred horses standing, frozen dead in the mud. Before the spring of 1833 the Choctaw nation had all been removed to their new homes, if homes these children of the forest could be said to have on earth.

In their report for 1833, the Board say, "Definite information respecting the number of the Choctaws who have become settled in their new country has not been received. It is probably between 10,000 and 14,000. The number of the whole tribe before their removal commenced, was estimated at 18,000 or 20,000. They generally appear to be satisfied with their new country, and are laboring with a good degree of vigor to prepare for themselves fields and comfortable residences, and manifest considerable industry and public spirit, though they have obviously suffered in their habits and moral character by their exposures to temptation while preparing to remove, and while on their long and hazardous journey."

The new territory occupied by the Choctaws is situated between the Arkansas and Red rivers, west of the State of Arkansas, with Texas on the south, and the Seminoles and Cherokees on the north. As several of the missionaries removed with the Indians, they began at an early day to locate the missions, and in 1834 there were five stations, viz.: Wheelock, Bethabara, Clear Creek, Bok Tuko, and Cedron. These stations were all near Red river, or Little river, a northern branch, and not far from the south-western corner of Arkansas. The missionaries were Rev. Messrs.

Kingsbury and Byington, Alfred Wright, Loring S. Williams, and H. R. Wilson, the latter also a physician. There were three churches; one at Wheelock, one at Bathabara, and one at Bok Tukló. The first had 71 members, 60 of whom were professors of religion before their removal; the second had 113 members, and the third 23. The missionaries preached as much as their impaired health would allow, and there was some serious inquiry and a few hopeful conversions. Six or eight schools for instruction in the Choctaw language were either opened or ready to go into operation, but they were entirely interrupted by the sickness which broke out in the preceding autumn, and prevailed to a fearful extent. In some populous neighborhoods one in every fifteen died, and not a child under a year old was left. "The wretchedness of the people, without suitable food, or medicine, or nursing, was heart-rending, and altogether beyond description." In the summer and autumn of 1834, sickness also prevailed to an alarming extent, and the schools were suspended, and the mission families were almost wholly taken up with the care of the sick and the dying. It was estimated that one in ten of the members of the churches, many of them promising young persons, were hurried to the grave. In the autumn of 1835, Eagle Town and Pine Ridge were added to the stations, and occupied by Messrs. Byington and Kingsbury. Each station had a school and a competent teacher, and the whole number of pupils was 365. A new church was formed in 1836, and the total membership was 225. Several tracts in the Choctaw language were printed, amounting, in all, to 30,500 pages. From this period to 1840, no very important changes occurred in the mission.

From May 1840 to May 1841, 85 persons were admitted to the churches, more by far than during any preceding year since the removal of the Choctaws. The whole number of members was now 314. The cause of temperance had made considerable progress, and in one district 300 were reported as having signed the temperance pledge. In 1842, one of the missionaries, who was with the Choctaws before their removal, wrote, — "I do not hesitate to say that there never has been, since I have been acquainted with this people, a season of so much interest as the present. Their crops were never better; there never was more peace and friendship; there never was less sickness; and drunkenness has decreased a hundred per cent. at least." In 1843 there was an accession of more than a hundred to the churches, the total membership amounting to 459. The religious interest continued, and in 1844 one of the missionaries writes, — "In no year since the Choctaws came to this country, have we been permitted to witness greater displays of the power and grace of God in the salvation of sinners." Nearly 100 were received by profession this year, and the membership increased to 546. Between 80 and 90 were added in 1845, and in 1846 the large number of 218 were received, making the number of members 769. During this long season of spiritual refreshing, increased attention was paid to education, and to the printing of the Scriptures and religious tracts. The four Gospels had been printed, and 3,000 copies put in circulation, besides other portions of the New Testament.

The existence of slavery both among the Choctaws and Cherokees had been a fact well understood for many years, and the relation of the missionaries and the mission churches to this evil, had been a matter of increasing solicitude to the friends of these missions. In 1848, Rev. Mr. Treat, Secretary of the Board, visited these nations for the special purpose of ascertaining the facts on this subject. His inquiries related to the origin of slavery among these tribes, its character, the number of slaves, their treatment, laws relating to slavery, effects of slavery, the influence of Christianity upon it, and its prospective termination. In his report to the Board, at its meeting in Boston, Sept. 1848, he not only presented a full and clear statement on the above points, but also in regard to the policy of the missions, the preaching of the Gospel in reference to slavery, the instruction of slaveholding converts, the admission of slaveholders to the church, the treatment of slaveholders in the church, and the employment of slave labor. This report, drawn up with exceeding clearness and force, was published in the Herald of October 1848, together with an important correspondence between Mr. Treat and the Choctaw and Cherokee missionaries on the same subject.

From these documents it appeared, that in the Cherokee churches there were 24 slaveholders, and in the Choctaw churches 38, and that the number of slaves held by them was considerably over one hundred. It also appeared that the missionaries themselves employed slave labor in the cultivation of land, sometimes hiring slaves, at other times buying them, "with their own consent, and with the understanding that they should be allowed to work out the purchase money, and then be free." For the reasons assigned by the missionaries in defence of this practice, and their feelings in regard to it, the reader is referred to the report as above.

Both the Cherokee and Choctaw nations had made stringent laws for the protection of slavery, the Choctaws especially, enacting in 1846, that any missionary or preacher, who should be found "to take an active part in favoring the principles and notions of the most fatal and destructive doctrines of abolitionism," should be compelled to leave the nation, and forever stay out of it; and they also enacted, that to teach a slave to read, write, or sing, without the consent of the owner should be sufficient to convict a person of abolition principles.

Having made the needed investigations, through its Secretary, in regard to the question of slavery in these churches, and ascertained the views of the missionaries; and having distinctly stated the principles that would govern its own action, the Board continued its support of the Choctaw and Cherokee missions, in the belief that divine Providence would indicate from year to year such further measures as ought to be adopted relative to this delicate and difficult subject.

During each year since the foregoing transactions, there have been accessions to the Choctaw churches, and diligent attention has been given to the schools, and to the printing of the Scriptures and of tracts. But these labors and their results have been of so uniform a character as not to require an extended notice, except as they relate to the present condition of the mission. The Herald for January 1854 reported 129 admissions to the churches during the preceding year, and commended the Choctaw government for its zeal in executing its temperance laws. A "high institution of learning" had recently been established by a Choctaw council, the course of study to be such as is usually taught in the best female institutions in the United States. In the Herald for Sept. 1854, mention is made of much seriousness at some of the stations, and a few conversions. In the same number Mr. Kingsbury writes, "In all the region of country where I labor, there is very little drinking; nor is there any other open vice, except that a portion of the community do not regard the Sabbath."

The foregoing tables exhibit with tolerable accuracy the present state of the Choctaw mission churches and schools.

At the meeting of the Board in September last, the Prudential Committee reported a state of things in the Choctaw nation, which seemed to call for special action. It appeared that the Choctaw Council had recently enacted a law, prohibiting the instruction of slaves, or the children of slaves, at any school or academy, by any person connected therewith; and also directing the expulsion from the nation of all such persons, missionaries or teachers, as should be found violating this statute. This was simply re-affirming the old law of 1846, before referred to, which, however, had so far remained a dead letter that the missionaries had continued to teach slaves and their children without interruption. The fresh promulgation of such a law indicated a determination to enforce its requisitions, and the Prudential Committee decided that the Board could not conscientiously maintain its connection with the Choctaw schools upon such conditions. This decision was approved by the missionaries, and was in exact accordance with the principles laid down in the well-known letter of Mr. Treat, in 1848. See the Herald for October of that year.

The subject, on being brought before the Board at Hartford, was referred to a committee, who reported resolutions which, after an animated and protracted discussion, were adopted in the following form:

"Resolved, That the Board acknowledge, with gratitude to God, the wisdom and fidelity with which, so far as appears from the documents which have been submitted to them, the Prudential Committee are advising and directing the missionaries among the Choctaws, in conformity with the principles presented by them in their correspondence with those missionaries, reported to the Board in 1848.

"Resolved, That the decision of the Prudential Committee, with the concurrence of the missionaries, not to conduct the boarding-schools in the Choctaw nation, in conformity with the principles prescribed by the recent legislation of the Choctaw Council, meets the cordial approbation of the Board.

"Resolved, That the commission given by Christ to his disciples, to go and teach all nations and to preach the Gospel to every creature, which is the warrant of Christian missions, is to be respected and obeyed in all the operations and by all the missionaries of the Board; and that while our missionaries among the Choctaws are allowed in fact to preach the Gospel to all persons, of whatever complexion or condition, as they have opportunity, and to preach it in all its applications to human character and duty, they are to continue patiently in the work."

These resolutions were understood and intended as a full endorsement by the Board of the principles of the letter just referred to, and upon which the Committee had been acting for six years, on their own responsibility. But recent events seemed to demand that the Board, in its corporate capacity, should assume this responsibility, and this it did, in the form of the above resolutions, which were adopted by nearly a unanimous vote.

At the period of closing this article it remains a doubtful question, whether the missionaries will be allowed to preach the Gospel among the Choctaws in the full and unqualified manner required in the last of these resolutions, or whether, being forbidden to do this, they will retire from the field.

Osages.—The mission among the Osage Indians was commenced in 1820, by a Presbyterian body, called the "United Foreign Missionary Society." At that period the Osage tribe consisted of two divisions, located at a considerable distance from each other, the one called the Osages of the Neosho, and the other the Osages of Missouri. The former dwelt upon the Neosho, or Grand river, a northern branch of the Arkansas, west of Missouri; and the latter occupied a territory in Missouri, 150 miles farther north.

The first station occupied by the above named society was at Union, among the Osages of the Neosho, on the west side of that river, and about 20 miles from its mouth. In 1823 a farming settlement was formed at Hopefield, four miles from Union, the design of which was to teach the Osages the arts and advantages of agriculture. Many families settled at this place, and the labor of the farm was carried on with much courage and zeal; but a threatened war with other tribes alarmed them, and some of them fled to Union for protection. A year or two later the place was nearly ruined by an inundation, which swept away all their crops, houses, fences, and every movable thing. At Union, meanwhile, a school was gathered, very small at first, but increasing, till in 1826 it numbered 50 scholars.

Among the Osages of Missouri two stations were formed, one at Harmony, near the western line of Missouri, on a branch of the Osage river; and one at Neosho, 60 miles from Harmony. Some progress was made in teaching the Indians, and especially in training them to agricultural habits. But they were a migratory tribe, accustomed to long hunting expeditions, and not stationary more than four or five months in the year, so that it was extremely difficult to do them good.

In June, 1826, a union was formed between the American Board and the United Foreign Missionary Society, and from that period the Board shared in the responsibility of the Osage mission. But the peculiar habits of the Osages, and their frequent intercourse with white traders, who exerted upon them a most corrupting influence, nearly baffled all attempts to benefit them either in a spiritual or temporal respect. The difficulty was further increased by treaties formed at different times with the United States, by which the Osages ceded large portions of their territory, and were finally removed to a considerable distance farther west, and north of the Cherokee country. The old stations were thus broken up, and the Osage mission was abandoned. In view of this result the Board say, in their report for 1836:

"A retrospect of the history of this mission cannot be taken without awakening many painful emotions. Very few, if any of the adults of the tribe have been induced to exchange their savage and migratory habits for a civilized and industrious life; or to substitute the Christian doctrines and practice for their ridiculous and absurd superstitions; nor do they seem to have been in any way benefitted as to their character and condition. The number of youths educated in their schools has been comparatively small, and of this small number few have given evidence that the Gospel, under whose daily influence they sat for years, has been to them the power of God unto salvation; while many have returned to their friends and former manner of life, and become as filthy and debased as those who never enjoyed such advantages; and not a few others have been enticed away to sink into the lowest depths of pollution and misery. The amount of funds expended on the mission has been great; and so also has been the number of laborers who have engaged in promoting it. Not a few of these, after going through a course of arduous service, have gone down to the grave, the victims of disease and hardship; others, worn down by toil, and disheartened by opposing difficulties, have retired from the field with broken constitutions; while the remnant, after having labored with much fidelity and patience nearly 15 years, have felt themselves compelled to abandon the work, leaving the Osages, with scarcely an exception, more miserable and hopeless, both as to condition and character, than they were when the mission was commenced among them."

Notwithstanding this most deplorable and discouraging result, circumstances encouraged the hope, in some minds, that something might be done to benefit the Osages, and during the following year, measures were adopted for re-establishing the mission. It seemed probable that the tribe would be permitted to remain upon their new territory, and many of them, particularly those who had been connected with the agricultural establishment at Hopefield, manifested a disposition to abandon the chase and cultivate the soil. Funds were also expected from the sale of the old mission buildings and improvements, and the government, agreeably to treaty, had furnished those Osages who wished to engage in agriculture, with farming implements, and aid in procuring stock. Under these circumstances, Mr. Re qua, who had labored much with this tribe, visited their towns, in the autumn of 1836, and selected a spot for a large agricultural colony, on the western branch of the Neosho. He had made considerable progress in preparing the requisite buildings and other improvements, and a preacher and school-teacher were expected to join him as soon as circumstances would permit. But during the following summer, a portion of the tribe began to manifest their hostility to the enterprise, the cattle belonging to the station were killed, and other property seized; the settlers themselves were threatened and assaulted, and the chiefs justified these savage acts. The annoyance became so great that neither usefulness nor safety could be hoped for, and Mr. Requa removed his effects and left the Osage country. No mission has since been attempted among them.

Chickasaws.—The Chickasaw Indians originally occupied the northern portion of the State of Mississippi, and numbered about 3,000. The first mission among them was commenced by the Synod of South Carolina and Georgia, in 1821; but was transferred to the Board, in December, 1827. The number of stations at the time of the transfer was four, viz.: Munroe, Tokshish, Martyn, and Caney Creek.

In 1827 there was an interesting revival at Munroe, and it extended to the whole country round, and continued many months. "People came thirty or forty miles to inquire what these things meant, and some of the most hopeless, stubborn sinners, were the first subjects of the work." Six were admitted to the church at Munroe this year; and in 1829 seventeen were admitted to the church at Tokshish, and 25 children of believing parents were baptized. Schools were taught at three of the stations, the number of scholars varying from 20 to 30. Most of these children learned to read and write, and many of them became acquainted with geography and history, besides acquiring a knowledge of the English language. During the years 1828 and 1829, a great reformation took place among the Chickasaws, in regard to the use of intoxicating liquors. The leading men discountenanced and nearly prevented the sale of whisky, and one of the missionaries remarked that he had not seen an intoxicated Indian for a year and a half.

For two or three years previous to 1830, the people had been agitated with the question of selling their lands to the United States, and removing to a region west of the Mississippi. The State of Mississippi extended its own laws over the Indians, which broke the force of their temperance and other laws, and intemperance with its associated vices prevailed through the nation "like an overwhelming tide." In the fall of 1830, a treaty was concluded with the Chickasaws, by which they agreed to sell their land and remove west of the Mississippi, provided a country could be found for them with which they should be pleased. A delegation was sent to explore the new country, and on their return they reported in favor of a tract of land lying between the Sabine and Red rivers, in the province of Texas. But this report was never acted upon, and the treaty was not ratified. The Indians, therefore, still remained in suspense, and in great despondency, the State laws beginning to operate severely upon them, and their intercourse with the whites leading them into temptation and moral debasement.

This state of things greatly interrupted missionary labor, and yet there was considerable seriousness in the churches, and some who had been excommunicated returned, and gave evidence of sincere repentance. Two of the schools were maintained with an average of 25 or 30 scholars.

In October, 1832, a new treaty was formed by which the lands of the Chickasaws were to be sold in the same manner as the public lands of the United States, and the proceeds paid over to them, out of which they were to purchase a new country and remove themselves; provided however, that if they could find no new country that suited them, they might remain permanently on one-third of the territory held by them, they being subject to the laws of the State of Mississippi. But they must not remain settled together, on one compact third of their country, but must be dispersed over the whole of it. This arrangement greatly aggravated the troubles of the Indians; for white intruders kept pressing upon them from all quarters, harrassing them by vexatious lawsuits and depredations upon their property, and introducing large quantities of liquor, which was sold often at an enormous price. "No less than 300 gallons of these liquors were brought into the single neighborhood of Tokshish, within a period of three months, where a grocery for the sale of them had been erected, near the house of God." The more intelligent Indians complained and remonstrated without effect.

Some of the missionaries lingered on the ground, endeavoring, against every disadvantage, to keep up the churches and schools, until 1834, when the mission was abandoned. It had been provided in the treaty, that the Indians might sell the reservations upon which they remained, and this fact attracted the attention of purchasers, who entered the country with money and whisky, and exerted a most corrupting and ruinous influence throughout the whole extent of the Indian settlements. They were at first tempted with strong drink, carried to every man's door; and then excited with the hope of making large gains by selling their lands; and when they received their payments, with characteristic improvidence, they gave themselves up to idleness, gambling and intoxication. They were thus rendered unfit to receive instruction, and all hope of doing them essential and permanent good was at an end. The Chickasaws never removed in a body to a new territory, but have either mingled with other tribes west of the Mississippi, or wasted away under the State laws that were extended over them.

Creeks.—The Board sustained a mission among the Creek Indians from 1832 to 1836. That portion of the tribe to which these labors were directed, was located at that time in the territory west of Arkansas, on both sides of the Arkansas river. Their number was about 2,500. A much larger portion of this tribe, some 18,000, resided on lands owned by them in the State of Alabama, but with these the Board had no connection.

The first and only missionaries which the Board at any time had among the Creek Indians, were John Flemming and his wife, and R. L. Dodge, physician. Mr. Flemming devoted himself with great zeal to the study of the Creek language, which no one had ever before attempted to reduce to writing. He found it an exceedingly embarrassing work, on account of the numerous and difficult combinations of consonants; but, with the aid of an interpreter, he prepared an elementary book in the language, containing also select portions of Scripture, amounting to 100 pages, of which 500 copies were printed. A few hymns were also prepared, to be sung at meetings.

It was found difficult, however, from the first, to interest the Creeks in matters of religion, or of education. They were generally indifferent or hostile to the missionaries and their operations, and the difficulty was increased by the efforts of the government to dispossess them of their lands, and remove them farther west. It was judged, also, that their jealousy was awakened by the presence among them of the missionaries of two other religious denominations, viz., the Baptist and the Methodist. The number attending religious meetings was at all times small, and it was not found practicable to maintain a school of any promise within their territory.

In the autumn of 1836, a number of the Indians, including some of their chief men, forwarded a petition to the United States' agent, in their neighborhood, requesting that the missionaries and teachers of all denominations might be removed from their territory. The petition was instigated by white men residing in the vicinity of the Creeks, and was accompanied by injurious and slanderous charges, and, without affording the missionaries any opportunity to examine or repel the allegations, they were all directed immediately to leave the Creek country.

As the Creeks of Alabama had, a little before this, been removed to their new country, west of Arkansas, composing, with those already there, a body of from 15,000 to 20,000, it was hoped that the mission might be resumed among them with better prospects of success, as soon as missionaries could be obtained; but, for reasons satisfactory to the Board, no attempt of this kind has ever been made.

Ottawas.—The Ottawa Indians, for whose benefit a mission was commenced in 1822, occupied five small reservations in the north-western part of Ohio. They were but a remnant of the tribe, and numbered only about 800; and they were found in a very poor and degraded state, their great vice being an excessive fondness for ardent spirits.

The mission was commenced at the above date, by the Western Missionary Society, and was transferred by them to the United Foreign Missionary Society. The station was at Maumee, about 30 miles from the mouth of the Maumee river, which empties into the upper end of Lake Erie. The care of the mission was subsequently assumed by the American Board, and was brought to a close in 1833.

A school was established at Maumee, which in 1828 had 70 pupils, about 40 of whom remained long enough to make useful acquisitions. Seven of them became hopefully pious, and persevered in their Christian course. A good farm was opened at the station, and was put under good cultivation. The missionary, Mr. Van Tassel, was untiring in his labors, but he was unacquainted with the Ottawa dialect, which no missionary had ever acquired, and as he could find no good interpreter, he could do little in the way of preaching. In 1830, a small church, formed several years previous, but much scattered, the Lord's Supper not having been administered for six years, was gathered and strengthened, and much seriousness prevailed.

During this year Mr. Van Tassel had so far mastered the Ottawa language as to prepare translations of the Lord's prayer and the ten commandments, and also a few hymns and spelling lessons, which were printed at Hudson, Ohio. It was hoped that some of the Indians would now learn to read their own language. About this time, however, they were induced to sell their lands lying in the State of Ohio, amounting to about 50,000 acres; but most of them absolutely refused to accept of lands offered them by the United States, west of the Mississippi, or to be removed to that country.

They were thus left without lands and without a home, surrounded by white settlers and exposed to every species of temptation, and in the worst possible condition to be benefitted by missionary labors. Their only prospect seemed to be an unsettled, wandering life, till they should waste away and disappear. Their mission was therefore discontinued.

The number of pupils connected with the boarding school at Maumee, during the ten years of its existence, was about 90. Nearly half of these acquired an education sufficient for the ordinary business of life. The church, which was formed in 1823, had 26 members at the time the mission was disbanded, including the mission family. The congregations on the whites, or that the running of a line through their country, or marking it upon a map, has any effect to impair their claims, or dispossess them of their patrimonial inheritance. The only way in which this inheritance can be alienated, is by treaties fairly and honorably made, and with the full assent of the present owners." These remarks will enable the reader to judge, not only of the rights of the Indians, but of the manner in which those rights were subsequently treated by the national government. It may be added, that large tracts had already been sold by treaties, to the United States, and the territories which remained to the Cherokees contained about 12,000 square miles, or 8,000,000 acres. About two-thirds of this country lay in the north-west corner of Georgia, one-fifth in the north-east part of Alabama, one-tenth in the south-east part of Tennessee, and a small portion in the south-west corner of North Carolina. The Cherokee population was supposed, in 1825, to be about 14,000. They had already made great advances in learning, and in agriculture and mechanic arts. The national council met annually for the exercise of legislative functions, and government was administered according to the usages of civilized countries. A regular constitution, however, had not been adopted, and in the summer of 1826 a council was held, and a committee appointed to draft a constitution. Measures were also taken this year at Boston, to prepare types in the peculiar character invented by Guess, and to provide a printing-press for the nation.

In the autumn of 1827, Mr. David Greene was appointed to visit all the missionary stations among the Indians in the south-western and western parts of the United States, which service he performed,—traveling 6,000 miles, inspecting 30 stations, and reaching Boston in July, 1828. His report, so far as it related to the Cherokees, authorized the statement, that nearly all the adult population, and in the tribe at large more than half, were actually capable of reading their own language, a fact almost incredible, but for the facilities afforded by the alphabet of Guess. There was a wonderful improvement, also, in regard to houses, dress, style of living, industry, &c.; the men being found upon well-cultivated farms, and the women spinning and weaving cotton, and providing garments of their own manufacture. More than 500 children had been taught in the mission schools, and 160 communicants belonged to the churches of the seven stations. This was justly considered by the Board and the missionaries very great and encouraging progress to have been made in ten years, and it ought to have silenced forever the objection that the Indians could not be civilized and Christianized. Rarely, if ever, has missionary labor been productive of greater results, within the same period, in any heathen country.

In 1828, Mr. Worcester occupied a new station at New Echota, not far from Brainerd and devoted himself chiefly to the translation of the Scriptures, and the preparation of religious books and tracts. A printing-press had been put in operation at this place, at the expense of the Cherokees.

Among the Cherokees of the Arkansas, during the few years just noticed, operations were continued with general success. At Dwight a house of worship had been erected, and there was no family in which some were not hopefully pious. Within 25 miles of this place there was a population of 1,200, not including the whites, and stated preaching was maintained in various neighborhoods among these people. Schools were sustained, and the progress made in education, husbandry, &c., was similar to that among the Cherokees in the southern states. A United States agent, Major Duval, residing near Dwight, declared to the corresponding secretary, that a single school for girls at that place, had done more to improve the condition of the Indians, than all the sums of money expended by the government, in furnishing them with implements of husbandry, and annual distributions of clothing.

In 1829, we find the Cherokees possessed of a regularly organized civil government, and of a written language, unlike any other that ever existed, and yet complete, by the use of which adults could learn to read their native tongue in ten, five, and even three days; and this language the invention of an uninstructed Cherokee! For a considerable time this mission had attracted special attention, both because it was the first mission of the Board to the American Indians, and because of the success which had attended it. But now the eyes of America and of many people in Europe began to be directed with new interest to this tribe, on account of the measures which were in contemplation for their removal. The Cherokees themselves began to be in great fear and anxiety lest they should be driven from the lands received from their fathers, and constrained to migrate to a country for which they had no attachment, and which, in their view, would be only a resting-place for a few years, when they would be again driven off, dispersed, and destroyed.

In September of this year the nation was deprived of one of its most useful and valued men, Mr. David Brown. He became pious in 1820, acquired his education at the north, and traveled much in the United States, receiving everywhere the esteem and affection of the people. He had been much engaged in public business, but at the time of his last illness was studying with a view to preach the Gospel. He was the fifth member of the same family who had died in the triumphs of the Christian faith.

In 1830, we find the Cherokee nation in an increasingly troubled and distracted state. A treaty for their removal had already been formed between the United States government and leading men of the tribe, in opposition, however, to a large majority of the Cherokees. The subject was engrossing the attention of Congress and of the nation, and it seemed a fitting time for the secretaries to record publicly their views of the subject, as it related to the Cherokees; and accordingly, in their report of this year, they said, "Whatever may be thought of some questions relating to this matter, the following points are indisputable, viz., that treaties in existence between the United States and the Cherokee nation guarantee the inviolability of the Cherokee territory and of the Cherokee government; that the words in which these engagements are expressed are perfectly plain, not admitting of doubt or cavil; and that these words express what was the real meaning of the parties at the time, and what was understood to be the meaning by both parties for more than forty years. It is true, also, that the Cherokees conceive themselves to have a perfect right to their own country, and that they are unwilling to leave it. The few who have consented to emigrate, have done so from the apprehension that all would be compelled to remove, and that those who remained longest would be in the most unfavorable circumstances." In March of the same year, Mr. Worcester wrote a letter on the subject of the advancement of the Cherokees in civilization, and their feelings with regard to a removal, and addressed it to a member of the Cherokee deputation at Washington. It was printed by the Senate, and appended to a report from the War Department. It gave a fair and candid account of the actual condition of the Cherokees, and may be found in the Herald of May, 1830.

Amid all these disturbances, public religious meetings were held at all the stations as usual, and the schools and printing-press were kept in operation. At the beginning of 1831 there were eight churches, embracing in all 219 members, at the stations occupied by this mission, of whom 167 were Cherokees, and the remainder were of African descent, or white persons residing in the nation. The number of scholars in all the schools was 150, which was less than usual, the school at Brainerd having been broken up by the burning of their school-house. A Cherokee Sunday-school Union had been organized, embracing six schools, eight teachers, and 113 scholars. During the year, the mission had also printed 1,400 copies of the Cherokee hymn-book, 1,000 copies of the Gospel of Matthew, and 3,000 copies of a tract of twelve pages, consisting of extracts from the Old and New Testaments. These had all been prepared by Mr. Worcester, assisted by Elias Boudinot, who was at the same time editor of a well-conducted and useful paper, called the "Cherokee Phoenix."

At the period just named, fourteen years from the commencement of the mission, the secretaries could say, "The mass of the people, in their dress, houses, furniture, agricultural implements, manner of cultivating the soil, raising stock, providing for their families, and in their estimate of the value of an education, will not suffer by a comparison with the whites in the surrounding settlements. The mass of the people have externally embraced the Christian religion. Intemperance, the bane of the Indian as well as the white man, has been checked; the laws of the nation rigorously exclude intoxicating liquors from all public assemblies; and numerous societies for the promotion of temperance have been organized." But in spite of these improvements and these laws, the secretaries were obliged to add, in their report for 1831, that "the nation has been made to experience nearly all the political and domestic evils with which, for two or three years, they had been threatened. Their government has been nearly prostrated; their council has been forbidden to assemble; their laws have been declared null and void, and their magistrates prohibited, under severe penalties, from enforcing them; intoxicating liquors have been introduced without restraint; their country has been traversed by armed troops; their property has been plundered, their persons arrested and imprisoned; the land which they know is theirs by immemorial possession, and which has been guaranteed to them by numerous and perfectly explicit treaties, has been claimed by others, and surveyed, and they themselves threatened with immediate ejection. These and other vexations and sufferings to which they have been subjected, have filled the nation with anxiety and alarm." In this condition of discouragement, and almost of despair, some, as was to be expected, gave themselves up to idleness and intemperance, and ceased to cultivate fields and erect buildings, not knowing who should possess them. The future was all dark, for if they could not hold their present country they could be secure of no resting-place, however it might be secured to them by solemn treaties. The Board had already addressed a memorial to Congress on this subject, the preparation of which was the last official act of the Corresponding Secretary, Rev. Dr. Cornelius. It was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, but was not known to produce any important results.

In addition to all the other embarrassments thrown in the way of the mission, and the distresses caused to the Cherokees, the missionaries themselves began, in 1831, to be arrested and imprisoned. In January of this year, the missionaries at Carmel, Hightower, Haweis, and New Echota, the four stations lying within the territory claimed by Georgia, were served with copies of a law, then just passed, declaring, in substance, that all white men found within the State after the first of the following March, without having taken an oath of allegiance to the State, would be imprisoned in the penitentiary at hard labor, for a term of not less than four years. But there were important and obvious reasons why the missionaries should not abandon the field; and they could not take the prescribed oath without an admission that Georgia was right. They therefore concluded to remain at their posts and abide the consequences. They were unmolested till the 12th of March, when a detachment of the Georgia guard, consisting of twenty-six armed and mounted men, proceeded to each of the four stations named, and arrested three of the missionaries, viz, Messrs. Proctor, Worcester, and Thompson. The fourth, Mr. Buttrick, was absent. They were taken to the head-quarters of the guard, where they employed legal counsel, and were set free by the judge of the Superior Court of Gwinnet county, on the ground that they were under the patronage of the United States government, and were in such a sense its agents that the laws of Georgia did not apply to them. They therefore returned to their stations, anticipating no further troubles of this nature.

A correspondence was now held between the Governor of Georgia and the President of the United States, the result of which was a statement by the president, that he did not consider the missionaries as being in any sense agents of the government. Upon this the missionaries received letters, informing them of their exposure, and giving them ten days to remove out of the State or take the required oath. Messrs. Buttrick, Proctor and Thompson thought it expedient to remove with their families. Dr. Butler was arrested, but released on account of sickness in his family, upon a promise that he would deliver himself up at the proper time. Mr. Thompson, who continued to visit his station at Hightower, was subsequently arrested and treated in the most brutal manner. Though seriously ill, and offering to furnish himself a horse, he was compelled to walk, and when he could walk no longer he was thrust into a most offensive and uncomfortable wagon. At one time he was chained. After being locked up in jail awhile he was dismissed, and told to go where he pleased, but no provision was made for his return. A month later, Mr. Worcester and Dr. Butler were again arrested, and subjected to cruelties and indignities such as savages themselves would scarcely inflict upon their captives. The shocking and painful details of the treatment which they received from the military, both on the march and in the filthy and wretched prison into which they were thrust, are given at length in a letter written by Mr. Worcester, and published in the annual report for 1831. They were finally taken out of the hands of the military, and released, on giving bonds to appear at the superior court of Gwinnet county, in September. On the 25th of that month they were tried, and Mr. Worcester and Dr. Butler, with eight other white men, one a missionary of the Methodist Episcopal church, were sentenced to four years hard labor in the penitentiary. On arriving at the door of the prison they were all offered a pardon and release, on condition of their removing from the State, or taking the oath of allegiance to the laws of Georgia, and all but two of them accepted of these humiliating terms. Mr. Worcester and Dr. Butler, believing that obedience to such laws would be treason against God, conceded nothing, and were committed to the penitentiary.

Measures were taken to bring the matter before the Supreme Court of the United States, and a writ of error having been granted by the justices of that court, the case was brought up and ably argued, in February 1832, by Messrs. Wirt and Sergeant in behalf of the plaintiffs in error. The decision was pronounced by Chief-Justice Marshall, on the 3d of the following March. It reviewed the whole subject of Indian titles, the treaties which had been made with the Indians, and the recent laws of Georgia, which extended the jurisdiction of the State over the Cherokee country, and these laws were pronounced repugnant to the Constitution, to treaties, and to the laws of the United States. The mandate of the Court was immediately issued, reversing and annulling the judgment of the Superior Court of Georgia, and ordering that all proceedings on the indictment against the prisoners do forever cease, and that the prisoners be, and hereby are dismissed therefrom.

But the Superior Court of Georgia refused to obey the mandate, or to discharge the prisoners. A memorial to the President of the United States was prepared by the counsel for the prisoners, praying him to interpose his authority for enforcing the decision of the Court. Upon consultation, however, it was thought inexpedient to present the memorial; neither was it thought advisable to prosecute the case by a second appeal to the Supreme Court; for it was well understood, that though that Court would sustain its own decision, the President, (Andrew Jackson) was not inclined to enforce it, and therefore the result would be doubtful. Further, the missionaries had the assurance of an unconditional release, provided they would desist from the attempt to obtain that release by a military enforcement of the decision of the Supreme Court. This assurance came not from any solicitations on their part. They made "no solicitation, no overture, no compromise." But they were often and earnestly solicited by persons in the confidence of the Governor of Georgia, to desist from the prosecution, and assured that if they did so, they should not long remain in prison. Even after they had given notice, as they did at one time, of their intention to move the Supreme Court for a further process, they were waited upon by two members elect of Congress, whose names are given, and told officially, that they had conversed with the Governor on the subject, and knew his views, and that they might regard it as certain, if they withdrew the suit, that they would be discharged without any concession, or condition, or even an application to the Governor. These repeated pledges induced the prisoners, by their counsel, to drop all further proceedings, and on the 14th of January, 1833, the keeper of the penitentiary received a proclamation from the Governor of the State, directing him to set Messrs. Worcester and Butler at liberty. This he communicated to them forthwith, and discharged them. They immediately returned to the stations which they had respectively occupied in the Cherokee country, and resumed their missionary labors.

The reasons which determined the conduct of these brethren from first to last, were stated by them with great clearness and force, and published in the report of the Board for 1833. In the same report may be found the decision and mandate of the Supreme Court; the reply of the Court of Georgia; the memorial of the Board, praying for the protection of the missionaries, and several other important documents relating to this subject.

During the year and four months that Messrs. Worcester and Butler were in prison, they were permitted daily to read the Scriptures, and pray with the prisoners confined in the same building; and during the last six months or more, Mr. Worcester preached once every Sabbath to all the prisoners. A spirit of inquiry was awakened, and many, it is believed, were savingly benefitted.

It is painful in the extreme to dwell upon such facts as have been recorded in the preceding pages; and it seems scarcely credible that they could have occurred in a country like ours, and in an enlightened Christian State. It is not surprising that missionaries should occasionally fare thus at the hands of benighted Brahmins, or proud Mussulmans, but that in the United States, and within 25 years, they should have been dragged from their fields of labor by an armed soldiery, and treated like felons; under laws, too, enacted for the very purpose of extinguishing Indian claims, and getting possession of their lands, in violation of treaties and of the Constitution, and all this persisted in against the decision of the highest judicial tribunal in the land,—this is surprising and deeply humiliating; and it forms a chapter in our country's history, which, for naked injustice, mercenary aims, and bold contempt of national faith and honor, is scarcely equaled by any of the public wrongs and oppressions laid to her charge.

During the period of these troubles there was no regular instruction at the four stations within the limits of Georgia, and at the other stations the work was prosecuted under great disadvantages. Previous to the release of Messrs. Worcester and Butler, the whole Cherokee country, lying within the chartered limits of Georgia, had been surveyed and divided into lots of 140 acres each, and distributed by lottery among the citizens of that State. The laws of Georgia had begun to be enforced, counties had been organized, courts held, and magistrates and civil officers appointed. In this state of things, the Cherokees were divided on the question of ceding their lands by treaty to the United States; but whether they did so or not, it had become evident to all that they must remove, either peaceably or under a despotism which they could not resist. In the beginning of 1834, the number of white settlers on the Indian lands was estimated to outnumber the Indians themselves, and no art was left untried by the whites to draw them into intemperance and every kind of debauchery. The depression of morals was deplorable, and yet not so general as might have been expected. Most of the influential men of the nation manifested much firmness and dignity of character, and remained the steadfast friends of the mission, and of the intellectual and moral improvement of these people.

After repeated negotiations and conferences between the Indians and the government at Washington, the details of which it is unnecessary to give here, a treaty was at length agreed upon, Dec. 1835, by which the Cherokees ceded the whole of the country which they occupied, and consented to be removed to a territory west of the Mississippi within two years. For their lands, improvements, buildings, &c., they were to receive $500,000, and $650,000 to defray the expenses of their removal, and of sustaining them one year after their arrival at their new homes. This treaty was negotiated with the representatives of a party or section of the Indians, and against it Mr. Ross and his friends protested in all the stages of its progress, as being unsatisfactory in its provisions, made contrary to the will of the nation, and with persons wholly unauthorized to transact such business. All attempts to annul or improve it, however, failed, and nothing remained but its rigid enforcement.

The time allowed the Indians to remain expired on the 23d of May, 1838, and immediately after that day the military commenced their operations. Families were taken from their houses and farms, leaving their furniture, fields and flocks as they were, unprotected, to be possessed by they knew not whom, and were marched under strong guards to camps selected to be their starting places for a distant, and to them a strange land. In June nearly the whole tribe had been taken from their houses to the camps, and some thousands were started Abenakis.—This band of Indians is settled at St. Francis, in Lower Canada, on the south side of Lake St. Peters, about 60 miles below Montreal. Their missionary and teacher, Peter Paul Osunkhirhine, is a native of this tribe, and received a good English education at Hanover, N. H., where he became hopefully pious. He afterwards returned home, with the hope of doing good to his people. Finding it impracticable to teach them the English language, he prepared an elementary book in their own language, embracing a translation of passages of Scripture, and some other useful pieces. This book, with a small religious tract, was printed at the expense of the Board in 1830. With these he returned again to his people, and having obtained the appointment of schoolmaster from the Canadian government, he opened a school, at the same time holding meetings on the Sabbath, and endeavoring, in other ways, to enlighten their benighted minds. Many children and youth attended his school, and even some adults learned to read his books. Some who listened to his religious instructions became serious and hopefully pious. This awakened the opposition of the papists, who complained of him to the government, for interfering with the religion of the Indians, and he was forbidden to hold meetings, or in any manner to meddle with their religious concerns. With this injunction he could not conscientiously comply, and he was, therefore, much persecuted, and deprived of his salary from the government. He then applied to the Committee of the Board, for such an annual allowance as would furnish him the means of subsistence, and enable him to continue his labors among his people. This was granted, and he has persevered in his self-denying and important work to the present time.

Osunkhirhine was licensed to preach in January, 1836, by the Champlain Presbytery, and in the following June, he was ordained as an evangelist to his native tribe. Upon this, the opposition of the papal community was much embittered, and efforts were made to get him removed from the reservation, but the governor refused to interfere. When he commenced his labors, the whole tribe were ignorant and bigoted papists. In 1837, more than 30 persons attended his preaching, all of whom had renounced the Romish church, in spite of the most bitter persecution. From five to twenty children were gathered into a school, according as the people were at home or on their hunting grounds, and three persons, including the wife of Osunkhirhine, had joined the Protestant church. In 1840, the church members had increased to 27, and a prosperous school of 23 pupils was in operation.

In the winter of 1841, President Lord, of Dartmouth College, visited Osunkhirhine at St. Francis, and in a subsequent statement, he remarked: "The church now consists of 29 members, out of 300 souls, the number of the tribe now resident at St. Francis. Osunkhirhine's labors are steady, and well adapted to the condition of the people. His wife, a full-blooded Indian, is remarkably interesting—a model. I beg to commend the mission. Its importance, I think, cannot be too highly appreciated. Its relation to the French population gives it its greatest importance. There is hardly any other light between Montreal and Quebec. The despised church at St. Francis is his witness along the great river."

In 1843, it was reported: "Five Indians have been received to the church on profession during the last year, and the whole number received since Mr. Osunkhirhine commenced his labors, is 46, 41 of whom still survive, and are members in good standing. The papal priests are active, as heretofore, in opposing the progress of spiritual religion among the Indians." In 1845 it was recorded: "Sixty-six Indians, all converted from Romanism, and hopefully renewed by the Spirit of God, have been received to the church." The opposition of the papal priests availed little. In 1846 it was estimated that one-third of the 300 composing the Abenakis tribe, had become Protestants, through the labors of this judicious and devoted native missionary.

In June, 1851, Mr. Treat, one of the secretaries of the Board, was directed to visit the Abenakis tribe, which he found composing "an irregularly-built village on the right bank of the St. Francis, four miles from the St. Lawrence. The population of the tribe is three or four hundred, and in their general appearance and habits of life, they compare well with the Canadians around them. Mr. Osunkhirhine has a plain but comfortable church, erected partly at the expense of the Board, in which he holds three services on the Sabbath, and three meetings during the week."

The latest intelligence from this mission is to January, 1854. The missionary continues to labor with his usual fidelity, having been at his post more than twenty years, and, though contending still against papal influence, and often tried by the delinquency of the converts, he has a reasonable prospect of continuance and usefulness.

Pawnees.—The Pawnee tribe, at the commencement of the mission among them, in 1835, was divided into four bands; Pawnee Republicans, Pawnee Peeks, Pawnee Loups, and Grand Pawnees,—amounting in all to between 6,000 and 7,000 persons. They occupied an extensive territory on both sides of the Platte river, in Nebraska. The first missionary company consisted of Rev. John Dunbar, missionary, Benedict Satterlee, physician and catechist, and Samuel Allis, assistant. Owing to the wandering habits of these Indians, little could be done for several years in the way of systematic labor. Their headquarters were at Bellevue, the seat of the government agency, and Messrs. Dunbar and Satterlee generally accompanied large bands of Indians in their long hunting excursions, with a view both to acquire the language and to give instruction, as opportunity was afforded. Mr. Satterlee died on one of these tours, in a somewhat mysterious manner.

In 1840, these four bands appeared strongly inclined to abandon the hunter life, and settle in villages for the cultivation of the soil. The tract of country selected for this purpose was located on Council and Plumb creeks, on the north side of Loup Fork, which empties into Platte river. To this place the missionary families removed in the spring of 1841. The government, agreeably to certain treaty provisions, had furnished the Indians with large numbers of oxen, plows, &c., and they had begun to plow and sow their farms with great zeal and satisfaction.

In this early stage of their progress they were destined to a terrible onset from a neighboring hostile tribe. Early on a morning in June, 1843, a strong party of Sioux came upon one of the Pawnee villages by surprise, when a course of fighting and plunder ensued which lasted till mid-day, and resulted in killing 67 Pawnees, wounding twenty others, seizing 200 horses, and burning 20 out of 41 lodges of which the village was composed. The value of property lost was estimated at $8,000 or $10,000. The Indians of this village were scattered among the other bands, being fearful of another attack should they attempt to rebuild the village; and in all the villages agricultural labor was greatly retarded by the constant fear of hostile tribes. Meanwhile the missionary brethren and sisters, amid many agitating scenes, prosecuted their labors with patience and hope; and especially had they, in 1846, accomplished an important work, in the translation of the Gospel of Mark into the Pawnee language.

In 1847 the missionaries, in view of the frequent assaults made upon the Pawnees, and the danger to which their own lives were exposed, withdrew from the field, and the mission has not since been resumed.

Oregon Indians.—After several exploring expeditions among the Indians west of the Rocky Mountains, the Board entered upon a mission there in the autumn of 1836. Their attention was directed to three tribes, embracing the Kayuses, among whom was the Wailatpu station; the Nez Perses, among whom were the Clear Water and Kamiah stations; and the Flat Heads, in whose neighborhood was the Tshimakain station. These stations were provided with suitable laborers, so that in 1840 the whole force consisted of four missionaries, one physician, two male and six female assistants. They were not only kindly received, but the Indians showed the utmost eagerness to receive instruction; and other tribes, hearing that teachers had come into the country, sent pressing messages requesting that one or more might be sent to dwell among them.

The three tribes above named were anxious also to engage in agriculture, and hundreds of families settled near the mission stations, and cultivated the ground so assiduously that in a little time they had produced enough for their comfortable subsistence. Their desire for religious instruction exceeded anything ever before met with among the North American Indians. "Among the Nez Perses," says the report for 1840, "the congregation had increased from such a number as could be accommodated in a small school house, to between one and two thousand, many coming from the adjacent bands. All seemed eager for religious instruction, and it was believed that the Spirit of the Lord was working on the hearts of many. As many as 2,000 made a public confession of sin, and promised to serve God. Doubtless many did this with a very imperfect idea of what was involved in it, though not a few were thought to give evidence of saving conversion." A similar religious interest was manifested among the Kayuses.

About this time the mission received, as a donation from the Sandwich Island churches, a small printing-press, with the requisite type and furniture, with paper, &c., all estimated at about $450. From the same source they received the year before $80 in money, and ten bushels of salt. The press was immediately set up at Clear Water, and employed to print an elementary school book of twenty pages. The Indians were highly gratified with a book in their own language, and new interest was found to be imparted to the schools. In 1841 a second book was prepared and printed in the Nez Perses language, and 800 copies printed, making 41,600 pages. A saw mill and grist mill were also put in operation at Clear Water, and a grain mill at Wailatpu, all of which afforded valuable aid to the mission families, and encouraged a settled life among the Indians.

For the three or four succeeding years the mission was attended with great apparent success, not, however, without some serious defections among the Indians, and at times abusive treatment from the younger and more savage portion of the tribes.

In the autumn of 1847, however, a scene occurred at the Wailatpu station, among the Kayuses, of the most tragical and distressing character. Owing to the prevalence and extreme fatality of the measles and dysentery, a portion of the Indians became jealous of the missionaries, and especially of Dr. Whitman, who was stationed at Wailatpu, supposing that if they would they might use their supernatural powers to stay the dreadful malady. Some even pretended that Dr. W. was giving them poison, in order to destroy their lives. They therefore determined on revenge, and on the 29th of Nov., 1847, they fell upon the Waiilatpu station, and most cruelly massacred Dr. Whitman, his wife, and twelve other persons. Of the latter, several were emigrants from the States, and one was an assistant missionary. The details of this tragical affair are of a most heart-rending nature. They are fully given in the "Herald" for July, 1848, by Mr. Spalding, one of the missionaries, with an account of his own wonderful escape. About fifty women and children, who were taken and held as captives, were redeemed through the agency of Mr. Ogden, chief factor of the Hudson Bay Company, after having suffered every abuse and indignity for nearly a month.

In addition to the above-mentioned cause for this outrage, it was believed to have been promoted in some measure by the Romish priests, from St. Louis, who had come into that region, and who had been active in opposing the Protestant missionaries. This suspicion was strengthened by the fact that several children of the murderers were baptized by one of these priests, while yet the hands of their parents were wet with the blood of their victims. It was also known that the Catholic priest last named was in the company of an Indian who was pursuing Mr. Spalding with a loaded pistol, with a view to murder him. From these and other circumstances it is not difficult to determine the relation and agency of Romish priests to this scene—one of the most savage and appalling to be met with in all the annals of missionary adventure.

Within a short time after the massacre, all the stations were abandoned, it not being considered safe for the mission families to remain. Some of the missionaries continued to labor in Oregon, among the whites, but no mission has since been attempted among the Indian tribes.

Indians in New York.—The Indians in New York are remnants of the "Six Tribes," and reside at the four following places, viz.: Tuscarora, about 4 miles east of Niagara river; Seneca, 4 miles from Buffalo; Cattaraugus, 30 miles south of Buffalo, and Alleghany, also in western New York. The missions at these places were transferred by the United Foreign Missionary Society to the Board, in 1826.

In 1827, Mr. John Eliot, a young man from Maine, entered upon his labors among the Tuscaroras, where he found a population of 240 Indians, a church of 15 members; a mission house and farm worth $1,800, and a school, which he immediately re-organized, with 30 scholars. In 1831, a revival of religion was enjoyed at this place, and the church was increased to 56 members. At this period for the first time, the sanctity and obligations of the marriage relation were acknowledged by these Indians, and 21 children were baptized. The people also began more strictly to regard the Sabbath, and to be more temperate and industrious.

At Seneca, a boarding-school was in operation, which, in 1828, embraced 70 pupils; also a church of 49 members. In 1829, a new house of worship was dedicated, the money for which, — $1,700, had been subscribed by the chiefs and young men of the tribe. During this year, also, the Gospel of Luke, the Sermon on the Mount, and about thirty hymns were printed in the Seneca language. A revival of religion was enjoyed at this station in 1831.

At Cattaraugus, there was special attention to religion in 1827, and a church of 12 members was organized. For several subsequent years there was much attention to religion at this place.

The station at Alleghany had enjoyed the services of a teacher several years, but had been without a missionary till 1829, when Mr. William Hall was ordained to that work.

In 1843, the whole number of Indians residing in Western New York, was estimated at 3,000, about three-fourths of whom were Senecas, and the remainder Tuscaroras, Onondagas, Cayugas, Oneidas, and Mohawks, remnants of the once powerful Six Nations. They occupied five reservations, embracing about 110,000 acres. A treaty had, a little before this, been concluded, by which a portion of their lands were ceded to the United States, and this subject caused much complaint and trouble.

The whole number of church members at this time was 234, of whom 49 were at Tuscarora, 20 at Seneca, 51 at Cattaraugus, and 114 at Alleghany. The number of pupils in the schools at these stations was estimated at 200. The mission press at Seneca was employed in printing various small works, and in 1845, more than 52,000 pages were executed. In respect to agriculture and the comforts of life, great good had been effected among the Indians. One of the missionaries reported in 1848, "three times as much productive labor as there was in 1832, and five times as much provision obtained."

Of late years some changes have occurred, and the mission has been reported under two separate heads, viz., the Seneca mission, and the Tuscarora mission. The Seneca mission has 4 stations, 4 missionaries, 15 female assistant missionaries, and one native assistant. In the two churches there are 169 members, and in the 10 schools there are 310 pupils.

The Tuscarora mission has one station, one out-station, one missionary, four female assistant missionaries, and two native helpers. The church has 96 members; and the schools, of which there are two, have 70 scholars.

Under the labors of the missionaries, these Indians have advanced to a high state of civilization, and, in respect to industrial, social, and moral habits, they show a degree of improvement rarely excelled by those who have been raised from a savage state.

MORAVIAN MISSIONS TO NORTH AMERICAN INDIANS.—The labors of the Moravian breth ren among the Indians of North America were commenced as early as 1735. Their attention was first directed to the Creek nation, but their labors were soon interrupted by hostilities between the English and the Spaniards. Subsequently, during the 18th century, they established missions at various points in the southern and middle States, and they often had the pleasure of seeing the Indians embracing the truth, and even of witnessing some signal triumphs of the Gospel; but they were frequently compelled to abandon interesting fields, by hostilities among neighboring tribes, and especially by the adverse events of the English and French war, and the war of the revolution. To follow them in the varied results of their labors through this long period, would require more space than can be allowed in the present work.

Within the present century the Moravians have had missions among the Delawares, the Chippeways, the Creeks, the Cherokees, and some smaller tribes, whom they have followed in their voluntary or forced removals, quitting their posts only when their continued labors became fruitless or impossible.

At the present time their missions are confined to two tribes: the Delawares, on the Kansas river, where they have more than 350 Indians under religious instruction, and the Cherokees, in their new western home, where they have two stations, and about 120 communicants. The returns from these missions are very incomplete, rendering it impossible to give full statistics, or to state what are their present prospects and means of usefulness.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The only mission which the Church of England has had among the North American Indians is that among the Esquimaux, on Red river, south of Lake Winnipeg and north of Minnesota. It was commenced in 1822 by Rev. J. West, the Hudson Bay Company's chaplain, on Red river. In the course of a year or two, a school-house and church were erected, and considerable progress was made towards bringing the Indians under instruction. In 1823 Rev. D. T. Jones sailed from England for the purpose of strengthening this mission, and in 1825 he was joined by the Rev. W. Cochran. The progress of the mission at this date had been such, that the school-house and church were too small, and new and more commodious ones were erected. In 1832 there were 3 stations, with each a church, and a total of 143 communicants. The number attending public worship was 800, and the number gathered into schools was 330.

At the present time, as nearly as can be ascertained from the incomplete returns, there are connected with the Red river mission 10 stations, 8 missionaries, 12 assistants, 8 of whom are natives, 1733 attendants on public worship, 507 communicants, 22 schools, and 724 pupils. The missionaries have acquired the Indian language, so as to preach in it, and they have translated portions of the New Testament, the church catechism, the marriage service, and the communion and baptismal services. The language of these Indians, denominated the Cree language, is said by the missionaries to bear a strong affinity to the Greek.

In the department of agriculture, considerable progress has been made. The Indians build very comfortable houses, raise large patches of barley, wheat, potatoes, &c., and enjoy much of social order and comfort. Within a short time Moose Lake has been occupied as a station, under the labors of a pious Indian who reads the New Testament well, and has the entire confidence of the missionaries.—REV. E. D. MOORE.

EPISCOPAL BOARD.—A mission was commenced at Green Bay, by the Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, in 1825, under the superintendence of Rev. Mr. Nash, which was suspended in 1827. In 1829, it was renewed, under the superintendence of Rev. R. F. Codle, by whom it was continued, under many embarrassments and difficulties, till 1837, when treaties were entered into between the United States and many of the north-western tribes of Indians for their removal west of the Mississippi. The unsettled condition of the tribes around the mission, consequent upon these treaties, and their subsequent removal, led to the discontinuance of the mission. The results of this mission are thus stated: About 270 Indian children enjoyed the benefits of the school, some of whom have died in the faith of Christ, and the comfortable assurance of a blessed hereafter. Some are now adorning the doctrine of God our Saviour by a life of consistent piety.

Some time after the breaking up of this mission, Bishop Kemper, accompanied by Rev. Mr. Gregory, embraced a number of tribes in a circuit, in a visit to the scattered members of his diocese; and on the 2d of December, 1838, he consecrated a church at Duck Creek, erected by the Oneidas with a portion of the funds received from Government; and in 1839, Rev. Solomon Davis had charge of the church. The department of Indian Missions was subsequently transferred to the Domestic Committee; who proposed a plan for an Indian diocese, with a missionary bishop, and considerable effort was made to raise money to endow the bishopric; but as yet, the object has not been accomplished. A mission has, however, been commenced among the Chickasaws, and an appropriation has been made by the United States Government toward sustaining a school under the direction of the mission.

AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.—Ojibwa Mission.—This mission comprises four stations, located at Red Lake, Cass Lake, Belle Prairie and St. Josephs, Minnesota Territory.

the first three on the head waters of the Mississippi river, and the last on the North Red river, where it enters the British possessions. This is the only mission in all that region of country. It was commenced under the patronage of the Western Evangelical Missionary Society, in 1843, and afterwards transferred to the American Missionary Association. The Ojibwa (or Chippeway) Indians compose one of the largest tribes in the United States, numbering some 30,000. They are divided into small bands of from 200 to 500 souls; the bands each having its own home, hunting-ground and chief, all located from 25 to 100 miles apart.

At three of these stations, boarding-schools are established, and the scholars are required to engage in some kind of manual labor a portion of each day. Churches containing native converts have been formed at Red Lake and Cass Lake. The other stations have been commenced within the last two years.

When this mission commenced, the Indians had no domestic animals, except dogs, and no agricultural implements. They raised nothing, but depended for subsistence on hunting and fishing, wild rice and sugar; and, being in a poor country for game, they often suffered with hunger, and sometimes resorted to the use of human flesh to satisfy it. Now some of these bands supply themselves abundantly with food, and have to spare for their starving neighbors of other bands. For this improvement they are indebted to the instruction and example of the missionaries, and the aid received from them in plowing their lands.—REV. G. WHIFFLE.

AMERICAN INDIAN MISSION ASSOCIATION.—This society, the seat of whose operations is in Louisville, Ky., have four missions, located among the Choctaws, Creeks, Weas, Piankeshaws, Miamias, and Putawatamies; with six stations and eight out-stations; 28 missionaries and assistants; 21 churches, with 1300 communicants; 126 baptisms during the year; and 165 pupils in schools. This society represents a portion of the Baptist denomination in the south-west.

NOVA SCOTIA: The province of Nova Scotia is situated on the eastern side of the continent of North America, between north latitude 43° 25' and 47°, and between west longitude 43° 40' and 66° 25'. It is one of the provinces of British North America. It was first colonized by the French, by whom it was called Acadie, or Acadia. It was finally ceded by France to Great Britain in 1713. Its principal natural divisions are Nova Scotia Proper and Cape Breton. Its area is about 18,600 square miles; its population 276,117, according to the census of 1851. The religious parties, when ranged under the two general divisions of Protestants and Catholics, stand thus: Protestants, 206,483; Roman Catholics, 69,634. Of the Protestant churches, the more prominent are the Established Church of England and Ireland; the Presbyterian Church; the Associate Baptist; the Wesleyan Methodist; the Congregational; and the Evangelical Lutheran. The religious statistics given in this article are to be understood as those of 1854, except where it is otherwise stated.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND is recognized by the ancient laws of the province as the Established Church. This legal recognition was effected in 1758, but though various civil enactments, as to the limits of parishes, appointment of church-wardens and vestrymen, were obtained thereby, nothing beyond the mere name of an establishment has for many years existed. The permanent endowment of Windsor College, under the exclusive control of this church, has been discontinued by the state; so that, in effect, the only privilege which remains of a distinctive nature, is that the bishop retains ex-officio a seat in the legislative council of the province. There is much probability that this offensive distinction will soon be removed, and that then the name, as well as the privileges of an establishment, will be erased from the civil statute book. The number of adherents to this church in 1851 was 36,482. The list of clergy for 1854 contains one bishop, one arch-deacon, 65 ordained ministers, and two traveling missionaries. These are located in 40 different towns and settlements. Four of the clergy are connected with Windsor College, and three with Halifax Grammar School: two are retired from service, and one is an agent for the Colonial Church and School Society. Until recently, large annual remittances for the support of the clergy and college professors, had been received from the British Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, and even, it is understood, from grants of the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland. The foreign aid is now greatly curtailed, and will, it is expected, in the course of a few years, altogether cease. The effect of this change of policy has been far from disastrous. A large portion of the wealth of the province is found within the pale of this church, and nothing is wanting to secure permanent and growing prosperity but the prudent management of its internal resources. Already this has been tested in the large endowment secured by subscription for Windsor College, (£10,000,) and in the efforts made to sustain in thorough efficiency the Diocesan Society and the Foreign District of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—Under this head are grouped the adherents of three distinct churches, who, though holding the same standards, are yet quite independent in church government, if not really antagonistic in feeling and pursuit. Their source of dispute, or rather, ground of separation, depends entirely upon their respective origin. They have all descended from the Presbyterian Churches of Scotland, and hold the distinctive principles of what are there denominated, Kirk, Free Church, and United Presbyterian. The oldest, largest, and most influential of these bodies in Nova Scotia is that which arose from the two secession churches, Burgher and Anti-burgher. A union was happily effected between the adherents of these, and of all the Presbyterians then in Nova Scotia, in the year 1817. Only one Presbyterian minister remained aloof, and he was personally favorable, while his congregation being originally independent, was unfavorable to this union. The first Presbyterian missionaries arrived in Nova Scotia in 1766, but no permanent location was made before 1771.

The first presbytery was formed in 1786, under the designation of Presbytery of Truro. Nine years afterwards, another was formed in Pictou, and so designated. At the period of the union above referred to, there were three presbyteries, comprising in all 19 ordained ministers, and 25 congregations. The great difficulty all along experienced by this church, has been the difficulty of obtaining an adequate supply of ministers.

At first, and for many years, the only source of supply was the parent churches in Scotland, and the missionary spirit there and then existing was not so ardent as to overcome, with sufficient readiness and frequency, the terrors of a climate generally reputed, though falsely, as vibrating between the extremes of heat and cold. In 1816 a society was formed to procure the establishment of an academy for the training of native youth, for the ministry and other learned professions. The basis proposed was sufficiently liberal to unite all dissenting bodies, and the means of support was to be endowment by the State. This effort was for a time apparently successful, but never so much so as to acquire the character of permanency. Ultimately it became a bone of contention, introduced bitter animosity and religious hate into the surrounding community, and became a watchword for political party, so as to form an effectual hindrance to ecclesiastical union on the part of the different Presbyterian bodies. Eventually all connection with this institution was abandoned by the Presbyterian Church of Nova Scotia, and then it became a matter of dire necessity with that church to provide and maintain an educational institute out of her own resources. Several years, however, elapsed before this step was taken. In 1848 measures were initiated with a view to the erection of a theological seminary, as preparatory to the Divinity Hall. A professor of philosophy was appointed, who for a time took charge of the literary classes, as well as logic, and natural and moral philosophy. At present, 1854, there are two professors in the seminary, one having charge of the classes in languages, mathematics, and natural philosophy; the other logic and moral philosophy, with other branches. In the Divinity Hall there are two professors, to one is committed biblical literature, to the other theology, systematic and pastoral. The literary and philosophical classes have an annual session of six months, and students are required to attend three years in order to complete their curriculum. The Divinity Hall remains in session six weeks, and the course of study extends over four years; but as the Hall meets annually, immediately after the seminary, the entire course for students of divinity does not exceed six years. A fixed standard of qualification for entrance to the seminary has been established, such as can be acquired at the general schools and academies of the province, and special provision is made to admit students who have received part of their training elsewhere to such a standing in the seminary or hall as their acquirements may be found, on examination, to entitle them.

The Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Nova Scotia meets annually on the last Tuesday of June, and is the final court of judicature—there being no ecclesiastical connection with the Church in Scotland, either in regard to pecuniary support or spiritual control. It has now (in 1854) under its inspection three presbyteries in Nova Scotia and one in Prince Edward's Island. The presbytery of Pictou includes 15 congregations; of these 14 enjoy a settled ministry, and one of these a collegiate charge. There are various mission stations within the bounds of this presbytery which will soon be able to support, as they now require, the labors of a separate minister. One member of this presbytery is located in Maramichi, New Brunswick, and is the only ordained minister of this connection now settled in that province. The presbytery of Tours includes seven congregations, and at present all are supplied with a settled ministry. Several mission stations are in course of preparation for the same position, and one of these is in New Brunswick. The presbytery of Halifax has within its bounds seven congregations. Six are now under a stated pastorate. Mission stations are thus numerous and promising. The presbytery of Prince Edward's Island contains seven congregations, six ministers, and several mission stations. In each of these presbyteries there are congregations whose local extent, number of adherents, pecuniary resources, and prospect of increase are calling aloud for division and subdivision; but the supply of ministers is yet too scanty to admit of compliance with a policy that would soon double and redouble the efficiency and spiritual prosperity of the best portion of the Church. At present there are but three ordained probationers, one retired minister who takes occasional appointments, and four licentiates. The business of the synod, during the interval of its meetings, is conducted by four distinct boards, one for the Home Mission supply, distributing supply of probationers according to the wants of the several presbyteries, and assisting such stations with the means of occasional supplies, under the direction of the presbyteries in whose bounds these are placed; a second board, for the superintendence of the Foreign Missionary operations of the church; a third, for the superintendence of the seminary and hall, and a fourth for legally receiving and appropriating the moneys of the church which may be entrusted to their care.

The following statistics will afford some idea of the pecuniary resources and numerical strength of the P. C. N. S.: ordained ministers, 38; licentiates, 4; self-sustaining congregations, 34; home mission stations, 6; supplemented congregations, 3; foreign mission stations, 1; adhering population, according to census (1851,) 28,767 in Nova Scotia; the population in Prince Edward Island not correctly ascertained, but not under 4,000, and in New Brunswick 1,000. If to all this we add 2,000 for the church at Aneiteum, New Hebrides, we have a gross amount of adherents, 35,767 souls, who are depending for spiritual oversight on the church. 31 congregations return 5,369 communicants, 276 accessions. According to the statistical tables and financial returns for 1854, the average salary paid to each minister is supposed to be nearly £130 currency, or £104 sterling.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—In order of date the Church of Scotland is the next branch of the Presbyterian Church in Nova Scotia. For a long period very painful and injurious animosity existed between this body and the Presbyterian church of Nova Scotia. Shortly after the union of all the Presbyterians in the province, in 1817, the strife commenced and raged so long as the state-paid academy of Pictou remained as a source of dispute. Happily this has been removed, and the very unseemly and destructive feuds which it engendered, have to a great extent disappeared, and feelings of friendship are now being cherished by ministers and people. This church has all along depended for pecuniary support and ministerial supply on the parent church in Scotland. In 1824, the Glasgow Colonial Society was organized (in Scotland) with a view to supply the Presbyterian population of the colonies with ministers of the Church of Scotland. At the disruption which took place in May, 1843, not fewer than 8 ministers left the synod of Nova Scotia to fill up the breaches at home. In 1844, this synod divided, a majority declaring in favor of the Free Church, and assuming the designation "Synod of Nova Scotia, adhering to the Westminster standards." For several years a large proportion of the congregations that had been deserted by their ministers, remained vacant, but latterly these have been to a considerable extent supplied by new accessions from Scotland. The synod now (1854) consists of 4 presbyteries. There are, however, in all, but 9 ordained ministers, and 1 ordained missionary, and 4 catechists. While the adhering population in Nova Scotia alone was, in 1851, 18,867. It will thus be seen that a very great deficiency of pastoral oversight still exists. The greater number of those ministers now in the field are supported by the Home Church, so that this church, as a whole, is far from self-sustaining.

FREE CHURCH OR SYNOD OF NOVA SCOTIA, ADHERING TO THE WESTMINSTER STANDARDS.—This body was formed in 1844, and consists of the same number of presbyteries as the body from which it was separated. It includes a ministry, however, of 24, of whom 19 are located in Nova Scotia, and 3 in Prince Edward's Island, one in Newfoundland, and one in Bermuda, W. I. The adhering population in Nova Scotia, in 1851, was found to number 25,820. A Free Church College for the lower provinces of British North America is located at Halifax, N. S., having 2 professors. Also an academy, with a rector and 2 masters, which is designed to prepare for the college. Hitherto the supply and support of ministers in this connection has greatly depended on the resources of the Free Church of Scotland; but from the above institution, in connexion with a Theological Hall, the native youth have been trained, so that the first year's students have advanced so far as to be licensed and located in the different vacancies and mission stations during the present year.

REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—Three congregations and 3 ministers. Adhering population not accurately known.

ASSOCIATED BAPTIST CHURCHES.—The earliest efforts of this religious connection in Nova Scotia is nearly contemporaneous with those of the Presbyterian Church. It has 54 settled ministers, with an adhering population of 42,243. This population, however, includes several distinct Baptist communities, whose ministry amounts to 17 elders and 3 ministers. The Associated Baptist Church is divided into 3 associations: Western, Central, and Eastern. The Baptist Convention of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island, meets annually. In Nova Scotia their educational institutions are located, consisting of a college and academy. The college has now 3 professors, and connected with it is a theological institute, with 2 professors, who also hold chairs in the college. The academy has two teachers, a principal and master, with an assistant. Some years ago this church sent a missionary to the foreign field, but at present they do not appear to have any one. They have, however, a missionary to the Acadian French in Nova Scotia.

WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH.—Missionaries from this body visited North America as early as 1769. In 1786, missions were commenced in Nova Scotia. By the last census (1851) it has an adhering population of 23,596, and in 1854, 31 ordained ministers. This list of ministers includes, however, 1 chairman and general superintendent, 1 editor of a denominational newspaper, and 4 supernumeraries. The seminary under the care of this body, is situated on the borders of the two provinces, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and this suits in its locality the wants of both denominational districts. It has a principal, who is also one of the professors, and a second professor; a classical and French tutor and English teacher; also a chaplain, treasurer, and steward. The students are boarded within the institution, and recently a large addition has been made, with a view to accommodate females with suitable board and education.

CONGREGATIONAL OR INDEPENDENT CHURCH.—The origin of this church in Nova Scotia was quite as early as others already described, but its progress has been very limited. It has but 6 ministers and 2,639 adherents. A college with 2 professors, 1 of whom acts as president, is placed under the sanction and control of the Congregational Union of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH.—This is the only other religious body in Nova Scotia worthy of distinct notice. Its adherents are chiefly of German extraction, and number 4087.

Besides the denominational efforts of each of these evangelical bodies, they severally unite in general schemes of benevolence and Christian philanthropy. The Nova Scotia Bible Society, and other auxiliaries of the British and Foreign Bible Society enlist the sympathies of all but the Baptists, and are very generally supported. The Halifax Naval and Military Bible Society is in like manner dependent upon the Christian public, generally. The Micmac Missionary Society, while its principal agent and missionary is Baptist, meets with the countenance and support of all classes. The Nova Scotia Sabbath Alliance consists of the leading ministers and members of all the leading Protestant denominations in Halifax.—REV. J. BAYNE, of Pictou.

NOWGONG: A station of the American Baptist Union in Assam.

NULLOOR: A station of the Church Missionary Society, in the Tinnevely district, India.

OAHU : One of the principal of the Sandwich Islands group. It is 25 miles W. N. W. of Molokai, the most romantic and fertile of the whole group, and the residence of the King, and seat of government. It is about 48 miles long and 23 wide. The American Board have seven stations on this Island.

OCEANICA : A term somewhat indefinitely applied to the islands of the Pacific Ocean. (See South Sea Islands and Indian Archipelago.)

OJIBWAS : A tribe of North American Indians, inhabiting the shores of Lakes Superior and Huron. (See North American Indians.)

OKKAH : A station of the Moravians in Labrador.

OLD TOWN : Station of the United Presbyterian Synod of Scotland, at the Old Calabar, West Africa.

OLD CALABAR : Old Calabar lies in the Bight of Biafra, near the sixth degree of north latitude, and between the eighth and ninth degrees of east longitude. The coast there runs east and west. Standing opposite the Old Calabar frith, you look directly north. On your right hand are the Cameroonian mountains, rising to the height of 13,000 feet ; and further to the right, at the distance of sixty miles, is the elevated and beautiful island of Fernando Po ; and on your left is an extensive level district, over which a dense mist is often seen resting :—that is the long-sought Delta of the Niger, a vast morass, extending 200 miles along the sea shore, and upwards of 250 miles inland, channeled by numerous streams—the mouths of that celebrated river, covered with mangrove and palm-oil trees, and inhabited by fierce and savage tribes, many of whom are cannibals. Sail up the Old Calabar frith, a distance of fifty miles, and you see two large rivers flowing into it. The one on your left hand is the Cross river, so called because it was supposed to communicate with the Niger, and to be one of its mouths ; but it was explored by Captain Becroft, in 1842, a distance of 175 miles, and was found to be an independent stream, more than a mile in breadth, with a depth of from six to seven fathoms, flowing from the east—a region yet unexplored by Europeans—and having its banks studded with towns and villages. Enter the river on your right hand, which is the Old Calabar river, fully three-fourths of a mile in width, and after ascending it about eight miles, and passing a jutting head-land, you see upon the right bank a cluster of towns. These are Duke Town, Henshaw Town, Old Town, and seven miles up the river, on the left bank, Creek Town, the principal towns of Old Calabar, and the seat of the mission of the United Presbyterian Synod of Scotland. (See Africa, Western.)

These towns, with the country villages, contain a population of 60,000 or 70,000, subject to the sway of the King of Old Calabar, and are accessible to missionaries. Each town has its king or headman ; but the chief authority is vested in Eyo Honesty, of Creek Town. The population is divided into two classes, freemen and slaves—the latter being the great majority. These are either employed on the provision grounds, which are at some distance from the towns, or in the operations of trade. The freemen are all engaged in trade, and are mainly dependent upon it for their support and influence. Even the king, who has no revenue from his subjects, carries on trade to a great extent, is of active business habits, keeps regular accounts, and owes all his power to the weight of his character, and the wealth which he has acquired from trading. The slaves are generally treated with kindness ; and there seems to be a process of internal emancipation, the children of the third generation generally becoming free. It is a happy circumstance that persons have ceased to be exported as slaves from this district for a considerable number of years. That horrid traffic is totally suppressed in the Bight of Biafra. This result is to be ascribed to the beneficial influence of a growing trade, and to the treaties made with the chiefs by the British Government. The trade which is carried on at Old Calabar, is chiefly in palm-oil. The palm-oil is brought from the interior, and is exchanged for British goods. The humanizing influence of legitimate commerce is becoming every year more obvious. Not only has it enlarged the views of the people, and to a certain degree improved their manners ; enabled them to have comfortable houses, and to furnish them, in many instances, with costly articles of European manufacture ; but it has taught them that it is for their interest to live at peace with their neighbors.

The mode of government at Old Calabar is, in the case of freemen, by common consultation and agreement. They meet together in the palaver-house, talk over the matter, and no measure can become law that has not a majority of votes. The great difficulty which they feel is to keep in subjection their numerous slaves. This seems to be managed chiefly by the aid of superstition. They have a secret institution, called Egbo, much resembling the Oro of the Yorubas. (See Yoruba).

Religion.—They believe in the existence of God and of the devil, in a future state, and in the immortality of the soul ; but their ideas on these subjects are dim and confused, and have, by the wickedness of the heart, and the malignant teaching of Satan, been framed into a system of superstition, dark, cruel, and sanguinary. They regard one day of the week as a Sabbath, they all practise circumcision, on festival days they sprinkle the blood of the Egbo goat, and they make a covenant of friendship between parties that were at variance, by putting on them the blood of a slain goat, mixed with certain ingredients; things which indicate the remains of the patriarchal religion. Their personal worship, so far as it has been ascertained, may be divided into two parts; that which is observed within the house, and that which takes place in the court-yard. The worship within the house consists in adoring a human skull, stuck upon the top of a stick, around the handle of which a bunch of feathers is tied. This disgusting object—their domestic idol—is said to exist in every house in Old Calabar. The worship in the court-yard is of this kind: in the middle of the yard there is a bason of water placed at the foot of a small tree, which is planted for the purpose. This bason is never emptied of its contents, but is once a week filled with a fresh supply of water; and on the day when this is done, the second day of the week, called God's day, they "offer a fowl, or some other small thing of that sort, which is tied by the foot to the tree," and then they "pray to Basi Ebum, the great God, but without confession of sin, and solely for temporal benefits." Witchcraft exerts the same terrible influence here as in other parts of Western Africa.

But the most desolating and sanguinary of all their customs is the practice of sacrificing human victims, for the benefit of deceased persons of rank. This horrid custom arises from the belief that the future world corresponds to the present—that the same wants are felt, the same relationships sustained, and the same pursuits followed; and therefore, that the station and happiness of a person depend upon the number of followers and slaves that are killed and sent after him. The effect of this belief is, that in proportion to the dignity of the departed, the rank and power of the survivors, and the warmth of affection which they cherish for the deceased, is the number of victims that are seized and immolated. Acquaintances also testify their respect for the dead, and sympathy with the sorrowing relations, by destroying a few of their slaves. The agents in this wholesale system of murder are the nearest relations of the deceased, who evince their affection and their grief, by exerting themselves to catch by force, by stratagem, and by all manner of ways, and to destroy as many of their fellow creatures as they can. It is a season of terror. The slaves, from whose ranks the victims are usually taken, flee to the bush for shelter, the doors of the houses are fastened, and every one is afraid to go abroad. And when it is considered that the funeral ceremonies continue for four months, and that at the beginning and especially at the close of this period, when the grand carnival, or make-devil, as they call it, takes place, great exertions are made to obtain victims, it will at once be obvious that this is a practice which spreads terror and mourning through every part of the community. It prevails in the greater part of western Central Africa, and is drenching the land with blood.

OLENDEBENK: Station of the American Board at the Gaboon, West Africa.

OODOOVILLE: A populous parish of Ceylon, in the district of Jaffna, 5 miles north of Jaffnapatam. It stands on an extensive plain, covered with groves of palmyra, cocoa-nut, and other fruit trees, in which are many villages of natives, and, formerly, many idol temples. The American Board have a station with a female boarding school here.

OODOOPITTY: (Valverty) A station of the American Board in Jaffna, Ceylon.

OORFA: A prospective station of the American Board among the Armenians: the ancient Edessa, as is commonly supposed, and also the Er of the Chaldees, the birth-place of the patriarch Abraham: has a population of 7,000 Armenians and 4,000 Syrians.

OOTACAMUND: A health station, on the Neilgherry Hills, Southern India.

OPOTIKI: A station of the Church Missionary Society in New Zealand, situated on a plain, at the entrance of the river, on the south-east side of the Bay of Plenty. Population about 1,300.

ORIENTAL CHRISTIANS, MISSIONS TO: For accounts of missions at present existing, among the decayed churches of the East, see Armenians, Nestorians, Greece, Syria, Mosul, Egypt. Although it does not enter into the plan of this work to notice extensively those missions, which have been prosecuted for a time, and then given up, yet there have been operations of this kind in the East which deserve some notice. Among these is the mission of the Church Missionary Society to Abyssinia, for which see Abyssinia. There are, also, several missions of recent origin, which may be noticed more appropriately in a general article than under geographical heads. And there are certain general principles, which apply to all these missions, which may be properly noticed in a general article. The appointment of a missionary bishop to Jerusalem, by the governments of Great Britain and Prussia, had reference not only to the Jews, but to Oriental Christians; but we have no sources of information which will enable us to give a connected history of his operations. The present incumbent, Bishop Gobat, the worthy pioneer of the Abyssinian mission, will use his position to the best advantage for the furtherance of evangelical labors among all classes of the people. The Church Missionary Society have a mission at Jerusalem, consisting of two ordained missionaries, one European lay secretary, and one native teacher. This mission was designed especially, though not exclusively, to provide for the instruction of Abyssinian pilgrims, Bishop Gobat having been requested, both by the king and the Abuna of Abyssinia, to take charge of the Abyssinian convent at that place. (See Africa East.) The report of that society for 1853, states that "The experience of another year has confirmed the committee in the wisdom of the course hitherto pursued by their missionaries, in making an open protest against the errors of the Oriental churches, and in receiving under Christian instruction all who desire to hear and embrace the truth of the Gospel. Events render it each year more difficult for such inquirers to continue in communion with their own church. They have now political liberty to enrol themselves on the civil register of the local pachas as Protestants; and having done so, they claim the assistance and protection of the Protestant churches, and there appears no just ground on which that claim can be refused. The committee have great satisfaction in adding, that the American Episcopal Church, at the late anniversary of their Board of Foreign Missions, announced their entire adherence to these views, after sixteen years' experience in missionary operations at Constantinople, upon the opposite principle of co-operation with the heads of the Oriental churches."

The mission at Constantinople, here alluded to, was commenced by the Rev. J. J. Robertson, D. D., and Rev. Horatio Southgate, under the direction of the Episcopal Board of Missions, in 1839. It was designed principally as a mission to the Greek Church; in the words of the annual report, "placing our church in a position to be known and recognized as a branch of the same Catholic Church, and a friend. It is sought that its missionaries should, if possible, be received and sanctioned as the representative of their church; that a friendly intercourse should be maintained, and every cause of needless offence be avoided. The Greek Church is to be approached as an Episcopal Church, and its integrity preserved."

In connection with this mission, it was designed also to establish a mission in Mesopotamia, among the Jacobite Christians. Mr. Southgate had made an exploring tour in that region, and Mardin was selected as the site of the mission.

In 1842, the Committee having determined to discontinue the Constantinople mission, and concentrate their efforts upon Mesopotamia, directed Mr. Southgate to remove as soon as practicable, either to Mardin or Mosul, and appointed two new missionaries to the same field. But Mr. Southgate viewing his appointment as limited to Constantinople, declined to accept the appointment to Mesopotamia.

At the meeting of the Board in 1843, the committee were directed to continue the mission at Constantinople, and re-appoint Mr. Southgate as missionary. One of the missionaries appointed to Mesopotamia, Rev. Mr. Taylor, on reaching Constantinople, changed his views as to his field of labor, and wished to remain at Constantinople; but the committee refused to alter arrangements which they considered definitely settled. Mr. Southgate, after his return to Constantinople, requested either that he might be permitted to return to the United States and present the cause to the churches, or else that a colleague be sent him, with authority to commence labor among the Armenians, and that $2,000 mission funds should be allowed for the coming year, both which the committee declined, chiefly for want of means. But this decision was overruled by the Board; and the committee were requested, so soon as funds could be raised for the purpose, to establish a mission to the Armenians, and also to grant Mr. Southgate permission to visit the United States for the purpose which he had proposed. In consequence of which the Mesopotamia mission was discontinued, and the whole operations concentrated upon Constantinople.

Soon after the adjournment of the Board, Mr. Southgate returned to the United States; and at the triennial session, his plans were submitted to the Board, and resolutions were passed, recommending to the general convention the appointment of a bishop, appropriating for the mission to the Eastern churches $5,000 per annum, and directing the addition of two missionaries to the station. In accordance with this recommendation, Mr. Southgate was elected bishop, and consecrated in October, 1844, as Missionary Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, in the dominions and dependencies of the Sultan of Turkey; and considerable sums of money were raised to sustain the mission. But the funds raised specifically for this mission not being sufficient to meet Bishop Southgate's views of what was needed to carry on the mission, and the committee not deeming it expedient to appropriate the amount requested by him from the general funds of the Board, Bishop Southgate returned with his family to this country, Nov. 6, 1849. On his arrival, the committee "came unanimously to the conclusion that the removal of the missionary bishop with his family, had closed the mission in Turkey."

At the triennial meeting of the Board in 1851, a resolution was passed, requesting the foreign committee to "renew the mission to the decayed churches in Asia Minor, in the manner they shall deem most likely to accomplish the best results." In obedience to this resolution, the subject was committed to Rev. Messrs. G. T. Bedell and T. S. Winston, who made an elaborate report, which was unanimously adopted by the committee. This report goes into an examination of the two methods of conducting missions to these churches: (1) "attempting their reformation through agencies and means approved by their ecclesiastical authorities, with the hope that the ecclesiastics would first become enlightened, and be chief instruments in promoting the general result;" and (2) seeking the same object "by the usual means of diffusing a saving knowledge of the Gospel among those who are ignorant of it, or 'decayed' in the appreciation of its truth."

In regard to the first of these, they say, "The foreign committee have entertained but one view on the subject. Although at the earnest representations of the missionary, they acquiesced in the trial of the experiment, yet from the first, they have considered it inadequate and impracticable. The experience of the church," they continue, "has proved that a reformation cannot be effectual while confined to the clergy; that of the two classes, the laity are the most easily affected, and must be the instruments of moving the clergy; and that ecclesiastics, as a body, very slowly acquiesce in a movement to which self-interest and cherished prejudices are so much opposed."

The committee proceed to review the history of the experiment at Constantinople, made for 16 years, at an expenditure of $45,000, and come to the conclusion that it has produced no practical results, beyond the translation of the Prayer Book, and a few other translations, the benefits of which if any are yet to be seen. They say, also, that an experiment upon similar principles was carried on by the Church Missionary Society from 1815 to 1846, with a similar result; and quote the following language from the report of that society: "The Society's chief failures have been in its attempts to establish missions among the ancient but lapsed churches of the East. The hope which was cherished, that the light of Divine truth might be rekindled with comparative ease among them, and through their agency be transmitted to their heathen and Mohammedan neighbors, has failed. Twice were the missionaries of the society driven out of the different districts of Abyssinia. (See Abyssinia and Africa East.) They were compelled, also, to withdraw from Asia Minor, through the jealousy of the Greek Church, as soon as their labors began to exercise a spiritual influence upon their scholars in their mission schools. And the Society's establishment at Malta was relinquished, after a trial of 25 years, as there appeared no results sufficient to justify its continuance. The Society also attempted, for several years, to coöperate with the ecclesiastical authorities of the Syrian Christian Church upon the Malabar coast of South India, in educational measures for the revival of that ancient church; but the attempts have failed." The committee also quote Bishop Gobat, and Archdeacon Pratt, of Madras, in corroboration of these views, and remark: "We are forced to the conclusion, that the effort to produce a restoration of those churches, by acting through their ecclesiastical authorities, or only in harmony with them, and by their approbation, will, in all probability, prove, as it has always proved, a failure; and therefore, that, in renewing the mission to these churches, the plan heretofore pursued must be abandoned."

At the annual meeting of the Board to which this report was made, it was resolved, "That the subject of Eastern Missions be still left in the discretion of the foreign committee, in accordance with the resolution adopted at the last triennial meeting."

Nazareth.—The Church Missionary Society have a station at Nazareth, under the care of Rev. F. A. Klein, who reports some movement among the people towards reformation. The congregation consists of 180 to 200.

Jerusalem.—Bishop Gobat, in his last communication, says, "During the course of last year, a goodly number of families and individuals have joined our church, although only 13 or 14 communicants are with us. But all meet every Lord's day, and two or three times during the week to hear the word of God read and expounded, and to pray together, with the help of the Arabic version of the Liturgy."

Nablous.—Bishop Gobat says the good work is progressing here. A few Protestants meet on the Lord's day and in the week, for reading the word of God and prayer.

Syra.—The Church Missionary Society have a station at Syra, in charge of Rev. F. A. Hildner. He has a school of 284 pupils, mostly girls. He holds service on Sundays in English and German, and some of the people seem to be under the influence of divine grace.

Smyrna.—Here, also, the Church Missionary Society have a station, under the direction of Rev. J. T. Wolters, and a Greek catechist. In his report for 1852, Mr. Wolters says, "There are a few Greeks among us, who have, I trust, been brought from darkness to light."

Malta Protestant College.—A Protestant college is maintained at Malta, of which the report of the Church Missionary Society for 1853 speaks as being in a state of growing prosperity. It comprises a school for youth, and a class of adults under training for native teachers. It contains 80 well-behaved boys and youths, from various countries, and of different complexions—Abyssinians, Syrians and Persians, Moslems and Jews, Copts and Greeks, Nestorians and Papists, are here living in the atmosphere of the pure word of God, of which some appear to have experienced the power during their stay here. Bishop Gobat, speaking of a visit which he recently made to the institution, says: "I could not refrain from tears of gratitude, when I saw them all devoutly kneeling, while an Italian, who but a few years ago was a blind Papist, or one who was formerly a blaspheming Jew, &c., was offering up a prayer to God, in the name of Jesus Christ, full of life and unction, for the outpouring of the Spirit of God upon Israel, Italy, Turkey, &c., each putting a peculiar emphasis upon the country or the people with whom, by nature and former habits, he was more particularly connected." Great hopes are entertained of this institution for furnishing missionary laborers in the East.

TABULAR VIEW.

ORISSA: A province of India, situated near the head of the Bay of Bengal, on its north-western shore, a short distance south-west from Calcutta: bounded on the north by Bengal, east by the Bay of Bengal, south by the country of the Teloochoos, and west by Nagopore. It is irregularly shaped, about three hundred miles long, and two hundred and forty wide. Its population is estimated at about three millions. It is supposed that the province was anciently much larger than it is now, and that its sovereigns formerly sustained a rank much above that of most Hindoo rajahs, and that it was numbered among the most powerful of the ancient Indian sovereignties. It was subjected in part by the Mohammedans about 400 years ago, and remained in an unsettled state till 1743. At that time it was overrun by the Mahrattas, who continued their plundering depredations till 1803, when they were expelled by the English. Since that period, the British have held absolute sway over the previously long distracted country, and quiet has mostly prevailed. Compared with the misrule and oppression of the former reigning powers, the policy of the present government is liberal, and the political condition of the people is so much improved that most of them are better satisfied with their state than their predecessors were with the rule of the native princes. Orissa is divided into three civil districts, viz.: Pooree in the south, Cuttack in the centre, and Balasore on the north. The sea-coast, which is the eastern part of the province, is level and far more populous than the central and western divisions, which are mountainous and covered in many places with primeval forests, inhabited by wild beasts, or men almost as untamed and rude as they. The climate, soil, productions, animals, insects, birds, reptiles, and fish of Orissa are similar to those of Bengal and other adjacent portions of Hindostan lying near the Tropic of Cancer. The villages, houses, food, clothing, dress, literature, and trades of the Oriyas are also much like those of the Bengalis and the people of other large portions of India.

The population of Orissa consists of Hindoos, Mohammedans, Santals, and Bhumijahs, the Hindoos constituting far the larger number. The districts of Pooree and Cuttack are occupied by the English General Baptist missionaries, the district of Balasore being the site of the Freewill Baptist mission. This district lies on the west side of the Bay of Bengal. It is about eighty miles long, and on an average thirty or forty miles wide, and contains about 500,000 inhabitants. On its northern boundary lies a considerable tract belonging to the province of Bengal, which is inhabited by Oriyas. On the west are several tributary states governed by native princes, which are peopled by Oriyas, Santals, &c. These are as numerous as the inhabitants of the district of Balasore, so that there are about one million souls dependent on this Society for religious light and influence. From its liability to inundation, the country is not much inhabited for three or four miles inland from the sea. Beyond this low tract the plains are sufficiently elevated for security, and are highly cultivated and densely populated. Farther inland the country becomes mountainous, covered in part by forests, where are found the scattered villages of the Oriyas, Santals, and Bhumijahs. "There are," says Rev. O. R. Bacheler, who has resided several years in the town of Balasore, "three vernacular languages spoken by the inhabitants of the Balasore district. 1. The Oriya, one of the Hindoo family of languages, derived principally from the Sanscrit. This is spoken by the greater part of the Hindoo population.

2. The Hindostanee, derived principally from the Arabic and Persian, and spoken by the Mohammedans. 3. The Santal, with which may be classed the Bhumija, they both being dialects of the same language."

The Oriya contains many religious and literary works, some translated from the Sanscrit, and others original. Most of the religious books are poetical, and some of them possess a great degree of literary merit. Some of these works are very large, the Puranas alone consisting of 1,600,000 lines! The religion of the Hindoos in Orissa, like their manners and customs, is similar to that of multitudes of others of their race. Caste in all its ruinous forms bears almost unlimited sway in the province. They worship the same gods and observe the same rites of most other Hindoos, and are equally ignorant and superstitious. The religious opinions and customs of the Mohammedans are based on the Koran, though somewhat modified by a long contact with heathenism. They are great bigots, and are probably more immoral and vicious than the Hindoos.

The Santals it is supposed were the aborigines of the country, but were driven to the mountainous regions by the Hindoos, by whom they were conquered in some remote period. They invariably live in the hilly jungle. They subsist mostly by selling wood, coal, and leaves to their neighbors; but they cultivate the soil to some extent. In religion, language, manners and customs, they are very different from the Hindoos, and are much less influenced by caste. The sun is the chief object of their worship, which they believe is God, and to which they sacrifice goats and chickens, at the same time repeating a prayer composed for such occasions. The departed spirits of their fathers are sometimes adored, and they are accustomed to worship their bullocks annually. This is done out of gratitude to the animals for bearing burdens during the year. These people are without a regular priesthood, temples, and a systematic religion. The master of a family officiates as its priest, performing the customary rites either in the house or under a tree.

The Santals say their race originated from two ducks' eggs; but their more immediate origin is attributed to a drunken and incestuous intercourse, something like that of Lot with his daughters. Strong drinks, music and dancing are among their favorite enjoyments. They are, however, a mild and inoffensive people. Unlike the Hindoos, they do not burn their dead, but bury them. Their complexion is nearly as dark as that of the Africans, but their hair is straight. A few oral songs and traditions constitute their literature, but they have no written language except that recently furnished by a missionary of the Freewill Baptist Society, and which none but a few who have been taught in the mission school can read. The language sounds very sweet and musical when spoken, and is remarkably regular, considering it has never been cultivated. As might be expected, it is very barren in theological terms. The women mingle with the men in their labors and recreations, seem to be on an equality with them, and are divested of the squeamishness of the Hindoo females. At the age of sixteen or seventeen years the Santals usually marry. The ceremony is very simple and performed as follows: The man puts some paint on the bride's head, and she in return confesses herself his wife by putting oil on his head.

The Bhumijas are next in importance to the Santals. They are described by Rev. Mr. Bachelier as "a similar people, occupying the same portion of the district, speaking a language strongly resembling the Santal, and, in most particulars, differing little from them. They are considerably less numerous than the former, and it is probable that missionary effort among them also would be eminently successful, could they be brought under religious influence. There are small portions of other tribes scattered among those already mentioned, but they are not sufficiently numerous to render a particular description necessary."

"The complexion of these different races varies from a dark copper color to black. Those whose occupation is mostly within doors are rather lighter than those more exposed. The hill tribes are darker than the people of the plains. The hair is straight and black, and worn long both by men and women. The eyes are black, the lips thin, nose prominent, foreheads elevated, the intellectual faculties predominating. They have an intellectual cast of countenance, and are rather good-looking than otherwise."

OROOMIAH: A city of Persia, the ancient Thebanna, the reputed birth-place of Zoroaster, situated on a beautiful fertile plain, the seat of the Mission of the American Board to the Nestorians. On this plain there are about 300 villages, inhabited chiefly by Nestorians, of whom there are about 20,000 in Oroomiah. (See Nestorians.)

OSHUNGA: Station of the American Board in West Africa, at the mouth of the Gaboon river.

OTAWAO: A station of the Church Missionary Society, near the Waipa river, in New Zealand.

OTAHEITE: Same as Tahiti. (See South Sea Islands.)

OZYUNGA: A station of the American Board at the mouth of the Gaboon river, West Africa.

PAARL: Station of the London Missionary Society, in South Africa, 85 miles north-east of Cape Town.

PACALTSDORP: Station of the London Missionary Society in South Africa, 245 miles east of Cape Town.

PAGO-PAGO: A station of the London Missionary Society, on the Island of Tutuila, one of the Samoan group.

PAGAN: A heathen, a Gentile, an idolator. This word was originally applied to the inhabitants of the country, who adhered to idolatry after Christianity had been received by the cities. So heathen signifies the inhabitants of a heath or woods, and Kaffre, in Arabic, signifies the inhabitants of a hut or cottage, and one that does not receive Mohammedanism.

PAGODA: A house of idols. In India, a temple in which idols are worshiped. It is likewise applied to an image of some supposed deity. Also a gold or silver coin current in Hindostan, varying in value from $1.75 to $2.

PAIHIA: A station of the Church Missionary Society in New Zealand, on the south side of the Bay of Islands.

PALLAM: A station of the Church Missionary Society in India.

PALAMCOTTAH: A station of the Church Missionary Society in the Tinnevely District, India.

PALANKEEN, or PALANQUIN: A covered carriage used in India, China, &c., borne on the shoulders of men, and in which a single person is conveyed from place to place.

PANNEIVILEI: A station of the Church Missionary Society in India.

PANTURA: A village at the mouth of a river of the same name, in Ceylon, a station of the Church Missionary Society.

PANTHEISM: The doctrine that the Universe is God.

PANEIVADALI: A station of the Church Missionary Society, India.

PANDITERIPO: A parish in the Jaffna district of Ceylon, 9 miles north-west of Jaffnapatam, where is a station of the American Board.

PAPENO: A station of the London Missionary Society on Tahiti, in the Southern Pacific.

PAPAOA: A station of the London Missionary Society on the Island of Tahiti, in the Southern Pacific.

PAPEETE: A station of the London Missionary Society on the Island of Tahiti, in the South Sea.

PAPARA: A station of the London Missionary Society on Tahiti, South Sea.

PAPEURIRI: A station of the London Missionary Society on Tahiti, South Sea.

PAPETOAI: A station of the London Missionary Society on Eimeo, South Sea.

PARK HILL: A station of the American Board among the Cherokee Indians.

PARAMARIBO: A considerable town, situated at the mouth of the Surinam river. Population 18,000 or 20,000. A station of the Moravians.

PARSEEISM: The Parsees are a somewhat numerous and influential sect in Hindostan, especially in the western part of the country, and also in Persia. In Bombay and vicinity they are estimated at about 75,000. Their sacred writings, or scriptures, are contained in the Zand-Avasta, or Zand Word, which, however, the missionaries have never found in a collected form in the hands of the Parsees. The Zand-Avasta consists of several parts, as the Vandidad, which professes to report the result of an interview of Zoroaster, the alleged founder of the sect, with Hormazd, the supreme object of worship, the Yacna and Vispard, which are interspersed with the Vandidad, and recited along with it during the celebration of the most extended service; the Khurda Avasta, or minor liturgy; the Yacta, and other detached pieces.

The Zand-Avasta is ascribed to Zoroaster, who is said to have lived about 500 years before Christ; but the testimonies of the ancients respecting the epoch of Zoroaster are very conflicting; and besides, there is no proof of even the existence of the Zand writings till long after the above period, and much less is there evidence that they were written by such a person. Learned Europeans of every shade of belief agree in pronouncing the Zand-Avasta a spurious work. Sir Wm. Jones, the "prince and pioneer of modern orientalisks," says it contains nothing which corresponds with the character of a philosopher and a legislator, and adds, that "either Zoroaster had not common sense, or he did not write the book which is attributed to him." Not only is it believed to be a spurious work, but a production of comparatively modern times, and probably of Persian origin.

According to the Zand-Avasta there are two deities, Hormazd and Ahiram, the former the author of good, and the latter the author of evil, but both of these are regarded as derived beings, coetaneously produced by Time. Writers on this subject have traced a striking resemblance between this theory and that of the ancient Manicheans, who also ascribed good and evil to two distinct creators, corresponding somewhat in name to those of the Parsees, and hence it is believed that the latter derived their notions, in part at least, from that heretical sect.

The Parsees are idolators, worshiping not merely the good and evil deities, but almost every thing that is named in heaven and earth. The learned Dr. Wilson, long a missionary of the Church of Scotland at Bombay, makes a literal translation of one section of the Parsee scriptures, in which the devotee is taught to say, "I worship Hor-mazd, the pure, master of purity. I worship Zoroaster, the pure, master of purity. I worship the whole body of Hormazd. I worship all the long existences (the beings which are to exist 12,000 years.) I worship all the pure celestial and terrestrial Izads (angels.) I worship all the fountains of water, flowing and stationary. I worship all the trees, and the trunks, and lofty branches, and fruit. I worship the whole earth. I worship the whole heaven. I worship all the stars, the moon, and the sun. I worship the primeval lights. I worship all the animals, both aquatic and terrene. I worship all the mountains, the purely pleasurable. I worship all the fires."

These are a few from the long catalogue of objects, animate and inanimate, which the Parsees are taught to worship. These objects are so jumbled together and confounded as to produce the utmost distraction and degradation in the mind of the worshiper. "Thus," Dr. Wilson remarks, "he at one moment calls upon Hormazd, at the next upon his own ghost; at one moment on an archangel, at the next on a sturdy bull; at one time on the brilliant sun, the next on a blazing fire; at one moment on a lofty and stupendous mountain, the next on a darksome cave; at one moment on the ocean, at the next on a well or spring, &c." Not only are all distinctions among the different objects of worship referred to in the liturgical and doctrinal works of the Parsees levelled, by being confounded together in the most strange and unnatural associations, but the same result is brought about by the fact that all the different objects of worship of whatever nature, have applied to them the same terms expressive of respect, of worship, of supplication, praise, exaltation, reverence, glory, and benediction. It has been clearly ascertained that the terms and objects of worship which have been given as specimens, are used by the Parsees, not to express civil, but religious respect and honor, and further, that they are used not with levity and indifference, but in the most solemn forms of devotion which they possess. Another singular fact is, that the service of the inferior objects occupies more space in the books of the Parsees, than that of the more exalted and commanding objects. It appears therefore that the Parsees, worshipping as they do "gods many and lords many," are polytheists in the most literal and degrading sense.

It must be evident from the number and character of the objects worshipped by the Parsees, that their ideas of personal responsibility and guilt, of the method of salvation, and of a future state, cannot be even an approximation to the scripture doctrine on these subjects. They do, indeed, like all idolators, believe in something called guilt, and in some method of expiation; but how low and corrupting is that belief, and how shocking and disgusting the services and sacrifices offered for the soul. The teachings of the Zand-Avasta on these subjects occupy a large space, and cannot be quoted here, but they are alluded to with sufficient distinctness by Dr. Wilson, when he says, "The religious war with, and relentless destruction of vermin; the mending of holes formed in the earth, through which the devils are supposed to emerge from hell; the feeding of the hungry flame with grease and fat and sweet smelling odors; the muttering and sputtering of prayers and praises in an unknown tongue, to every object that exists; the disposal of corpses so as to pollute the atmosphere rather than the earth; the solemn funeral of bones and hair and nails; the drinking and sipping of cow's urine at morn and eve as if it were the very elixir of immortality; the scrubbing and rubbing of the body with various ablutions for the expulsion of devils; the frightening and driving away of demons by noises; the introduction of dogs to survey the bodies of the deceased and to prognosticate and guard them from the assaults of Satan; and many other practices said to be enjoined by divine authority and to be good and virtuous actions, do not certainly commend themselves to the reason of many of those with whom tyrant custom compels their observance."

The earth, fire, water, dogs, and some other objects are deemed peculiarly sacred; and hence the severe penalties attached to the pollution or injury of either of these objects. Thus, for instance, a person who strikes a water dog is treated to 10,000 stripes; and he must by way of atonement carry 10,000 bundles of dry and the same quantity of soft wood, to the fires of Hormazd. He must furnish 10,000 barsams (trees), and 10,000 zors of pure hom (a kind of tree) and its juice. He must kill 10,000 reptiles that creep on their bellies, 10,000 reptiles in the form of a dog, 10,000 turtles, 10,000 land frogs, 10,000 water frogs, 10,000 ants which drag the grain, 10,000 stinging ants, 10,000 blood suckers, and 10,000 stinging flies; and he must take out 10,000 impure stones from the ground. And these are only a part of the penalty.

So numerous and confused are the rites, ceremonies, superstitions, and penal regulations of the Parsees, that to illustrate them all would require a volume. They are in general but little acquainted with their sacred writings, except by tradition and as inferred from actual observances, though some of them are quite intelligent, and able to defend their system with a show of learning and ingenuity. An American missionary at Bombay says of the Parsees, "They yield in energy and influence to none. They are more ready than any other class to adopt European customs and opinions, and not a few of them speak and write the English language with facility. They have several fine temples in Bombay, and at the time of sunrise and sunset they may be seen reading and repeating their prayers, and addressing their worship to the sun and to the sea. But they are much less of a religious people than the Hindoos. They are indeed zealous for their religion, but are most ignorant of what it really is, and their zeal apparently arises rather from a sectional, national feeling, than from their being imbued with any religious principle. They pride themselves on being Parsees, and they are ready to defend Parseeism, whatever it may be. Among them are found the bitterest opponents of Christianity, who are familiar with the principal writings of opposers, and who manifest no little zeal in disseminating their infidel views. Much use is made of the press for this purpose."—REV. E. D. MOORE.

PARIS PROTESTANT MISSIONARY SOCIETY: This society was formed in 1822, under the title of "Société des Missions Évangéliques de Paris." A meeting was held for the purpose at the house of S. V. S. Wilder, Esq., an American merchant, then residing in Paris, which was attended by the presidents of the Reformed and Lutheran Consistories; by other pastors, with lay members of the two churches; by various foreign Protestants, then in Paris, among whom were Rev. Daniel Wilson, Rev. S. S. Wilson, and Rev. Jonas King, and by Messrs. Cook and Croggon, Wesleyan missionaries then in France. One object of the Society was declared to be, to enlighten the public mind, through the press, as to the character and importance of the different missions of Protestant Christians among the heathen; and another, to establish an institution for young persons recommended by the different missionary societies, to whom it might be necessary to study some of the Oriental languages.

Rev. Jonas King, being then in Paris, and having received an invitation from Rev. Mr. Fisk, after the death of his associate, Rev. Mr. Parsons, to join him in the mission to the Holy Land, the new society assumed, for a given period, his support. The committee issued an address, setting forth the object of the society, and soliciting contributions. They also established the Monthly Concert of Prayer.

Subsequently, this society directed all its efforts to Southern Africa, where their missions have been very energetically and successfully prosecuted to the present time. They have thirteen stations, among several different tribes, with fourteen missionaries, and a large number of native assistants, and about thirteen hundred communicants. (See Southern Africa.)

PASUMALIE: A station of the Madura mission in Southern Hindostan, under the care of the American Board.

PASHA: In the Turkish dominions, a viceroy, governor, or commander.

PASHALIC: The jurisdiction of a Pasha.

PATNA: a city of much importance in the presidency of Bengal, on the south side of the Ganges, about 300 miles north-west of Calcutta. The population is estimated at nearly 400,000. Within the walls, the city is not more than a mile and a half in length by three-fourths of a mile in breadth; but its suburbs extend nine miles along the banks of the river, and two miles inland. The English Baptists commenced a mission here in 1811.

PATEA: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in New Zealand.

PATRIARCH: In the Oriental churches, a dignitary superior to the order of archbishops.

PATRIARCHATE: The office or jurisdiction of a patriarch.

PAUMOTU: A group, consisting of a large number of low, small islands, in the South Pacific, between 17° and 23° S. latitude, and 139° and 145° W. longitude. They have been called by several names, as The Labyrinth, Pearl Islands, Pallisee Islands, Dangerous Archipelago.

PEDANG: A Dutch settlement on the west coast of Sumatra. Camphor, benzoin, and pepper, and a considerable quantity of gold from the interior are collected here, and sent to Batavia. It is a station of the Baptist Missionary Society.

PEELTON: Station of the London Missionary Society, among the Kaffres in South Africa, destroyed by the Kaffre war.

PEHIAKURA: A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, on the north-west side of Waikato harbor, New Zealand.

PEKING: The Northern Capital of China, the residence of the imperial court, situated in the Chihli province, in lat. 39° 54' N., and long. 116° 27' E. (See China.)

PELLA: A station of the Rhenish Missionary Society, in Little Namaqua, South Africa.

PERIACOLUM: A station of the American Board, belonging to the Madras mission, in Southern Hindostan.

PHILIPOLIS: Station of the London Missionary Society, in South Africa, among the Bosjesmans, on the north side of Cradock River, with out-stations.

PHILIPTON: The principal station of the London Missionary Society, on Kat River, South Africa.

PIETERMAURITZBURG: A Dutch settlement, near Port Natal, Southern Africa.

PILGRIMAGE: A journey to some place deemed sacred, undertaken with superstitious veneration for the place or the relics or other sacred things which it contains.

PINE RIDGE: A station of the American Board among the Choctaw Indians.

PIPLEE: A short distance from Pooree, in Hindostan, and near the coast of the Bay of Bengal, a place through which most of the pilgrims pass in their annual journeys to the great Juggernaut festival. The General Baptists of England established a mission there in 1847.

PIRIE: Station of the Free Church of Scotland in South Africa, about 20 miles East of Burnshull.

PLAATBERG: A station of the Wesleyans in the Natal District, South Africa.

POINT PEDRO: The northernmost extremity of Ceylon, in lat. $9^{\circ} 48' N.$, and long. $80^{\circ} 7' E.$ A station of the Wesleyans.

POINT VENUS: A station of the London Missionary Society, on Tahiti.

POLYNESIA: The Many Isles; a name vaguely applied to numerous groups of Islands in the Pacific Ocean. (See Sandwich Islands, South Sea Islands, &c.)

PONTIANAK: A Dutch possession on the west coast of Borneo, 12 miles from the mouth of the Pontiana river, for some time a station of the American Board.

POOHACOOTEE: A large village, about 50 miles north-east from Madura, within the territory of the Tondiman rajah. The station was transferred to the American Board in 1845, by the Indian Church Missionary Society of Madras.

POOTHACOTTAH: A town of Southern Hindostan, 65 miles north-east from Madura. Population, 10,000. The mission of the American Board at Madras had a station here, but transferred it to Madura in 1845. In 1848 it was relinquished, owing to its distance, and the inconvenience of superintending it.

POONAH: A city in the province of Arungabad, until 1818 the capital of the Mahratta empire, about 30 miles east of the Ghauts, 100 from Bombay, and 75 from the nearest sea-coast. A station of the Free Church of Scotland.

POOREE: A station of the General Baptists in Orissa.

PORT ANTONIO: A station of the Wesleyans in Jamaica, W. I.

PORT-AU-PLATT: A station of the Wesleyans in Hayti.

PORT MORANT: A station of the Wesleyans in Jamaica, W. I.

PORT NATAL: (D'Urban,) the principal port of the Natal District, South Africa.

PORT REPUBLICAN: A station of the Wesleyans in Hayti.

PORT OF SPAIN: A station of the United Secession Church in Trinidad.

PORT ELIZABETH: Station of the London and Wesleyan Missionary Societies in Algoa Bay, South Africa. The London Missionary Society's labors at this station are chiefly directed to the Fingoes, a considerable portion of this tribe having been for years settled at this place. There is also an English congregation and a Sabbath-school.

PORT LOKKOH: A native town in the Timneh country, about 40 miles from the colony of Sierra Leone, West Africa. In point of population and geographical location, it is a highly important position. It is the thoroughfare of that part of the country, and is visited by the natives of various countries to the eastward. This is the site of the mission of the Church Missionary Society to the Timneh country.

PORT LOUIS: A station of the London Missionary Society, on the north-western side of the Island of Mauritius, or the Isle of France. It is the principal town and capital of the Island, and contains a large proportion of the whole population. Its population is largely Roman Catholic, and, of course, the missionary work meets with much opposition. (See Mauritius.)

PRATTVILLE: A station of the Church Missionary Society in Jamaica, W. I.

PRESBYTERIAN BOARD OF MISSIONS.—The foreign missionary work was commenced by the Presbyterian Church in the United States at an early date. The Society for propagating Christian knowledge in Scotland, which was formed in 1709, established a Board of correspondents in New York, in 1741, who appointed the Rev. Azariah Horton, a member of the Presbytery of New York, to labor as a missionary among the Indians on Long Island.* His labors extended through two or three years, though the precise limit is not now known. The second foreign missionary of the Presbyterian Church was the justly celebrated David Brainerd. He was licensed to preach by an association of Congregational ministers, assembled at Danbury, Conn., July 29, 1742, and spent about a year at an Indian settlement not very far from Albany. On June 12, 1744, he was ordained by the Presbytery of New York, then meeting at Newark, N. J., and immediately commenced his labors at the forks of the Delaware, on the Susquehannah, and at Cross-weeks, near the centre of New Jersey. After the death of David Brainerd, in October, 1747, he was succeeded by his brother, the Rev. John Brainerd, a member of the same Presbytery, who labored faithfully and successfully among the Indians for many years. These three first missionaries to the heathen tribes in this land, under the direction of the Presbyterian Church, maintained a correspondence with the parent Society in Scotland, and derived a portion of their support from that country. Both Mr. Horton and David

* See Green's Hist. Sketch, page 37, and Rev. A. Horton's Narrative, from June, 1742, to March, 1743, in Prince's Christian History, Vol. I.

Brainerd received something like two hundred dollars a year from this source. But John Brainerd was supported principally, if not wholly, by contributions in the Presbyterian churches here. In 1763, the Synod of New York ordered a collection to be made in all their churches for the support of Indian missions, allowing Mr. Brainerd a salary of thirty pounds, giving the same amount for the support of schools, and voting sixty-five pounds for the support of the Rev. Sampson Occum, a native Indian, a member of the Presbytery of Suffolk, on Long Island, and at that time a missionary among the Oneida Indians.* Three years after this, in 1766, the Rev. Charles Beatty and the Rev. George Duffield performed a mission, under the appointment of the Synod of New York, to the Indians on the Muskingum river in Ohio; and their report was so favorable that the Synod appointed two others to labor in the same region. But troubles arising between the Indians and the frontier inhabitants, this mission was relinquished. After the death of Mr. John Brainerd, in 1780, so many changes had occurred among the Indians in consequence of the revolutionary war, and other causes, that the foreign missionary work was to a considerable degree abandoned for several years. It had been prosecuted by the Presbyterian Church from the year 1741 to 1780, a period of nearly 40 years, during which time at least six faithful ministers had labored in the field, besides schoolmasters, and some other helpers. In the year 1796, the foreign missionary work was resumed in the formation of the "New York Missionary Society." This body was independent of any presbyterial supervision, though it is believed to have consisted principally of members of the Presbyterian Church. A considerable amount of funds was collected, and three Indian missions were established, viz.: among the Chickasaws, the Tuscaroras, and the Senecas. In the following year, 1797, the "Northern Missionary Society" was instituted. This, like its predecessor, was an independent body, though composed in part of Presbyterians. By this Society, missions to the Indian tribes were prosecuted for several years. But in the year 1800, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church took up the work of foreign missions in a systematic manner. They appointed the Rev. Mr. Chapman as a missionary on the north-western frontier of the State of New York, with reference to the wants of both the white inhabitants and the Indian tribes; and in the year 1802, the General Assembly's standing committee on missions addressed a circular to all the Presbyteries under their care, urging collections for the support of missions, and making inquiries for suitable candidates to be employed. In the next year, 1803, a suitable person was found. The Rev. Gideon Blackburn offered himself for the work and a mission was established among the Cherokee Indians, then residing within the chartered limits of the State of Georgia, where Mr. Blackburn prosecuted his missionary labors with zeal, activity, and devotedness, for eight years, when his health failed, and he was constrained to leave his post. The standing committee of the General Assembly intended to have prosecuted this mission, but did not succeed in finding a man to supply the place of Mr. Blackburn, and subsequently the Rev. Mr. Kingsbury, acting under the American Board, established himself in the Cherokee country, and a flourishing mission was built up.

Missions among the Indians were prosecuted by the General Assembly in various directions from 1805 to 1818, and with some encouraging results; but in 1818, measures were taken to unite the efforts of the Presbyterian, Reformed Dutch, and Associate Reformed Churches, by forming one independent Society, and a new body was accordingly formed, called "The United Foreign Missionary Society." This Society was in active operation some six or seven years, and all the existing missionary interests in the Presbyterian Church were merged in it. In the year 1826, it had under its care nine missions, embracing 60 male and female missionaries, 250 children and youth under instruction, and more than 40 native converts to the faith and hope of the Gospel.* About that time the whole work was transferred to the American Board, and the United Foreign Missionary Society ceased its operations.

It was regretted by many Presbyterians that the church of their preference should not prosecute foreign missions under their own distinctive name, and this feeling became at length so deep that in the month of November, 1831, the Synod of Pittsburgh formed the "Western Foreign Missionary Society." This Society was intended to unite the efforts, not of that Synod alone, but the efforts of all others who might choose to unite with them. Operations were immediately commenced and prosecuted by this Society, with varied success, for six years, when, in June, 1837, a Board of Foreign Missions was established by the General Assembly, to which the Western Foreign Missionary Society subsequently transferred all their missions and funds.—
REV. J. GREENLEAF.

The following interesting account of the manner in which this Board is organized, and the principles upon which its operations are conducted, is taken from Mr. Lowrie's "Manual of Missions:"

* Green's Sketch, page 44.

* Green's Sketch, page 59.

This Board consists of sixty ministers, and as many laymen, whose term of office is four years. Its members are appointed by the General Assembly, one-fourth part each year. To them is "intrusted, with such directions as may from time to time be given, the superintendence of the foreign missionary operations of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America;" and they are required to "make annually to the General Assembly a report of their proceedings; and submit for its approval such plans and measures as may be deemed useful and necessary." The Board is, therefore, simply a Standing Committee of the General Assembly, and the title of Committee would have more clearly indicated its relations to that venerable court. For convenience in holding certain real estate and in the transaction of some kinds of business, a charter has been obtained for the Board under a general law of the State of New York, with the same title precisely as designated by the General Assembly, "The Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America." This charter is not a close but an open one, and the members of the incorporated body are the same persons, and no others, who are appointed as members of the Board by the General Assembly.

The Board appoints annually an Executive Committee and the Executive Officers. On these devolves the immediate charge of the missionary work. Weekly meetings are held by the Committee, at which every thing relating to the interests of the missionary cause at home and abroad may be brought under consideration. The selection of missionary fields, the appointment of missionaries, the kinds of labor in each country and at each station, the measures suitable for promoting an interest in the missionary work among the churches at home, receive continued and careful attention. Most of these are matters of deep importance. They require the exercise of enlarged views and the most sober judgment. A general acquaintance with the missionary field, and with the history of missions, and a particular knowledge of the missionary work under the charge of the Board, are required for the proper decision of questions that occur from time to time. An application for funds to build a missionary chapel, or a request for appointment as a missionary or teacher, may easily bring under consideration the whole subject of the best method of expending missionary funds, in view both of the exigences of the various missions and the amount of moneys at the disposal of the Committee.

The appointment of missionaries is one of the most important of these duties. In making appointments the Committee must rely very much on recommendations of pastors, instructors, and others. They are anxious to send forth only those who have been called to this work by the Head of the Church. As a part of the evidence of this divine call, they must take into consideration the qualifications of the applicant. His reputation for piety, prudence, and zeal, his talents and scholarship, his health and its adaptation to particular climates, are all matters of great moment. Qualifications of a superior class are greatly to be desired; but men of respectable talents, with good judgment and habits of industry and energy, all under the control of humble, loving, and devoted piety, may be very useful in most missionary fields. It may well be doubted whether it is expedient to send out men whose qualifications are not fully equal to the average attainments of the ministers of the churches in this country. A rule was adopted by the Board, at the request of the Executive Committee, that no ordained minister should be sent to a foreign field, without the recommendation of his Presbytery. This places the responsibility of deciding on the qualifications of missionaries, to a large degree, on the Presbyteries; and it should go far to secure the right kind of men. But the nature of the work itself, and the sacrifices which it involves, will always furnish presumptive evidence that the brethren who offer as volunteers to engage in it are men worthy of confidence and honor.

The missionaries become members of the Presbyteries which have been organized in their respective fields of labor, and all ecclesiastical matters are transacted as is usual in these church courts. With these, the Committee do not interfere, unless by Christian counsel at the request of the missionaries. Financial and other business matters are transacted with the missionaries, not as Presbyteries, but as missions or sub-committees; and as a general rule it is expedient to leave local details as far as possible in their hands. The general supervision must, from the nature of the case, be reserved to the Committee. This is particularly necessary in the expenditure of the funds devoted to missionary purposes. Estimates are sent up, embracing the various kinds of work in each mission—the sum desired for the support of missionaries and native assistants, for building churches, chapels, or school-houses, for schools, for the press, &c., being separately stated. In forming these estimates, the missions proceed upon the expenses of the preceding year as a basis, with such enlargement or diminution as may be called for by their circumstances and prospects. With estimates from all the missions before them, the Committee then apportion to each such part of the probable receipts of the Board as the wants of each mission appear to require. The probable income to be thus apportioned is itself a matter of estimate, founded upon the income of the preceding year, and the hope of enlarged contributions by the churches to this cause. In the proper fulfilment of their trust in these financial matters, the Committee are called to exercise their maturest judgment. Errors or mistakes here would involve the whole work in serious difficulties. Were expenditures to be authorized without a strict regard to the probable means of payment, a debt would soon be created, embarrassing alike to friends at home and to the missionaries abroad. On the other hand, it is no easy matter to withhold aid which is urgently solicited, and which the churches are so well able to give.

The arrangements of the Board for the receipt and expenditure of the funds committed to its charge for the missionary work, are thoroughly business-like and satisfactory. Every donation, though as small in amount as the widow's two mites, can be traced in its course from the time it leaves its donor's hands, and for every dollar expended a satisfactory exhibit can be shown—all being on record in books kept for the purpose. Vouchers are preserved for all moneys expended. It is believed that nothing has been at any time lost through want of uprightness or fidelity. Errors of judgment there may have been, and a consequent injudicious expenditure of money in some cases. To acknowledge this is but to concede that the Executive Committee and Officers are far from being infallible in judgment. But it is no small thing to be able to say, that in twenty years, out of an expenditure amounting altogether to more than a million and a half of dollars, nothing has been lost through want of fidelity on the part of those who were charged with its disbursement. The further merit of economy in the administration of the funds of the Board may be justly claimed, and is shown, among other ways, by the low per centage of cost for executive services.

In the transmission of moneys for the support of the missionary work abroad, different methods are adopted for missions in different countries. To the missions among the Indian tribes, a large amount of "supplies"—various articles of clothing, groceries, books, &c.,—are forwarded. These can be purchased at much lower rates in our cities than in the Indian country. For articles purchased in the neighborhood of these missionary stations, payments are commonly made by drafts drawn by the Treasurer or Superintendent of the mission on the Treasurer in New York. In the African missions, particularly at Corisco, money is less convenient than some kinds of merchandise, and accordingly supplies are sent from this country. To the missions in India, Siam, and China, supplies are seldom sent, and only when ordered; and money is remitted, commonly by letters of credit. The Treasurer goes down into Wall street, and engages a letter of credit for, say, five hundred pounds sterling; on which letter, bills of exchange may be drawn, payable in London at four or six months after sight. This letter of credit is forwarded to the Treasurer of the mission, and bills are sold by him at the prevailing rates. The purchaser sends the bill to London, where it arrives in some five or six months after the time when it was obtained in Wall street, and four or six months must still elapse, after it is presented for acceptance by the parties on whom it is drawn, before it becomes payable by the Treasurer of the Board, making altogether ten or twelve months from its date in New York. As the Board must in due time pay this draft, it has been the good practice of the Committee to authorize, at the time of engaging the letter of credit, the investment upon ample securities of money bearing interest, so as to be in no danger of not being prepared to take it up when it becomes due. In this way, not only is safety secured, but the interest gained in the meantime on the money invested serves to reduce the cost of the bill, or, in other words, to diminish the expense of remitting funds to the missions. When the fluctuations of commerce, war, or any other cause render it difficult to sell bills of exchange in India or China, it then becomes necessary to send out silver. This must be bought, sometimes at a premium, and it is subject to expense for freight and insurance, while on the voyage it is earning no interest; so that this kind of remittance is seldom a desirable one.

The business of the Board is transacted mainly in the city of New York. This city has become the chief foreign port of the country, and possesses many advantages for sending forth missionaries, remitting funds, and foreign correspondence. No other city in this country affords equal facilities for these purposes. The decision to establish the business head-quarters of the Board in this city was therefore a measure of obvious propriety. Almost the only drawback to the desirableness of this location grows out of the great cost of living in New York. This renders a somewhat large outlay necessary for the salaries of the Executive Officers. The amount paid by the Board, however, has thus far at no time equalled the actual expenses incurred by them for their support.

The missions of the Board are eight in number, viz.: to North American Indians; Western Africa; India; Siam; China; Jews; and Papal Europe. The following summary view will exhibit the progress and present condition of these missions, as they appear in the Report for 1854:

For offices, the liberality of a few friends, in addition to the collections made in some of the churches in 1842, has provided the Mission House, in Centre street. The place at first occupied as an office was a room in the Brick Church Chapel, in partnership with another benevolent institution. This was soon found to be quite too confined a place, and two rooms were taken on the third floor of a building at the corner of Broadway and Murray street. The growing business of the Board and the inconvenience of these rooms led to another change, and a part of a house was rented in City Hall Place, where the office was held for some years. These rooms, however, were not well suited to the use of the Board; and the plan of renting an office was found to be expensive, and attended with the risk of change and other serious inconveniences. It is therefore a most happy thing that a house conveniently situated, well lighted, sufficiently large, and planned for its special use, is now owned by the Board. Its offices are rent-free, and are better suited to its purposes than rented rooms at almost any cost.

In the Mission House, besides the Treasurer's and Secretaries' offices, there are apartments for packing and storing goods to be sent to the missions. These occupy the basement story. When several missionary families are about to sail, their trunks, boxes, parcels, articles of furniture, &c., fill up these apartments, often to an uncomfortable degree; and both the economy and the convenience of these rooms become quite apparent. To rent suitable places for such purposes, when missionaries are preparing to embark, would always be attended with much expense, and might often be found impracticable.

The rooms devoted to the Museum, in the third story, contain a rare variety of idol gods and goddesses, from India, Siam, China, Africa, and other heathen countries, besides numerous other objects of interest. This collection is gradually increasing in extent and value, and is worthy of attention by the friends of missions. Visitors are admitted at any time, on application to the officers or clerks in the House.

A large room is occupied by the Library. The books here collected number about 2000 volumes, mostly relating directly or indirectly to the work of missions. They include numerous translations of the Sacred Scriptures, Dictionaries and Grammars of foreign languages, Reports and periodicals of missionary institutions, in bound volumes, memoirs of missionaries, works on the Indians, on Africa, India, China, &c. They form a collection of very considerable value, and one which should be gradually enlarged.

A number of works by Chinese authors occupy a recess in the same room. This is probably the only library of the kind in this country. It consists of about 1000 volumes, of which 400 are but one work, "The Twenty-Four Histories;" and another work, "A Universal Encyclopædia," with maps, diagrams, and sketches, extends to 120 volumes. "The Five Classics" number 104 volumes, and a second series, under a similar title, contains 22 volumes. These are all in octavo, as are works on botany, descriptions of particular districts, accounts of kings and emperors, dictionaries, &c., besides some works of smaller size. The whole collection gives a striking view of the extent of Chinese literature, and makes one sigh over the strange language which renders its stores inaccessible to most readers. Yet for reference these volumes may prove of great service. They were collected by the late lamented Mr. Olyphant, a merchant in the China trade, for some years a most valued member of the Executive Committee; and by his characteristic liberality they occupy a place in the Mission House Library.

In other rooms are kept the bound volumes of letters received at the missionary office. These are arranged according to date. All from correspondents in this country are classified under Domestic, and those from the missionaries are placed under the head of the Missions. Thus, the volume labeled, "Domestic—January to June, 1853," includes the home letters received in those months; and the volumes labeled, "India Letters, Lodiana, 1847-51," contains the letters from the Lodiana Mission in that time. Each volume has an index, making reference easy. There are upwards of sixty of these thick volumes, and each year steadily increases the number. In addition to these are many volumes consisting exclusively of letters relating to the Missionary Chronicle, formerly published, and to the Foreign Missionary. The copies of letters sent from the office fill several volumes more. And the Treasurer's books of account, of various kinds, form still another class, second to none in their importance. A copy of every letter with remittances of money to the missions, and every letter containing remittances from the churches or individuals to the treasury, will be found among these volumes.

The Receipts of the Board, and of the Western Foreign Missionary Society, (deducting the grants of the Bible and Tract Societies, and the appropriations of the U. S. Government for Indian schools,) from the commencement of their operations to the present time, as it appears from the following table, present a gratifying view of the growth of the missionary spirit from year to year. The financial year of the Board terminates the first of May.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF NOVA SCOTIA, BOARD OF MISSIONS: This Board was first organized on the 11th July, 1844, in consequence of an overture on the subject of Foreign Missions by the Presbytery of Prince Edward Island. The movement in Presbytery is understood to have originated with Rev. John Geddie, who afterwards became the first missionary under the direction of the Board. Its members are subject to the annual appointment of synod, but for the most part the same individuals are re-appointed. At present, it consists of eight clergymen and four laymen; the Rev. David Roy, New Glasgow, N. S., being Convener, and Rev. James Bayne, Pictou, N. S., Recording and Corresponding Secretary. The Board meet as often as business requires, at the call of the Convener, or their own adjournment. The Secretary is instructed to correspond once in three months, and at other times, as circumstances require. A monthly periodical, called "The Missionary Register," is issued under the care of the Board, with a special view to disseminate missionary intelligence. An annual report of proceedings is laid before the synod, and the minutes of the various meetings, during each year, countersigned by the Moderator.

The following synodical instructions were given to the Board at its first formation: (1) That the Board be authorized to receive the coöperation of the several ministers of the church in making an appeal to all the congregations of the body relative to the object of their appointment, and in countenancing and aiding an agency, if it be deemed proper that one should be employed. (2) That the Board do apply to such sources of information as they may deem requisite for the purpose of ascertaining the most eligible field for their missionary operations, expenses of outfit, passage, annual salary, &c. (3) That when funds adequate to maintain a missionary abroad shall be guaranteed by the several congregations of the church, and the Board shall feel themselves prepared to negotiate with candidates for such missionary employment, proposals shall be made to obtain offers from qualified persons willing to volunteer their services for this purpose. (4) That in treating with candidates, careful attention be paid to their personal religion, doctrinal views, and missionary spirit. Agreeably to these instructions the Board took immediate steps to appeal for support, and as far as possible obtain a guarantee of annual contribution to a specific amount from the Church at large. The result of this appeal was that a yearly contribution of £200 currency, was considered as an amount that might confidently be depended upon. It had been ascertained that £70 sterling, or £84 currency, was sufficient for the support of one missionary in Polynesia, and this field was selected as the least expensive and most healthful. September 26, 1845, the Board met for the purpose of receiving tenders of service from duly qualified persons, when the Rev. John Geddie, of Cavendish and New London, Prince Edward Island, offered and was accepted. From the favorable aspect of continued and enlarged pecuniary support, the Board felt encouraged to appoint a catechist as companion and assistant to Mr. Geddie. This was happily accomplished so that the divine example of sending out the disciples two by two was followed to the letter. Mr. Isaac Archibald, a native of Nova Scotia who had received a liberal education, though not sufficient to warrant his immediate licensure and ordination as a missionary in full standing, was unanimously accepted, and duly appointed. In the mean time Mr. Geddie, who was in a few weeks loosed from his congregation, visited the various congregations in his presbytery with a view to deepen their interest in the mission, by a series of farewell services. The same course was pursued during the earlier part of the following year throughout the presbyteries of Nova Scotia, and was found to produce a very happy effect. Mr. Geddie devoted some months to the study of medicine and also to the art of printing, with a view to their future practice on the field of foreign service. It was found very difficult to select the particular island on which Mr. Geddie should commence operations, as it was not known which would be most accessible to missionary effort. New Caledonia was chiefly thought of, but Mr. G. was not bound by any decision of the Board to adopt it, unless circumstances were found favorable. The New Hebrides group had been surveyed by the martyr missionary Williams, for the special occupation of the parent church, (United Presbyterian, or as it was then called the United Secession Church of Scotland,) and at their expense. It was felt to be exceedingly appropriate that the Church in Nova Scotia should adopt as their field what the Church at home could not enter upon at that time. This arrangement proved afterwards to be quite advantageous, and was accordingly adopted. Messrs. Geddie and Archibald, with their wives and children, after a series of farewell services in Pictou, Onslow, and Halifax, left Nova Scotia Nov. 30, 1846. After a brief sojourn in the United States, at Newburyport, where they were very kindly entreated by the friends of the missionary enterprise, they sailed for the Sandwich Islands, being there also entertained, with Christian welcome, and sent on their way with the prayers and offerings of the churches. They found a safe and prosperous voyage to the Samoan group, which is occupied by the agents of the London Missionary Society, with whom they spent a considerable period, receiving the benefit of their experience as to the manners and customs and language of the tribe whose evangelization was considered most suitable to the resources of the newly arrived missionaries. After due deliberation the island of Aneiteum, New Hebrides, was selected for permanent location. In July, 1848, the mission families were conveyed thither and entered immediately upon their allotted duties. Mr. Isaac Archibald resigned his connection with the mission in 1850. Since that period the Board have had one missionary and a few native teachers under their charge. Very urgent appeals have been made for additional assistance, but up to the present year, (1854,) no favorable answer has been returned, such as warrants the expectation of immediate aid. One young man of ardent missionary spirit, is now in course of training, and will be sent out by the John Williams on her outward voyage next year. Two additional missionaries are wanted, and if found, duly qualified, would be sent immediately. The funds on hand have always been adequate to the wants of the mission, and exhibit now a more flourishing condition than they have ever presented. After defraying the necessary expenses for the year there will be a balance on hand of nearly £500. There is no reason to fear that the resources of the Church are quite equal to the maintenance of four missionaries. At first, the salary of the ordained missionary was £70 sterling, but in 1850 it was raised to an equality with the scale adopted by the London Missionary Society, viz., £100 sterling, and £5 sterling for each child. In addition to this, one of the children has been for some years at Walthamstow, England, along with the children of the missionaries of that Society. The expense for his education amounts to £15 sterling per annum, and with extras does not exceed £20.

The entire amount contributed to this mission since 1846 probably exceeds, but may be stated at, £3,000 currency or £2,400 sterling. The amount for the past year received by the Treasurer is £424 currency, or £339 sterling in money, and nearly £300 in mission goods. At present the Board has but one mission, and one missionary, with several native teachers, on Aneiteum and Fottenna, New Hebrides. The church in Dec., 1851, contained 24 members and is situated at Aniligauhat, Aneiteum. There is every probability that the number of converts greatly exceeds this amount now. By the latest date, Oct. 1853, it appears that the entire island, with its 3,000 inhabitants, has abandoned heathenish practices, and that the district which had last given up its idols is now exceedingly anxious to have Christian instruction. (See South Sea Islands.)—Rev. J. BAYNE, of Pictou, N. S.

PRIMITIVE METHODIST FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY: The Primitive Methodists, (or "Ranters," as they are sometimes called,) are a body of simple-hearted and devoted Christians which arose in England in 1810. In 1853, they reported 568 ministers, 108,926 members. Finding themselves gaining strength, they organized a foreign missionary society in March 1844, adopting Canada, New Zealand and Australia as their fields of labor. The Rev. J. Long, and J. Wilson were the first missionaries they sent to Australia. Since that time they have strengthened this mission, and God has honored them with considerable prosperity. Their stations in Australia are Adelaide, Mount Barker, Burra Burra, Sydney, Morpeth, Melbourne, and Geelong. The number of missionaries is seven, and of members under their care 535. The total number of their foreign missionaries throughout the world, is 23; of whom 13 are in Canada, 7 in Australia, and 3 in New Zealand. The whole number of members in their stations is 2,374—W. PROSPECT PENN: A station of the London Missionary Society in Jamaica, West Indies.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH, MISSIONS OF: (See Episcopal Board of Missions.)

PUEN: A station of the London Missionary Society on Tahiti, South Sea.

PUNA: A district on the western coast of the Island of Hawaii, forming, in connection with Hilo, the Parish of Rev. Mr. Coan, formerly a missionary of the American Board, now pastor of the native church in Hilo and Puna, by whom he is supported.

QUILON: A seaport town, in Southern India, of considerable note in former times, said to have been built A. D. 825. A station of the London Missionary Society.

RAGGED ISLAND: One of the Bahamas; a station of the Baptist Missionary Society.

RAIATEA: One of the Society Islands, having a mission of the London Missionary Society.

RAIVAVAI: One of the Austral Islands, and a station of the London Missionary Society.

RAJKOTE: A station of the Irish Presbyterian mission in India, on the Gulf of Cambay, opposite to Surat.

RAJMUNDRY: A town in the Northern Circars, India,—a station of the Hamburg North German Missionary Society.

RAJAH, or RAJA: In India, a prince. Some of the Rajahs are said to be independent princes, and others are tributary to the Mogul.

RAMREE: The capital of a district of the same name, 117 miles south from Arracan town: A station of the American Baptist Union.

RANGOON: The principal seaport of the Burman dominions, situated on the north bank of the Rangoon branch of the Irrawady. Its extent along the river is about a mile, and its breadth about 650 yards. It is enclosed by a stockade of teak timber and planks from ten to twelve feet high, having two gates on the northern face, and one on each of the others. Pop. 40,000 to 50,000.

RANGIHONA: The first station occupied by the Church Missionary Society in New Zealand, on the north-east side of the Bay of Islands.

RAROTONGA: The largest of the Hervey Islands group, in the South Pacific, where is a mission of the London Missionary Society.

RED RIVER: The Red River falls into Lake Winnipeg. The settlement on this river is about 50 miles in extent. Population in 1843, 5,143, of whom 2,798 were Roman Catholics, and 2,345 Protestants. The Church Missionary Society have several stations in this settlement.

REGENT'S TOWN: A town of liberated Africans, in Sierra Leone, West Africa, 5 miles south south-east from Cape Town, in a valley near the heights of the Sierra Leone mountains. Its situation is romantic and healthy. No less than 8 mountains, covered with evergreen forests, rear their heads and form a chain around the settlement. Streams descend from the various cliffs, and form a large brook, which runs through the middle of the town. On the banks is a meadow for the cattle belonging to the settlement, which is always green. In 1813, this spot, then uninhabited, was set apart for the reception of negroes delivered from slave ships by the English cruisers. In 1816, their number was 1,100, from 22 different tribes, barbarous to an astonishing degree. (See Western Africa, Church Missionary Society.)

REHOBOTH: A station of the Rhenish Missionary Society, at the hot springs, in Namaqualand, South Africa.

REWA: The second place in rank and influence in the Feejee Islands. A station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

RHENISH MISSIONARY SOCIETY: The following account of the Rhenish Missionary Society was given by Rev. L. Van Rohden, Assistant Inspector of the Barmen Missionary Seminary, in the "Evangelical Christendom" for Jan. 1851: "The Rhenish Missionary Society was founded in the year 1828. Three associations, those of Elberfeld, Barmen and Cologne, united in the autumn of the above year, that they might, with common powers, send out missionaries to the heathen world. The above three associations were soon joined by others, in the Rhenish provinces and in Westphalia, having the same objects in view. The associations thus combined, which, up to the present time, have been joined by about fifty other small and large associations in Western and Middle Germany, bear altogether the name of the Rhenish Missionary Society. The associations have appointed a committee, or, as we call it, "a deputation," consisting of twelve individuals, the whole residing either in Elberfeld or Barmen, who have the management of its affairs in their hands. They hold, for this purpose, regular meetings once a month, or oftener, in the mission-house. A part of the correspondence is conducted by the members of the deputation themselves; but the principal part of the business devolves on the inspector of the mission-house. Once a year, or even oftener, the deputation summons delegates from all the combined associations to a general assembly at Barmen; lays before them a report of their proceedings; and adopts such resolutions as may appear to be necessary for the extension and furtherance of the work. The general assembly decides by a majority of votes.

"When the Rhenish Missionary Society met in the autumn of 1828, one of the associations composing it, viz., that of Barmen, had already for three years established a mission seminary; and had published also the Barmen Missionary Gazette, of which 20,000 copies were in circulation. The mission seminary had at the first for its object to give young mechanics the necessary instruction to qualify them for going out as missionary assistants to the heathen. But soon this plan was enlarged so far, that the young men should be educated with a view of becoming actual missionaries, who should pass their theological examination here, and should be ordained to go out as ministers to the heathen; only by way of exception are they sent out without being ordained as catechists, or even as assistants and mechanics. The Rhenish Missionary Society undertook, immediately after its foundation, the direction of the Barmen mission seminary. The Inspector and the pupils were placed under its control. The first was a permanent member of the deputation. Dr. Richter was then the Inspector; and he remained so till the spring of 1847, when he suddenly died. He was assisted by his brother W. Richter, who died about two years before him. His place was filled by the writer of these lines, L. Von Rohden, and that of Inspector by C. Wallman since 1848.

"The Rhenish Missionary Society supports twenty-five stations, with several more outstations, in three different parts of the mission-field; viz., in South-eastern Africa, in Borneo, and in China. It has sent out fifty missionaries, who are, for the most part, married, and of whom seven have already died. The yearly income amounts to from 28,000 to 32,000 Prussian thalers, or from £3,150 to £3,600. It possesses a mission-house, in which the pupils are educated, ten at a time, and a small congregation and mission-chapel, near the mission-house, in which public worship is conducted by the pupils exclusively, under the direction of the Inspector. Once a year missionary meetings are held in all the congregations connected with the society, which have assumed the character of public festivals. Once a month missionary prayer meetings are held. Every fortnight there appears a report of the labors of our missionaries: and once a year a general report is published."

Thus stood the affairs of the Society in 1851. It has just entered its twenty-sixth year. It now has twenty-five auxiliaries in Rhenish Prussia, and thirteen in Westphalia; and many of these embrace other "special and local unions." Nor is this all. Thuringia furnishes four auxiliaries; Nassau, Hesse Darmstadt, &c., three; and there is one in the United States. In 1850, its receipts had risen to 39,000 thalers. Within the twenty-five years, more than 500,000 thalers have been expended for the spread of the Gospel. As the result of its efforts in behalf of the heathen, the Rhenish Missionary Society can point to more than five thousand persons who have received baptism, and to eighteen hundred communicants.

RIMATARA: One of the smallest of the Austral Islands, and a station of the London Missionary Society.

ROBBEN ISLAND: Hospital for Lepers, off Table Bay, South Africa, occupied as a station by the United Brethren, removed from Hemel-en-Aarde.

ROCKBOOKAH: A station of the American Episcopal Board in West Africa, about 25 miles east of Cape Palmas, beyond the limits of the Colony, being the capital of the Bahboo tribe.

ROCK TOWN: Station of the United Presbyterian Synod of Scotland, near the mouth of the Old Calabar, West Africa.

ROCKTOWN: A station of the American Episcopal Missionary Society in West Africa, south-west of Cape Palmas.

ROMA: One of the Banda Islands, a group of the Moluccas, in the Indian Archipelago.

ROTORUA: A station of the Church Missionary Society in New Zealand, on the Rotorua Lake, lat. $38^{\circ} 40'$ S. and longitude 176° E.

ROTTY: One of the Molucca Islands, in the Indian Archipelago.

ROYAPOORUM: A station of the American Board, belonging to the Madras mission, in Eastern Hindostan.

RURUTU: A small island, of the Austral group, and a station of the London Missionary Society.

SABATHA: A station of the Presbyterian Board in Northern India, 110 miles north-east from Lodiana, in the lower ranges of the Himalaya mountains, at an elevation of about 4,000 feet above the sea.

SAFET: A town, formerly of considerable note, situated on a hill overlooking the western coast of the Lake of Tiberias, 65 miles west of Damascus. It formerly contained seven Jewish synagogues, and a sort of university for the education of Jewish rabbis. In the year 1759, the place was nearly destroyed by an earthquake. It is now a poor place. The Jews are much oppressed. The London Jews' Society have a station here.

SAFOTULOFAI: A station of the London Missionary Society, on the Island of Savaii, one of the Samoas. It is a large and important place. Population about 1,000.

SAHARANPUR: A town in the province of Delhi, Northern India, 90 miles north-east from the city of Delhi, and 130 south-east from Lodiana. Its elevation above the sea is 1,073 feet. It is a large town, and many of the houses are built of brick. The Presbyterian Board (American) have a station here.

SALULUA: A station of the London Missionary Society, on the Island of Savaii, one of the Samoan group.

SALEM: Chief town of a district of the same name, in the province of Mysore, India: a station of the London Missionary Society. Also, a station of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in South Africa, and of the United Brethren in Surinam.

SALUAFATA: A station of the London Missionary Society, on the Island of Upolu.

SALONICA: (See Thessalonica.)

SAMANA: A station of the Wesleyan Society in Hayti.

SAMARANG: A town and seaport on the north coast of the Island of Java, near the mouth of a river of the same name, 240 miles east south-east from Batavia. Population about 20,000. A station of the Baptist Missionary Society.

SAMOA: A group of Islands in the South Pacific, between 10° and 20° S. lat. and 169° and 174° W. longitude, sometimes called Navigators' Islands, 8 in number, viz., Manua, Orosenga, Ofu, Tutuila, Upolu, Manono, Aborima, and Savaii. Population 160,000. The London Missionary Society have a mission here. (See South Sea Islands.)

SANDOWAY: A station of the American Baptist Union in Arracan.

SANGEER ISLANDS: A group of the Moluccas, in the Indian Archipelago.

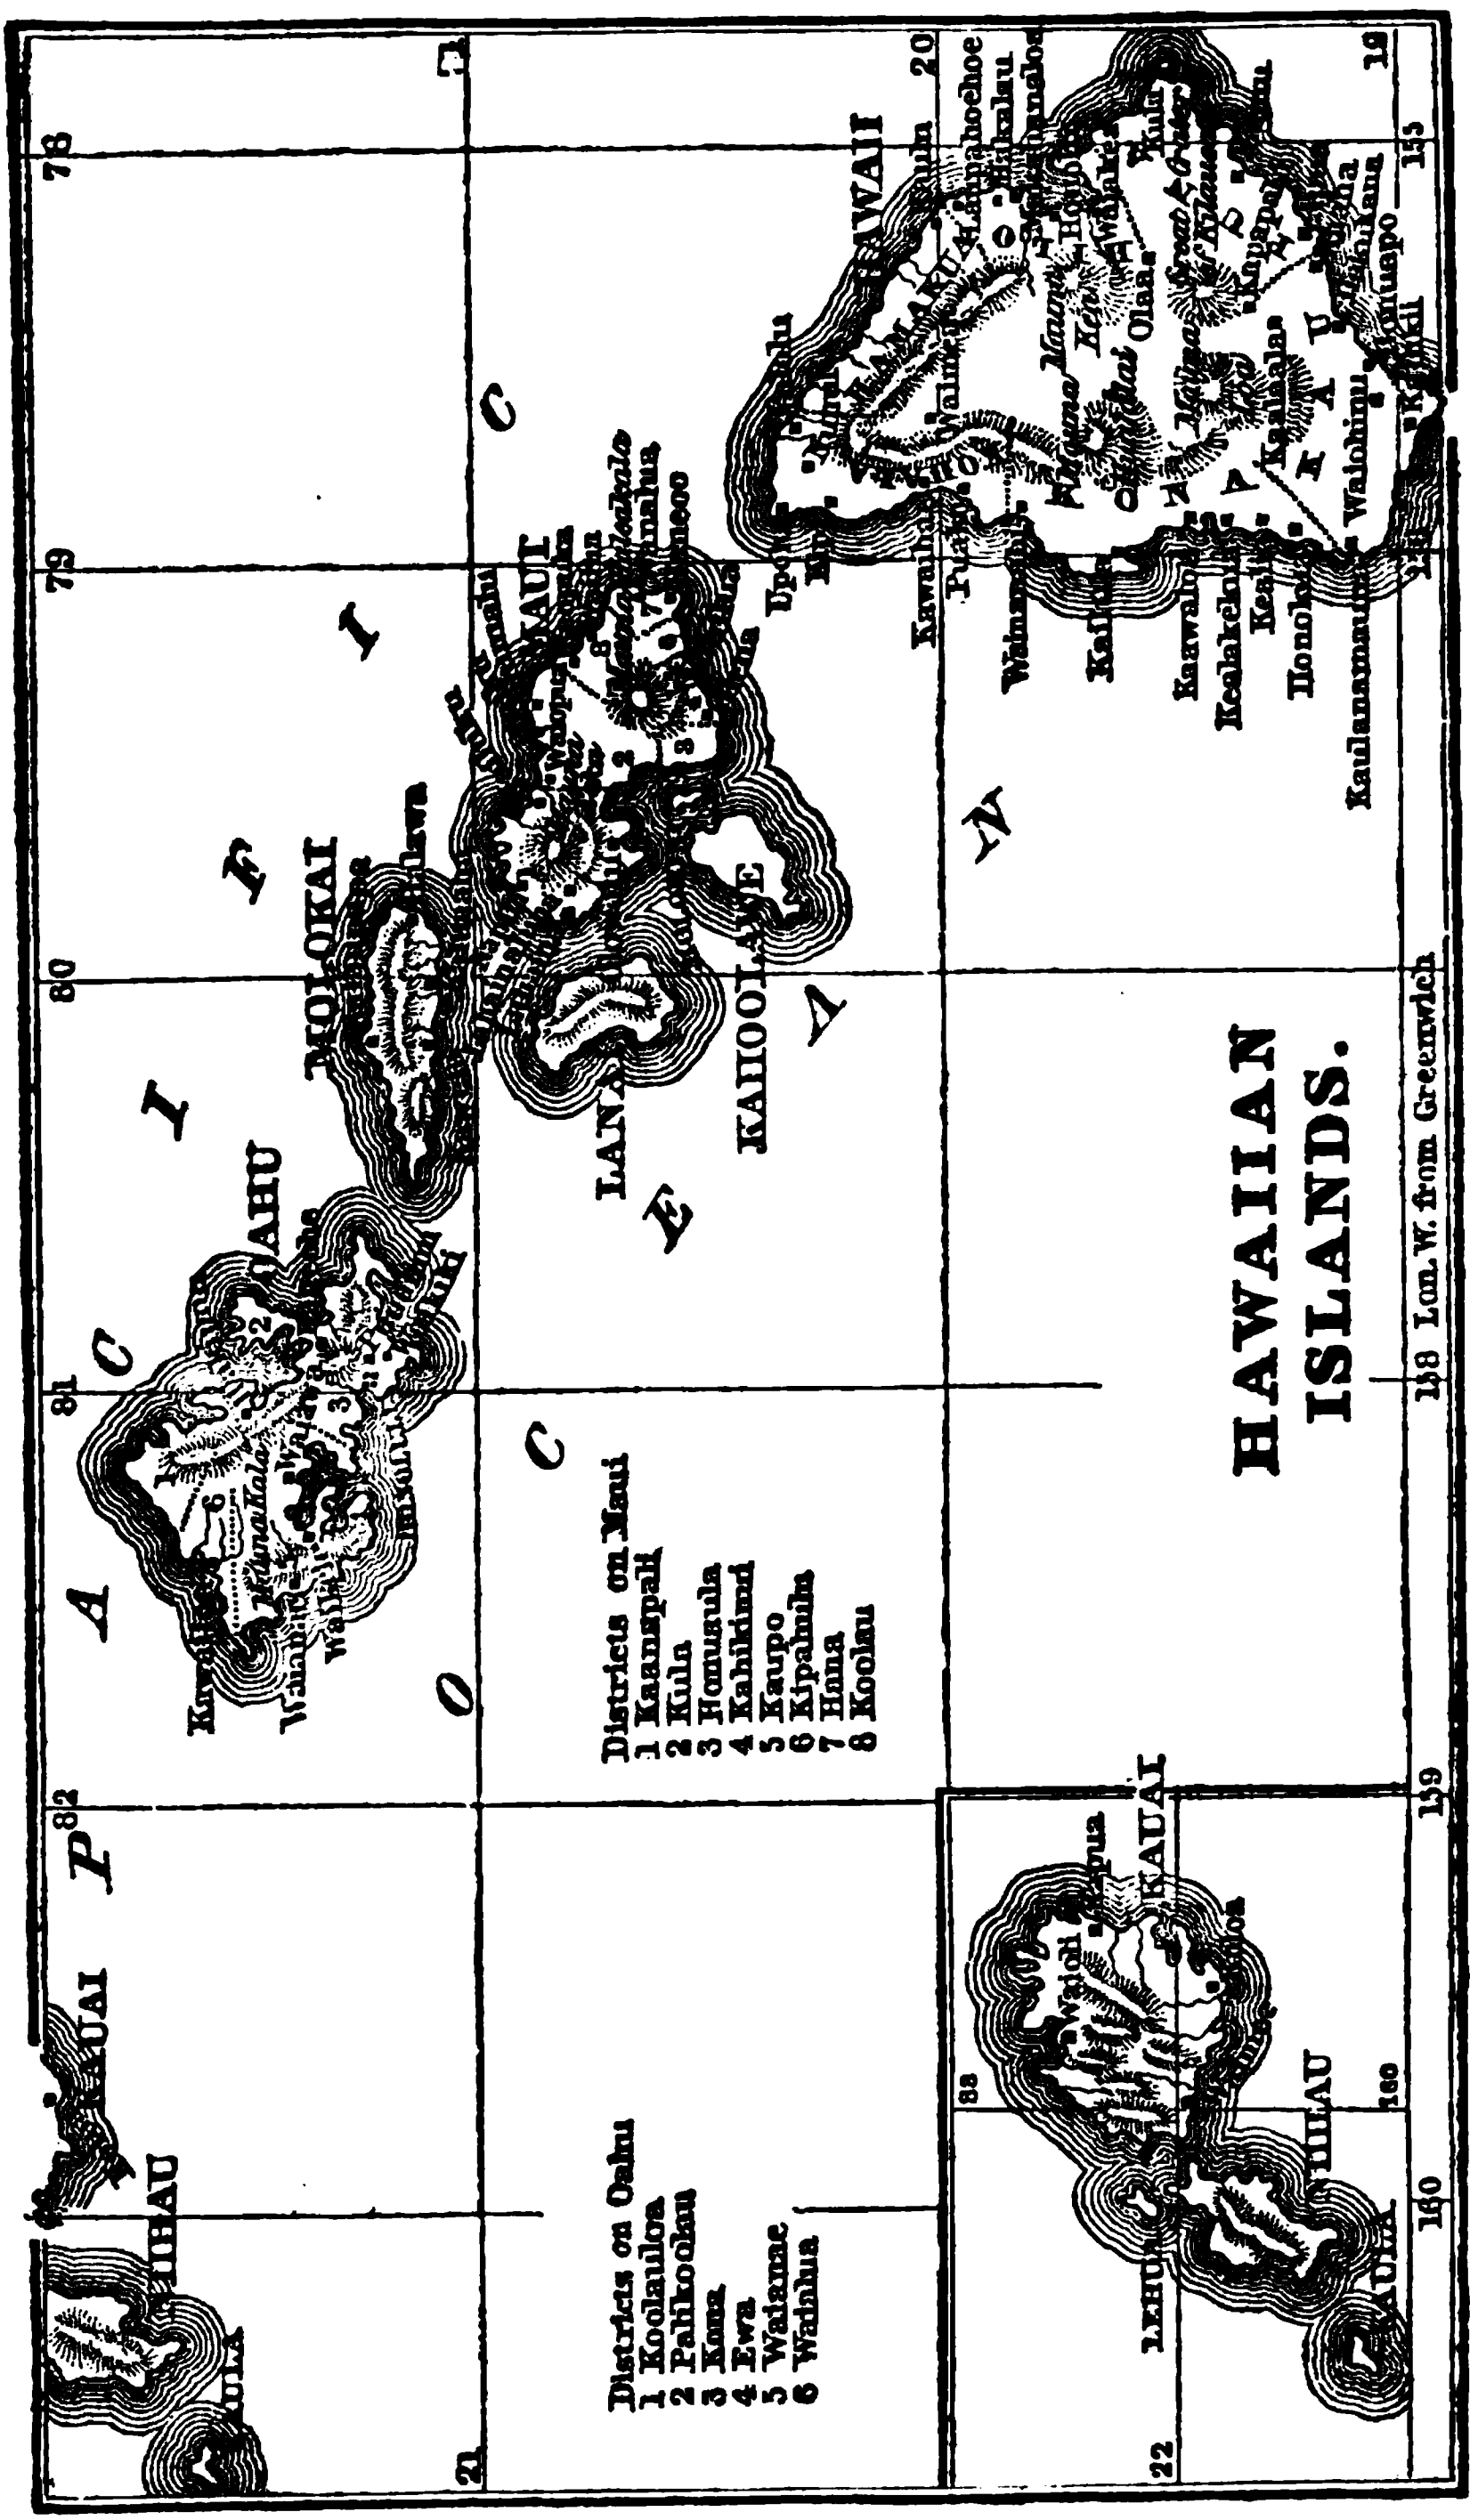

SANDALWOOD ISLAND: One of the lesser Sunda Islands, in the Indian Archipelago.

SANDWICH ISLANDS: The Sandwich Islands, situated in the North Pacific Ocean, about 20° N. lat. and 160° W. long., were discovered by Capt. Cook in 1778. They consist of a group of twelve volcanic islands, (three or four of which are merely uninhabited rocks,) standing quite by themselves, and of very considerable commercial importance. Hawaii is the largest, but Oahu, more central in the group, and having a good harbor, is the seat of government and the commercial centre. The islands are estimated to contain something more than 6,000 square miles. The face of the country is greatly diversified with hills and plains, secluded valleys, deep ravines, lofty mountains, and craters of immense volcanoes. In the elevated interior of the Islands the climate is cool. Rains are frequent in the interior and on the windward side, and vegetation in many parts luxuriant; but the low lands of the leeward side of the islands are mostly dry and barren. The native inhabitants belong to the same race with those of most of the more easterly islands in the Pacific.

Population.—The population was estimated by Capt. Cook at 400,000; an estimate, doubtless, greatly too large; though, from various causes, the people have been rapidly wasting away since his visit. About 1840, a census not fully to be relied upon, showed the population to be not far from 108,000.

Social, Moral, and Religious Condition of the People.—Before missionary operations commenced, the people were, if not in the lowest state of barbarism in which men are ever found, yet certainly in a very low state of intellectual, social, and moral debasement. With no written language, with no comfortable dwellings, with very little clothing, with the family constitution in ruins, unmitigated licentiousness universal, and every vile passion indulged without restraint; the people "a nation of drunkards," with no laws or courts of justice. "Society was a dead sea of pollution, and many ships visiting the islands were floating exhibitions of Sodom and Gomorrah." The government was wholly arbitrary; the kings and chiefs were considered owners of the soil, and the people were slaves, with their property and their lives subject to the will of those above them. The people of all ranks were much under the influence of superstitious fears, and their religion, in connection with the cruel rites of idol worship, was in a great measure a tabu system; i. e., a system of religious prohibitions and consecrations, which had extended itself very widely, and had become exceedingly burdensome under the direction of priests and kings who used the system to accomplish their own purposes.

MISSION.

AMERICAN BOARD.—Just as American Christians were beginning to direct their attention to the work of Christianizing heathen nations, two youths from the Sandwich Islands, Opukahia (Obookiah) and Hopu, came in an American vessel to the United States. They came from "a boys' notion," but the hand of God was in it. Landing at New York in 1809, they accompanied the captain of the vessel to New Haven, Conn.,

and soon attracted the notice and Christian sympathy of some of the students of Yale College, who began to give them instruction. In 1816, they, with several others from the Sandwich Islands, and others from various portions of the heathen world, were gathered into a "mission school" at Cornwall, Conn. Opukahia, having become hopefully a Christian, expressed deep sympathy for his heathen relations and nation, and a strong wish that they might be evangelized. He, however, was not permitted to engage personally in the work of preaching to them the Gospel, as he ardently desired to do. He died in Feb., 1818, before arrangements were made for sending a mission to the Islands. But he had not lived in vain. Extensive interest had been awakened, and it had become obvious that Christian missionaries would soon be sent to his kindred according to the flesh.

In the summer of 1819, Hiram Bingham and Asa Thurston, students in the theological seminary at Andover, offered themselves to the American Board for this service. They were ordained at Goshen, Conn., Sept. 19. Others offered themselves as assistant missionaries; a mission church was organized in the vestry of Park Street church, Boston, Oct. 15th. The public instructions of the Prudential Committee were given by the Secretary, Rev. Dr. Worcester, at Park Street, the same evening, and on the 23d of the same month, (Oct. 1819,) the company sailed from Boston in the Brig Thaddeus, Capt. Blanchard. Besides the two ordained missionaries and their wives, there were, as members of the mission, Mr. Daniel Chamberlain, farmer, Dr. Thomas Holman, physician, Mr. Samuel Whitney, mechanic and teacher, Mr. Samuel Ruggles, catechist, and Mr. Elisha Loomis, printer and teacher, with their wives, and John Honoree, Thomas Hopu, and William Tennooe, natives of the Islands who had been educated at Cornwall; in all, 17. George Tamoree, a son of one of the Island chiefs, who had also been educated at Cornwall, returned in the same vessel, but not as a member of the mission. It may be stated here that some of these natives of the Islands did not render all that assistance which it was hoped would be derived from them in the operations of the mission. They exhibited neither the intelligence nor the stability of character needed in teachers. Hopu, however, acquired the epithet of "the faithful," and Honoree appears to have been laborious and useful; but Tennooe rapidly fell into the immoral practices of his countrymen, and was excluded from the church in 1820. The mission was also yet more deeply pained by the unchristian conduct of Dr. Holman, who was excommunicated in January, 1821. In the instructions given to this band of missionaries, who were going, emphatically, to one of the "dark places of the earth," they were directed "to aim at nothing short of covering those islands with fruitful fields and pleasant dwellings, and schools and churches, and raising up the whole people to an elevated state of Christian civilization;" "to introduce, and get into extended operation and influence among them, the arts, institutions and usages of civilized life and society;" but, "above all, to convert them from their idolatries, superstitions and vices, to the living God." They were going to do a great work, and God, who had prepared the way for their being sent, was also preparing the way for their reception and for their success.

Preparation for the Mission at the Islands.

—One of the most important of that series of events by which the Sandwich Islands were prepared to be a field of most successful missionary operations, was the subjugation of the different islands about the commencement of the present century, and the union of all under one government. Several distinct petty kingdoms had previously presented a scene of uninterrupted jealousy, contention, and savage warfare; but now Kamehameha, of Hawaii, a man of great physical strength and mental energy, and of many excellent qualities as a ruler, had subdued all the other kingdoms. There was one government only. What was permitted in one island would be likely to be permitted in all, and any changes which might take place in customs, religion, or laws, would readily become universal changes.

Capt. Vancouver, who visited the Islands several times, in 1792, '93, and '94, gave the king much good advice, as well as some valuable presents; and before leaving, is reported to have said to him: "There is a God above in heaven, and if you desire to worship him, when I return to England I will entreat his majesty to appoint for you a clergyman; and when he comes you must renounce your tabu system, which is false,—there are no earthly deities." Kamehameha died May 8, 1819, a few months before the missionaries sailed from Boston. On his death-bed, he requested an American, who was present, to tell him about the religion of the Bible and the Christian's God. He obtained, however, no information, and died without the knowledge which he sought, leaving his son, Liholiho, Kamehameha II., to succeed him.

Almost immediately, under Liholiho, another event occurred, of great importance in the way of preparation for the Gospel:—the renunciation of the tabu system and the old idolatry. Kamehameha is said to have spoken to his chiefs, during his last sickness, of throwing off the restraints of tabu when he should recover. The testimony of foreigners residing at the islands had been often given against the system. They had also sometimes allured the people to acts which were violations of tabu, and as no harm had followed,—as the gods did not punish by death or in any other way,—the force of superstitious fears were lessened. The restrictions of tabu were unnumbered, and often of the most oppressive character, bearing, in many things, as heavily upon the chiefs as upon the common people, so that many motives would urge to its violation. The chiefs present at the death of the king are said to have requested Kaahumanu, the one of his wives who was specially looked to for direction, to suffer that occasion to be taken for disregarding all former ceremonies, and renouncing tabu. Kaahumanu however, did not consent, but the license and intemperance which followed the king's death, helped the matter forward. That very day, many of the common people and a few chiefs ate, males and females together, a thing prohibited on pain of death, and a few days after, most of the female chiefs partook of prohibited food. Superstitious fears were gradually swept away. Kaahumanu advised the king, on the day of his coronation: "Let us henceforth disregard the restraints of tabu," and within a short time, the dissolute Liholiho, first in the midst of drunken revels, ate, drank, and smoked with female chiefs. The people raised the cry, "The king has violated tabu, there is no longer any restraint." Some, however, still resisted. One chief, encouraged by the priests, raised the standard of rebellion in support of the old idolatry; but he was subdued,—“the army with idols was weak, the army without idols was victorious,”—and the work was done; the islands were without a religion, waiting for God's law. The people demolished the temples of the false gods that had enthralled them, and treated their idols with contempt, throwing some into the sea, and some into the fire. God had brought about events before the missionaries reached the Islands, which they could hardly have supposed it possible that they should witness until after years of toil.

Arrival and reception of the missionaries; first stations and labors.—The missionaries welcomed their first view of the mountains of Hawaii on the 30th of March, 1820, and entered the harbor of Kailua on the 4th of April, only a short time after the decisive battle which had subdued the party supporting idolatry, and near the scene of that battle. They had already received intelligence, from some of the ship's company who had landed with a boat, of the surprising and encouraging revolution which had been effected; but how they would be received they could not tell. The missionary company were introduced to the king, (who was then at Kailua, with many of the chiefs,) gave him the presents and the letter from the Secretary of the Board, which were designed for his father, and requested permission to remain and establish themselves as teachers, on different islands. They were received with respect; but an answer to their proposal was not given until after a discussion of several days. One difficulty was that Vancouver had encouraged Kamchameha to look for teachers from England, and they doubted whether they ought to receive those who were from another country; but John Young, an Englishman residing at the islands, and who had been recommended to their confidence by Vancouver, assured them that missionaries from America were the same as missionaries from England. On the 8th of April, permission was given for them all to remain one year at Kailua. They, however, thought it better that a part of their number should go to Oahu, and on the 11th the king consented to this. On the 12th, Mr. Thurston, Dr. Holman, Tennooe, and Hopu were landed at Kailua, and the Thaddeus sailed with the rest of the company for Honolulu, on Oahu. Early in May the Thaddeus sailed for Kauai, to return George Tamoree to his father, and Messrs. Whitney and Ruggles accompanied him. The old chief received his son with great joy and urged the missionary laborers who were with him to remain. After spending some weeks, and satisfying themselves that a favorable opening was presented there, they returned to Honolulu to consult with their brethren, and in July were stationed at Kauai. Thus three stations were commenced by the first band of laborers, on three of the largest islands, Hawaii the most south-easterly, Kauai the most north-westerly, and Oahu, central, and commercially the most important of the group.

After establishing themselves in thatched native huts of a single room, without floor, ceiling or fixtures, and with simple openings for doors and windows, one of the first efforts of the missionaries was to collect schools, composed both of children and adults. The king, the chiefs, and the members of their families were the first pupils. As the native language had never been reduced to writing, instruction was of necessity confined to the English, and the difficulties were great. Much interest however was awakened among the learners, though with most it soon abated. Within three months, the king could read, and within six months several of the chiefs could both read and write. In November of this year the mission reported 4 distinct schools with 90 pupils, of different ages and rank. Religious services of different kinds, and Sabbath schools were also at once established, and within a few months some of the missionaries were addressing the people on religious subjects in their own language, imperfectly used of course. After residing about three months at Kailua, Mr. Thurston preached a formal sermon to the royal family, using Hopu as an interpreter, from the words, "I have a message from God unto thee." His little audience kneeled in prayer before Jehovah.

Obstacles.—Wonderfully as God had prepared the way before the missionaries, it yet could not be otherwise than that they should find themselves compassed with difficulties and met by many and sore trials in their efforts to evangelize a people so degraded. There was the difficulty of communicating with the people, and when the language was learned so as to be spoken, there was still the want of a written language, and of books; and there was the poverty of the language, especially its want of terms which would express correctly the sentiments and doctrines of a pure religion. But far more than all this there was the intellectual and the moral debasement of the people, which they themselves well termed their "dark-heartedness." When the missionaries first looked upon the degradation and barbarism of the half naked, lewd, and chattering savages as they came about the ship in their canoes, some turned away from the sight with shrinking and with tears, and others were ready to ask, "Can these be human beings? can they be civilized and Christianized? and can we take up our abode for life with such a people?"

But as if the character and the condition of the natives did not present obstacles enough to the successful prosecution of the holy work for which these Christian laborers had come, foreign residents at the islands, from Christian lands, must bring in also, not only all their vices, but their decided opposition. Most of the foreigners then at the island, were sailors of the "baser sort," some of whom had been put on shore by masters of vessels, and some were deserters. Such men, removed from all the restraints of a Christian land and shut out almost entirely from the observation of the virtuous, lived in open and unblushing vice, as vile as the heathen about them, and much more capable of successfully opposing missionary effort. There were some foreigners of a better class, among traders and commercial agents, from whom the missionaries received, more or less, both of kind attention and of encouragement in their work; but for many years, the great body both of foreign residents, and of seafaring men visiting the islands, exerted a most pernicious influence, and were a source of constant and most painful trial to the Christian laborers. Nearly all the foreigners at Kailua, when the missionaries first arrived, used their influence to induce the king and chiefs to send them away, asserting, among other things, that they would soon make war upon them and take away their lands. Here the presence of missionary ladies was found to be of great service. "If they had come to make war would they have brought their delicate wives?" said the chiefs. Foiled in their efforts to prevent the landing of the missionaries, they looked forward to the end of the year for which they had obtained permission to remain, hoping then to secure their banishment. But in this also they were wholly unsuccessful. Before the year expired the chiefs had become satisfied in regard to the character and the objects of their teachers, and instead of sending them away were requesting them to send for more.

Reinforcements.—To sustain and carry forward the effort to Christianize the islands, additional laborers have been sent from time to time. The table below will show at one view the number of laborers of different classes who have gone from the United States (not including natives of the islands) and the date of their arrival at the islands. In regard to female helpers the table is not quite full, 76 in all having been sent, nine of whom went out unmarried.

Of the laymen sent, seven have been physicians, and two have been employed specially in managing the secular affairs of the mission. In April, 1822, Rev. Wm. Ellis, an English missionary at the Society Islands, came to Honolulu with Messrs. Tyerman and Bennet, designing to go from there to establish a mission at the Marquesas Islands. Prevented from going as he had expected to do, and finding that he could be very useful at the Sandwich Islands in connection with the American missionaries, he was induced to remain, and cooperated with affectionate harmony in the labors of the mission until obliged by the illness of Mrs. Ellis, to leave for England in the autumn of 1824.

Position and influence of the Chiefs.—In order to understand correctly many of the facts connected with the history of this mission, the relative position of the chiefs and the common people must be borne in mind.

The inhabitants of the Islands were "chiefs and slaves," with a wide distance between the two classes. The king was supreme, and his word was law, not only in civil, but in religious and all other matters; and the chiefs also were regarded by the people generally with superstitious reverence and awe, as something more than mortal. They were accustomed, not to suggest and advise, but to direct; and their wishes, or advice, had all the force of a command. The people were accustomed to obey, and to look to the chiefs for direction. Hence, in the estimation of both chiefs and people, if any change was to be introduced in laws, customs, or religion, the chiefs must take the lead. When the missionaries came, the king and chiefs were not willing that the common people should be taught to read till they had first learned, and when some of the lower chiefs and the common people began to think favorably of the new religion, they considered it out of place for them first to make any public profession; they must wait "for the king to turn." From this state of things there resulted a kind of necessity for paying much attention to the higher classes, endeavoring to secure from them attention to schools and preaching, and such a sanctioning of the instruction given as would at least be regarded by the people as permitting them to follow it. From the same cause, when chiefs of the highest rank did express their wish that the people would learn to read, or would attend on preaching, the wish was at once regarded; when they desired the people to build school-houses, or houses of worship, it was done without hesitation, and when they publicly professed their faith in Christ, thousands of the people would readily have done the same at once. It was not easy to keep church and state distinct, where civil and religious matters had always been united, and not always easy for either chiefs or people to perceive the difference between permitting a suitable religious liberty, and suffering an entirely unsuitable disobedience to civil rulers.

In this connection it should be distinctly stated, to the honor of both the missionaries and the chiefs, that discipline in the churches has been administered with impartiality. In 1835 a sister of the king was excommunicated, and one of the older missionaries writes in 1847: "High chiefs have been disciplined as abundantly as any class of members in our churches, and they are vastly more docile under discipline than crooked elders, deacons, and gentlemen of high standing in the United States."

First Four Years of Missionary Labor.—The reception which the missionaries met at the islands, the first stations taken, and the first efforts to reach the people, have been mentioned. The royal family left Kailua,

Hawaii, towards the close of the year 1820, and early in 1821 went to Honolulu, on Oahu. Such was now the state of things at Kailua that the mission family was no longer considered safe at that place, and they also removed to Honolulu in Dec., 1820, and Hawaii was left without missionary labor until Nov., 1823, when Kailua was again occupied, and the next year two other stations were taken on the island. The interest at first felt by chiefs and others in learning to read in English, somewhat abated as the novelty wore away, and in Dec., 1821, there were but about 65 pupils. In the mean time, the missionaries had given themselves diligently to the difficult task of learning the native language and reducing it to writing, and on the first Monday in January, 1822, the first sheet was printed in the Hawaiian language, containing the first eight pages of a Hawaiian spelling-book. (Owing to the extreme difficulty of ascertaining the exact sounds of a language never before written, and the best modes of expressing such sounds, six months elapsed before the second sheet was struck off.)

This introduction of printing awakened much interest, and gave at once a new impulse to schools. Several of the chiefs undertook in earnest to learn to read and write their own language. The king resumed his studies in August, and on the 16th of the month he wrote a letter, in a fair, legible hand, to one of the chiefs of the Society Islands. Kashaumanu and others of the highest chiefs followed the example of the king, and in September, the number of persons under instruction was estimated at 500.

Religious instruction began to be given to much better advantage. The spelling-book contained easy but important sentences of Christian truth. The missionaries could in some measure dispense with the aid of interpreters in preaching. Mr. Ellis, who had joined them, could readily make himself understood in the Hawaiian tongue, and some natives of the Society Islands who had accompanied him, could very soon pray and converse with the Sandwich Islanders in their own language. Many of the people listened with interest to the Gospel, but "waited for the king to turn."

The conduct of the king, Liholiho, was one of the greatest obstacles with which the missionaries were called to contend. He was friendly to the mission, had sometimes applied himself with characteristic energy to learning to read and write; advised others to learn; regretted that he had not more perseverance; and showed no resentment when reproved by the missionaries for his vices. But he was young, reckless and profligate; was naturally daring, and when partially intoxicated was ready for any adventure; and a portion of the foreign residents, taking advantage of his weaknesses, made assiduous and persevering efforts to keep him from the influence of the Gospel. Even in the place of worship, means were used to divert his thoughts; and to prevent his attendance on preaching, he was more than once artfully seduced into intoxication, against his own deliberate resolutions.

While some foreigners thus endeavored to seduce the king, and many complained that the preaching, which was regularly maintained, was too severe against sin and sinners, others approved the preaching and sustained the preachers. Chiefly at the expense of foreign residents, a grass house of worship was erected at Honolulu, in 1821, 54 feet by 22, and calculated to hold 200 hearers. On the 15th of September, it was publicly dedicated to the service of God.

The missionaries were much encouraged and aided in their work in 1832, by the visit of Messrs. Tyerman and Bennet, who had been sent by the London Missionary Society to visit their missions in the Pacific. They came with Captain Kent, who had in charge a small schooner as a present from the king of Great Britain to the king of the Sandwich Islands, and their testimony in favor of the missionaries, as well as the testimony of natives of the Society Islands who were with them, as to the happy results of missionary labor in those islands, was of great service. It was specially of service, and providentially timely, from the fact that foreigners, among other efforts to prevent the success of the missionaries, and, if possible, to secure their banishment, had endeavored to persuade the king and chiefs that the English government would be displeased if they tolerated the residence of American teachers. Here now were men from England, coming at the same time with the ship which Vancouver had long before encouraged Kamehameha to look for as a present from the king of England, strongly commending the missionaries to the confidence of the king, and urging attention to their instructions. The falsehood and baseness of the opposers was made clear. The commander of a Russian exploring squadron had previously, in Dec. 1821, heartily commended the missionaries, sending from himself and his officers a generous donation to aid them in their work.

In August, 1822, the first Christian marriage, that of Thomas Hopu, took place at the islands; and in October, 1823, two chiefs of high rank, at their own request, were publicly, at the house of God, on the Sabbath, "like the people of Jesus Christ, joined together as man and wife." The first Christian burial was that of a son of Mr. Bingham, Jan. 19th, 1823. The services were attended by the king and his principal chiefs. A few days after, a relative of Liholiho whom he called sister, died at Honolulu, and at his request her funeral was conducted with similar Christian services. In February of this year, the chiefs held a consultation respecting the Christian Sabbath, and a crier was sent around at Honolulu, proclaiming a law enjoining its observance.

May 31, 1823, a station was taken at Lahaina, on the island of Maui, at the request of Keopuolani, the mother of the king, and the highest chief of the islands, who was going to that place to reside. "She interested herself as a mother in seeing the missionaries comfortably located," and exerted her great influence to induce the people to respect them, and listen to their instructions. A house of worship "of ordinary structure and frail material" was soon erected there, and dedicated on the 24th of August; and in Dec., a house was dedicated also at Kailua, where labors had now been resumed. Keopuolani was the first native baptized at the Islands. She lived but a few months after the station was taken at Lahaina, in which she felt so deep an interest. Previous to her last sickness, she had given evidence of conversion; during that sickness the evidence constantly brightened, and at her request she received baptism a short time before her death, which occurred on the 16th of September. She had given strict injunctions that no heathen customs should follow her death or attend her funeral, and her injunctions were in good measure regarded; though, but a short time before, the death of such a chief would have been followed, not only by horrid rites, but by a scene of universal licentiousness and pillage. It was expected now. Many natives fled to the mountains, and foreigners prepared to take refuge on board the ships, advising the missionaries to do the same. "But not a human victim was slaughtered; not a hamlet was burned, not a house was pillaged." Thus had the mother of the king given her testimony and the influence of her example, in life and in death, in favor of the missionary work, and thus was it made apparent that already much good had been accomplished.

Regency of Kaahumanu.—On the 27th of November, 1823, the king embarked for England, prompted, probably, more by curiosity and a restless, roving disposition, than by any better motive. He was accompanied by his favorite wife, several chiefs, and a Frenchman named John Rives. They reached London in May, 1824, received some attention from statesmen, and visited places of amusement, but saw little of religious society. Within a few weeks, the king and queen were both attacked with measles, and both died in July.

Before sailing, Liholiho had nominated his young brother as his successor, in case he should not return, and left the government in the hands of Kaahumanu, the favorite wife of the conqueror Kamehameha, and by his appointment the prime minister of Liholiho. Kaahumanu was a woman of much energy, decision, and strength of character; and though haughty and disdainful, and sometimes tyrannical and cruel, was in many respects well fitted for the emergency in which she was placed. Her prime minister, not associate regent, was Kalanimoku. At this time she stood entirely aloof from religious influence, and looked down upon the missionaries with contempt; but she soon gave evidence of a great change of character, and in December, 1825, she became a member of the church, with several other persons of rank. Six months before, she, with others, had made a public declaration of faith in Christ and desire to join his people. From the time of her hopeful conversion, this remarkable woman became warm in her attachment to the missionaries; and in the administration of the government she manifested a strong desire to promote the good of the people. In a female prayer-meeting at Honolulu, she expressed her feelings with earnestness and tears. Nor was she content to speak alone. While giving strict attention to all the affairs of government, she began at once the work of "visiting every island of the group, and almost every village of each island; encouraging schools, introducing improvements, and exhorting the people to forsake their many vices, and cleave to the pure religion which had been brought to their shores." The effect was very great. Not the king, indeed, but the regent, had turned. Liholiho had issued his proclamation against various crimes and vices, and in favor of the Sabbath, with little effect comparatively, for his example did not show him to be sincere. Kaahumanu gave to her proclamations and instructions the force of her own consistent example, and made it evident that she was deeply in earnest. A great change among the people was the immediate result, at least in outward deportment, and the way was in some measure prepared for a true reformation of character.

The regent was not alone among the chiefs in such efforts to do good. Several others, of much influence, were already, hopefully, true Christians, and still others gave their support to the labors of the mission. Indeed, as early as April, 1824, just as the printing of 3,000 copies of elementary lessons in reading and spelling was finished, the principal chiefs had called a meeting of the people of Oahu, to proclaim, in a formal manner, their united resolution to receive instruction themselves, to observe the Sabbath, worship God, and obey his law, and to promote true knowledge among the people. After a public examination of the schools, Kaahumanu selected some of the most forward of the pupils to teach in other districts, and before the end of the year 1824, 50 natives were thus employed as teachers, and at least 2,000 persons were said to have learned to read; but both the teaching and the learning were, of course, in most cases, of a very imperfect kind. This was the commencement of a kind of native school system which rapidly extended itself, and continued in operation without very much change, for eight or ten years. Native houses were built for the purpose by direction of the chiefs, and large numbers of the people, a great majority being adults, were collected in what were called schools, and taught to read, and in many instances to write their own language, by native teachers who themselves knew, in most instances, "this much, no more." But defective as these schools were, they were much better than nothing, and they were all that could then be had. In 1831 there were reported 1100 schools, with near 53,000 learners, at least one-third of whom could read with a good degree of ease, many could write, and a few had some knowledge of arithmetic.

Kapiolani.—Mention should here be made of another "honorable woman"—Kapiolani, of the island of Hawaii. A woman of high rank and of great influence, she united with the church about the same time with Kaahumanu, and, like her, made it her great business to induce the people to attend to the instructions of the missionaries. Like her, she made frequent extensive tours among the people, exhorting them to forsake their sins, and destroying every vestige of idolatry. She became, also, a pattern to the people in civilization. "She built a large framed house, enclosed a yard, and cultivated flowers, and in her dress, manners, and mode of living appeared more like a Christian lady than any other high-born native of her day." In December, 1824, that she might more effectually destroy from among the people any remaining fear of old divinities, she determined to visit the great crater of Kilaua, the reputed residence of Pele. The whole mountain was a dreaded place. Its fire and smoke, its frequent mutterings, and occasional desolating eruptions, served to keep alive the superstitious dread. Clinging even to the feet of their chief, the people besought her, with tears, not to go. Before reaching the crater, she was met by a pretended priestess, wild with rage, who warned her to desist. But her purpose was fixed. With calm dignity rebuking the pretensions of the prophetess, she had her soon humbled and calm, saying that the god had left her, and she could not answer. Accompanied by one of the missionaries, and by some trembling native attendants, she descended into the crater, and standing upon a ledge 500 feet below the top, with the lake of molten fire before her, she cast stones into the fiery gulf, ate the sacred berries consecrated to Pele, and called upon one of her attendants to offer prayer and praise to the one true God. The rock did not open under her feet; the hissing and bellowing gases did not destroy her, and the boiling lava did not rise to consume her. The people felt that Pele was powerless, and Jehovah was God.

Visit of the British frigate Blonde, Lord Byron.—While the influence of honored chiefs, whose hearts God had touched, was thus doing much to turn the tide of feeling in favor of Christianity, another event occurred, of much importance, tending to the same result. The frigate Blonde, commanded by Lord Byron, which had been sent from England with the remains of Liholiho and the queen, and with the few survivors of the natives who had attended them, reached Honolulu on the 7th of May, 1824. At first there was a burst of tumultuous feeling, but the strength of heathenism was broken, and Christian services took the place of crue pagan rites. In the evening, the crowd attended at the chapel, to engage in religious services. At the close of the meeting, Baki, the chief of highest rank who had returned from England, made some report of what he had seen in a Christian country: of the influence of the Christian religion, as he supposed, in giving so much wealth and power, and of what the king of England had said, urging that the people should attend to the instructions of the missionaries. Lord Byron, during his stay of two months at the islands, showed himself the decided friend of the mission, thus adding the weight of his influence to increase the favor with which the Gospel and the American teachers were beginning now to be received. On the 6th of June a council of the chiefs was held, to fix the succession in a formal manner. Lord Byron attended, and aided by his advice. Everything was conducted in an amicable and Christian manner, the rightful claims of Kamikeaouli, the young brother of Liholiho, about nine years of age, were fully admitted, and it was resolved to acknowledge and sustain him. Kaahumanu was still to act as regent during his youth, and he was to be put, for a time, under the instruction of the missionaries. It was generally felt by the chiefs and the people that here was a triumph of the Gospel of peace, since, had it not been for the influence of the Gospel, that mere boy could never have been king.

Various circumstances thus combined to give strength to the religious influence of the regent. The Spirit of God, which had changed the hearts of chiefs, was present also with the people, and some from time to time gave pleasing evidence of a saving change. The mission having been reinforced, more stations had been taken ; more houses of worship were erected, and large numbers attended upon preaching, while schools of some sort, were established at almost every village throughout the group of islands. "Things as they were in the days of Kaa-humanu," has long been a phrase well understood at the islands.

Opposition from foreigners—Whale Ship Daniel.—But all was not bright. Well would it have been if all foreign vessels had exerted as good an influence as the Blonde and her commander. But the commanders and the crews of merchant vessels, and sometimes also of vessels belonging to the navies of the United States and of Great Britain, as well as of France, have disgraced themselves, while they have thrown the most serious obstacles in the way of missionary effort at these as well as at other islands. On the 3d of Oct. 1825, the English whale ship Daniel, Capt. Buckle, came to anchor at Lahaina. The crew soon found that a change had taken place since their former visit to the islands. A law of the chiefs had gone into operation, forbidding females to visit ships for immoral purposes ; and instead of the throng of native females which they had expected to see, not one approached the vessel. Suspecting the cause, they cursed the missionaries, and clenching their fists, declared that they would have revenge ; and in spite of missionaries, and chiefs, and laws, they would have the liberties of former years. On the evening of the 5th some of the crew came to the house of Mr. Richards, the missionary, insisting that he should exert his influence to have the law repealed, and threatening destruction to his property, his life, and his family if he refused. He firmly told them that he would die rather than give any countenance to such vile demands, and his wife, in feeble health, and with her helpless little children around her, assured them of her readiness to share the fate of her husband in such a cause. The men at last withdrew, and the house was guarded through the night by natives. The next day Mr. Richards wrote to the commanders of some American vessels, who took no notice of his letter. He wrote also to Capt. Buckle, asking him to control his men, but he replied that the men were all on shore determined not to return without women, and Mr. Richards had better give his consent, when all would be quiet. On the next day the men again landed, and, having a black flag and armed with knives, they presented themselves before the mission-house to the number of about forty, demanding, with oaths and execrations, that Mr. Richards should not resist their purpose. The chiefs, who had exercised all forbearance and had at first sent natives armed only with clubs to defend the mission family, satisfied that milder measures would not answer, at length called out a company of two hundred men armed with muskets and spears. The mob was compelled to retire, the law was sustained, and quiet restored. From Lahaina the ship went to Honolulu, where, aided by American sailors, the crew engaged in similar outrages.

Schooner Dolphin.—The crews of whale ships were not to be left alone in the unenviable notoriety secured by such proceedings. The armed schooner Dolphin, of the United States navy, Lieutenant Percival commander, came to Honolulu Jan. 14th, 1826, when the law against females visiting ships had been in operation about three months. The ten commandments also had been translated and printed in the Hawaiian language, and the chiefs had adopted them as a basis of law and government. The missionaries had been instructed, as are all missionaries of the Board, to abstain from intermeddling with the affairs of civil government, that they might give rulers no occasion for jealousy, and unreasonable men no grounds for finding fault, and they had so abstained. It was obvious however that the religious instruction which they had imparted had given the chiefs new views of right and duty, and had in this way led to the enacting of such laws ; and foreigners who did themselves intermeddle, in the most objectionable way, accused the missionaries of intermeddling and dictating laws, which were to them offensive. Even the English and American consuls violently opposed some of the new laws, recommending a code which should prohibit nothing but murder, treason and theft. They even went to the young king and told him that the regent and chiefs had no right to make laws, but that the right belonged to him alone. When the Dolphin arrived, her commander at once manifested his sympathy for those who were thus endeavoring to prevent improvement in the morals of the people, and in the laws ; at least any improvement which should interfere with their vices. He expressed his disapprobation of the law which kept females from going to the ships for purposes of infamy, and insisted upon the release of four prostitutes then in custody for a violation of the law. Imputing its existence to the influence of the missionaries, he threatened violence against their houses and their persons if it were not repealed. The chiefs became alarmed, and repeatedly inquired of the missionaries what would be the duty of the people in case such threats were put in execution. They were assured that the commander would not venture to injure them, as he was responsible to the United States Government, and when they still pressed the inquiry, "What shall we do in case your houses are attacked ?" they were exhorted in no case to resort to violence in their defence. On the afternoon of the Sabbath, Feb. 26, when Mr. Bingham and several of the chiefs were collected for religious worship around the sick bed of the minister, Kalanimoku, six or seven sailors from the Dolphin, armed with knives and clubs, entered the room and demanded the repeal of the law, threatening to tear down the house if it were not repealed. After a scene of confusion, during which they broke all the windows in the front of the house, they were constrained to retire, when they directed their course towards the house of Mr. Bingham. The missionary, alarmed for his family, attempted to reach his house before them by another way, but fell into their hands and very narrowly escaped with his life, rescued by the natives. The same evening, Lieut. Percival, instead of restraining his crew, or apologizing for the outrage, called on the chiefs, and declared that the prohibition should come off; that he was determined not to leave the islands till the law was repealed. Kalanimoku was confined by sickness, some of the chiefs yielded to fear, and a connivance at a breach of the law was the result. "In the dusk of the evening of the next day, a boat with females passed along the harbor, and a shout arose among the shipping at the glorious victory that had been achieved." The Dolphin remained at the islands about four months, and left a most disastrous influence behind, when at last, she sailed. The law was broken down for a time; the flood-gates of vice were opened; and irreligion and immorality had gained strength and boldness which could not be overcome at once. Similar scenes of violence and outrage were enacted by the crews of English and American whale ships at Lahaina in Oct. 1826. A mob of such sailors went to the house of Mr. Richards with the declared intention of taking his life. He was not at home, and his house was guarded by the natives; but for some days they filled the place with violence, pillaging the tents of the natives and destroying their property. Here, however, females were not obtained. The Governor was absent, and the place was in the charge of a female chief, who directed the women to flee with her to the mountains, which they did; all the females from a town of 4,000 native inhabitants, fleeing from the violence and lust of sailors from Christian lands! Such are the sailors, and such the foreign residents at the Sandwich Islands, by whom so many basely false and slanderous reports against the missionaries have been put in circulation.

United States Sloop of War Peacock—Vindication of the Missionaries.—We gladly turn from such scenes to look at the honorable conduct of a more honorable commander in the navy of our country. Within the same month in which these scenes were enacted at Lahaina, the United States sloop of war Peacock, Capt. T. H. C. Jones, arrived at Honolulu, where it remained till January 1827. Hearing of the proceedings of Lieut. Percival, and hearing also the many slanderous reports against the missionaries, Capt. Jones kept himself uncommitted, until he should be able to judge from a knowledge of the facts. About this time the missionaries published a circular, stating the course they had pursued, and some of the good results of their labors, denying the charges brought against them, and challenging investigation. Opposing foreign residents, laying hold of the word "challenge," called a meeting at which Capt. Jones and the other officers of the Peacock were to be present, and a hearing was to be had. Without detailing the proceedings of the meeting, we quote Capt. Jones' own opinion of the case as he subsequently gave it to the public:—"I own, I trembled for the cause of Christianity, and for the poor benighted islanders, when I saw, on the one hand the British Consul backed by the most wealthy and hitherto influential residents and shipmasters in formidable array, and prepared as I supposed, to testify against some half a dozen meek and humble servants of the Lord, calmly seated on the other, ready and anxious to be tried by their bitterest enemies, who on this occasion occupied the quadruple station of judge, jury, witness, and prosecutor. Thus situated, what could the friends of the mission hope for or expect? But what, in reality, was the result of this portentous meeting, which was to overthrow the mission, and uproot the seeds of civilization and Christianity so extensively and prosperously sown by them in every direction, while in their stead, heathenism and idolatry were to ride triumphantly through all coming time? Such was the object, and such were the hopes of many of the foreign residents at the Sandwich Islands in 1826. What, I again ask, was the result of this great trial? The most perfect, full, complete, and triumphant victory for the missionaries that could have been asked by their most devoted friends. Not one jot or tittle—not one iota derogatory to their character as men, as ministers of the Gospel of the strictest order, or as missionaries—could be made to appear by the united efforts of all conspired against them."

Further Outrages.—In Oct., 1827, the crew of the English whale ship John Palmer, Capt. Clark, at Lahaina, enticed several base women on board. Hoapili, the Governor of the island, demanded that they should be given up, but the Captain evaded and ridiculed the demand, and when the Governor detained him on shore insisting that it should be complied with, he sent directions to his crew to fire upon the town if he should not be released within an hour. He soon promised however that the women should be sent on shore if the Governor would release him, and he was released accordingly, but before the crew had learned this fact they discharged five cannon balls, all in the direction of Mr. Richard's house. The next day the Captain sailed for Honolulu, basely disregarding his promise to send the women on shore. At that time Capt. Buckle, of the Daniel, was again at Honolulu. The report of his conduct at Lahaina two years before had been sent to the United States and extensively published, and the published account had just returned to the islands. The excitement was intense. There were other captains and crews, and there were foreign residents at Honolulu, with the British Consul at their head, who sympathized with Capt. B. Deeds which heretofore they had supposed they could commit at these far off islands in darkness, were being brought to the light. The privilege of wallowing in all pollution there, and returning with untarnished reputations to their homes, they were likely to lose. Complaints were bitter and threatenings were loud. Some who had before sustained the missionaries now thought Mr. Richards had done wrong in reporting the outrage. Even Boki and John Young took this ground. Kaahumanu was for a time perplexed and troubled. She sent for the principal chiefs at Lahaina, and Mr. Richards, to repair to Honolulu, and called a Council to consider whether it would be right to give up Mr. Richards to the foreigners, or whether it was their duty to protect him. Before any decision was reached, meeting a shrewd man of the common people in whom she had confidence, David Malo, Kaahumanu asked him, "What can we do for our teacher? for even Mr. Young and Boki say he was very guilty in writing to America." After a few remarks, David asked, "In what country is it the practice to condemn the man who gives true information of crimes committed, and let the criminal go uncensured and unpunished?" "No where," she replied, and her resolution and that of the chiefs was soon taken. Mr. Richards had done no wrong; he had told only what they all knew to be true, and they would protect him. The British Consul and his party saw that they were defeated, and when Mr. Richards was sent for to meet them before the Council they hastily withdrew.

Letter from the President of the United States.—Before turning entirely from this kind of foreign opposition, allusion must be made to some other facts. Every effort was made to prevent the enacting and the enforcement of wholesome laws. Especially did many foreign residents and visitors pretend to be themselves exempt from all obligation to obey the laws, and threaten the chiefs with the vengeance of their respective governments if they should be punished for violating them. The government was however gradually gaining strength and confidence, and in 1829 a proclamation was issued declaring that the laws of the country forbade murder, theft, licentiousness, retailing ardent spirits, Sabbath-breaking and gambling; and that these laws were in force equally against all residents at the islands, both foreign and native. On the 14th of October, just one week after this proclamation was issued, the American sloop of war Vincennes arrived at Honolulu. Her commander, Capt. Finch, brought presents, and a letter to the king from the President of the United States. That letter, after congratulating the king on the progress of civilization and religion in his dominions, and recommending "earnest attention to the true religion of the Christian's Bible," proceeded to say: "The President also anxiously hopes that peace, and kindness, and justice will prevail between your people and those citizens of the United States who visit your island, and that the regulations of your government will be such as to enforce them upon all. Our citizens who violate your laws, or interfere with your regulations violate at the same time their duty to their own government and country, and merit censure and punishment." The letter also expressed entire confidence in the missionaries and bespoke protection and favor for them and for other American citizens who conducted with propriety. Nothing could have been more opportune. A kind Providence had sent this decided sanction by a foreign power of the course they were pursuing just at the time when it was most needed to strengthen the hands of the chiefs.

Papal Missionaries—French Outrages.—It has been mentioned that John Rives, a French adventurer, left the Islands with Liholiho when he went to England. From England, Rives went to France, and pretending to be the owner of large estates at the Island, and to have great influence with the king, he applied for priests to establish a Catholic mission. In 1826, John Alexius Augustine Bachelot was appointed, by the Pope, Apostolic Prefect of the Sandwich Islands. He arrived at Honolulu, July 7, 1827, with two other Romish priests and four laymen. Disregarding the law which required foreigners to obtain permission before landing, the priests and their company landed privately. They were ordered to leave, and the captain of the vessel was told that as he had landed foreigners without permission, he must take them away. He, however, took his departure, leaving them on shore, where they never obtained permission to reside, but remained in disregard of law. Boki, governor of Oahu, was disposed to court the favor of foreigners, and was, as early as this, manifesting some disposition to resist, or at least disregard the authority of the Regent. The priests immediately connected themselves particularly with his party, but even he never gave them permission to remain, which, indeed, he had no authority to do. They soon opened a chapel, and it was at once reported that they worshiped images. The young king went to see for himself, and, as he thought, found the report correct. The chiefs feared their old religion, which they knew to be bad in all its tendency, was about to be revived. English captains told them of the influence of the Papal religion and Papal priests in Europe, and predicted that they would work evil there if they were suffered to remain. They and their adherents continued to identify themselves with the party of Boki, whose career was one of intemperance, prodigality, and at last rebellion. Collecting armed men and ammunition in different places, he threatened the life of the Regent and a revolution in the government. Fortunately, in December, 1839, he embarked on a wild expedition in search of sandal wood, and was lost at sea; but his wife Liliha, whom he had left as governor of Oahu, continued to head the disorderly party until in 1831, when a conspiracy seemed fast ripening, and she was deposed from her office. In the mean time, there was much trouble with the Papists. The priests countenanced and encouraged, in their adherents, various violations of the laws, until the natives were forbidden to attend their services, and some were punished for doing so. At length, in April, 1831, the chiefs passed a formal order, requiring these priests, whom they regarded as abettors of rebellion and promoters of vice and disturbance, and who were residing there without authority, to leave the islands. They had borne with them almost four years, and could bear no longer. The priests, however, resorted to various expedients to evade obedience to the order, and in December the government fitted out one of its own vessels and sent them to California, with orders to the captain to "land them safe on shore, with every thing belonging to them, where they might subsist." The banishment of these priests, as well as preceding and subsequent proceedings against the Catholics, has often been attributed to the agency of the American missionaries; but both the missionaries themselves and the Sandwich Islands government have always denied the charge, and there is ample evidence that the missionaries have decidedly discountenanced any thing which could be regarded as interfering with religious liberty.

In September, 1836, another Papal priest came to the Islands. He was forbidden to remain; but aided by the English Consul, who claimed a residence for him as a British subject, he evaded repeated orders to leave. In March, 1837, two of the banished priests, M. Bachelot and Mr. Short, returned from California. They designed to land secretly and conceal themselves for a time; but they were recognized and ordered to return on board the vessel. Refusing obedience, after much delay they were put on board by the police, where they remained, in the harbor. On the 8th of July, a British, and on the 10th, a French ship of war came into port. The captains of these vessels interfering, an arrangement was made by which the priests were to be allowed to remain on shore until they should have opportunity to go to some other civilized country; but in the mean time they were not to be allowed to proselyte. On the 24th of July, the French captain negotiated a treaty with the king, in which it was stipulated that the French should "go and come freely" at the Islands, "and enjoy the same advantages which subjects of the most favored nation enjoy." This, of course, did not secure the right of teaching a prohibited religion. In October, Mr. Short left the islands, and in November, M. Bachelot also left, with another priest who had recently arrived, and had been refused permission to remain. On the 18th December, the government issued an ordinance forbidding the teaching "of the Pope's religion," and announcing that no teacher of that religion would be allowed to reside at the islands. Some persecution of Romanists followed; but in June, 1829, under the influence of Mr. Richards, who, at their earnest request, had become the political teacher of the king and chiefs, the king issued orders that no further punishments should be inflicted upon adherents of the Romish faith.

About three weeks after this order was given, on the 9th of July, the French frigate L'Artemise, Capt. Laplace, came to Honolulu. A full account of the proceedings which followed cannot be given here. The captain immediately issued a manifesto, stating that he had been sent out to put an end to the ill-treatment which the French had received at the islands, and demanding, among other things, "that the Catholic worship should be declared free;" "that a site for a Catholic Church should be given by the Government at Honolulu," and that $20,000 should be deposited with him, by the king, as a guarantee of his future conduct towards France. These "equitable conditions" must be complied with, and the treaty which accompanied the manifesto must be signed at once, or he should make immediate war upon the islands. Offering protection, in case of hostilities, to English and American residents, he expressly excepted the "Protestant clergy." As the king was absent, he consented to wait for his return until the 15th, before commencing hostilities. The king not returning, the $20,000 was sent on board by the governor of Oahu, on the 13th, and the treaty was signed by the governor and the Premier. On the 16th, the king returned, and was compelled, almost at once, to sign it himself. The most offensive articles were the fourth and sixth: the fourth providing that no Frenchman accused of crime should be tried except by a jury composed of foreign residents proposed by the French Consul; and the 6th declaring that French merchandize, "and particularly wines and brandy," cannot be prohibited, and shall not pay a duty higher than five per cent., ad valorem. A law had just before been enacted to promote temperance, which excluded distilled spirits and imposed a heavy duty on wines. This was now effectually repealed; the French Consul at once engaged largely in the sale of intoxicating drinks, and intemperance rapidly increased. Of course, numbers of Papal priests soon arrived, and located themselves on different islands of the group. It was not, however, to the advantage of Romanism that it was thus forced upon the people, and that in connection with brandy. The same word in the native language, says Mr. Hunt, now means a Frenchman, a Papist, and brandy. The priests have continued their efforts to the present time with varying success, sometimes interfering seriously with the efforts of the Protestant missionaries and of the government for the elevation of the people, especially opposing the school laws, and interfering with efforts to promote general education; but by no means gaining the confidence of the better and more intelligent classes of the community. For several years their influence does not seem to have been increasing, but rather diminishing. In 1852, of 436 common schools, supported by the government, 92 were Papal, with 2,174 pupils.

In September, 1842, the French sloop of war Embascade visited Honolulu, the captain making most arrogant demands, designed to secure the more free use of French intoxicating liquors, and still greater facilities for propagating the Papal faith. Providentially, the king had recently sent a delegation to the court of France, to adjust all difficulties, so that he could with good reason decline negotiations with the commander, and that without giving him a pretext for offering violence. In 1846, treaties were negotiated both with England and France, by which the government of the islands was allowed to impose any duties on wines and spirituous liquors which should not be so high as "absolutely to prohibit" their introduction. A duty of five dollars a gallon was imposed, against which the French Consul protested. In August, 1849, Admiral Tromelin came to Honolulu, and misled, as is believed, by M. Dillon, who had been there as Consul since February, 1848, made demands upon the government utterly unreasonable and unjust, having reference in great measure, as usual, to French spirits and the Romanists. As these demands were not complied with, he took possession of the fort, the custom house and the government offices by an armed force, seized the king's yacht, which he sent away as a prize, dismantled the fort, and destroyed the arms, powder, &c. The government abstained from all forcible resistance; but the representatives of Great Britain and of the United States made a formal protest against the ungenerous proceeding. To complete the series of such outrages on the part of the French, in December, 1850, M. Perrin came to Honolulu as Commissioner of the French Republic, presenting demands, which were mostly a reiteration of those made the year before, and prepared, it is supposed, again to use force. But in the kind providence of God,—not by any previous arrangement or direction from home,—the United States ship Vandalia, Captain Gardner, came into port at the most critical point of the negotiation, and the impression that this vessel would resist any acts of violence if appealed to by the native government doubtless led the commissioner to moderate his demands, and the islands were saved, perhaps, from such a French protectorate as has been forced upon some other islands in the Pacific Ocean.

Having thus presented a connected view of difficulties thrown in the way of the Christianization of the islands by unprincipled foreigners, of the forced introduction of Roman Catholics, and the aggressions of the French, it is time to return to the days of Kaahumanu, and consider more directly the progress and results of the missionary work.

Results of the first ten years of missionary labor.—A few brief statements in regard to the state of the mission, and results which had been already reached in 1830, will show that the first ten years of labor by the American missionaries had accomplished very much, over which they, and all friends of their work, might well rejoice. Not only had the language of the islands been reduced to writing, but two printing-presses were in operation at Honolulu, at which 387,000 copies in all, of twenty-two distinct books in the native tongue, had been printed, amounting to 10,287,800 pages. A large edition of the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and John, had also been printed in the United States for the mission, swelling the whole number of pages in the Hawaiian language to 13,632,800. Most of these pages were portions of the Scriptures, or other strictly evangelical and most important matter. Nine hundred native schools, for teaching the people to read, were in operation, and about 45,000 scholars, about 21,000 readers, and more than 3,000 writers, were reported. The government had adopted the moral law of God as the basis of its future administration, and recognized the Christian religion as the religion of the nation. Most of the higher chiefs and rulers were members of the church of Christ. Special laws against the grosser vices, and also against retailing ardent spirits, Sabbath breaking, and gambling, had been enacted and were enforced, and the Christian law of marriage was the law of the land. Decent houses for public worship had been erected by the chiefs and people in very many villages. Those at the several mission stations were large: one at Kailua, 180 feet by 78, and one at Honolulu, 196 by 63. At Lahaina, the church was of stone, 98 feet long and 62 broad, with galleries; "the most substantial and noble structure in Polynesia." It would seat 3000 persons after the native manner. The other churches were all thatched buildings. In these houses large congregations assembled from Sabbath to Sabbath, or when the missionary could attend, to listen to the preaching of the Gospel. Churches had been gathered at different stations, to which there had been admitted 185 native members at the close of the year 1829.

There were now connected with the mission, 11 ordained missionaries with 3 male and 16 female associate laborers from the United States. Six stations were occupied, three on Hawaii, one on Maui, one on Oahu, and one on Kauai. A third reinforcement was about to join the mission.

Death of Kaahumanu.—Reaction against Religion.—In 1827, the mission mourned the death of Kalanimoku, the prime-minister of Kaahumanu, often spoken of as joint regent with her, whom foreigners called Pitt, and whom the natives regarded as the "iron cable" of their country. He gave satisfactory evidence of preparation for a better world. On the 5th of June, 1832, Kaahumanu also "fell asleep," and "the mission and nation mourned as for a mother." She had nominated Kinau or Kaahumanu II., a pious daughter of Kamehameha I., to be her successor, as regent, and had given affectionate and earnest parting counsels to the young king. For a time sad reverses followed her death. Kinau, though a consistent Christian, had neither the dignity, the strength of character, nor the influence of Kaahumanu, and the king, inclined to dissipation and led on by vicious foreigners, broke over all restraints. Others followed his example. Many schools were deserted; teachers relapsed into vice; congregations on the Sabbath were reduced; some churches were burned; in a few places heathen rites were revived, and opposing foreigners predicted that the missionaries would soon be banished. Early in 1833, the king assembled the chiefs and people at Honolulu, and declared the regency at an end. It had been said that he would remove Kinau from all authority, and appoint Liliha, the unprincipled wife of Boki, as his premier. This was hoped for and expected by the dissolute, but when the time came he shrunk from such a step and named Kinau. When asked by his companions why he had not done as he intended, his significant reply was, "Very strong is the kingdom of God." The reverse had long been expected by the missionaries, for religion had been too popular, and sustained too much by the influence of the chiefs; but the crisis was already passed when the king named Kinau as his principal agent, and the reaction in favor of vice and idolatry was but temporary and more apparent than real.

Progress.—Schools.—Additions continued to be made to the mission churches from year to year, and that great care was exercised in receiving members must be obvious from the fact, taken in connection with the character of the people, that in 1835, of the whole number who had been received from the beginning (864) only 13 had been excommunicated, and that though the year of reaction had passed.

The character of the first native schools at the islands has been already spoken of. The missionaries soon felt the great importance of raising the qualifications of teachers, and as early as 1830 commenced schools in various places for this purpose, which were instructed by themselves, or by females from the United States. In 1831, a seminary was commenced at Lahainaluna (Upper Lahaina) for the education of teachers and other helpers in the missionary work. The school was first opened in a mere shed made of poles and grass, but under the direction of the teacher, Mr. Andrews, the scholars, most of whom were adults, soon began the erection of a stone house, which was covered with a thatched roof in 1832. The school prospered, and its importance became more and more obvious. Another teacher was associated with Mr. Andrews in 1834, and about the same time a large permanent building was commenced. In 1836 the school became more distinctively a boarding school for unmarried lads, and it has now, for many years, been regarded as one of the most important of the means in operation for supplying the Sandwich Islands with educated teachers and an educated native ministry, "sending out streams of the best influence to every part of the nation." In 1849, the support of this seminary was assumed by the government of the islands.

A female seminary was commenced at Wailuku, on Maui, in 1837, and a boarding school for boys, at Hilo, on Hawaii, in 1839, for both of which commodious buildings have been erected. Quite a number of other boarding and high schools of similar character, some for boys and some for girls, have been in operation at the islands, accomplishing much good. In 1839, a family school for young chiefs was opened at Honolulu, which has been attended with much success. The expenses of this institution have been paid by the government for the last ten years. A school for the education of the children of the missionaries was commenced at Punahau, on Oahu, in 1841, which has recently received a charter from the government as a collegiate institution. By these various seminaries and select schools much has been done to bring forward native teachers, who are in good measure fitted for their work, and the character of the schools has greatly improved. The government of the island has assumed the support and superintendence of the common schools. In 1840, laws were enacted requiring parents to send their children to school, and providing for the erection of school houses, and the support of native teachers. These laws have since been revised, and increased efficiency has been given to the school system. In 1846, Mr. Richards was appointed minister of public instruction, and after his death, Mr. Armstrong, who had been long connected with the mission, was induced, by the earnest solicitation of the government, to take the same office. In no country probably are the children more universally collected into schools. The government expends near $50,000 annually for purposes of education; of which between $25,000 and $30,000 is for the support of common schools.

The Press—Churches—Great Revival.—The first newspaper ever issued at the islands was printed in February, 1834, at the Lahainaluna Seminary, "The Hawaiian Luminary." This was designed especially for the members of the seminary, but a semi-monthly paper designed for general circulation, "The Hawaiian Teacher," was commenced soon after at Honolulu, and in 1836, 3,000 copies were circulated. In 1847, five periodicals were published at the islands. Several printing-presses and a bindery are now in operation, and most of the workmen are natives. From the commencement, near 200,000,000 of pages have been printed at the mission presses. "Besides the Bible and a hymn-book, no mean library has been translated and composed, consisting of religious, scientific and literary books of various kinds."

As early as 1836, it began to be manifest that the churches were fully recovering from the depressing influence of the reaction which followed the death of Kaahumanu. At most of the stations there were tokens of the special presence of the Holy Spirit. In June, 1837, there were 15 churches on the islands, with 1,049 members in good standing, and during the remainder of the year admissions were numerous. The churches were gaining strength and influence; there was increasing preparation of mind among the people at large to listen to preaching, and to feel the force of truth, and about the close of the year it seemed obvious that the time had come for greater triumphs of the Gospel than had yet been witnessed. The labors of the missionaries, particularly in the way of preaching, were increased, as increasing feeling among the people called for more effort, and at the general meeting of the mission in June, 1848, it was found that religion had been revived at every station; about 5,000 persons giving evidence of true conversion, had been added to the churches since the last meeting, about 2,400 then stood propounded for admission, and many others were giving evidence of a change of heart. The work continued,—a great work of the Spirit of God,—and during the next twelve months more than 10,000 persons were added to the number of the professing followers of Christ. In June, 1840, there were 19 churches, with 18,451 members in regular standing.

To suppose that all those who had been brought during the progress of this "great awakening" to give, for a time, satisfactory evidence of a saving change, would continue to give such evidence, would be to expect far more from the ignorant and degraded natives of these islands than is ever realized in the most enlightened Christian nations. In most cases the missionaries were very cautious, and candidates for church fellowship were kept many months on probation. Some indeed, were probably too cautious; but some others erred upon the other extreme, and at some stations there began to be experienced, in 1839, something of the reaction which usually follows high excitement. It is remarkable, however, that, if we except one church to which the additions were very numerous, it has been found necessary to exclude so few of the thousands who were received as the fruits of this revival. It is also remarkable that no year has passed from that time to this, during which there have not been large additions to the churches, on profession; very few years in which the number thus added has not considerably exceeded 1,000. Up to June, 1853, the whole number of those who had been admitted to the churches, on examination, from the origin of the mission, was 38,544. Of these 11,782 had deceased. The number then in regular standing was 22,236, more than one-fourth part of the whole population of the islands.

Benevolence.—From the very commencement of the mission the chiefs and people have been accustomed to make efforts to provide houses of worship and school houses, and sometimes also for other purposes; and as the churches have increased, as civilization has advanced, and the people have begun to rise from their utter poverty, their benevolent efforts have greatly increased. With the great revival in 1838 and '39 there came an increase of effort worthy of notice. At the general meeting in 1839, mention was made of four large stone churches in process of erection at as many different stations. Contributions in money to the amount of more than 8,000 were reported, mostly for building churches and school houses. Four churches had contributed towards the support of their missionary pastors. In 1844, the subject of fully supporting their own pastors began to be agitated, and at least two of the churches resolved to undertake the work at once. Contributions to different benevolent societies commenced early, and have been greatly increased. In 1851, the whole amount of contributions reported for different objects was $21,211, of which $5,608 was for the support of pastors, and $2,838 for the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. In 1852, contributions to the Hawaiian Missionary Society, now an independent body, amounted to $4,981; and contributions to all objects exceeded $24,000. May it not be said that "their deep poverty" hath "abounded unto the riches of their liberality?"

The importance of raising up a native ministry for the churches has long been felt by the missionaries, and has been urged upon their attention by the officers of the American Board. But they have been cautious, fearing to "lay hands suddenly" on those who might not prove "faithful men." In 1842, there were but two regularly licensed native preachers, with one other, who, though not yet licensed, was entirely devoted to the work of preaching. A very considerable number, however, were employed in different villages, as a subordinate class of religious teachers. The first instance of the ordination of a native as the pastor of one of the churches, occurred in December, 1849. In 1850, two others were ordained; there were five other fully licensed native preachers, and quite a number who had a qualified license to preach at out-stations.

Civilization — Government — Laws.—The Christianization of the Hawaiians has advanced more rapidly than their civilization and refinement, and school education more rapidly than a knowledge of the mechanic arts. Those, however, who saw the islanders as they were in 1820, see now an advance in civilization which is truly wonderful; and Christianity and common schools have laid the foundation for a rapid advance in future.

In 1838, the king and chiefs having endeavored in vain to procure from the United States some suitable person of legal attainments to become their adviser, requested Mr. Richards to become their teacher in the science of government and laws, their chaplain, and their interpreter in intercourse with foreigners. He and his brethren thought it his duty to comply with the request. Up to this time, the government was an absolute despotism. The chiefs were still the sole proprietors of the soil, and the people were virtually their slaves, though some laws had been published, and the administration of the government had been greatly meliorated. In 1839, the first code of written laws was published, prepared wholly by a native. In 1840, a constitution was adopted, and a new code of laws soon took the place of the first. Of their own accord, a king and chiefs, who were absolute hereditary despots, had now set limits to their own power, and given constitutional liberty to their subjects, for their good. In 1846, the different departments of the general government were fully organized, and the organization of the judiciary soon followed. The legislative power is vested in a house of nobles, mostly hereditary, and a house of representatives, elected by the people. Substantial court houses and prisons are being erected in different districts. Honolulu has its "noble custom house," its "costly court house," and its "splendid and convenient market house." Roads and bridges are in process of construction in every part of the islands, for building which the people are all taxed. And most important of all, perhaps, the people are rapidly becoming owners of the soil they cultivate, a commission having been appointed several years since to investigate claims and give titles, which "are not to be disturbed or questioned," and which "are intended to be as perfect and independent titles to the soil as are enjoyed by the citizens of any country in the world."

The laws are not a dead letter. Very soon after they were first published, a high chief murdered his wife. It was at once predicted that justice would not reach one of such rank; but, to the surprise of foreigners and the astonishment of the common people, the chief was hung. Mr. Lee, the present chief-justice of the Islands, testifies that now "in no part of the world are life and property more safe." Yet, a few years since, this was a nation of thieves, robbers, and murderers.

Seizure of the Islands by Lord George Paulet—Independence acknowledged.—Record must be made of one more gross act of aggression upon the rights of the Sandwich Islands government and people. In February, 1843, Her Britannic Majesty's ship Carysfort came to Honolulu. The commander, Lord George Paulet, at once opened a correspondence with the king, conducted, on his part, in a style of shameless insolence, in which, pretending to seek protection for British subjects, and to support the position of Mr. Simpson, to whom Mr. Charlton, now going to England, had delegated the functions of British Consul, he made demands which could not be complied with, under threat of an immediate bombardment of the town. The king, having no alternative, surrendered the government of the Islands, provisionally, to Lord Paulet, at the same time protesting against the justice of his demands, and appealing to the British Government, to which he had already sent ministers, for redress. A commission was appointed for the provisional administration of the government, which proceeded at once to abrogate some of the most important laws, and, among others, that against fornication. The government was in the hands of this commission for five months, and they were months, at Honolulu, of vice and sorrow. In July, 1843, Rear-Admiral Thomas, commander-in-chief of the British forces in the Pacific, having learned what had been done, came to Honolulu, and at once restored the sovereignty to the king. The English government, also, on learning the proceedings of Lord Paulet, promptly disavowed having authorized them, or giving them any sanction.

Previous to these transactions, the king had sent Mr. Richards and Haalilio, as commissioners, with full powers, to the United States and different European governments. They secured an acknowledgment of the independence of the Islands by the United States, Great Britain, France, and Belgium. As has been previously mentioned, important treaties were negotiated with England and France in 1846, and in 1850 the United States government entered into a treaty with the Islands on a more liberal scale than any which the Hawaiian government had been before able to negotiate with leading Christian nations.

Decrease of Population.—It is a painful fact that the native population of these Islands is still diminishing. The reasons for this are perhaps in part inexplicable, or at least not now understood; but doubtless a vitiated national constitution, the fearful consequence of disease introduced by the vices of foreign visitors, long before the introduction of Christianity, has been a prominent cause. For many years, deaths were many, and births few. Other causes are to be found in the fact that there is neither sufficient intelligence, nor sufficient preparation in the way of home comforts, among the people, to enable them to contend successfully with contagious and epidemic, or other violent diseases now from time to time introduced from abroad. In 1848-9, measles and whooping cough, followed by diarrhoea and influenza, passed over the Islands with fearful fatality, carrying away about one-twelfth part of the whole people. A census taken in 1850, showed the population to be only about 84,000. Recently, the small-pox has proved very fatal in some districts, but its ravages have not been like those of the measles. (See Report, 1849, p. 187.)

The Mission dissolved.—The missions of the American Board, as other foreign missions, are never regarded as permanent institutions. They are established and conducted with reference to a definite end; to plant the institutions of the Gospel, and to Christianize the people, and prepare them to support, themselves, Christian institutions. The Hawaiian nation has been Christianized. Much remains to be accomplished for the more full civilization of the people, and to bring them to a higher state of intellectual and social as well as religious cultivation; but it is a Christian people. One-fourth part of the whole people are members of Protestant Christian churches; and the first article of the national constitution, adopted by the chiefs in 1840, declares that all the laws of the Islands shall be in consistency with God's law.

In July, 1848, the Prudential Committee, of the American Board addressed a long communication to the mission, designed to bring about changes in the constitution of the mission, and its ultimate separation from the Board; and thus a change in the mode of affording needed assistance to the native churches, and to educational institutions adapted to the changed circumstances of the people, while yet the continued residence of the missionaries and of their families at the islands should be secured. In accordance with propositions made, some of the missionaries very soon took a release from their full connection with the Board; others have from time to time been doing the same, and at the meeting of the mission in May, 1853, the transition was completed, and the mission was merged in the Christian community of the Islands. Its organization as a mission, under the direction of the Board, was dissolved.

Much assistance must doubtless be rendered, still, to this new and poor Christian community; but the churches at the Islands are put forward to the leading position, and are to take the leading responsibility in supporting the Gospel institutions. It is expected that they will erect their own church edifices, and support native pastors; and aid furnished in the support of foreign pastors,—when this is necessary,—will be given on the Home Missionary plan of making up deficiencies, after the churches have done, individually, what they can. The Hawaiian Missionary Society has become an independent body, but will act to some extent as a disbursing agent for the board. Various other benevolent societies have been organized at the Islands, yet the pecuniary means for accomplishing what is done for the newer sections of our own land by Education, College, Tract, and other benevolent institutions, must obviously be furnished in good measure still from the United States.

Substantially, the appropriate work of a Foreign Missionary Society at the Sandwich Islands has been done. A new nation has been born into the family of Christian nations. To bring about this "intellectual, moral, religious, and social new creation of the Hawaiian nation," the American Board has expended $817,383; the American Bible Society, $41,500; and the American Tract Society, $23,800: in all, $882,683:—less than it costs to build one line-of-battle ship, and keep it in service for a single year.

The number of laborers, male and female, sent to the Sandwich Islands by the Board, is 145:—42 ministers, 7 physicians, 20 lay helpers, and 76 females. Of these, 27 ministers, 3 physicians, 9 of the other lay helpers, and 42 females, are now at the Islands.

Teachers sent to the Marquesas Islands.—Some account of what has been done at the Sandwich Islands in connection with the mission to Micronesia, will be found in the account of the "Micronesian Mission;" but some notice should be taken here of a mission to the Marquesas Islands. In March, 1853, Matunui, the principal chief of Fatuhiva, one of the southern islands of the Marquesas group, came in a whale-ship to Lahaina, accompanied by a son-in-law, who was a native of the Sandwich Islands. He had come thousands of miles to obtain missionaries to teach him and his people the word of God. Desiring a white missionary if he could be had, he would yet greatly prefer Hawaiian teachers to none, and was affectingly urgent to obtain those who would return with him at an early day. "We have," said he, "nothing but war, war, war —fear, trouble, and poverty. We are tired of living so, and wish to be as you are here." The case awakened much interest among the churches; Hawaiian pastors and teachers offered themselves for the service; the people were willing contributors to provide for their outfit and support, and on the 16th of June, two native pastors and two deacons, with their wives, sailed for the Marquesas, in a brig chartered for the purpose, at an expense of $2,000. They were accompanied by Rev. R. W. Parker, who would give them advice and assistance in commencing their work, and then return to the Sandwich Islands. They reached Fatuhiva, (usually called Magdalena on the charts,) on the 26th of August, and were "received with much joy by the natives." Only five days after their arrival, a French brig, which had sailed from Tahiti while they were detained at that island, anchored in the harbor, and a Catholic priest landed. The captain of the brig, and the priest, in a long interview with Matunui and other chiefs, claimed the islands as the possessions of the French, and demanded that the Protestant teachers should be sent back to the Sandwich Islands. The chiefs, however, insisted that the land was theirs, and that the Protestants must remain; they wanted them, and not the Papists. After a few days, the brig left, taking the priest, but leaving two Hawaiian Catholic teachers, with the promise that in a few months a French priest would come to remain. The Protestant missionaries were soon established in a house belonging to Matunui, and engaged in their work. Papal, and probably French, opposition is to be expected; but it may be hoped that God has good things in store for a mission commenced under circumstances so remarkable.—See Reports and Publications of the American Board; Jarvis's, Dibble's, and Bingham's Histories, and Hunt's "Past and Present" of the Sandwich Islands.—REV. I. R. WORCESTER.

AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.—Rev. Mr. Green, who was originally a missionary of the Board, has been, for a number of years, connected with the American Missionary Association. He has under his care two churches, one at Makawao, and the other at Keokea, the latter having a native pastor, David Malo. Mr. Green has also three or four native helpers. The whole number of members in these churches is 750, residing at various places within an extensive district, and having a number of different places of meeting. The Committee say, in their last report: "The indications of progress are very encouraging. More than one hundred and eighty members have been added to the church in Mr. Green's field. The interest of his people in behalf of the conversion of the world and the relief of the enslaved is maintained, and, in general, the members of the church, are diligent and attentive readers of the Bible."

Present Condition and Future Prospects of the Missionary Work in the Sandwich Islands—Letter from Rev. Titus Coan.—The following letter, addressed to the author, by the pastor of the largest church in the world, giving his impressions of the state of things in this most remarkable field, cannot fail of being read with deep interest:

HILO, HAWAII, April 17, 1854.

My Dear Brother:—You ask my impressions concerning the present condition and future prospects of the missionary work at the Sandwich Islands. It is impossible to do justice to the subject in one brief letter; but allow me to say, that I believe the Gospel has effected a signal triumph on these shores. Savagism has fled before it, never to return. Idola- try, in its grossest forms, has fallen, never to rise again. Ignorance and superstition have fled apace before its rising light. Not that the people are remarkable for intelligence and wisdom; but they have made progress. They are not where they were 35 years ago. Most of them can read and write, and what is more, their minds have been imperceptibly expanded by the silent and constant influx of ideas from a world opening and moving around them. Like the man ascending the mountain, their horizon is extending at every step. The comforts and improvements of civilization are multiplying here. All men with eyes can see this, and all men of candor confess it. Social relations are better understood, and social obligations more faithfully discharged than in former days. Not that we are perfect, or near it; but we can report progress. The nation has experienced a great civil revolution, a political emancipation, and this without rebellion and without blood. Calmly, silently, but with the energy of light, the Gospel has undermined, overthrown, and melted the ancient despotism, and the temple of freedom is now rising on its ruins. Instead of the capricious, the selfish, the irresponsible, the crushing will of despots, we now have constitutional laws, the elective franchise recognized, prerogatives limited, rights defined, and life, limb, liberty, character, and the fruits of physical and mental toil protected.

External morality is also more generally practiced here than in most nations, or perhaps, any nation. No where on earth are life and property more secure. No where may the people sleep with open doors, by the wayside, or in the forests, with more safety than here. No where may the traveler with more impunity encamp where night overtakes him, lay his purse by his side, hang his watch on a tree, and commit himself to sleep. Natives often hang calabashes of food, fish, clothing, and other things on the limb of a tree by the wayside, and leave them thus for days or weeks, until they return from an excursion. Open crimes are of rare occurrence here. They increase, however, as a certain class of white men are introduced.

As to "pure and undefiled religion" among the people, we would speak with modesty. God only knows the heart. Our enemies say that in this, as in all good, we have signally failed. We are sure that the word of God has not been without effect—that it has not returned void—that those who have sown in tears have not reaped in sadness—that those who have fought with spiritual weapons have not beat the air. It is our joy, and a part of our reward, to believe that many of the poor sons and daughters of Hawaii have been prepared unto glory; that they now sing with the re deemed in heaven; and that many now with us are following in the steps of those who through faith and patience, now inherit the promises. This we believe, because God's word and the fruits we see, warrant such confidence. How many, or what proportion of our church members are the true seed of Abraham, we do not even conjecture. This we leave for the disclosures of the final day. That all of our converts are weak and child-like, we confess; while at the same time we feel that many of them are better than ourselves. We do not boast that in any one thing we have attained or are perfect, but we follow after. We are toiling up the hill, and we may say, with all our defects—and they are many—that no savage tribe ever went so fast and so far, in 35 years, as the Hawaiians. And the Gospel is the efficient cause. Not that we overlook or undervalue collateral agencies. These have been many. One class of facts has had a happy influence in helping to elevate and to bless this people, while another class has been decidedly antagonistical. For whatever good has been done, let God be praised.

As to the future prospects of our islands, what shall we say? Here, of course, our knowledge is at fault. Our missionary operations are now in a transition state. As in other respects, so also in this, old things are passing away, and all things are becoming new. The islands are adopted into the great fraternity of Christian nations. Henceforth we are no longer to be known as foreign missionaries. Many of us are already receiving our full support from the churches over whom we are pastors. Others receive support in part, the lack being supplied from foreign sources. For years to come we may need to call on the A. B. C. F. M., and on the Bible and Tract Societies, for special grants to aid us in our work. But these aids will be collateral. We are organizing independent institutions in the land. Our churches are settling their pastors, obtaining charters, etc. We have our Missionary, Bible, Tract, and other benevolent Societies, to draw out, collect, and scatter over many waters the beneficence of our churches. Already the relative amount of those charities does not suffer by comparison, with the gifts of more favored lands. In a word, we consider the Church of Christ as planted here, as having taken root, and as bearing fruit. And as Christ said to his disciples, that their "fruit should remain," so we say of these children of the kingdom. We are sure that the Redeemer has a church here, that it is founded on "The Rock," and that "the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." But in saying this we do not affirm the perpetuity of the Hawaiian race. This may, and probably will, become extinct. The natives are few, and in physical, mental, and moral power, feeble. Amidst the march of men, the rush and the surges of a moving world, they may be overwhelmed and lost. Fleets of merchantmen, whalemens, and warships, are scattering thousands of our vigorous young men to all the winds of heaven. Foreigners are pouring in upon us from every point of the compass. Amalgamation is fast taking place—new forms of disease have swept off thousands to the tomb. The base passions of many vile and reckless seamen, like the consuming fires of hell, are destroying many in our sea-ports who should have become the mothers and matrons of a rising race. The English language is being learned by many and coveted by most—and all things combining, indicate the absorption or extinction of the Hawaiians as a distinct race, at no distant day. Let it be so—still the islands will have a people, and God will have a Church here. A crisis may be at hand which will try men's souls. We shall need the prayers, the sympathies, the counsels, and the alms of the Church in older lands. The cause of education must be sustained here. We must have a college. We must have teachers and evangelical ministers—men of wise heads and holy hearts. Men of self-denial, patience, zeal, discretion, and broad philanthropy. Our work is not done. Probably our responsibilities were never so great as at the present hour. All things grow around us, and we need great faith, firmness, and wisdom, lest all good be swept away by the currents of passion and of worldly and civil policy. Our joy and our triumph are, that "The Lord reigns," and his kingdom is safe. In Christian love,

Your friend and brother,

TITUS COAN.

SARON: A station of the Rhenish Missionary Society in South Africa, near Tulbagh.

SASAC: One of the Lesser Sunda Islands, in the Indian Archipelago.

SATTAUKOOLAM: A station of the Church Missionary Society in the Tinnevely District, Hindostan.

SATARA: a city of Hindostan, and a station of the Am. Board. It is 170 miles S. E. of Bombay, and 50 miles from the western coast. It is 2,320 miles above the level of the sea, and its position is singularly beautiful. The population of the city is 32,000. It was occupied as a station of the Bombay mission till 1848, when it became a distinct mission.

SAVAII: One of the Samoan Islands, on which the London Missionary Society have four stations.

SAVAGE ISLAND: One of the Friendly Islands, situated about 130 miles from Kappel's Island. It is a cinder island, produced by volcanic action. It is a remote island, the landing dangerous. The London Missionary Society have a station here, in charge of native teachers. It has six chapels, one of which is wholly built from the bread-fruit tree.

SCHEPPMANNSDORF: A station of the Rhenish Missionary Society in Namaqualand, South Africa, at Whale Bay.

SEAMEN: The subjects of inquiry here are three, viz.: 1. The number of persons employed. 2. The origin and progress of missionary efforts among them. 3. The results.—In ascertaining the number of persons employed in connection with navigation both on the sea and on the interior waters, there will necessarily be a degree of uncertainty, as a part of it cannot be known with precision, there being no documents in existence to point it out, and an estimate is all that we can obtain. But in other cases there are authentic documents, on which we may safely rely. This is the fact in relation to British and American seamen. From the latest document which could be consulted, it is found that there are about 30,000 registered vessels in Great Britain, the measured burthen of which is about 3,000,000 of tons. These vessels are manned by about 170,000 sailors. To these there should be added about 40,000, who are always in port looking for ships, and between 50,000 and 60,000 engaged in the fisheries, and nearly 40,000 more in the Royal navy, making in all of British sailors about 300,000. The number of American seamen is correctly stated in the last annual reports made to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury, and by the Secretary of the Navy. They are as follows: The measured burthen of American vessels in the foreign trade is 3,230,590 tons, and the number of their crews is 117,043. The measured burthen of vessels in the coasting trade is 2,008,021 tons, and the estimated number of men in them is about one hundred thousand. This is an estimate based on the tonnage. It includes the vessels on the lakes and rivers in the western country, steamers as well as sail vessels. The measured burthen of the vessels engaged in the fisheries is 175,205 tons, carrying about 22,000 men, making in all of American seamen in the foreign and coasting trade, and the fisheries, 239,000 souls. And when we add to these not far from ten thousand seamen in our national vessels, we shall have a total of not less than two hundred and fifty thousand men in American vessels for whose salvation we should labor. The seamen of Russia, Sweden, Denmark, the Dutch and German States, of France, Spain, and Portugal, are probably nearly or quite double the number found in Great Britain and America. Looking now up the Mediterranean on the African coast, and away to the eastern Archipelago, and thence to Turkey and the Grecian Islands, we shall encounter a multitude of seafaring men; and then looking across the Atlantic to the South American coast, both on its eastern and western shores, we shall find multitudes more, not yet counted, to be added to those already estimated. And when we turn eastward again, and passing the Cape of Good Hope, stretch away toward India, and China, and the eastern Islands, an almost innumerable multitude of seafaring men are found thronging the native vessels which fill those seas. Putting the whole together, not much short of three millions of men will be found floating upon the waters for whose salvation every effort should be made. We turn now,

2. To the origin and progress of missionary efforts among seamen.—The first effort known to have been made to benefit seamen as a distinct class of men, took place in London, in the year 1814, and under the following circumstances: At an evening meeting, a stranger was observed to enter the assembly, and to sit weeping bitterly during the sermon. When the service was closed, a pious man, who had observed him, followed him out, and asked him who he was. He said he was a sailor, belonging to a collier vessel, which then lay among others in the Thames. On farther inquiry it was ascertained that there were a few other seamen belonging to those vessels who were also serious minded men, and who were accustomed to meet together occasionally and pray. A few pious men from the shore sought opportunity to visit those vessels, and hold prayer-meetings on board, until it became a common thing, and as an appropriate name, they called them "Bethel meetings," and a flag was prepared to designate the vessel where the meeting was held, which they denominated the "Bethel Flag." It was a piece of blue bunting, bearing the word "Bethel" in white letters, having over it a star, and under it a dove bearing an olive branch. After about two years, preaching was added, either on ship board, or in a chapel near the water, and the commencement of this was at London and New York, at about the same time, yet without any concert of action. It was in the year 1816, when the Rev. Ward Stafford was laboring in New York as a city missionary, and carrying the Gospel to the destitute as he could find them. In prosecuting this work he placed his eye on the sailors, some thousands of whom were visiting the port of New York every year, and procuring a school room, he commenced preaching to them. The Mariner's Church in New York grew out of this effort. In 1818, a similar meeting was opened in Boston, by the Rev. Dr. Jenks, and in the following year, 1819, the Rev. Mr. Eastburn commenced a meeting for seamen in Philadelphia. Efforts of the same kind have been made in other places, and regular meetings have been established in Portland, Baltimore, Richmond, Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, and New Orleans. In some of the larger ports, different denominations have embarked in the cause, and are carrying on the work, each under their own flag, but harmoniously as against a common enemy. Thus in Great Britain and the United States, all the large ports are provided with mariners' churches, and the work of promoting religion among seamen is very judiciously carried on, under the patronage of local societies.

About the year 1831, an advance was made in this work by extending it to the inland waters, and after various efforts to establish Bethel meetings at some of the more important places on the line of the canals, rivers, and lakes of the western country, a large meeting was held at Syracuse, N. Y., Aug. 11, 1833, which resulted in the formation of the "Boatmen's Friend Society." Several local societies had been previously formed, which, to some extent, were now merged in this. After a year or two of rather declining operations, a convention of the friends of the cause was held at Buffalo, in June, 1836, when the "American Bethel Society" was formed, which took charge of most, if not all of the Bethel operations on the western waters.

The friends of seamen in the United States having seen the permanent establishment of mariners' churches in most of the large ports on the Atlantic coast, and having labored successfully in this department for about ten years, began to consider the condition of seamen in foreign ports, and the importance of providing the preaching of the Gospel for them there. This led to the establishment of the "American Seamen's Friend Society," in 1827, the grand object of which is to provide and sustain chaplains for seamen in every large foreign port, where an open door can be found. In the prosecution of this work that society has stationed chaplains at Canton, Havre, Marseilles, Smyrna, Cronstadt, Stockholm, Gottenburg, Rio Janeiro, Sandwich Islands, San Francisco, Havana, and some other smaller ports, most of which remain to the present time.

The friends of seamen in Great Britain, through a general organization styled "The British and Foreign Sailors' Society," has accomplished much for the benefit of seamen in their own ports, though, as yet, but little abroad. Such is a brief outline of the origin and progress of the missionary efforts among sailors up to the present day. These efforts have involved a large outlay of money, but the precise amount cannot be stated. We turn to consider,

3. The results of these efforts.—We have no means of counting the number of pious seamen, were we so disposed. They are scattered in almost every vessel that floats upon the ocean; but as a general remark, proved by many facts, we feel safe in the assertion that the character of seamen, as a whole, is greatly improved since Bethel efforts were commenced; and many vessels are now found where the Sabbath is strictly observed, and daily prayer is maintained; things almost unknown in former days. Temperance has gained ground among sailors, since the efforts for their benefit commenced, quite as fast if not faster than among landmen. Forty years ago it was thought wholly impracticable to manage a vessel without ardent spirits, and merchants would almost as soon have thought of sending their ships to sea without bread as without rum. But that day has passed, and a large proportion of vessels are now manned on temperance principles, and "no rum," is put forward to a prominent place on the shipping paper. Marine temperance societies are common in every port, bearing the names of many thousands of pledged men, both officers and common sailors. The immediate and very natural result of temperance in seamen is frugality, and a careful saving of their hard earnings; and an investigation of the various Seamen's Savings Banks, which are founded in every large port, shows us that immense sums have been there deposited by sailors for use in future life. We have thus briefly hinted at the several subjects of inquiry respecting seamen. The details may be found in the twenty-five annual reports of the American Seamen's Friend Society; the annual reports of the American Bethel Society; the twenty-five volumes of the Sailors' Magazine; the annual reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, relating to commerce; the annual reports of the Secretary of the Navy; the annual reports of the British and Foreign Sailors' Society; "Britannia," by the Rev. John Harris; the "Retrospect," by Rev. R. Marks; publications of Rev. G. C. Smith, Rev. William Scoresby, and others.—REV. J. GREENLEAF.

SEIR: A village near Oroomiah, Persia, where the seminaries of the mission of the American Board are located.

SERAMPORE: Formerly a Danish settlement, in the province of Bengal, situated on the west side of the Hooghly river, about 12 miles above Calcutta. Population 15,000. For many years, the principal station of the English Baptists in Bengal.

SEROOR: In Hindostan, 28 miles southwest from Ahmednuggur. Pop. 6,500. Became a station of the American Board in 1841.

SETTRA KROO: A station of the American Presbyterian General Assembly's Board on the western coast of Africa, about half way between Cape Palmos and Monrovia.

SEVAGUNGA: A station of the American Board in Southern Hindostan, 25 miles east of Madura, and connected with that mission.

SEYCHELLES: A cluster of small islands, which lie nearly north from Madagascar. They are high and rocky, and little fitted for any culture except cotton. Population 4,000. They are famous for the production of a palm not known in any other part of the world. A station of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel.

SHALONG POINT: A station of the American Board in Micronesia, on Taman Island, a small island in the mouth of Metelim Harbor, Ascension Island.

SHANGHAI: A city in China, in latitude $31^{\circ} 10'$ north and longitude $121^{\circ} 30'$ east, on the Wosung river, about 14 miles from its mouth. (See China.)

SHAWANOE: A town in the Indian Territory, and the seat of a mission of the American Baptist Union for the Shawanoe and other tribes.

SHEIKH: (pronounced Shehh or Shuhh) means literally an old man, but besides being used in that sense it is also employed as a prefix to the names of respectable heads of families like our "Mr." Somewhat like our M. A. it is applied to schoolmasters and learned men. It is also the title of the heads of the Mohammedan sects as the Hhanafees, Malikees, &c. But among the Bedaween it denotes the head of the tribe, and where several Sheikhs unite together for greater security, they choose a chief from among themselves who is called Sheikh el k'bir or Sheikh el Shoyukh. Sheikh el Islam is one of the titles of the Grand Mufti of Constantinople, who is the President of the College of the Ulema, or professors of Mohammedan Law. Shiekh is also the name of one of the orders of priesthood among the Yezidees, and has a like religious meaning among the Druzes.

SHILOH: Station of the United Brethren in South Africa, on the Klipplaat river, among the Tambookies and Hottentots.

SHWAYDOUNG: A town in Burmah near Prome, and the seat of the Prome mission of the American Baptist Union. It is one of the principal centres of Burman education and religion, and has been styled the "Oxford of Burmah."

SHWAYGYEEN: A city in Southern Burmah, at the junction of the Shwaygyeen and Sitang rivers. It is the seat of a mission of the American Baptist Union.

SIAM: Siam is a long, narrow country, lying between Burmah and Cochin-China, and extending from the Gulf of Siam to the borders of China. It is watered by several rivers and by numerous canals; and as the soil is generally quite fertile, it is capable of supporting a large population. Having been distracted by wars, however, until within comparatively a modern period, the actual number of inhabitants is estimated at not more than from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000. Of these some hundred thousands are Chinese, and there are many Peguans, Burmese, Shans, &c. This diversity among the inhabitants imparts the greater interest to Siam as a sphere of missionary labor. Some races may be reached here who cannot be visited in their own lands. Numerous Chinese, for instance, from the island of Hainan, are now living in Bangkok, who keep up a constant intercourse with their own country; and through whom a Christian influence might readily be exerted on the 1,500,000 inhabitants of that island.

In Siam the inhabitants live chiefly on the banks of rivers and canals,—a circumstance worthy of being noted, as it renders them easily accessible by missionaries in boats—the common mode of traveling. The principal city is Bangkok, of which the population is estimated at 300,000; it is situated on the Meinam, about twenty-five miles from its mouth. The people of this country are hardly inferior in civilization to other nations of South-eastern Asia. They carry on various kinds of industrial occupation. Many are able to read, and schools are commonly connected with the wats, or places devoted to temples and idolatrous worship, where education is given without charge by some of the priests; yet the knowledge thus acquired by the youth is little more than that of the simplest kind.

Government.—The government of this country is a despotism. The king is chosen, however, on some basis of hereditary descent, by the principal nobles, which must give them influence in the administration of public affairs. In no other country in the East, and probably in no country in any part of the world, is the influence of the king more controlling over all the opinions and conduct of his subjects; the servility of all classes is most abject, and is fitly shown by the prostration, with the face to the ground, of even the chief men when they appear in the royal presence.

Religion.—The religion of the Siamese is Buddhism, which may be characterized as a kind of atheistical idolatry; for Budh, in his most common form, Gotama, is not supposed to take any concern in the affairs of men. (See Budhism.) It is one of the reasons for regarding Siam with special interest as a missionary field, that it is the headquarters of this widely-spread system of false religion, so far as this bad preëminence can be assigned to any country. It is a religion held here in great honor. The king is its subject; the revenues of the kingdom are to a large extent devoted to the wats, the support of priests, processions in honor of Gotama, and other religious ceremonies.

If Budh were dethroned in this country, his downfall would doubtless be felt in other parts of Asia.

MISSIONS.

PRESBYTERIAN BOARD.—The mission established by the Board in Siam was resolved upon in 1839. It was formed at first with reference to the Chinese rather than to the Siamese. The door into China was not then open, and missionary societies adopted the policy of supporting stations among the large numbers of Chinese emigrants who were found in the neighboring countries. The Rev. Robert W. Orr, one of the first missionaries to the Chinese, whose station was at Singapore, made a visit to Siam in the autumn of 1838; and upon his favorable report it was deemed expedient to form a branch of the Chinese mission at Bangkok, and also a mission to the Siamese at the same place. The Rev. William P. Buell and his wife, appointed to the latter mission, arrived at Bangkok in August, 1840. A physician and his wife were appointed to this field of labor in 1841, and a minister and his wife in 1843. They were led, however, to proceed to China instead of Siam, so that Mr. Buell was not joined by any associate. After learning the language, he was able to preach the Gospel and distribute the Holy Scriptures and other religious books, explaining them to the people. He was encouraged in his work; but in 1844 he was compelled to return to this country by the state of his wife's health.

In March, 1847, the Rev. Stephen Mattoon and his wife, and Samuel R. House, M. D., licentiate preacher, arrived at Bangkok; and in April, 1849, they were joined by the Rev. Stephen Bush and his wife. These brethren found ample employment in preaching and distributing the Scriptures and religious tracts. The medical labors of Dr. House were of the greatest benefit to large numbers of patients; while they brought many persons within the reach of the Gospel, whose attention could not otherwise have been gained; and they also tended to conciliate the confidence and good-will of persons of all classes towards the missionaries.

The year 1850 was marked by vigorous labors in preaching and tract distribution in Bangkok; by missionary tours to several distant parts of the country, which were made without hindrance, and afforded many opportunities of publishing the Gospel; by the printing at the press of another mission in Bangkok of 422,000 pages of books of Scripture history; and by faithful and successful medico-missionary practice. This year was also marked by a singular exigency in the history of the mission, which for months threatened its existence.

The missionaries had lived in houses formerly occupied by missionaries of the American Board. On relinquishing Siam as a field of labor, the American Board transferred these houses to the American Association, and it became necessary for the brethren to seek other places of abode. After long search and many disappointments, they found it impossible either to purchase or rent new quarters. The increasing bigotry of the king was the obstacle in their way. He did not openly oppose their wishes, but it was soon understood among his abject people that he was unfriendly to foreign teachers; and no man was willing to sell or lease real estate to those who at any hour might be ordered out of the kingdom. The strange issue was apparently reached, that Christian missionaries must withdraw from a heathen land, where their life and liberty were still safe, and where their labors might be carried forward in many ways, solely for the want of houses in which to live! The question had been viewed in every aspect; referred home to the Executive Committee; reconsidered after obtaining the sanction of the Committee, given fully, but with deep regret, to their removal to some new field of labor—and still the necessity for this removal appeared to be unavoidable.

Towards the end of the year matters grew worse. The teachers of the missionaries were arrested and thrown into prison, their Siamese servants left them or were taken away, and none of the people dared to hold intercourse with them on religious subjects. In the mean time prayer was offered without ceasing on their behalf, and in answer to the requests of his people, God interposed for the help of his servants,—but in a way not expected by them. The king was attacked with disease in January, 1851; and, though he had the prospect of many years of life, he was cut down by death in April.

His successor, the present king, had much intercourse with the missionaries before his accession to the throne, and he has since shown himself to be their friend. The difficulty about a site for mission premises was soon removed; suitable houses have been erected, and the work of the mission can now be prosecuted with greater freedom than at any former period.

The little company of missionaries have since been called to meet with trials of a different kind—to see their number diminished, instead of being increased. Mrs. Bush was removed by death in July, 1851. Her last days were full of Christian peace and joy, and her associates could say, that “in the full possession of all her faculties, without one cloud to separate between her and a present Saviour, she went down into the Jordan of death, singing Hallelujah, in the triumph of victory. The Siamese have lost in her a faithful, praying friend; the mission, an exemplary fellow-laborer; and her bereaved husband, an affectionate and beloved companion." The health of Mr. Bush afterwards gave way, and it became necessary for him to return to this country, in 1853, for his recovery. He has not yet become sufficiently restored to return to his field of labor.

With the single exception of the embarrassment growing out of their small number, the missionaries have reason to be much encouraged in their work and its prospects. They are permitted to preach the Gospel in stated services and by the way-side; and the Word has not been preached in vain. Besides the testimony thereby held forth for God and against idols, and the secret convictions and impressions of many hearers, which may yet result in the open confession of Christ before men, two hopeful converts have been admitted to the church. They are both Chinese, and one of them is a native of Hainan. Their walk and conversation are exemplary, and both of them are engaged in efforts to make the Gospel known unto their own people. Some progress has been made in giving the Scriptures to the Siamese in their own tongue. The New Testament and the books of Genesis and Exodus have been translated by the missionaries of other Boards; but the translation will require revision, and it may be expedient to make altogether a new translation. Mr. Mattoon's biblical scholarship and his knowledge of Siamese will enable him to perform good service in this work. Schools have been opened on the mission premises, and a small number of boarding-scholars are under daily Christian instruction. It seems to be not unlikely that a Christian element may be largely introduced into the education of Siamese youth. The distribution of the Scriptures in Bangkok and in the interior is going forward, and many of the people are not only able to read and willing to receive Christian books, but give a cordial welcome to the missionary, and have many inquiries to make about this new religion. Mrs. Mattoon and the wives of the other missionaries have been requested by the King to give instruction in English to some of the female members of his family; and they can in this way bring before persons of the highest rank—in Eastern countries commonly secluded from intercourse with foreigners—the all-important lessons of the Gospel of Christ. These engagements are still in progress, and may result in the greatest good to some of the ladies of the royal family, and by their means to many others in high and low stations. One of their pupils, a princess of amiable disposition, who had given pleasing attention to the instructions of the missionary teachers, was suddenly removed by death. Her serious interest in listening to the story of the cross would lead us to hope that her trust in her last hour may have been placed in Jesus.

In connection with this brief sketch of missionary labors, the character of the present King of Siam should be taken into consideration. He is a Buddhist in his religious profession; and he is an absolute monarch. He might on any day banish every missionary from his kingdom. The Church must ever remember that her dependence is not on the kings of the earth, but on the God of heaven. This being deeply felt, it is still allowable to survey things future in the light of present providences. Now he who, contrary to human expectation, has been elevated to the throne of Siam, possesses a considerable degree of Christian knowledge. He is a much more enlightened and liberal man than his predecessor. He has learnt the English language. He has paid some attention to the history of our country, probably led to this by his acquaintance with American missionaries, and he is a warm admirer of Washington. He is disposed to adopt the improvements of western civilization. He has under consideration the opening of a ship-canal to connect the Gulf of Siam with the Bay of Bengal—a measure which would prove greatly favorable to commerce between India and China, and would bring his hitherto secluded country out upon one of the highways of the world. He is surrounded by the priests of Budh, but Christian ministers are living at his capital, and their wives are giving lessons of Christian truth in his palace. Reasons of state policy may commend Buddhism to his pride, but the Spirit of God may easily constrain his heart to bow unto Him who is the King of kings and the Lord of lords. The influence of the king and court in Siam, is almost unbounded, especially in religious matters. If the king should embrace Christianity, a large part of his subjects would follow his example. They are in some degree prepared for this, by their acquaintance with the general truths of the Christian religion; the circulation of the Scriptures and Christian books, and other labors of the missionaries, have been the means of widely disseminating a knowledge of the Gospel. It is, therefore, in the power of one man, not only to make his own reign an era in the history of his country, but to lead his people from the wat to the church—from a miserable paganism to the profession of Christianity; and if the Spirit of the Lord were poured out from on high, we might soon see in Siam "a nation born in a day." "The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord; as the rivers of water, he turneth it whithersoever he will."—Lowrie's Manual of Missions.

AMERICAN BAPTIST MISSION IN SIAM.—This mission was originally designed in part for the native Siamese, and in part for the Chinese who are found in Siam in great numbers, and who, until within a recent period, were wholly inaccessible in their own country. It was commenced in March 1833, by Rev. J. T. Jones, formerly of the mission in Burmah, who with Mrs. Jones at that time established his residence at Bangkok, the capital of the kingdom. The city had at former periods been visited by Rev. Mr. Gutzlaff, of the Basle Missionary Society, Rev. Mr. Abeel, of the American Board, and quite recently by Rev. Mr. Trumlin, of the London Missionary Society. They had, however, all abandoned the attempt to plant a mission there, and the latter on his departure had written to the missionaries in Burmah, urging them to send one of their number to Siam. It was by the appointment of his brethren of the Burman mission, that Mr. Jones first settled at Bangkok, and commenced his labors among the several races composing its diversified population, the most numerous of whom were the Chinese.

He was courteously received by the public personages to whom he became known, and in a little time his house became the resort of considerable numbers of Chinese, Burmans, and Peguans. He found the Chinese by far the most amiable and inquisitive, but he understood neither their language, nor the Siamese, and was in consequence obliged to confine his teachings and conversations to the Burman tongue, which, however, seems to have been comprehended by others than the Burman population. He baptized his first five converts in December, 1833. They were all Chinese, two of whom had been instructed by Messrs. Gutzlaff and Abeel. One of them was immediately appointed an assistant in the mission, to take charge of a school for Chinese boys, and to conduct public worship in Chinese on the Sabbath. In 1835, Mr. Jones had acquired sufficient familiarity with the language to warrant his attempting a translation of the Scriptures. He soon completed the Gospel of Matthew, and a Catechism of the New Testament, both of which he carried to Singapore to be printed by the press of the mission of the American Board established there.

When Mr. Jones removed from Rangoon to Bangkok, it was without the knowledge of the Board of Managers. They, however, were already directing their attention to that country, and not only approved the steps taken by Mr. Jones, by the advice of his associates in Burmah, but determined immediately to send additional missionaries to be united with him. Accordingly, Rev. William Dean and Mrs. Dean, were appointed by the Board in the summer of 1834, and sailing in the following September, arrived at Singapore in February, 1835, while Mr. Jones was still there engaged in printing the Gospel of Matthew. Both the missionaries remained here for several months for the purpose of studying the Chinese language; here Mrs. Dean, a few weeks after her arrival, was suddenly summoned away by death. Mr. Dean accompanied Mr. Jones to Bangkok in June, 1835, and they commenced together the labors of the mission; the former more particularly among the Chinese, and the latter among the Siamese. In December of the same year, three other Chinamen were baptized. But so strong was the appetite for opium, and so general its use among the Chinese, that several of those who had been baptized were unable to withstand the temptation, and fell away from the faith which they professed.

In March, 1836, Mr. Jones had completed the translation of the Acts of the Apostles, and went a second time to Singapore to obtain fonts of type both in Siamese and Chinese, to be used with a press which had been forwarded from America, and which was expected soon to arrive. It was while he was absent on this excursion that there arrived at Singapore, Rev. Messrs. Davenport, Reed, and Shuck, with their wives, together with the expected press, and the necessary materials for printing. Messrs. Davenport and Reed soon went with Mr. Jones to Bangkok, the former to be attached as preacher and printer to the Siamese, and the latter to be connected with Mr. Dean in the Chinese department of the mission. Mr. Shuck remained for the present in Singapore, with the intention of establishing himself ultimately either at Macao or at Canton. A printing house was immediately built at Bangkok, together with a substantial brick building for a store-house, and the press was set into immediate operation under the direction of Mr. Davenport, in printing books and tracts both in Siamese and Chinese. Mr. Dean occupied a floating house on the river, and employed himself in conversing with visitors and on Sundays in preaching to a congregation varying from thirty to fifty Chinese, while Mr. Jones was occupied with translating the Scriptures into Siamese, preparing tracts and visiting the wats or places of worship for the purpose of scattering the knowledge of the Gospel among the people. The ladies of the mission also were employed in teaching such pupils as could be induced to attend their instructions. The children, however, were in many instances forbidden by their parents to attend the schools, lest by so doing their value would be diminished in case their parents should wish to sell them as slaves.

In 1834, the mission was visited by Rev. Dr. Malcom, and its members, together with those converts who still remained faithful, were organized into a church. Three others were added soon afterwards, and the labors of the mission, particularly among the Chinese, continued to progress, until they were sadly interrupted by a series of bereavements which for a time paralyzed its energies. Mr. Reed was taken away by death, in August, 1837; Mrs. Dean had already fallen a victim to a fever; Mr. Dean was now obliged to withdraw for a period, in order to recruit his failing health; and early in 1838, Mrs. Jones, a missionary of great excellence, closed her valuable life at Bangkok. The printing arrangements proved very defective on account of the imperfection of the type, and a type-foundry was established in the summer of 1838, and at the same time a second press was added to the property of the mission. By these means the books of the New Testament, which Mr. Jones was rapidly translating, were printed in great numbers, and with these a multitude of tracts and other works prepared for circulation among the people.

In June, 1839, Rev. Messrs. Slafter and Goddard, arrived at Singapore, as a reinforcement of the mission in Siam. Mr. Slafter brought with him an additional press, and went almost immediately to Bangkok, where he became associated with Mr. Jones in the Siamese department of the mission. He speedily acquired the language, and gave great promise of usefulness, but in 1841 he fell a victim to disease before he had begun his labors as a preacher. Mr. Goddard, who was appointed to the Chinese department, remained at Singapore studying the language, until October, 1840, when he repaired to Bangkok and entered upon the duties of his post as an associate of Mr. Dean. In 1843, Mr. Chandler, a machinist and type founder connected with the mission at Maulmain, went to reside at Bangkok. He became the principal manager of the printing establishment, and immediately interested himself in introducing among the people a knowledge of the mechanic arts. Prince Momfanoi invited him to aid in building several kinds of machinery after American models, and evinced such deference for his Christian principles that he directed his laborers to abstain from work on Sunday. Much incidental good was thus accomplished, though it of course fell far short of the great objects for which the mission was established.

Notwithstanding the fact that the missionaries in Siam have encountered none of the hindrances usually interposed by the governments of oriental nations, it is also true that they have been encouraged by comparatively few religious fruits among the native Siamese. They have translated the books of the New Testament, and some of the Old, into the language of the country. They have printed and circulated very widely among the people copies of the Scriptures and of religious tracts. They have introduced the mechanic arts, and have won the favor of several of the princes and noblemen of the country, but they have not thus far succeeded in persuading the people to accept the Gospel. The native race of Siam is said to be comparatively stupid and less civilized than those of the neighboring countries. They have the Gospel, but they do not embrace it. They acknowledge the superiority of Christ's religion, but they still remain indifferent to it. Messrs. Jones and Chandler, with the interruptions of occasional absence, were for many years the principal laborers in this department of the mission. The former, though repeatedly prostrated by ill-health, on account of which he twice returned to the United States, died at Bangkok, September 13, 1851. He had been a missionary upwards of twenty years, and had passed eighteen years in Siam. He had acquired the language to a degree of unusual perfection, and had won the respect and confidence of the king and the leading public personages of the country. He had written many tracts and books in the Siamese language, and had translated the entire New Testament and parts of the Old Testament, the former of which he had just revised for the third time. These contributions to the literature of Siam will remain forever, as memorials of his well-spent and most laborious life.

In 1849 the Siamese department of the mission was strengthened by the arrival at Bangkok of Rev. Samuel G. Smith, who since the death of Mr. Jones has been the only missionary whose work was preaching the Gospel. Mrs. Jones and Miss Morse conduct schools and render such other assistance as may be in their power, while Mr. Chandler has lately returned from a visit to the United States, better supplied than ever before with the means of printing, both in Siamese and in Chinese. A few native Siamese have been converted to Christianity, and have been admitted to the Chinese church, but as has been already intimated, the spiritual results of this department of the mission, after the lapse of twenty years, in which it has not only encountered no opposition, but has been received with decided favor from the Government, appear thus far to be unusually small. It may be, however, that these have been only years of toilsome preparation, and a period of sowing the seed which shall yet spring up and yield an abundant harvest.

The Chinese department of the mission at Bangkok, however, has from the beginning been attended with far more encouraging results. It was established at a period when the Gospel was shut out from the countless population of Chinese, and was designed to accomplish for her wandering traffickers and the emigrants from her shores what could not be done for her people at home. The only church at Bangkok has been composed.

with few exceptions, of converted Chinamen, who at first learned the Scriptures through the Siamese translations of Mr. Jones. From 1840, to the removal of Mr. Dean to China in 1842, the mission was managed principally by Rev. Messrs. Dean and Goddard, and the former engaged in preparing books and tracts and the latter in translating the Scriptures, and both in preaching to the people. In 1840, the members of the church were nine in number, and each year has witnessed a gradual increase, until in 1853 they were thirty-five. In January, 1851, the mission suffered a severe loss in the destruction of its buildings, and the entire property which they contained, together with many of the personal effects of the missionaries, the whole amounting to not less than $12,000 to $15,000, a calamity from which it has not even yet fully recovered.

It has already been stated that Mr. Shuck with his family settled at Macao, a port under the jurisdiction of the Portuguese, in 1836, also for the purpose of laboring as a missionary among the Chinese. He found them, as at Bangkok, entirely accessible to the preaching of the Gospel. In 1841, Rev. Issachar J. Roberts, who had been residing for some time at Macao under the direction of a missionary society in the Western States, became associated with Mr. Shuck under the patronage of the American Baptist Missionary Union. Two or three Chinese converts have been baptized at this station, religious books and tracts have been circulated very widely among the multitudes of Chinese who frequent this mart of oriental commerce, and the missionaries were looking with the fondest hopes on the prospect that was opening before them, when in 1841 their labors for a time were wholly interrupted by the breaking out of the war between Great Britain and China, and the blockade of the port of Macao. This was continued till August 1842, when a treaty of perpetual amity was concluded, by which the island of Hongkong, at the mouth of Canton river, was ceded to England, and the five ports of Canton, Amoy, Fuhchau, Ningpo and Shanghai were opened to the commerce of Great Britain and the residence of foreigners. This most important event altered the relations of this ancient people to the rest of the human race, and effectually severed the barriers which have hitherto prevented the introduction of the Gospel to the country. So soon as the treaty was published, Messrs. Shuck and Roberts from Macao, and Mr. Dean from Bangkok, removed to China and took up their residence at Hongkong; Messrs. Dean and Shuck at the new town of Victoria, and Mr. Roberts in another part of the island at Chek-chu. Mr. Goddard remained at Bangkok prosecuting his accustomed labors among the Chinese population of that city till 1848, when he went to join the mission in China.

Meanwhile at Bangkok both departments of the mission were committed to the care of the Siamese missionaries. Two out-stations were established, one at Teng-kia-chu, and one at Bang-chang, both of which were placed under the charge of native assistants. In 1851, Rev. W. Ashmore and Mrs. Ashmore arrived at Bangkok as missionaries to the Chinese. Mr. Ashmore has now acquired the language, and is prosecuting those labors to which he was appointed. The latest reports of the mission bear witness to a somewhat more gratifying progress in both its departments. The Siamese missionaries had before been often invited to the palace of the king for the purpose of aiding the monarch and some members of the royal family in the study of English and the mechanic arts, and much incidental conversation had been held respecting the doctrines of the Gospel. These interviews, while they have been latterly declined by the missionaries, when proposed for the former objects, have become more frequent for the latter object, and have led to the establishment of a regular system of biblical instruction at the palace. The two ladies of this department of the mission, Miss Morse and Mrs. Smith, formerly Mrs. Jones, are also constantly engaged in similar teaching either at the mission school or in private. The most friendly relations are still maintained with the government, and even the Buddhist priests themselves in Siam, appear less pertinacious in their opposition to the new religion than in other countries in which Buddhism prevails. The Chinese church, which is still the only one belonging to the mission, numbers at present only twenty-six members, nine having removed to China. In addition to this, and several Siamese who have been baptized, but live away from Bangkok, there were at recent dates eight additional converts who were about to be baptized. These are all Siamese. In February, 1854, Rev. R. Telford and Mr. G. H. Chandler, the printer, with their wives, sailed from the United States for Siam; Mr. Chandler having been home on a visit for the benefit of his health, and the improvement of his arrangements for printing. Mr. Telford is appointed to the Chinese department of the mission. When they arrive at their stations the two departments will be nearly equally supplied, though neither will possess a missionary force at all adequate to the work which may be advantageously undertaken. The prospects of the mission—though prospects are often illusory—are thought to be more encouraging than at any former period. The mission is organized in one station at Bangkok, and four out-stations in the towns of the neighboring country. It embraces in the Siamese department Rev. S. G. Smith and Mr. G. H. Chandler, with their wives, and Miss Morse a teacher, and in the Chinese department Rev. Messrs. Ashmore and Telford and their wives, and four native assistants who are employed in both departments.

STATISTICS FOR 1854.

1 station, 4 out-stations, 4 missionaries, 5 female assistants; 9 missionaries and assistants; 4 native preachers and assistants; 1 church, 35 members; 2 boarding schools, 21 pupils; 2 day-schools, 20 pupils; total of schools 4, and 41 pupils.—W. GAMMELL.

AMERICAN BOARD.—Messrs. Abeel and Tomlin spent some time in Bangkok in 1831, and again Mr. Abeel in 1832. Messrs. Robinson and Johnson, with their wives, arrived July 23, 1834, and Doctor and Mrs. Bradley on the 18th of July, 1835, with a printing-press, and Siamese type. Mr. Caswell afterwards joined the mission. The missionary work was prosecuted here by the Board until 1848; but without any marked results. That year, in consequence of a change of sentiment on the part of Doctor Bradley and Mr. Caswell, a separation took place between them and the Board. And, on the matter coming up at the meeting of the Board, the discontinuance of the mission was recommended, and the Prudential Committee afterwards took action accordingly. Messrs. Bradley and Caswell were afterwards received under the care of the American Missionary Association, and the mission premises were transferred to that body. For a full account of the causes which led to these results, the reader is referred to the report of the Board and of the Association for 1848.

AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.—In October, 1849, the Association sent out Doctor Bradley, Rev. L. B. Lane, M. D., Prof. J. Silsby, with their wives, who in due time arrived at Bangkok, and entered upon the missionary service. In 1853, the executive committee authorized the opening of a new station in Siam, and they speak hopefully of the future prospects of the mission. The present missionary force is two ordained missionaries, with their wives.

SIBSAGOR: A town in Assam,—one of the stations of the Assam mission of the Am. Baptist Union.

SIBERIA: See Tartary and Siberia.

SIERRA LEONE: A colonial establishment of Great Britain, on the west coast of Africa, consisting of a peninsula about 25 miles in length, north and south, washed by the Atlantic on the north-west and south, and partly bounded on the east by a bay formed by the Sierra Leone river. The population, consisting chiefly of liberated slaves, amounted, in 1847, to 41,735. Free-town, the capital, has 10,580 inhabitants.

The peninsula consists principally of a range of conical mountains, from 2000 to 3000 feet in height, surrounded by a belt of level ground, from one to five miles in breadth. The location, for Europeans or Americans, is unhealthy, though not more so than the French and Portuguese settlements in other parts of Western Africa. The chief characteristic is its extreme humidity. More rain fell there in two days of August, 1838, than in Britain throughout the entire year.

This colony was founded in 1787. About 1200 free negroes, who, having joined the royal standard in the war of the American Revolution, took refuge, at the termination of the contest, in Nova Scotia, were conveyed to Sierra Leone, in 1792. To these were added the Maroons from Jamaica: and since the legal abolition of the slave trade, the negroes taken in the captured vessels, and liberated, have been carried to the colony. The constant influx of these poor heathen Africans has materially tended to retard the improvement of the colony. A large proportion, however, are enjoying the means of moral and religious instruction, under the direction of the missionaries of the Church and other missionary Societies. (See Africa, Western, under the heads of Church Missionary Society, and Wesleyan Missionary Society.) Many of the colored people brought from Nova Scotia had there been converted, under the labors of missionaries who were associated with Lady Huntingdon. For more than sixty years they have existed as a distinct religious body, under the name of the "Connection of the Countess of Huntingdon." Simple faith and earnest prayerfulness have distinguished them from the beginning, and sustained them under many and heavy trials. They have now forty-eight preachers and exhorters, and more than fifteen hundred members in church fellowship; they have also eleven chapels and several schools. Aid has seldom been received by them from any quarter. They have all along maintained a steadfast devotion to the welfare of their countrymen. Their attention has been directed to several localities in and around the colony where the people have no Christian teachers, and several tribes have invited them to send them teachers. By means of some assistance from England, they have sent out two ministers and several teachers, and it is expected that others will speedily follow them.

Rev. E. J. Pierce, in a letter dated January 11, 1854, states that Rev. E. Jones, principal of a seminary for the education of young men for the ministry, has 16 students, who read Hebrew quite as well as the average of students in the senior class in our own theological seminaries. They also read the Greek Testament, and seemed to understand the structure of the language.

Freetown is the chief city of Sierra Leone; in which the Wesleyans have 17 chapels, 1 out-station for preaching, 5 missionaries and assistants, 4 catechists, 27 day-school teachers, 71 Sunday-school teachers, 67 local preachers, 4,213 church members, 256 on trial, 12 Sunday-schools, 665 scholars, 11 day-schools, 1400 day-scholars: 2,065 scholars in all; number of attendants on public worship, 7,534. The Baptists have 2 churches.

SIMLA: A station of the Church Missionary Society among the hills, between the Sutlej and Jumna, situated near Saba-thoo, and elevated 7,200 feet above the level of the sea. It is a sanatorium for invalids from the plains of India, a retreat for the civil and military officers, and a place of fashionable resort. The number of English houses is about 200. The country around it contains a numerous population.

SIMAO: One of the Molucca Islands, in the Indian Archipelago.

SINGAPORE: A small island at the southern extremity of the Malay peninsula, including the town of the same name. In 1836, it contained a population of 29,984, of whom 13,749 were Chinese settlers, and 9,632 Malays. The town of Singapore is situated on the south side of the island. Its central part is occupied with the dwellings of the merchants, and the military cantonments. The Malay quarter is at the east, and the principal Chinese commercial quarter at the west extremity. The junks from China bring annually a large number of Chinese settlers. Most of the artizans, laborers, agriculturists, and shopkeepers, are Chinese. Singapore was occupied, for a number of years before the opening of the Five Ports, as a Chinese mission, by a number of different societies; but the missions there have never been very productive.

SINDE: A station of the Church Missionary Society, a little east of Bombay.

SINMAH: A town in the south of Arracan, on the confines of Burmah; an out-station of the Bassein mission of the American Baptist Union.

SMYRNA: The principal city of Asiatic Turkey. Of the cities of the seven churches addressed in the Apocalypse, Smyrna alone can be regarded as still flourishing. The modern town, which has long been the emporium of the Levant, contains a mixed population of about 120,000. It is a station of the mission of the Am. Board to the Armenians; also of the Church Missionary Society.

SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS: This Society received its charter from King William III., in 1701; its two great objects being, "to provide for the ministrations of the Church of England in the British Colonies, and to propagate the Gospel among the native inhabitants of those countries. The principal efforts of this Society, however, have been directed to the British colonists, rather than to the conversion of the heathen in general; and therefore it assumes more the character of a Home than Foreign Missionary enterprise. Yet, the Society have not been backward to embrace opportunities of preaching the Gospel to the heathen. Though occasional assistance in books and money was given to Jamaica, Antigua, Newfoundland, and other islands, for fourscore years, the great field of the Society's missionary labor was the continent of North America. Shortly after the establishment of the Society, missions were founded in Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the Carolinas; and the ministers who were sent to take charge of them were the only ministers of the Church of England in vast districts. Among other missionaries of the Society, the celebrated John Wesley received an appointment and allowance, in 1735, as its first missionary in Georgia. It subsequently extended its operations, and now has missionaries in Canada, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, the West Indies, the East Indies, South Africa, Seychelles, Australia, Tasmania, and New-Zealand. The whole number of missionaries now maintained by the Society, in whole or in part, is 491. Besides this, it supports 300 Divinity students, catechists, and schoolmasters. The following table shows the location of the missionaries:

Of this number, 74, in Canada West, are supported from the interest of the Clergy Reserve Fund, and 16, in Nova Scotia, by a Parliamentary grant. The following statement shows the aggregate receipts in periods of twenty years, the average annual receipts, the receipts of 1849 and 1850, and the general aggregate from the beginning:

SOCIETY ISLANDS: A group of Islands in the Southern Pacific, embracing Huahine, Raiatea, Tahaa, Borabora, Maurua, Tubai, Moupiha, and Fenuaura, having a population of 10,000.

SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION, BOARD OF MISSIONS: The Southern Baptist Convention was organized in 1845, in consequence of disagreement between the northern and southern portions of the Baptist churches on the subject of slavery, when a separate Board of Missions was constituted for the south. It held its first annual meeting at Richmond, Va., June 10, 1846, on which occasion its two first missionaries were designated to China. It now has a mission to China, with three stations; and a mission to Liberia, with thirteen stations. It has also projected a mission to Central Africa, the ground of which has been surveyed by one of its missionaries. The whole amount received by the Board, as appears from its biennial reports, is $118,262 22, being an annual average of $14,782 77.

SOUTH SEA ISLANDS: The islands which lie in the Pacific Ocean, south of the Equator, from their prominence in the missionary operations of the present century, have become generally known as The South Sea Islands. Under this designation, we shall include, in this article, the following groups, being the field of operations in the South Sea, occupied by the London Missionary Society, viz.: the Georgian, Society, Austral, Hervey, Navigators' or Samoa, Pearl, and Marquesas Islands; and the Friendly and Feejee Islands, by the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

THE GEORGIAN ISLANDS are situated in the South Pacific Ocean between 17° and 18° south latitude, and 149° and 153° west longitude. The group contains six islands, Tahiti, Eimeo, Tabuaem nuu, or Sir Charles Sander's Island, Tetuarooa, Matea, and Mee-tia.

Tahiti is the largest of these islands, and sometimes gives name to the whole group.

Tahiti was visited by Captain Cook, and from him received the name of Otaheite, but Tahiti is the name given to it by the natives. It consists of two peninsulas united by an isthmus. The largest is nearly circular, and about 20 miles in diameter. The smaller one is oval, about 16 miles long, and 8 broad. The circumference of the whole island is 108 miles. The interior is mountainous, but is surrounded by a border from 2 to 3 miles wide, of low, rich, level land, which extends from the base of the mountains to the sea. The population of Tahiti is estimated at about 10,000.

Eimeo, or, as it is called by the natives, Moorea, is situated about 2° west of Tahiti. It is about 25 miles in circumference. The other islands though equally elevated are of smaller extent.

THE SOCIETY ISLANDS include Huahine, Raiatea, Tahaa, Borabora, Maurua, Tubai, Moupiha, and Fenuaura. The population of this group is supposed to be about 10,000.

THE AUSTRAL ISLANDS are Raiavai, or High Island, Tubuai, Rurutu, Rimataru, and Rapa. They are situated between 22° 27' and 27° 36' south latitude, and 144° 11' and 150° 47' west longitude. The population is about 1,000.

Raiavai is one of the most important islands of this group. It is about 20 miles in circumference, mountainous in the centre, but has considerable low land.

Rapa is the most southerly of the Austral Islands. The mountains are craggy, and picturesque, and the land generally fertile.

Tubuai is a small island about 12 miles in circumference and thinly peopled.

Rurutu and Ramataru are small, and but little is known of either of them.

THE HERVEY ISLANDS are situated between 19° and 21° south latitude, and 156° and 161° west longitude, and contain a population of 16,000 or 18,000. The largest and most important island of the group is Rarotonga. This beautiful island remained unknown until 1823. It was then discovered by the Rev. Mr. Williams, an English missionary. It is a mass of mountains, many of which are high, and remarkably romantic. The island is about 30 miles in circumference, and has several good harbors for boats. Its population is about 7,000.

Mangaia is 20 or 25 miles in circumference, and contains between 2,000 and 3,000 inhabitants.

Atiu is about 20 miles in circumference, hilly, but not mountainous. It is a very verdant island, and contains nearly 2,000 inhabitants.

Aitutaki is 18 miles in circumference, and has a population of about 2,000. The landscapes on this island are rich and variegated.

Mauke is a small, low island, discovered by Messrs. Williams and Bourne in 1823. Its former population was considerable, but when discovered it was so much reduced by repeated wars that it numbered only 300.

Mitiaro is a still smaller island lying 20 miles north-west of Mauke. It has also been nearly depopulated by famine and wars, so that it contains not more than 100 inhabitants.

Hervey's Island is the one from which the group takes its name, which was given by Captain Cook, in honor of Captain Hervey.

THE NAVIGATORS' or SAMOA ISLANDS are situated between 10° and 20° south latitude, and 169° and 174° west longitude, and consist of eight islands, Manua, Orosenga, Ofu, Tutuila, Upolu, Manono, Aborima, and Savaii.

Manua is a small and almost uninhabited island, circular in form, and so elevated as to be visible at a distance of 40 or 50 miles.

Orosenga and Ofu are two small islands, separated from each other by a narrow channel.

Tutuila is about 50 miles west of Orosenga. It is from 80 to 100 miles in circumference.

Upolu is between 150 and 200 miles in circumference. The mountains on this island are very high, and covered with verdure to their summits.

Manono is about 5 miles in circumference, and is attached to Upolu by a coral reef.

Aborima is a small island about 2 miles in circumference, situated half way between Manono and Savaii. It received its name, which signifies the hollow of the hand, from its shape. It is supposed to be the crater of an extinct volcano.

Savaii, the largest island of the group, is about 250 miles in circumference. The mountains are very high, and visible at a distance of 600 or 700 miles. With the exception of the Sandwich Islands, this group is the largest and most populous of the numerous clusters in the Pacific at which missions have been commenced. Its population is estimated at 160,000.

THE PAUMOTU, or PEARL ISLANDS, are situated between 17° and 23° south latitude, and 139° and 145° west longitude. The group consists of a large number of small, low islands. They have been called by different names, as, the Labyrinth, the Pearl Islands, Paumotu, the Palliser Islands, and the Dangerous Archipelago. Some of the islands have received the name of Crescent, Bow, Harp, and Chain, which have been regarded as indicative of their shape. The population is 3,000 or 4,000.

THE MARQUESAS ISLANDS are situated about 7° or 8° north of the Pearl Islands, and extend from 7° to 10° south latitude, and from 138° to 140° west longitude. They consist of two clusters. The southern cluster contains five islands. They were called Marquesas by Alvaro Mendano, a Spanish navigator, in honor of his patron, Marques Mendoza, viceroy of Peru. The northern group also consists of five islands, and as it is distinct from the other cluster, it has sometimes been called by another name. Both groups, however, are usually designated by the common name Marquesas. The geographical extent of the united groups is inferior to that of the Georgian and Society Islands, but the population is supposed to be much greater.

Most of the South Sea Islands are surrounded, at a distance of from one to two miles from the shore, by a coral reef, or belt of coral rock, several yards in width. Against this reef the waves of the Pacific are constantly dashing, and being impeded in their course, rise from 10 to 14 feet above the surface of the reef, and thus form a beautiful liquid arch. From the outer edge, the reefs shelve away underneath into deep hollows. In landing from canoes, when the sea is high, there is danger of upsetting, and being forced by the violence of the waves into these awful caverns, from which escape would be impossible. The water within the reef is placid and transparent, and at the bottom may be seen coral of every shape and color, among which fishes of various hues and sizes are constantly sporting. In most of these reefs there is an opening large enough to admit vessels, through which a stream of water enters the ocean.

The climate, though hotter than that of Europe, is more temperate than in those parts of South America whose latitude is the same. Though the distance of the groups from the equator is, on an average, only 17° , they are surrounded by a vast expanse of water, and enjoy almost daily a refreshing land and sea breeze. Still, the heat in the low lands is constant, and often excessive. The changes, on the other hand, are neither sudden nor violent, and the warmth of the climate, though debilitating to Europeans, occasions no inconvenience to the natives.

The islands are for the most part hilly, often mountainous, and on some of them the mountains rise to an immense height. The sides of the mountains are covered with verdure, and at their bases are spread fertile and luxuriant valleys. It would be difficult for the strongest imagination to conceive an earthly paradise more lovely than is to be found in some portions of the South Sea Islands. Freed from the usual power of the tropical heat, and fanned by the soft breezes of a perpetual spring, these delightful regions present to the eye extensive and beautiful views of hills and valleys, forests and streams. The scenery is in general fine, especially on the island of Tahiti, which abounds in landscapes of the most charming kind.

Yet the beautiful is occasionally mingled with the terrible. The winds, though generally moderate, are sometimes violent and tempestuous. Whirlwinds visit the islands and produce the most disastrous consequences.

Water-spouts are of frequent occurrence, and are a source of much terror to the islanders.

The vegetable productions of the South Sea Islands are abundant. Many of them are invaluable to the natives, and from some of them, they derive almost their only means of subsistence. The trees are remarkable for their size, and the beauty of their foliage or flowers. Most of them are evergreens, and often present an appearance both novel and interesting. The old and new leaves, the bud, and the blossom, the young fruit, and the ripe, are found together throughout the year.

The most valuable trees are, the bread-fruit, the cocoanut, the candle-nut, the auti, or paper-mulberry, from which most of their material for making cloth is derived; besides several other magnificent trees, very useful for their timber.

The native esculent roots are, the taro or arum, which is prepared in the same manner as the bread-fruit, the yam, and the sweet-potato.

Many of the most valuable tropical fruits have been introduced into the islands. Vines, oranges, limes, and other plants were brought from England by Captains Cook, Bligh, and Vancouver. Citrons, tamarinds, pino-apples, figs, and coffee-plants have since been introduced, and successfully cultivated. Foreign vegetables do not generally thrive.

The only quadrupeds originally found on the islands were hogs, dogs, rats, and lizards. Rats were exceedingly numerous, and at Mangaia, and some of the other islands, they were a common article of food; but after the introduction of Christianity, they ceased to be eaten. So numerous were these animals that one or two persons were constantly kept in attendance on the tables for the purpose of keeping them off. Horses, asses, cattle, goats, and sheep, have all been brought to the islands, and with the exception of the cattle appear to thrive. The common domestic fowl is reared in great numbers to supply the vessels that touch at the islands for refreshment, but they are little used by the natives. The coast abounds with fish and turtle. The only venomous reptiles found on the islands, are a species of centipedes, and a small kind of scorpion. There are several species of snakes, all of which are esteemed good food by the natives.

INHABITANTS.—The islands of the Pacific Ocean are inhabited by two races of men, which exhibit traces of distinct origin. One race is characterized by a black skin and crisped hair. The other resembles the Malays. The skin is of a bright copper color, the hair long, black, and glossy. The first race belongs to Australasia, or Western Polynesia; the latter inhabit Eastern Polynesia, including those islands in the Southern Ocean which we have described. Although the inhabitants of these islands exhibit the same general characteristics, the people of each cluster are marked by some peculiarities. Their origin is involved in obscurity.

Language.—There are eight distinct dialects in the Polynesian language. The resemblance which exists between them is, however, so strong, that with little variation one language can be spoken by the inhabitants of all the islands. It abounds in vowels, and all their syllables end with a vowel. On this account, as well as for other reasons, it was extremely difficult to acquire a knowledge of it or to reduce it to a written system.

General Characteristics.—The inhabitants are distinguished by vivacity, and move with quickness and ease. The men are generally tall, often more than six feet high. Their forms are well proportioned and symmetrical. The women, though they often present elegant models of the human figure, are inferior, in appearance, to the other sex. The chiefs are men of uncommon size—a fact which is probably to be attributed to the different treatment which the sons of chiefs receive in infancy and childhood.

Tattooing was common in most of the groups of the Pacific. It was considered a personal ornament, and was practised by all classes, and by both sexes. The operation was so painful that a whole figure could rarely be completed at once. Much taste and elegance were often displayed in the arrangement of the figures. They were first drawn on the skin with a piece of charcoal. The instruments used for perforating the skin were constructed of the bones of birds or fishes, fastened with fine thread to a small stick. The coloring fluid was made of the kernel of the candle-nut, baked, and reduced to charcoal, and then mixed with oil. The points of the instrument having been dipped in this fluid, and applied to the surface of the body, a blow upon the handle punctured the skin and injected the dye.

The dress of the islanders was various in form, color, and texture. It was always light and loose, and often elegant. All classes used the same materials for clothing, and the dress of the two sexes differed but little. Both men and women wore folds of cloth round the body. Some of the former wore a garment extending below the knee, open at the sides, with a hole cut in the middle, through which to pass the head. The women wore the ahu-pu in the form of a scarf over their shoulders. With the exception of the ornament of a bunch of flowers, or a wreath of cocoanut leaves, with which the forehead was sometimes shaded, the head was uncovered. The unmarried females wore a white instead of a red mat, were neither anointed nor colored with rouge, and had a profusion of graceful curls on one side of the head, while the other was shaved. The females generally wore their hair short, the men sometimes long, sometimes short. It was often braided in a kind of cue behind, or wound in a knot on the top of the head. The men plucked out their beard by the roots, or shaved it off with a shark's tooth. Some, however, allowed the beard to grow, and braided it together. Since the islanders have become civilized, they all shave once a week, and the chiefs more frequently.

The mental capacity of the South Sea Islanders is thought by the missionaries not to be inferior to that of Europeans. Children learn to read, write, and cypher, and readily commit their lessons to memory. Many who commenced learning the alphabet at thirty or forty years of age, were able to read in the Testament in the course of twelve months. They commit to memory with ease large portions of Scripture, and sometimes whole books. They have made considerable progress in the use of numbers. They are remarkably curious and inquisitive, and some of them are ingenious and imitative. They often ask questions of the most interesting character, and are anxious to acquire knowledge.

The islanders are generous and hospitable. Their native modes of living were simple, requiring little exertion to supply their wants, and thus cultivating habits of indolence. They are cheerful and good natured; but their domestic habits are unsocial, and their hours for rest and meals irregular. They manifested an extreme fondness for ornaments and love of pleasure, no small portion of their time being devoted to games and sports.

Marriage.—Among the Tahitians marriages were often celebrated when the females were twelve or thirteen years of age, and the males two or three years older. The parties were generally betrothed at an early age. The principal part of the marriage ceremony consisted in the bridegroom's throwing a piece of cloth over the bride, or the friends throwing it over both.

Moral Character.—In the Georgian and Society Islands, infanticide prevailed to an incredible extent, and of those who were suffered to live, it is stated by Mr. Ellis, that "their years of childhood and youth were passed in indolence, irregularity, and unrestrained indulgence in whatever afforded gratification."

The moral habits of the islanders were, many of them, such, that the veil of oblivion ought forever to hide them from the view. The revolting forms in which human depravity developed itself among them will not bear the light. They were often engaged in savage wars, which gave them a ferocious character. They were addicted to thievish habits, and to robbery and plunder. Their dances and other amusements were conducted with shocking indecency; their conversation was low and vile, and chastity was unknown among them. Some of them were cannibals. "Awfully dark, indeed," says Mr. Ellis, "was their moral character, and notwithstanding the apparent mildness of their disposition, and the cheerful vivacity of their conversation, no portion of the human race was ever, perhaps, sunk lower in brutal licentiousness and moral degradation than this isolated people."

The Arts.—Previous to their intercourse with Europeans, the use of iron was unknown to the natives. Long before the missionaries settled among them, however, many of them had learnt its value from the ships that visited their coasts. But of the method of working it they were still ignorant. The houses of the natives were little more than thatched roofs or sheds, supported by posts and rafters. The inside of the chiefs' houses was often ornamented with beautifully fringed matting. The floor was covered with long dried grass, or mats. If the family was large, little huts were sometimes erected near the principal building, for the accommodation of the children and servants at night; but the greater part of the houses contained only one room. Their beds consisted of a coarse kind of matting, made of palm leaves woven by the hand. The principal articles of household furniture consisted of some wooden stools, pillows, and a few wooden dishes. The pillows were ten or twelve inches in length, and four or five inches high, cut out of a single piece of wood, and curved on the upper side so as to fit the head. The natives were accustomed to sit cross-legged on mats, but occasionally used a stool. The principal dish was called umete. Those belonging to the chiefs were often six or eight feet long, a foot and a half wide, and twelve inches deep, and resembled a canoe rather than receptacles for food. The dishes in common use were two or three feet long, and twelve or eighteen inches wide. Each dish had four feet cut out of the same piece of wood. The papahia or mortar was used for pounding bread-fruit and plantains, which was done with a stone pestle called a penu. Their drinking cups and vessels for washing their hands were made of the cocca-nut shell, and were often beautifully carved. A piece of bamboo-cane was their only substitute for a knife, but this they used for a variety of purposes. Like the American Indians, they obtained fire by rubbing together two dry sticks. Their principal agricultural instrument was a short stick, and their only tools were an adze of stone and chisels of bone. Their cloth and mats were made by the women, from the bark of trees.

Wars, at most of the islands, were frequent and exceedingly destructive. At Hervey's Island, they occurred so often, and were so exterminating in their character, that the whole population was at one time reduced to about sixty. A few years afterwards, when this island was visited by one of the missionaries, it was found that by repeated combats this little remnant of the former population had become smaller still, so that five men, three women, and a few children were the only survivors. When preparations were to be made for war, every thing else was neglected; for war was considered the most important end of life, and training for its successful pursuit was held in the highest estimation. In time of war all who were capable of bearing arms were called on to join the forces of the chieftain to whom they belonged, and the farmers were obliged to render military service whenever their landlord required it.

War was seldom proclaimed hastily, and the preparatory deliberations were frequent and protracted. Great importance was attached to the will of the gods. If they were favorable, conquest was considered as sure; but if unfavorable, defeat, and perhaps death, was certain. For the purpose of ascertaining the decision of the gods, divination was employed, and in connection with it, offerings were presented to the divinities invoked. Success or failure was inferred from the appearance of the animal offered, either before or after it was placed on the altar. The victorious party pillaged the villages of their enemies, cut down and destroyed all the bread-fruit and cocoa-nut trees, and often left the island almost uninhabited. The vanquished fled to the mountains, where they were pursued by their enemies, and sometimes overtaken and slain. Those who eluded pursuit, took up their residence in caves and dens of the mountains, and sometimes became perfectly wild. Captives taken in war were either slain on the spot, or sacrificed to the gods. On the day following the battle, the bodies of the slain, having suffered the greatest indignities, were offered to Oro, the god of war, as an acknowledgment of his assistance. In connection with their wars, the natives were accustomed to observe many ceremonies, and to offer human sacrifices to Oro, whom they wished to preside over the army. Various ceremonies and offerings to the gods, together with divination, also accompanied the making of peace.

Government.—Although there were many points of resemblance in the government of the different clusters of islands in the South Sea, there were also some peculiarities in each. In the Society Islands, and in some of the other groups, the government was hereditary and despotic. The chiefs in the island of Tongataboo were elected, and their power limited. In the Marquesas and Navigators' Islands, each tribe was governed by its own chief, and was independent of every other. In all the islands, the government was interwoven with their system of idolatry. The god and the king were generally supposed to share the authority over mankind. Next in rank to the king was the queen, who often governed a whole island. Immediately on the birth of a son to the king, the infant was proclaimed sovereign, and the father became a subject. He, however, continued to transact business, but paid the same homage to his son that he had before demanded for himself. The king and queen, whenever they traveled by land, were always carried on men's shoulders, and accompanied by a number of "sacred men, or bearers," who relieved each other of their burdens. The distinction between king and people was strongly marked. Every thing connected with the former, even the ground on which he trod, was considered sacred, and no person was allowed to touch either the king or queen, on pain of death. The inauguration of the king took place some years before he arrived at the age of twenty-one, and this festival, although celebrated in a magnificent manner, was marked with crimes of the deepest dye. Each district had its own chief, whose power in that district was supreme. They had no regular code of laws, nor any court of justice. The people avenged their own injuries, and the chiefs punished with death or banishment. Theft, although common among them, was severely punished.

Religion.—The islanders generally, and especially the Samoans, had a vague idea of a Supreme Being, whom they regarded as "the Creator of all things, and the Author of their mercies," called Tangaroa, or Taaroa. They believed in a future state, but their ideas respecting it were vague and indefinite; and their notions of paradise were material and sensual. Idolatry prevailed at most of the islands. The inhabitants of several of them worshiped their departed ancestors; others, birds and insects, while the greater part of them had gods, the work of their own hands. Their gods were nearly a hundred in number, and every family of rank had its tutelar idol. So great was their fear of the gods, that, to avert their anger, they would not only devote to them every valuable article they possessed, but murder their fellow beings, and offer them to the god. The worship of the islanders consisted in prayers, offerings, and the sacrifice of victims. Their prayers were generally vain and useless repetitions, addressed to the god in a loud and unpleasant tone of voice. Their offerings included "the fowls of the air, the fishes of the sea, the beasts of the field, and the fruits of the earth, together with their choicest manufactures." Domestic altars, or those erected near the corpse of a departed friend, were small squares of wicker work. The altars in the temples were usually eight or ten feet high, and were ornamented with plantain leaves, and covered with sacred boughs. The animals, when presented alive, received the sacred mark, and were allowed to roam at liberty. When slain, great care was taken that a bone should not be broken, or the animal disfigured in any way. The atmosphere in the vicinity of the marae was frequently rendered offensive by the action of the heat on the offerings of meat left on the altar. In some of the islands, the inhabitants inflict injuries on themselves, in connection with their offerings.

Besides animals and fruits, human victims were not unfrequently offered to the gods. These barbarous rites commonly took place in time of war, at great national festivals, or the erection of temples, and during the illness of the king and chiefs. The victims were generally captives taken in war, or persons who had rendered themselves odious to the king. At the request of the priest, a stone was sent by the king to the chief of the district where the person selected as a victim resided. If the stone was received, it was an indication that the requisition would be complied with. Certain districts were regarded as tabu, or devoted. From these districts, and generally from families where one victim had been previously taken, another was demanded. When it was known that any ceremonies were near, at which human sacrifices would be offered, the members of the devoted families fled to the mountains or caves, and remained till the ceremonies were past. The victims were generally unconscious of danger, till they were seized, or stunned by a blow. Their doom was then fixed, and their death certain.

The account which has here been given does not, however, apply to the religious system of the natives of the Samoas, or Navigators' Islands. They had neither temples nor altars, and practised none of the barbarous rites that were observed at some of the other groups. The form of superstition most prevalent at the Samoas was the worship of the etu. This consisted of some bird, fish, or reptile, in which they supposed that a spirit resided. It was not uncommon to see an intelligent looking chief praying to a fly, an ant, or a lizard.

The islanders generally had both stated and occasional seasons of worship. The latter were observed in times of national calamities, such as the desolation of war, or the illness of their rulers. At the close of war, they were accustomed to perform certain ceremonies, the object of which was to purify the land from the defilement occasioned by the incursions of an enemy. In connection with these ceremonies, prayers were offered to the gods, that they would cleanse the land from pollution. It was then considered safe to remain on the soil; but if the ceremony had been neglected, death would have been anticipated. The illness of the king or chiefs was supposed to have been owing to the displeasure of the gods, on account of some offence committed either by them or the people. Prayers, if offered frequently, were supposed to avert anger and prevent death. Costly offerings always accompanied their prayers to the god, and the value of the gift was in proportion to the rank of the chief. Whole fields of plantains, and a hundred pigs have often been presented to a god at once. If recovery followed these ceremonies, the gods were supposed to be pacified, but if death ensued, they were considered as inexorable, and were destroyed.

Religious ceremonies were connected with almost every event of their lives. An ubu, or prayer, was offered before they ate their food, when they tilled their ground, planted their gardens, built their houses, launched their canoes, cast their nets, and commenced or concluded a journey.

Their "first fruits" were always presented to the gods. At the close of the year they observed a national festival, which was considered as an annual acknowledgment to the gods. A sumptuous banquet was provided, after which each individual visited his family marae or temple, to offer prayers for the spirits of departed friends. Witchcraft and sorcery were common among them.

MISSIONS.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—Georgian Islands.—In 1796, this Society purchased the ship Duff, and sent her out under the command of Capt. James Wilson, who had retired from the East India service several years before, with twenty-nine missionaries. They left Portsmouth on the 23d of September, and arrived in safety at Tahiti on the 4th of March following. On their arrival, seventy-four canoes, each carrying about twenty natives, put off from the shore, and rowed rapidly towards them. About one hundred of the natives came on board, and began to dance and caper about the deck in the most frantic manner. When their astonishment and delight had in some measure subsided, many of them voluntarily left the vessel, and others were sent away by a venerable old man, a near relation of the royal family, called Manne Manne. They afterwards landed, and were presented by the king with a house, built by his father for Capt. Bligh—a spacious building, 108 feet long and 48 wide.

The island had been visited by two Spanish Catholic priests, in 1774, who resided about ten months on the island, but effected nothing.

Captain Wilson, through the medium of a Swede who acted as interpreter, informed Otu, the king, of the object and design of the voyage. The king received the communication with favor, and formally ceded the whole district of Matavai to Captain Wilson and the missionaries; but the missionaries were not expected to appropriate the land to their own use to the exclusion of the original proprietors.

The Duff now proceeded on her way to the Friendly Islands, where ten missionaries were landed. Captain Wilson then visited the Marquesian Islands, and left one missionary there, after which he returned again to Tahiti. He found all the missionaries in good health, and learned with pleasure from them that the natives continued to treat them as friends, and that they had furnished them with abundant supplies of food. On the 4th of August, 1797, he sailed from Matavai, taking with him one of the missionaries, who expressed a desire to return; and on his arrival in England, the society observed a day of public thanksgiving for the success that had attended the voyage. This day was kept on the first Monday of the month, the same that has since been observed as the Monthly Concert. Dr. Haweis preached on the occasion, and such was the effect of his appeal, that the very next day the Missionary Society passed a resolution to undertake another voyage to the Pacific Ocean. In the latter part of December, 1798, the Duff sailed from England, under the command of Captain Thomas Robson, on her second voyage, with a reinforcement of twenty-nine missionaries. Ten of them were married, five were ordained ministers, two were acquainted with medicine and surgery, and most of the others were botanists, agriculturists, and artisans. On the 13th of February, 1799, a little less than two months from the time of leaving England, the Duff and all the missionaries on board were captured off Cape Frio by the Buonaparte, a French privateer. They were taken to Monte Video, where they remained several weeks. The Captain of the privateer appears to have been a kind-hearted man, and expressed great sympathy for the missionaries, saying, that if he had known who they were and the cause in which they were engaged, he would rather have given five hundred pounds out of his own pocket than to have met with them. By his kindness the missionaries were at length furnished with a passage to Rio Janeiro. On their way to that port they were again taken captive by a Portuguese frigate bound to Lisbon. During this voyage, the missionaries suffered not only from want of proper accommodations and food, but from the inhuman conduct of the Captain of the frigate. On their arrival at Lisbon, September 22d, they were set at liberty, and, with the exception of one of their number who had died, returned to England.

In the mean time, the king and chiefs continued friendly to the missionaries, and supplied them liberally with such things as the island afforded. Several of the missionaries had been selected on account of their acquaintance with the mechanic arts; and the surprise of the natives was great, on seeing their tools, and the readiness with which they were used, but particularly, in the working of iron.

While some of the missionaries were employed in making the natives acquainted with the arts, others were diligently exploring the adjacent country, and planting the seeds which they had brought from Europe. They all began to apply themselves diligently to the acquisition of the language, which proved to be a most laborious undertaking.

In 1798, in consequence of attempting to assist Captain Bishop, of the ship Nautilus, in recovering two of his sailors, who had deserted with the ship's boat, four of the missionaries were seized by a party of natives, who attempted to drown them; and it was thought that the outrage was committed with the sanction of Otu, the young king. However, they were rescued by some of the natives, and taken to Pomare, the old king; who, with his queen, treated them kindly, restored several articles which had been taken from them, and sent them home in his own boat. But, in consequence of this occurrence, eleven of the missionaries, considering their lives in danger, determined to leave the island, in the ship that was then there. Pomare, with much persuasion, induced Mr. and Mrs. Eyre, and five single missionaries to remain; but the departure of the remainder of the eleven crippled the mission very much. Those who remained now deemed it expedient to give up to Pomare their public stores, and all the property they possessed, together with the blacksmith's shop and the tools. But, notwithstanding this precaution, they were frequently alarmed by intelligence that the mission-house was marked out for destruction, and they were several times plundered of valuable articles. Hostilities also commenced in the district of Pare, in consequence of the execution, by order of Pomare, of two of the men who had so cruelly treated the missionaries. The inhabitants rose in arms to revenge their death; and when peace was offered them, they rejected it. Pomare therefore attacked them with a numerous force, drove them to the mountains, killed fourteen of their number, and burnt forty or fifty houses. Otu, and his father Pomare, not being on friendly terms, Manne Manne, the chief priest, taking sides with Otu, formed a league with him to deprive Pomare of all authority in Tahiti. They made war upon the district of Matavai, put the inhabitants to flight, and took possession of the land. The triumph of the old priest, however, was short. Pomare gave private directions to Idia, the queen, to procure his assassination. At the earnest solicitation of his mother, Otu, though in the closest alliance with Manne Manne, consented to his death. This event appeared to unite in one interest Otu and his father. The inhabitants of Matavai left their places of retreat, and having presented a peace-offering, re-occupied their land. The missionaries resumed their attempts to instruct the natives, but continued to meet with much to discourage them, not only in the acquisition of the language, but from the insensibility of the natives.

In November, 1799, the missionaries were called to mourn over the death of Mr. Lewis, one of their number. For some months previous to this event, his conduct had been such as to excite the fears of his brethren, and lead them to feel the utmost solicitude respecting him. Soon after the departure of the Nautilus, he expressed his intention of uniting in marriage with a native female, but as the missionaries considered her as an idolatress, they endeavored to dissuade him from it. Mr. Lewis, however, persevered in his determination, on account of which the connection that had subsisted between him and the other missionaries was dissolved. He removed from the mission-house to another part of the district, but was still constant in attendance on public worship, and industrious in the cultivation of his garden. As soon as the report of his death reached the missionaries, they hastened to his house, where they found his body, which presented indications that he had been murdered. Soon after this the small band was again reduced, by the departure of Mr. Harris to New South Wales; but his place was supplied, in the January following, by the return of Mr. and Mrs. Henry from Port Jackson.

Until the year 1800, public worship was held in the mission house; but on the 5th of March, of that year, the missionaries, with the assistance of several of the natives, commenced the erection of a chapel. The materials were mostly furnished by the chiefs, and when it was nearly completed, Pomare sent a fish as an offering to Jesus Christ, requesting that it might be hung up in the new chapel. This was the first building erected in the South Sea Islands for the worship of the true God. At the time of its completion the missionaries indulged the hope of seeing it regularly filled with worshipers; but they were obliged early in the year 1802, to pull it down in order to prevent its affording shelter to their enemies, or being set on fire.

The missionaries continued to labor among the people, but without any apparent success. Their situation was in many respects improved, but their property was still exposed to the thefts of the natives, and their feelings constantly tried by the apathy of the degraded beings for whose benefit they were making such sacrifices.

In the month of June, 1800, the missionaries were visited with a new and unexpected affliction. Mr. Broomhall, who had for some time evinced much coldness and indifference in respect to religious things, at length avowed that his sentiments had become entirely changed, and that he no longer believed in the immortality of the soul, or the reality of a divine influence on the mind. His companions endeavored to remove his skepticism; but, failing in their efforts, they separated him from their communion, and he soon afterwards left the island. The brethren followed him with their prayers, but for years received no account of him. At length he made himself known to the Baptist missionaries at Serampore, and conversed freely with them respecting his state. He appeared deeply penitent, renounced his erroneous sentiments, and professed his belief in the truths of the Christian revelation. Shortly afterwards, he embarked on another voyage from which he never returned, and nothing has since been heard of him.

In July, 1801, a reinforcement of eight missionaries arrived at Tahiti from England. The number of missionaries now amounted to thirteen, who were organized into a regular body, with rules for the regulation of their proceedings.

In 1802, the missionaries who had been longest on the island had acquired so much of the language as to be able to preach to the natives in their tongue. Early in that year, Messrs. Nott and Elder made the first missionary tour of Tahiti, and in a little more than thirty days preached in nearly every district. The natives seemed interested in the account of the creation, and asked various questions about Jehovah, and his Son Jesus Christ. Some of them were much affected by the exhibition of Jesus as the atonement for sin, others said they desired to pray to the true God, but were afraid to do so lest the gods of Tahiti should destroy them. But at this time a serious war broke out, in consequence of the king having taken their national idol, Oro, from the district of Atehuru, by force; which, for a time, interrupted the crerations of the mission. For many years the missionaries were treated with ridicule and contempt, and their hearts were often grieved to see the same ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, which they found on their arrival, still prevail among the heathen. Sometimes when they had gone to every house in a village, and the people had not only promised to attend their meeting, but had actually set out with them, they found on reaching the appointed place, that only two or three had arrived there. Those that came often brought with them dogs or cocks, which they would set to fighting outside the circle of persons to whom the missionaries were preaching. In addition to these and similar trials, they were sometimes charged with being the authors of all the disasters of the people, and especially with being the cause of all the diseases which prevailed among them, and which they supposed were brought upon them by the influence of the foreigners with their God.

In Sept. 1803, old King Pomare, who had always been their friend, died. Before his death he recommended them to the protection of his son, Otu, who now assumed the name of Pomare. Early in 1805, they had formed a vocabulary of Tahitian words, and prepared a catechism in the language. They had also made considerable progress in the instruction of the children.

The king had for some time applied himself to writing, and had become so fond of using his pen, and his progress was so rapid, that in the beginning of 1807 he was able to address a letter to the Missionary Society of London. He first composed it in the Tahitian language, and afterwards transcribed the English translation which was made for him.

In October of this year, Mr. Davies opened a school for boys in a part of the mission-house, and was so much encouraged that he composed a spelling-book in the Tahitian language, which was sent to England and printed.

Near the close of 1807, the mission sustained a heavy loss in the death of Mr. Jefferson. He was a man of ardent piety and great perseverance, who for ten years had labored unremittingly to bring the heathen to a knowledge of the truth.

In November of the following year a rebellion broke out, and the king was defeated. The missionaries were compelled to leave the island, their premises being destroyed, and all their labor apparently lost. All of them, with the exception of Mr. Nott, embarked the first opportunity from Huahine, and arrived at Port Jackson, New South Wales, in February, 1810, Mr. Nott remaining on the island of Eimeo. But it was not long before they received letters from King Pomare, expressing the deepest sorrow at their absence, and inviting them to return as soon as possible. And in the autumn of 1811, five of them rejoined Mr. Nott, at Eimeo. They were received with joy by the king. During their absence he had scrupulously observed the Christian Sabbath, and he now expressed the deepest contrition on account of his past life. He spent much of his time in reading and writing and in earnest inquiries about God, and the way of acceptance through Jesus Christ. He had for some time past shown contempt for the idols of his ancestors, and expressed a desire to be taught a more excellent way, that he might obtain the favor of the true God. This change in the king's views had been noticed by his subjects with the most fearful apprehensions. They were powerfully affected on one occasion, when a present was brought him of a turtle, an animal which had always been held sacred, and which it was customary to dress with sacred fire within the precincts of the temple, part of it being invariably offered to the idol. The attendants were proceeding with the turtle to the marae, when Pomare called them back, and told them to prepare an oven to bake it, in his own kitchen, and serve it up, without offering it to the idol. The people around were astonished, and could hardly believe that the king was in a state of sanity, or was really in earnest. The king repeated his direction; a fire was made, the turtle baked, and served up at the next repast. The people of the king's household stood in mute expectation of some fearful visitation of the anger of the god as soon as a morsel of the fish should be touched. The king cut up the turtle, and began to eat it, inviting some that sat at meat with him to do the same, but no one could be induced to touch it, as they all expected every moment to see him either expire or writhe in strong convulsions; and although the meal was finished without any evil result, they carried away the dishes with many expressions of astonishment, confidently expecting that some judgment would overtake him before the morrow. Pomare now requested baptism, but the missionaries judged it expedient to defer it till he received more instruction.

Soon after the return of the missionaries, two chiefs arrived from Tahiti, and invited Pomare to return and resume his government in that island. After his departure they were cheered by the accounts which they received from time to time of his efforts to enlighten his subjects; and one of the missionaries who visited Tahiti, returned with the report that a spirit of inquiry had been awakened among some of the inhabitants of that island, and that two of those whom they had formerly instructed, occasionally met to pray to God. Messrs. Scott and Hayward were then sent to visit Tahiti; and the morning after their arrival they retired to the bushes near their lodgings for meditation and prayer, when Mr. Scott heard a native engaged in prayer in his own mother-tongue. "It was the first native voice in praise and prayer that he had ever heard, and he listened almost entranced with the appropriate and glowing language of devotion employed, until his feelings could be restrained no longer. Tears of joy started from his gladdened eye, and rolled in swift succession down his cheeks, while he could scarcely forbear rushing to the spot, and clasping in his arms the unconscious author of his ecstasy. The name of the native was Oito. He had formerly been an inmate of the mission family, and had there been instructed in the knowledge of the true God.

Since the return of the king to Tahiti, Oito had been with him occasionally, and some remarks from him had awakened convictions of sin. Having no one to direct him, and not knowing how to obtain relief, he applied to Tuahine, who had for a long time lived with the missionaries. Tuahine was in a state of mind similar to that of Oito. Their conversation strengthened their impressions, and they resolved to retire to the valleys for meditation and prayer. This course at first excited ridicule, but, after a time, several young persons united with them, and this little band, without any missionary to guide them, agreed to refrain from the worship of their idols, and from the evil practices of their country, and to observe the Sabbath day, and to worship Jehovah only.

Tuahine afterwards became a valuable assistant to the missionaries, not only as a teacher in the schools, but also in translating the Scriptures into the native language. He subsequently accompanied one of the missionaries to Raiatea, and was appointed deacon in the native church there, a station which he continued to fill till his death, in 1827. He was much respected by the people, and died in the enjoyment of the consolations of the Gospel, at the age of forty-five.

After making the tour of the island, Messrs. Scott and Hayward returned to Eimeo, taking with them Tuahine and Oito, that they might attend the school which had been opened there. At a meeting held at Eimeo, after the dedication of a new chapel, in July, 1813, 81 natives declared that they had already cast away their idols, and desired that their names might be written down as those who were determined to worship the true God. To this number 11 others were soon added, among whom were Taaroarii, a young chief of Huahine, and Matapupuu, the chief priest of Huahine, who had long been one of the principal supporters of idolatry in that island. The missionaries held frequent meetings with them, for the purpose of explaining to them the doctrines of revelation, and uniting with them in social worship. They had the satisfaction of hearing some of the new converts lead in prayer, and were surprised and gratified with their fluency and fervor, as well as the appropriateness of their language.

On one of Mr. Scott's visits to the residence of Taaroarii, to preach to his people, Patii, the priest of Papetoai, expressed his intention of bringing out his idols the day following, and publicly burning them. In the forenoon of the next day, the preparations were made; and the news spreading, multitudes assembled to witness what they considered a daring act of impiety.

A short time before sunset Patii appeared, and ordered his attendants to apply fire to the pile. This being done, he hastened to the sacred depository of his gods, brought them out, and laid them down on the ground. They were small carved wooden images, rude imitations of the human figure; or shapeless logs of wood, covered with finely braided and curiously wrought cinet, of cocoanut fibres, and ornamented with red feathers. Patii tore off the sacred cloth in which they were enveloped, stripped them of their ornaments, which he cast into the fire; and then, one by one, threw the idols themselves into the crackling flames, sometimes pronouncing the name and pedigree of the idol, and expressing his own regret at having worshiped it,—at others, calling upon the spectators to behold their inability even to help themselves.

The example of Patii produced the most decisive effects on the priests and people. Many in Tahiti and Eimeo, emboldened by his example, not only burnt their idols, but destroyed their maraes. Patii himself became a pupil of the missionaries, and his subsequent life evinced the sincerity of his profession of Christianity.

On the 5th of October, 1813, the native Christians for the first time united with their teachers in observing the Monthly Concert of Prayer. The names of 50 who had renounced idolatry were now recorded, and the number of those who attended public worship was so great, that it was found necessary to enlarge their place of meeting. The deportment of those who professed to have been converted was most encouraging. They were punctual and regular in their observance of the outward ordinances of religion, in social meetings for prayer, and in seasons of retirement for private devotion.

King Pomare, not being successful in recovering his authority at Tahiti, in the autumn of 1814, returned to Eimeo, with a large number of followers, all of whom professed to be Christians. And so rapid was the progress of divine truth among the natives, that, at the close of 1814, no less than 300 hearers regularly attended the preaching of the Gospel, and about 200 were constantly receiving instruction in the different schools.

But the success of Christianity awakened the jealousy of the priests, and of those chiefs who adhered to idolatry, and a persecution broke out against the native Christians. One young man was shot at and wounded; another was seized while in a retired spot for devotion, carried off, and sacrificed to their gods! The chiefs of several districts on Tahiti entered into a conspiracy to exterminate the Christians; on hearing of which, they fled to Eimeo. But, on being invited by the rebel chiefs to return to Eimeo, Pomare and his people accompanied them, and an apparent reconciliation was effected. But, on the Sabbath, as the king and his people were at worship, they were attacked, and an obstinate engagement followed, in which the king was victorious, and the pagan party completely routed. The king, however, would not allow his men to follow up the victory, according to their former customs, to take vengeance on their enemies, but said, "It is enough."

At the close of the battle, the king directed a number of his people to proceed to the temple in which Oro, the great national idol, was deposited, and to destroy the temple, altar, idols, and every vestige of idolatry. In the evening of the same day, Pomare and the chiefs invited the Christians to assemble, and render thanks to God for the protection he had afforded them. On this occasion, they were joined by many who had, till then, been zealous worshipers of idols, but who now desired to acknowledge Jehovah as the true God.

The party sent by the king to destroy the god Oro proceeded to the temple at Tautira, and, having brought out the idol, stripped it of its sacred coverings and highly valued ornaments, and threw it contemptuously on the ground. The altars were then broken down, the temples demolished, and the sacred houses of the gods, with all their appendages, committed to the flames. The temples, altars, and idols, all around Tahiti, were soon after destroyed in the same way.

Pomare was now by universal consent restored to his government, and to supreme authority in his dominions. His clemency, on this occasion, made a strong impression on the minds of the vanquished, who concluded that it must be the new religion which had produced such a change, and unanimously expressed their determination to embrace it themselves. "The family and district temples, and altars, as well as those that were national, were demolished,—the idols destroyed by the very individuals who had but recently been so zealous for their preservation, and, in a short time, there was not one professed idolater remaining." The people were earnest in inviting the missionaries to come and instruct them in the knowledge of the Christian religion. Schools were established, and places for public worship erected, the Sabbath was observed, divine service performed, and infant murder, with all the abominations of idolatry, were discontinued.

As soon as possible after the battle, tidings of the result were conveyed to Eimeo. The missionaries were almost overcome with joy, when they learned that the Christians were safe, and hastened to render thanks to God, with feelings which it would be impossible to describe. "In that one year they reaped the harvest of sixteen laborious seed-times, sixteen dreary and anxious winters, and sixteen unproductive summers." A missionary from Eimeo was soon despatched to Tahiti. On his arrival, he found the people so anxious to hear about Jesus Christ, that they would often spend the whole night in conversation and inquiry on subjects connected with religion. The schools everywhere greatly increased, and hundreds who had been among the earliest scholars, were now engaged in imparting to others the knowledge they had received. "Aged priests and warriors, with their spelling-books in their hands, might be seen sitting on the benches in the schools, by the side, perhaps, of some smiling little boy or girl, by whom they were now taught the use of letters. Others might be often seen employed in pulling down the houses of their idols, and erecting temples for the worship of the Prince of Peace, working in companionship and harmony with those whom they had so recently met on the field of battle."

In 1816, Pomare sent most of his family idols to the missionaries, to be either burnt or sent to England, "that the people might know Tahiti's foolish gods." The idols were accordingly sent to England, and deposited in the Missionary Museum. In February of the following year, the mission was reinforced by the arrival at Tahiti of the Rev. Mr. Ellis, who expressed his astonishment at the change that had taken place. Mr. Ellis had brought with him from England a printing-press and types, and at the request of the directors of the Missionary Society had learned the art of printing. The curiosity of the natives to see the printing-press brought persons from different parts of the island, and also from Tahiti, to look at this "wonderful machine." Hundreds who had learned to read were still destitute of a book. Some had written out the whole spelling book on sheets of writing paper, while others had written the alphabet on pieces of cloth made from the bark of a tree. Pomare manifested a strong interest in the press, and rendered much assistance in the erection of the building for its accommodation. He was allowed the privilege of setting the types for the first alphabet, and of making the impression of the first sheet that issued from the press, which gave him great satisfaction.

The curiosity of the natives, excited by the establishment of the printing-press, was not easily satisfied. Pomare visited the printing-office almost every day; the chiefs requested to be admitted inside, and the windows, doors, and every crevice through which they could peep, were filled with people exclaiming, "Beritanie! fenua paari;" "O, Britain, land of skill," (or knowledge.) Multitudes from every district in Eimeo, and many from other islands, came to procure books and to see the machine which performed such wonders. For several weeks before the first portion of Scripture was finished, the district of Afareaitu, in which the printing-office was situated, resembled a public fair. The beach was lined with canoes, the houses of the inhabitants were filled to overflowing, and temporary encampments were everywhere erected. The printing-office was visited by such numbers of the strangers, that they often climbed upon each other's backs, or on the sides of the windows, so as to darken the room. So anxious were the people to obtain books, that they were constantly coming from other islands, and many waited five or six weeks rather than return without them. Most of those who received the books made them their constant companions, and read them carefully and regularly, so that they became to them the source of their highest enjoyment.

The greater portion of the inhabitants of the Georgian Islands having embraced Christianity, the missionaries proposed to the king, and to several of the leading chiefs, the plan of forming an auxiliary missionary society, which was at once approved by them, and the 13th of May, 1818, which was the anniversary of the London Missionary Society, was appointed for its organization. At sunrise, the missionaries attended a meeting for prayer in the English language. The natives, also, held one among themselves at the same hour. In the forenoon a sermon was preached in English by one of the missionaries; in the afternoon the services were entirely in the native language. Long before the appointed hour, the chapel was crowded, and the meeting was adjourned to a beautiful grove at a short distance from the chapel. Chairs were provided for the king and chiefs, and a raised stand, four or five feet from the ground, for Mr. Nott. The services commenced with singing and prayer; after which Mr. Nott delivered a short and appropriate discourse from Acts 8: 30, 31. At the conclusion, Pomare rose and addressed the multitude, referring to their former habits, and to the wonderful change which the Gospel had produced in their condition, and showing their obligation to extend the same blessing to others still in heathenish darkness. He concluded by proposing the formation of a Tahitian Missionary Society, to aid the London Missionary Society in sending the Gospel to the heathen, and requested those who approved the object to hold up their right hands. Two or three thousand hands were instantly raised. The constitution of the society, previously prepared by the missionaries, was then read; a treasurer and secretaries were chosen, and the people retired to their dwellings with excited and happy feelings.

In 1817, the mission had been reinforced with seven missionaries and their wives; and early in 1818 two of them, Messrs. Wilson and Darling, removed to Tahiti, and commenced their labors near the place from which the missionaries had been obliged to fly in 1809. New stations were also commenced in three other districts on the island of Tahiti.

Pomare had for a long time been engaged in preparing materials and erecting at Papaoa, on the island of Tahiti, a chapel 712 feet in length and 54 feet in width. The roof was supported by 36 massive pillars of the bread-fruit tree, and the sides by 280 smaller ones. The walls were composed of boards fixed perpendicularly in square sleepers, and were either smoothed with a plane or polished by rubbing with coral and sand. The building contained 133 windows and 29 doors. The floor was covered with long grass, and the area was filled with plain but substantial benches. The rafters were bound with braided cord, colored in native dyes, or covered with white matting, the ends of which hung down several feet from the upper part of the rafter, and terminated in a broad fringe. The chapel contained three pulpits, 260 feet apart, but without any partition between. It was called the Royal Mission Chapel, and was first opened for divine service on the 11th of May, 1819. A sermon was preached at the same time in each pulpit, to an audience of more than 2,000 hearers. The encampment of the multitude extended along the beach on each side of the chapel to the distance of four miles. A long aisle extended from one end of the chapel to the other, crossed in an oblique direction by a stream of water five or six feet wide. The plan of so large a place of worship originated entirely with the king, and the chapel was erected by the united efforts of the chiefs and people of Tahiti and Eimeo. When Pomare was asked why he built so large a house, he inquired "whether Solomon was not a good king, and whether he did not build a house for Jehovah superior to every edifice in Judea or in the surrounding countries."

The first baptism at the islands took place in 1819, and the king was the first subject. The ceremony was performed on Sabbath, the 6th of June, in the new chapel, in the presence of 4,000 or 5,000 people. The exercises were conducted by Messrs. Bicknell and Henry, two missionaries who had arrived in the Duff more than 22 years before. This public profession of religion by Pomare was followed by the baptism of many of the converts.

As the people had now embraced Christianity, they were desirous that their civil and judicial proceedings should be in accordance with the principles of the Christian religion. The missionaries, at the request of Pomare, assisted him and his chiefs in framing a code of laws. On the 13th of May, 1819, when a large number of people from Tahiti and Eimeo were assembled at the anniversary of the missionary society; after the meeting had been opened with prayer, the king read and explained the laws, and afterwards asked the chiefs if they assented to them. They replied, "We heartily agree to them." Then addressing the people, the king desired them, if they approved of the laws, to signify it by holding up their right hands. Thousands of arms were immediately raised. The meeting was then closed with prayer by Mr. Henry. The laws were subsequently printed on a large sheet of paper, and sent to every chief and magistrate throughout the islands, and posted up in most of the public places. After the promulgation of the new laws, two or three slight insurrections occurred, but they were easily quelled; and their authority firmly established.

In the islands of Tahiti and Eimeo, Christian churches were formed early in 1820, which, though small at first, gradually increased in numbers.

An interesting change had now taken place in the Georgian Islands, and the effects of the Christian religion were becoming more and more apparent. The appearance of the missionary station at Burder's Point, in Tahiti, is thus described by Mr. Ellis, who visited it in April, 1821: "Newly planted gardens and enclosures appeared in every direction; several good houses were finished; some were plastered and thatched, while only the frames of others were completed. A school-house and chapel had been erected. The latter was neatly finished with a gallery, the first built in the South Sea Islands. The congregation on the Sabbath consisted of about five hundred, who were generally attentive. Here, as in other stations, the singing forms an interesting part of the worship. The female voices are usually clear and distinct, but those of the men rather inclined to harshness."

With the introduction of Christianity into the Georgian Islands, a striking change took place in the habits of the natives. The females, who had until this time been treated with contempt or cruelty, and regarded as fit only for the most menial offices, now began to assume their proper station in society.

When the missionaries first went there, they were annoyed with the thievish propensities of the natives; but, after this change, Mr. Ellis, who had resided at Eimeo more than a year, remarked: "Although we had no lock, and for a long time no bolt, on our door, and though sometimes the door was left open all night, yet we do not know that a single article was stolen from us by the natives, during the eighteen months we resided among them."

The observance of the Sabbath was so marked as to attract the attention of the officers of vessels, which visited the islands. A ship arrived at Tahiti on Friday. It was soon thronged with natives, who offered fowls, fruit, and vegetables for sale. On the following day the traffic was continued, but on the third, to the astonishment of all on board, no individual came near the ship. The reason afterward assigned was, that it was the Sabbath. On Monday the intercourse was resumed again, as briskly as before.

In 1821, two laymen were sent out for the purpose of teaching the natives the useful arts; and they learned to manufacture cotton cloth, and to make lathes, looms, and spinning-wheels.

While these things were taking place at Tahiti and Eimeo, similar events were occurring at Tabuaemanu, another of the Georgian Islands. Having heard that the people of the Huahine had destroyed their idols, they resolved to do the same. In 1818, Mr. Davis, while on a voyage to Tahiti, being driven out of his course, spent nine weeks on Tabuaemanu, instructing the natives, and when he left them, appointed two of the best informed to teach the rest. In 1819, nearly all the inhabitants, with their chief, removed to Huahine, to receive religious instruction. The next year they returned to their own island.

Mr. Barff visited this island in 1822, and found the inhabitants living together in great harmony, and diligently endeavoring to improve in knowledge. Those who had been received, while at Huahine, as candidates for baptism, continued to act consistently with their profession, and frequently met together to exhort each other to love and good works. During his stay at Tabuaemanu, Mr. Barff baptized fifty-four adults, and thirty children. Two native teachers from the church at Huahine were appointed to labor among them, and on the departure of Mr. Barff nearly all the inhabitants placed themselves under their instruction. In 1823, a church of thirty-one members was formed at this station, to which thirty-five more were added in 1825. In 1833, Mr. Barff found the outward appearance of the settlement greatly improved by the erection of houses built after the European manner, with neat and well cultivated gardens. The judicious labors of the native teachers had been followed with the divine blessing, and order, harmony, and industry prevailed. A new chapel had also been built, and dedicated to the worship of God. In 1836, the church had increased to ninety members, and there were in the school seventy-six children. All the adults were under instruction, and most of them had learned to read the Scriptures.

Near the close of the year 1821, the mission in the Georgian Islands experienced a heavy bereavement in the decease of the king Pomare II. He was the first convert, and proved a steady friend of the missionaries; but towards the close of his life he contracted a fondness for spirituous liquors, which proved a snare to him. On his death-bed, being reminded of the number and magnitude of his sins, and directed to Jesus Christ, he replied, "Jesus Christ alone," and shortly after expired. He was succeeded by his son, Pomare III., only four years old, who was crowned with Christian ceremonies. He lived, however, but about a year and a half, and was succeeded by a daughter of his father, who was afterwards married to the young chief Tahaa, to whom her father had given his own name.

In March 1824, the South Sea Academy was established at Eimeo, by the Deputation from the Missionary Society, the primary design of which was to furnish a suitable education to the children of the missionaries. Native children also of piety and talent had access to its advantages, and it was intended as preparatory to a seminary for training native pastors.

In 1829, nineteen years after the natives became Christians, the Rev. Mr. Stewart visited the Georgian Islands, as chaplain of the United States' frigate Vincennes. After giving an account of the schools, and the public services on the Sabbath, he adds, "A single glance around was sufficient to convince the most skeptical observer of the success and benefit of missions to the heathen; for it could not be made without meeting the plainest demonstration, that such can be rescued from all the rudeness and wildness of their original condition, can be brought to a state of cleanliness and modesty in their personal appearance, can be taught to read and write; for many, besides the intelligent and familiar use of the Scriptures and their hymn-book, took notes in pencil of the sermon delivered; in a word, can be transformed into all that civilization and Christianity vouchsafes to man."

In 1835, there was an awakening, and the houses of the missionaries were thronged with those who desired to be instructed in the way of life. Some of these were wild men and women from the mountains; but among those who desired admission to the church were the queen, her husband, and her mother. In Dec. of this year, the translation of the Scriptures was completed, and Mr. Nott went to England to superintend the printing, as well as to recover his health. In 1836, there were, in Tahiti, nearly two thousand natives in church fellowship; two-thirds of the people could read; a great number of them had learned to write; and the schools and chapels were well attended.

An attempt was made in 1836 to introduce Catholic priests into the Georgian Islands, but the queen refused them permission to remain, and ordered them to depart in the same vessel in which they came. But Mr. Moerenhaut, the American consul, received them, and placed them in a house where they locked themselves in. The officers of the queen, however, lifted off the roof, and took them out by force, and put them on board the ship. In 1837, a second attempt was made by an American ship, from Boston, commanded by Capt. Williams, who undertook to force two Catholic priests upon the queen, in which he was aided by the American consul. Because she would not receive them, he demanded $2,000 damages, and threatened to send a man-of-war to enforce the demand. The queen wrote a letter to President Van Buren, complaining of the conduct of Mr. Moerenhaut, and the president promptly removed him, and appointed Samuel R. Blackley in his room.

Mr. Moerenhaut, however, was rewarded for his zeal in behalf of the Catholics, with the French Consulate. The French frigate, Venus, was ordered to proceed from the South American station to punish the insults offered at Tahiti to the subjects of His Most Christian Majesty. The captain, on his arrival, ordered the queen to send on board his frigate $2,000; to write to the king of France an humble letter of apology; and to permit all French subjects to reside on the island, on the most favorable terms. The deck of the frigate having been cleared for action, these requisitions, as well as some others, were enforced by threats of the immediate destruction of the town; and the queen was obliged to borrow the money to meet this unexpected demand.

Captain Harvey, master of a whaling vessel who visited Tahiti, in May, 1839, gives the following testimony to the good effects of missionary labor on the island:—"This is the most civilized place that I have been at in the South Seas; it is governed by a queen, daughter of old Pomare, a dignified young lady, about 25 years of age. They have a good code of laws; no spirits whatever are allowed to be landed on the island; therefore the sailors have no chance of getting drunk, and are all in an orderly state, and work goes on properly. It is one of the most gratifying sights the eye can witness on a Sunday in their church, which holds about 5,000, to see the queen near the pulpit, and all her subjects around her decently appareled, and in seemingly pure devotion. I really never felt such a conviction of the great benefit of missionary labors before. The attire of the women is as near the English as they can copy."

Such was the state of things in these islands, previous to the introduction of the French protectorate, which has been the means of opening the floodgates of iniquity, and of embarrassing and finally breaking up the mission. This measure appears to have been brought about, through the combined influence of rumsellers and Catholic priests. It is stated in the report for 1843, that the French and American Consuls had determined to break through all restrictions; and in spite of law, they had openly forced the sale of spirits. "I have seen more drunkenness," says a missionary, "at Eimeo, the last six months, than in seven years before." The first French outrage was committed, as already stated, in consequence of the Queen's refusing to permit two Catholic priests to remain on the island, in the exercise of her undoubted right of sovereignty. This was in August, 1838. In April, '39, the Artemise, another French frigate, put into Papeete for repairs; and after receiving the aid of the natives, and the kind hospitality of the government, for three months, these acts of kindness were repaid by obliging the queen to abrogate the law excluding Papists from settling on the island, under threat of overturning her government. In May, 1842, Tahiti was visited by the French ship of war, L'Aube, under the command of Capt. Dubuset, who compelled the queen to disband her police force, because the commander of a French whaler had been put in confinement for drunkenness and riot. On the first of September, of the same year, the French ship of war, Reine Blanche, of 60 guns, Admiral A. Dupetit Thouars, arrived at Papeete, with professions of peace. After a few days, the queen, who was at Eimeo, daily expecting confinement, with the principal chiefs, were invited to come to Papeete, that the Admiral might pay his respects to them. The principal chiefs came and dined on board, on the 8th, it being understood that a meeting or conference was to be held the next day. The same evening, the British vice-consul and the American consul were notified of probable hostilities. During the night, a secret meeting was held between the French and four principal chiefs, at which the latter were induced to sign a document, addressed to the Admiral, soliciting the protection of the French, ostensibly leaving the internal affairs of the government in the hands of the queen, and stipulating for the freedom of religion and the protection of the English missionaries; but leaving all affairs concerning foreign governments, foreign residents, port regulations, &c., with officers appointed by the French government; thus, in reality, nullifying the stipulation concerning the English missionaries. The Admiral demanded the queen's signature to this surrender of her sovereignty, or a fine of $10,000 for alleged injuries; and if she did not comply with one or the other of these demands in 24 hours, he threatened to plant the French flag and capture the island. The queen signed the document just one hour before the firing was to have commenced. A supreme council of three Frenchmen was appointed, from whom there was no appeal but to the king of France; and a proclamation was issued, threatening with banishment from the island, any person who should, by word or deed, prejudice the people against the French government. Under such laws, we can see how easy it would be, at any time, to find a pretext for annoying the missionaries. This gross outrage called forth protests and expressions of sympathy from most of the Protestant Missionary Societies in Great Britain and on the continent of Europe, as well as of the American Board; and appeals were made by the Directors of the Society to the Governments of France and Great Britain.

On the 15th of January, 1843, Tahiti was visited by the British frigate Talbot, Sir Thomas Thompson, Captain, by whom a meeting was convened of the queen and principal chiefs, at which the French and American Consuls were present, to confer upon the changes that had taken place. By request of the queen, the meeting was opened with prayer. A letter was read from the British Admiral, expressing the sympathies of the Queen of England toward Queen Pomare; and, in answer to inquiries, the principal chiefs of each district declared that Queen Pomare was their only sovereign; that they desired to be on friendly terms with all nations, but that, if she required aid of any nation, it was her intention to seek it of Great Britain. And even the chiefs who signed the request for French protection declared that they did not desire the aid of the French, but that they signed the request because they were teased to do so.

On the 2d of November, following, Admiral Dupetit Thouars paid a second visit to Papeete, with three men of war, and demanded the removal of the emblem of the queen's sovereignty from the national colors, which she resolutely refused to do; whereupon the gallant Admiral declared that she had ceased to reign, and took possession of the island in the name of the king of the French. The queen issued her proclamation, ordering her subjects to offer no resistance. The British Consul struck his flag, and protested against these proceedings. The French government refused to sanction this act; but the French Protectorate still remained, to the lasting disgrace of that nation. The French authorities, allying themselves with the most unprincipled portion of the chiefs, have been able to secure the passage of laws, purporting to come from a native legislative body, to suit their own nefarious designs, and subversive even of the original conditions of their own proposing.

These events were followed by continued acts of aggression, on the part of the French; which, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the missionaries, and the commands of the queen, led to resistance on the part of the natives; and the fairer portions of the island were desolated by the French.

Early in the year 1844, Queen Pomare took refuge from the insults and hostility of the French on board a British vessel, where she remained six months, and afterwards sailed in the Carysfoot to Raiatea. On the 2d of May, Rev. Henry Nott, one of the missionaries who first landed at Tahiti, in 1796, was called to his rest, and on the 30th of June, Rev. T. S. McKean was accidentally shot by one of the native soldiers. A number of stations were at this time broken up, and others reduced very low, and several of the missionaries returned to England.

The French continued to exercise full sovereignty, till January, 1845, when, in consequence of instructions from government, this claim was nominally abandoned, but one of the most corrupt and unprincipled of the chiefs was named "Regent," and affairs were carried on in the queen's name, though really by the French; and many arbitrary regulations were introduced, among which was one, changing the Sabbath from Sunday to Monday; and another prohibiting the missionaries to travel in the island without a passport.

In 1845, the French attempted to introduce the protectorate at the Society Islands, where they met with a decided resistance, in consequence of which they blockaded some of the ports. But subsequently the independence of these islands was guaranteed by the French and English governments; yet the latter, to the surprise and grief of good men, acknowledged the protectorate of the French in the Georgian Islands.

In 1846, in revenge for an attack by the natives on Papeete, Governor Bruat drove them into the mountains, and destroyed every vestige of civilization and fertility in the country below. Every house was leveled, and every tree cut down and burnt. And while the better portion of the natives were thus hewed down, those who submitted to French rule were seduced into the vices of the invaders, and intemperance and licentiousness prevailed in their most loathsome forms.

In December, 1846, the patriot forces of Tahiti, seeing no possibility of successful resistance, surrendered to the French; the queen returned, and an attempt was made to resuscitate the mission. In 1849 the new French governor under the Republic arrived, and at first he appeared friendly to the missionaries, but afterwards he employed his authority and influence to prevent the natives repairing their houses of worship, or making contributions for the diffusion of the Gospel; and from one district, where there were two Catholic priests, they were entirely excluded, lest there should be controversy about religion! But amid all these troubles the Tahitian churches received numerous accessions, and exhibited progressive improvements in Christian character; 109 members were added to the church at Papaoa, in six months, and 134 at Papeete; and the queen has maintained her Christian character throughout, in these most trying circumstances.

The missionaries continued to be subjected to the harrassing interference of the French authorities, while an influence was exerted by the latter upon the natives, exceedingly prejudicial to good morals and social order. At length, in 1852, a law was enacted, removing the choice of pastors from the members of the churches to the principal chiefs. The missionaries of the London Missionary Society were likewise denied the privilege allowed by others of preaching the Gospel in their own houses. The missionaries regarding this as a violation of treaty stipulations with Great Britain, as well as of every principle of religious liberty, retired from the island, leaving Mr. Howe in charge of the mission property and of the theological seminary at Papeete. A number of native pastors, educated at this seminary, had, however, previously been ordained, and several of the superannuated missionaries remained at different places, where the churches had native pastors.

It will readily be perceived that the state of confusion into which this group of islands has been thrown by these outrages and oppressive proceedings must have proved disastrous to the missionary work. It has certainly been the means of the dissolution of morals, the destruction of good order, and of strengthening every evil influence. And yet the work of God has not been destroyed. The following table will show the state of the churches before the giving up of the mission:—

The returns in regard to schools and attendance on public worship are very incomplete. The number of communicants is probably below the fact, the churches having been much scattered during these trials. At Bunaauia, there was an extensive awakening in 1850, which was much accelerated by Mr. Darling's farewell sermon, on his departure for England, and which resulted in the addition to the church of about 80. An institution for raising up a native ministry has been maintained for many years at Papeete, which promises to supply native pastors for these churches. Five of them were called to the pastoral office in 1851, and 8 more were in the institution, making good progress in their studies.

Society Islands.—When the missionaries were obliged to flee from Tahiti in 1808, they spent some time at Huahine; and in 1814, Messrs. Nott and Hayward made a second visit, and were welcomed, and their instructions listened to with serious attention. Afterwards, Mr. Wilson and Pomare, while sailing from Fimeo, were driven to Huahine, where they spent three months in preaching the Gospel and persuading the natives to abandon their idols. In June, 1818, Messrs. Davies, Williams, Ormond and Ellis, accompanied by a number of the principal chiefs of Eimeo, sailed from that island to Huahine for the purpose of establishing a mission there. On landing, the missionaries found that, with one or two exceptions, the natives had renounced idolatry, and, in profession at least, had become Christians. Infanticide, and some of the most degrading vices had been discontinued. The people, however, were not yet fully acquainted with the nature of Christianity, and were only partially under the influence of its moral restraints. The outward change which had taken place was owing to the example and efforts of Tamatoa, the king of Raiatea, and certain other chiefs who had been with him at Tahiti and Eimeo. Soon after his return, Tamatoa publicly renounced his idols and declared himself a believer in Jehovah and Jesus Christ. Several of the chiefs and a number of the people followed his example. Here, however, as in Tahiti, the idolatrous chiefs and inhabitants resorted to arms in defence of the gods. Exasperated at the destruction of Oro, their great national idol, they determined to make war upon the Christians and to put them all to death. Having erected a house, and enclosed it with the trunks of cocoanut and bread-fruit trees, they resolved to thrust the Christians into it, and burn them alive. Tamatoa sent frequent overtures of peace, but the invariable reply was, "There is no peace for god-burners, until they have felt the effects of the fire which destroyed Oro." The attack was made by the idolaters in canoes, early in the morning, while the Christians were at prayers. While the idolaters were landing, the Christians rushed to the shore, and extended their little army as far as it would reach. The boldness of this movement filled the assailants with consternation. After a short resistance, they threw away their arms and fled for their lives, expecting to meet with the same barbarous treatment which they would have inflicted had they been the conquerors. Perceiving, however, that those who had fallen into the hands of the Christians sustained no injury, they came forward and threw themselves on the mercy of the victors. As the prisoners were conducted into the presence of the chief, a herald who stood by his side, shouted, "Welcome! welcome! you are saved by Jesus, and the influence of the religion of mercy which we have embraced!" When the chief who had led the heathen party was taken, and conducted, pale and trembling, into the presence of Tamatoa, he exclaimed, "Am I dead?" His fears were, however, soon dissipated by the reply, "No, brother; cease to tremble; you are saved by Jesus!" The Christians soon prepared a feast for them, consisting of a hundred baked pigs, and a large quantity of bread-fruit. But so overcome were the prisoners by the kindness with which they were treated, that but few of them were able to partake of the food. One of them rose from the table, and declared his determination never again to worship the gods who could not protect them in the hour of danger. "We were," said he, "four times the number of the praying people, yet they have conquered us with the greatest ease. Jehovah is the true God. Had we conquered them, they would at this moment have been burning in the house we made strong for the purpose. But instead of injuring us, or our wives or children, they have prepared for us this sumptuous feast. Theirs is a religion of mercy. I will go and unite myself to this people." A similar feeling seemed to pervade the whole company. That very night they bowed their knees, and united with the Christians in returning thanks to God for the victory he had given them. On the following morning, the Christians and the heathen joined their efforts to demolish the gods and marae, and three days after the battle every vestige of idolatry was destroyed.

The inhabitants of Tahaa, Borabora, and Huahine soon followed the example of the Raiateans, demolishing their temples and burning their gods. A number of the chiefs and people of Borabora and Raiatea visited Manua, the most westerly of the Society Islands, and succeeded in persuading the inhabitants to destroy their temples and idols. The reign of idolatry in this group was now at an end. In one year the system of false worship, which had so long prevailed, was abolished, and most of the people adopted the external forms of Christianity.

Soon after the arrival of the missionaries at Huahine, Tamatoa, king of Raiatea, visited them, in order to persuade some of them to remove to these islands; and Messrs. Williams and Threlkeld accompanied him to Raiatea. Immediately on the introduction of the Gospel, the natives began to lay aside their idle habits, and to cultivate the arts of civilized life. They began the cultivation of cotton and sugar-cane; and in October, 1818, they followed the example of the Tahitians in the formation of a missionary society. The missionaries soon acquired a sufficient knowledge of the language to preach to the natives, of whom they had large and attentive congregations. A flourishing school was also sustained.

A carpenter's shop had been erected, the forge was in daily operation, and a large place of worship was building. The missionaries had erected dwellings for themselves, the framework of which was of wood, wattled, and plastered with lime made of coral. "It was my determination when I left England," says Mr. Williams, "to have as respectable a dwelling as I could erect, for the missionary does not go to barbarize himself, but to civilize the heathen. He ought not therefore to sink down to their standard, but to elevate them to his."

A house similar to that of Mr. Williams' was soon after built for Tamatoa, which was the first of the kind erected for their own abode by any of the natives of the South Sea Islands. A plastered house was soon after finished on the island of Huahine, in the district of Fare. The success of the individuals who had built houses encouraged others to follow their example, and the settlements in the Leeward Islands soon began to assume a new aspect. The people of these islands were also occupied in building chapels for the worship of God. The edifice erected for this purpose in Raiatea was more than one hundred feet in length and forty-two feet in width. It was completed and opened for divine service early in the year 1820, when upwards of 2,400 inhabitants of that and the adjacent islands assembled within its walls. By the ingenuity of the missionaries, it was subsequently furnished with a rustic set of chandeliers, the frames of which were of light wood and opaque cocoanut shells. The chapel in Huahine, 100 feet long and 60 wide, was also finished and opened in May of this year. The walls were plastered within and without, and the windows closed with sliding shutters. All classes had cheerfully united in the work, and the king of the island, with his son, a youth of seventeen, were daily employed in directing the laborers or using the plane and chisel themselves.

The old chapel was converted into a school-house, and two other buildings were afterwards erected, one for the boys' school and the other for the girls'. Schools were also established in the other islands of the group, and the improvement of the pupils became daily more and more perceptible. The same eagerness to obtain books was manifested here as in the Windward Islands, and nothing could exceed the delight with which the treasure was received by those who were so fortunate as to obtain one. And the same general improvement was manifest in the people as has been described at the Georgian Islands, in the adoption of the dress and habits of civilization. But in no respect was the change in the South Sea Islanders more apparent than in their manner of spending the Sabbath. It was customary for those who resided at a distance to repair to the settlement before the Sabbath. On a Saturday afternoon, parties from every direction were seen approaching the missionary station, either by sea or by land. The shore was lined with canoes, and the encampment of natives along the beach presented a scene of bustling activity. Their food for the Sabbath was all prepared on Saturday, and carefully placed in baskets. Their calabashes were filled with fresh water, their fruit was gathered, and bundles of the broad hibiscus leaf were collected to serve instead of plates. The dwellings of the natives appeared more than usually neat and clean, and at an early hour the preparations for the Sabbath were completed. No visits were made on the Sabbath, and no company entertained; nor was any fire kindled except in case of sickness. This strict observance of the Sabbath was never directly enjoined by the missionaries. It was no doubt partly attributable to the example of their teachers, but with many it was probably the result of impressions left on their minds by their former superstitious system. While they were heathen, their religion consisted in a great measure in the strict observance of sacred days, and the punctilious performance of ceremonies. But some of them were actuated by conscientious Christian motives.

The private devotions of the natives on the Sabbath were finished by sunrise; and soon after that time the greater part of the inhabitants assembled for their weekly prayer-meeting. Often 600 or 800 were present. The meeting was generally conducted by a native, one perhaps who had formerly been an idolatrous priest. The singing of a hymn, and the reading of a portion of Scripture, were followed by prayers of the most appropriate and touching character. At eight o'clock, the children assembled in the Sabbath-school, where they remained an hour. They were then conducted to the chapel, each class walking in pairs with its teacher. A particular portion of the chapel was assigned to the Sabbath-school scholars, and here they all quietly seated themselves, waiting for the commencement of public worship. In the afternoon they again assembled in the schools to read the Scriptures, and to repeat hymns and the catechism. They were also questioned as to their recollection of the morning sermon, and it was often surprising to see the readiness with which they would repeat not only the text, but the divisions, and often the leading thoughts of the discourse. At the close of the school the afternoon worship was held. A weekly lecture was also delivered, which was always well attended. A sea captain, who was present at one of these meetings, says, "The most perfect order reigned the whole time of the service. The devout attention which these poor people paid to what was going forward, and the earnestness with which they listened to their teacher, would shame an English congregation."

A meeting was held every week for the instruction of those who wished to make a public profession of religion; besides which there were occasional meetings for conversation. At these the natives inquired the meaning of different passages of Scripture, and asked other questions on miscellaneous subjects.

The baptism of the first converts in the Society Islands took place in Huahine, in September, 1819. Mahine, the principal chief of the island, was among the number. The name of every individual was formerly descriptive of some event or quality, and many of them were significant of something blasphemous, idolatrous, or impure. These the missionaries advised the people to renounce, and select those by which in future they wished to be called. Scriptural names were in general chosen by the adults for themselves and their children. After the first baptism, an address, on the nature of the ordinance and the duties of those who received it, was printed and widely circulated, apparently with good effect. The weekly meeting for those who desired baptism was continued, and, after the first administration of this rite, the number of those attending it was greatly increased. Many, who had previously been indifferent to religion, now seemed in earnest to obtain it, and not only in Huahine but in the other missionary stations, a general desire to obtain the favor of God seemed to prevail among the people. "Often," says Mr. Ellis, "have we been aroused at break of day, by persons coming to inquire what they must do to be saved." Many, who at that time were awakened and professed conversion, have ever since given evidence of being actuated by Christian principle; but some having been baptized, were disposed to rest satisfied without making greater attainments. It therefore became necessary for the missionaries to lengthen the term of probation, and in some instances persons have been candidates more than two years.

This first awakening in the Society Islands occurred in the years 1819 and 1820. Early in May, 1820, the first Christian church in this group was organized at Huahine, and on the following Sabbath 16 persons, who gave evidence of a saving change, united for the first time with the missionaries in the commemoration of the death of Christ, in the presence of several hundreds, who by their thoughtful and serious countenances evinced how deeply they were affected by it. The annual meeting of the Missionary Society in Huahine was held soon after the formation of the church. The subscriptions amounted to between 3,000 and 4,000 gallons of oil, besides cotton and other articles. In February of the following year, four of the converts, who had long been consistent Christians, were set apart to the office of deacons, and proved valuable assistants to the missionaries. So general had the interest in religious things become, that wherever the people were collected, religion was the topic of conversation. The houses of the missionaries were sometimes thronged at day-break by those whose minds were distressed, and often, after they had retired to rest, some would come to their doors and beg for instruction. A great change had taken place in these once degraded islanders. The aged and the sick, who had formerly been treated with the greatest neglect and cruelty, were now nursed with care by their relatives and children. In some of the islands, benevolent societies were formed among the natives, for the purpose of building houses for the poor, and supplying with food and clothing the sick who had no friends to take care of them. Besides this, they were visited by persons who read the Scriptures and prayed with them, so that their last days were cheered by the precious consolations of the Gospel. Parental restraint and discipline began also to receive attention. The mothers endeavored to influence their children and gain their affection by kindness. The fathers sometimes resorted to harsher measures.

But there were some young men who did not relish the restraints which Christianity had imposed upon them; and they entered into a conspiracy to murder the missionaries and overturn the government. They were, however, detected, and the chiefs held a meeting and determined to put the ringleaders to death. But the missionaries interceded for their lives, and, after a whole day's discussion, the chiefs yielded. In the course of conversation, the chiefs inquired what the English people would do in such circumstances, and were informed that in England there were established laws, by which all offenders were tried before judges appointed for the purpose. They then wished to know what judges and laws were, and when the subject was explained to them, they said, "Why cannot we have the same?" A temporary judge was then appointed, by whom the criminals were tried, and the ringleaders sentenced to four years banishment on an uninhabited island.

A code of laws was soon after prepared by the missionaries, and recognized by the chiefs and people of Raiatea. It was publicly proclaimed in May, 1820. At a national assembly, held in Huahine in May, 1821, a code of laws similar to that adopted in Raiatea was promulgated in that island also, under the authority of the queen, the governor, and the chiefs. These laws met with the approbation of the people; but there were a number of dissolute young men, who did not relish the restraints which these laws imposed on their appetites and passions. The practice of tattooing, on account of its connection with idolatry and with certain vices, had been prohibited. It was discovered that 46 young men had been marking themselves, not from any desire to ornament their persons, but from impatience of the restraint of law. They were publicly tried, and sentenced to build a certain quantity of stone work, as a punishment. A day or two afterwards, it was discovered that Taaroarii, the king's son, a youth about eighteen years of age, had also been tattooed. This was considered as evidence of a determination to oppose his father, and produced a strong sensation among the people. The father, a venerable old man, was deeply agitated by a struggle between affection and duty. The latter prevailed, and his son was brought to trial. His punishment was the same as that of the others. In the month of August, he withdrew from the place of punishment, with a number of the culprits, to Parea, in the northern part of the island. There they were joined by the son of the king of Raiatea, a young man twenty-six years of age, and by a large party of associates. These proceedings seemed to indicate that a formidable rebellion was about to break out. A public council of the chiefs and people was held, and, after several interesting and affecting speeches, it was determined that kindness should be mingled with decision. An armed force was sent, with orders to reason with the malcontents, and invite them to return to their duty, and to resort to arms only in case of resistance. The insurrection was quelled without violence. The rebels surrendered and were brought back as captives. Two days after, they were tried and sentenced to public labor, with police officers to guard them. On the evening after the trial, the weekly service was thronged by great numbers of the people, and their attention was directed to the history of Abimelech's rebellion. The turbulence of these disinclined young men having been repressed without any bloodshed, the supremacy of the laws was firmly and permanently established.

Slight insurrections, similar to that which was excited in Huahine, occurred in Tahaa and some of the other islands; but, since the introduction of Christianity, peace has prevailed for a much longer period than was ever before known. Their love for peace is expressed in terms like the following: "Let our hands forget how to lift the club or throw the spear. Let our guns decay with rust, we do not want them; though we have been pierced with balls or spears, if we pierce each other now, let it be with the word of God. How happy are we now; we sleep not with our cartridges under our heads, our muskets by our sides, and our hearts palpitating with alarm. We have the Bible, we know the Saviour, and if all knew him, if all obeyed him, there would be no more war."

In 1821, Taaroarii, the king's only son, died, as he had lived, without the Christian hope, much to the grief of his aged father.

During the year 1837, the most happy effects were observable in the improved moral state of the people at Huahine. Numbers came forward and offered themselves as candidates for baptism; nearly all of whom were from that class who had lived in the practice of the most debasing vices. A considerable addition was also made to the church, chiefly from among the young. The schools were better attended by adults and children than in former years, and a desire for knowledge, particularly for religious knowledge, was much increased among all classes. At Borabora, also, a great interest in religious things was manifested, and in 1838, more than 100 members were admitted to church-fellowship.

sustained a great loss in the death of Mahine, the chief of that island. He was nearly 80 years of age, and, from the time when he became a Christian, he had been a steady, active, and consistent member of the church. For several years he had been a deacon, and had discharged the duties of that office with great faithfulness. He showed a sincere and strong attachment to the missionaries, and on several occasions hazarded his life in defence of the truth which they preached. In the prospect of death, he was calm and composed. In reply to one who asked him how he felt, he said, "Christ is my resting-place; the fear of death is removed; I have taken leave of all things here, and am waiting and praying for the Lord to take me."

Since that time, the mission to these islands has been subject to various vicissitudes of decline and advancement. Their proximity to the Georgian group has subjected them to the injurious influence of the excitement created by the French outrages; and they have not been unmolested, the attempt having been unsuccessfully made to subject them to the Protectorate. There has, however, on the whole, been a steady advancement of the work. In 1851, all the stations were reported in a prosperous condition. But in 1852, owing to the tyranny of the queen of Huahine, she was deposed, and the chief Teururai, a mild man, and a member of the church, was chosen in her place. A young man named Otara, who had been one of the principal agents in bringing about this change, was appointed prime minister, and several of his relations were appointed to offices of trust. These men sought the repeal of the laws prohibiting licentiousness and the use of ardent spirits. This led to a civil war, in which, however, Teururai was victorious, and the laws sustained. Yet, amid this confusion, the church members generally adorned their profession. Raiatea, also, the same year, was afflicted with a civil war, arising out of a quarrel between the king and one of his principal chiefs.

Harvey Islands.—In 1821, two natives were set apart with appropriate religious services, at the Society Islands, and sent to Aitutaki.

Mr. Williams accompanied them, who found the natives exhibiting in their manners all the features of savage life. Mr. Williams related to the chief, to his astonishment, what had transpired on the other islands, and the teachers were kindly received, with promises of protection. For some time, however, they labored in great discouragement, suffering much from the persecution of the natives. But, while the old chief was engaged in an idolatrous feast of several weeks' continuance, his daughter was taken dangerously ill. Offerings were immediately presented to the gods; and to induce them to restore the child to health, their favor was invoked from morning till evening. The disease, however, increased, and the girl died. The old chief, incensed at the ingratitude of the gods in requiting his zeal with such unkindness, determined at once to abandon them, and the next day sent his son to set fire to his marae. Two other maraes near it took fire and were also consumed. On the Sabbath, after the death of the chief's daughter, the people of several districts brought their idols to the teachers, and professed themselves worshipers of Jehovah. Others followed their example, and at the close of the week there was not a professed idolater on the island. Fifteen months after the arrival of the teachers at Aitutaki, a general meeting of the inhabitants was convened at the request of Papeiha. In an address to the assembly, he spoke of the immense labor they had formerly bestowed in the erection of their maraes and in the worship of their gods, and exhorted them to let their "strength, devotedness, and steadfastness in the service of the true God far exceed." He then proposed that all the maraes in the island should be burned, and the idols be brought to him that he might send them to Raiatea, and also that they should immediately commence building a house for the worship of Jehovah. To both these proposals the multitude assented. At the close of the meeting, a general conflagration of the maraes took place, and on the following morning not a single temple remained. The whole population then came in procession, district after district, the chief and the priest leading the way, and the people following them, leaving their rejected idols, which they laid at the teachers' feet, and received in return copies of the Gospels and elementary books. The missionaries at Raiatea, hearing of the success of the native teachers at Aitutaki, resolved to visit them, and to attempt the introduction of the Gospel into every island of that group. In July, 1823, Messrs. Bourne and Williams, with six natives who had been solemnly set apart as teachers, sailed from Raiatea, and after a pleasant passage of five days, arrived at Aitutaki. A number of canoes filled with men crowded around the vessel, saluting the missionaries with such expressions as these: "Good is the Word of God; it is now well with Aitutaki!

The good word has taken root at Aitutaki." The teachers soon came on board, and informed Mr. Williams of the destruction of the idols and temples, and added that the Sabbath was regarded as a sacred day, that all the people attended divine service, and that family prayer was very general throughout the island.

Soon after, Messrs. Williams and Bourne, with two native teachers and several natives of Rarotongo set sail for that island; and after six or eight days' fruitless search for it, they landed at Mangaia; where, after being received in a friendly manner, the native teachers were stripped of every thing they had, and obliged to reëmbark. A few months afterwards, two other native teachers went to the island, and found the people prepared to receive them; a fatal epidemic having broken out, which they attributed to the anger of God for their treatment of the teachers. Though meeting with opposition for some time, the Gospel was ultimately successful at this island. When Mr. Williams left Mangaia, after his first visit in 1823, he proceeded to Atiu, where two native teachers had been sent two or three months before. He found them in a most pitiable condition. They had been stripped by the natives of all their property, had suffered exceedingly from hunger, and become very much disheartened by their want of success. The chief came on board, where he met a native convert, who astonished him by relating what had taken place, in the burning of idols, in Aitutaki; and Mr. Williams commented upon what is said by David and Isaiah in reference to idols, by which the mind of Rotane was powerfully impressed; especially by the words, "With part thereof he roasteth roast and is satisfied; and the residue thereof he maketh a god, and worshipeth it, and prayeth unto it, and saith, Deliver me, for thou art my god." The effect of this striking passage of Scripture on the mind of the heathen chief, was powerfully expressed by the language in which it was uttered. There are in that language two words, similar in sound but expressing opposite ideas, moa and noa, the former meaning sacred, and the latter profane or common. All that pertains to the gods is the superlative of moa, and all that relates to food the superlative of noa. The chief now saw, for the first time, the folly of making a god and cooking food from the same tree, thus uniting two opposite extremes, the moa and the noa. For some time he appeared lost in wonder. At length he retired, and spent the whole of the night in conversation with the Aitutakians about the wonderful truths he had heard, frequently rising up and stamping with astonishment that he should have been so long deluded. His idol gods he determined never again to worship. "Eyes, it is true," said he, "they have, but wood cannot see; ears, they have, but wood cannot hear." He expressed a determination to demolish his maraes, to burn his idols, and to commence immediately the erection of a house for the worship of Jehovah. Leaving Atiu, Mr. Williams sailed in search of the two small islands Mitiaro and Mauke, taking with him the newly converted Romatane, who was king of those islands also. On arriving at Mitiaro, the king had an interview with the resident chief of the island, to whom he stated that the object of his visit was to exhort him and his people to burn their maraes, and abandon the worship of their false gods. He wished also that they would place themselves under the instruction of a Christian teacher, and convert the house they were erecting for himself into a house of prayer. The people listened with astonishment, and inquired if the gods would not all be enraged and strangle them. "No," replied the king, "it is out of the power of the wood, that we have adorned and called a god, to kill us."

Sailing from Mitiaro, Mr. Williams proceeded to Mauke, where he found the people waiting on the shore to welcome their king. The first words of Romatane were, "I am come to advise you to receive the word of Jehovah, the true God, and to leave with you a teacher and his wife who will instruct you. Let us destroy our maraes, and burn all the evil spirits with fire: never let us worship them again. They are wood, which we have carved and decorated, and called gods. Here is the true God and his word, and a teacher to instruct you. The true God is Jehovah, and the true sacrifice is his Son Jesus Christ." The people listened with astonishment, but said that as the king assured them it was a "good word" which he brought, they would receive it. It was determined to leave here a native teacher with his wife, to whom the king presented a new house which had been erected for himself, and commending them to the care of the chief, he returned to the vessel and shortly afterwards departed. These islands were afterwards visited, and found to have wholly abandoned idolatry, and to have adopted the habits of Christian people.

The Gospel had now been introduced into five of the Hervey Islands, but Rarotonga, the largest island of the group, remained undiscovered. Mr. Williams inquired of Romatane if he had ever heard of it, and learning from this chief the direction in which it lay, he determined to go again in search of it. He sailed on this voyage in 1823, and after having been so long tossed about by contrary winds as to be on the point of giving up all hope of accomplishing his object, he was at last delighted with the sight of the lofty mountains and beautiful valleys of this lovely island. A boat was soon sent on shore with Papeiha, another teacher, and one of the Rarotongans whom Mr. Williams had found at Aitutaki. Meeting with a favorable reception, they immediately stated to the people who gathered around them in great numbers, the object of their visit. Having informed them of the renunciation of idolatry at the other islands of that group, the teachers proposed to the natives that they also should receive Christian instruction, and become acquainted with the way of salvation through Jesus Christ. The proposition was agreed to, and Makea the king came on board to conduct the teachers to the shore. He was introduced to his own people who had come with Mr. Williams, among whom was his cousin. Early the next morning the teachers and their wives came off to the vessel in a most pitiable condition, and related the sad treatment which they, and especially the females, had received during the night. A powerful chief who had conquered the principal part of the island had heard of their arrival, and had come with a large retinue to take away one of the female teachers, for the purpose of making her his wife. He had already nineteen wives, and the teacher was to be the twentieth.

Tapaireu, the cousin of Makea, was a person of much influence, and to her exertions the preservation of the females was owing. Discouraged by the roughness of their reception, the teachers would have abandoned this field of labor had not Papeiha, when the chiefs expressed a desire that they should stay, offered to remain alone on the island on condition that his friend Tiberio should be sent from Raiatea to his assistance. This was readily promised, and Papeiha, after taking leave of his friends, got into a canoe and went on shore carrying nothing with him but the clothes he wore, his native Testament, and a bundle of elementary books.

Papeiha was conducted to the house of Makea, and was followed by an immense crowd, one of whom cried out, "I'll have his hat;" another, "I'll have his jacket;" a third, "I'll have his shirt." Before they were able to carry their threats into execution, they were met by the chief, who, addressing Papeiha, said, "Speak to us, O man! that we may know the business on which you have come." The teacher replied that he had come to instruct them in the knowledge of the true God, and the way of salvation through Jesus Christ, that they might burn their idols as the inhabitants of Tahiti and other islands had done. The multitude cried out with surprise and horror, "What! burn the gods! What gods shall we then have, and what shall we do without the gods?"

After five months, Tiberio, Papeiha's friend, arrived, and they visited together all the chiefs on the island, explaining to them the principles of Christianity. Carrying this plan into effect, at some places they were kindly treated, at others ridiculed, while from some they narrowly escaped with their lives. A few days after their return to the station, a priest came to the teachers and expressed a determination to burn his idols, and requested permission to place his son, a boy of ten years of age, under their care, lest the gods in their anger should destroy him. Leaving the child with the teachers, he returned home, and next morning came bending under the weight of the god he was bringing to be burned. A crowd followed, calling him a madman, but he persisted in his resolution to embrace Christianity, and threw his idol at the teachers' feet. One of the teachers brought a saw to cut it up, but as soon as the people saw the instrument applied to the head of the god, they became frightened and ran away. In a short time they returned, and in the presence of an immense multitude the first rejected idol of Rarotonga was committed to the flames. So great an effect was produced on the minds of the people by this event, that in less than ten days after it occurred 14 idols were destroyed. Immediately afterwards the chief Tinomana sent for the teachers, and informed them that after much deliberation he had concluded to embrace Christianity, and to place himself under their instruction. He therefore wished to know what was the first step towards becoming a Christian. Being told that he must destroy his maraes and burn his idols, he instantly replied, "Come with me and see them destroyed." The temple was immediately set on fire, and was soon consumed, together with the sacred pieces of wood with which it was decorated. The idols were then brought and laid at the feet of the teacher, who, having disrobed them, threw them into the fire. Some of the people were much enraged with the chief, and called him a fool and a madman for burning his gods. The women became frantic with grief, and made loud and doleful lamentations. But notwithstanding this excitement, an impression was made in favor of the new religion, and in the course of a few days all the idols in the district were brought to the teachers for their disposal. From this time the destruction of the gods and maraes went on rapidly throughout the island. Among the last of the chiefs to renounce his idols was the king. Though many still adhered to their superstitions, the supremacy of idolatry was now at an end. Through the influence of the teachers, a chapel 600 feet in length was built for the worship of the true God, in the erection of which the people were all anxious to assist. When the first post was laid, Tinomana was requested by the king to implore the blessing of God; and in order that all might see and hear, the chief climbed up into a tree and offered an appropriate prayer. While this chapel was building, Rarotonga was visited by Messrs. Tyerman and Bennet, who found that the whole population had renounced idolatry. One year later Mr. Bourne preached to large congregations in Rarotonga, and baptized many converts. Of the progress of the Gospel in this island he observes, "Much has been said concerning the success of the Gospel in Tahiti and the Society Islands, but it is not to be compared with its progress in Rarotonga. In Tahiti, European missionaries labored for 15 long years before the least fruit appeared. But two years ago Rarotonga was hardly known to exist, was not marked in any of the charts, and we spent much time in traversing the ocean in search of it. Two years ago the Rarotongans did not know there was such good news as the Gospel. And now I scruple not to say that their attention to the means of grace, their regard to family and private prayer, equals whatever has been witnessed at Tahiti and the neighboring islands. And when we look at the means, it becomes more astonishing. Two native teachers, not particularly distinguished among their own countrymen for intelligence, have been the instruments of effecting this wonderful change, and that before a single missionary had set his foot upon the island."

The heathen party at Rarotonga, though comparatively small, was sufficiently numerous to annoy the Christians, and at last the personal injuries inflicted on the converts to the new religion led to a conflict between the two parties. In this battle the Christians conquered. Having led their captives to the seaside, the victorious chiefs, instead of putting them to death, ordered them not to be injured, and advised them to embrace Christianity, in order that peace and happiness might be established. The prisoners replied that they were now convinced of the superior power of Jehovah and of the merciful character of the Christians, and that they would therefore unite with them in the worship of the true God. On the following day they demolished all their maraes and brought their idols to the teachers.

The island was soon after visited by Mr. Williams and Mr. and Mrs. Pitman. A chapel was built, well plastered, capable of containing nearly 3,000 people, without a single nail or any iron work. The people were attentive to instruction. Their anxiety to understand the truths of the Gospel, and their punctual attendance on public worship, were very encouraging. Previous to the commencement of public worship on the Sabbath, the people met in classes of 10 or 12 families, and a particular portion of the sermon was assigned to each person, which he was to bring away. One said, "Mine shall be the text, and all that is said in immediate connection with it;" another, "I will take care of the first division;" and a third, "I will bring home the particulars under that head." After public worship the classes met again, and after singing and prayer, one among them began the examination by inquiring, "With whom is the text?" and proposed a variety of questions respecting its meaning. He then proceeded to other parts of the discourse, till the whole sermon had passed in review, and to such habits of attention were the people trained, that a sentiment of importance was rarely omitted. A code of laws was established, and the difficult subject of polygamy was disposed of, by requiring the converts, from the king down, to select one of their wives, and then be united in marriage to her in public. We think the Gospel rule would explicitly require that the first wife should be retained, and all the others discarded.

The last visit which Mr. Williams made to Rarotonga was in 1834. The contrast between the appearance of the inhabitants at this time and on his first visit is thus stated: "When I found them in 1823, they were ignorant of the nature of Christian worship; and when I left them in 1834, I am not aware that there was a house in the island where family prayer was not observed every morning and every evening."

During the year 1838, several native converts were removed by death. Their last days were full of hope and joy, and afforded to surviving friends abundant consolation in the belief that the exchange was their eternal gain. In this year also great additions were made to the churches at Rarotonga. The spirit of inquiry seemed to be general, and the lives of very many testified that they had become sincere Christians.

One of the missionaries, in a letter from Rarotonga dated January 14, 1840, stated that a meeting was regularly held in the chapel at Arorangi, to give opportunity for persons to express their feelings and to exhort one another to diligence and love in the work of the Lord. At one of these meetings an old man who was a candidate for church fellowship, said that he had lived during the reign of four kings. "During the first we were continually at war. During the second we were overtaken with a severe famine, and all expected to perish. During the third we were conquered, and became the prey of two other settlements. But during the reign of this third king we were visited by another King—a good King—a powerful King—a King of love—Jesus the Lord from heaven. He has gained the victory; he has conquered our hearts; we are all his subjects; therefore we now have peace and plenty in this world, and hope soon to dwell with him in heaven."

In 1841, the directors record with satisfaction the progress of their missions in these islands. In Rarotonga, the largest of the group, they say the Christian churches presented a most impressive and animating aspect, both as to numbers and character; and the social and moral character of the population, a few years previous loathsome and terrific, was then pure and peaceful. One of the most consistent members of the church, and an active evangelist, was, in the days of his youth, a cannibal. An institution was commenced about this time at Avarua, for the training of native missionaries, in which young men are instructed in Christian theology and other branches of useful knowledge.

In 1843, the directors say that in the islands forming the Hervey Group, the people generally evince a sincere attachment to the Gospel. "The entire aspect of society is changed from the savage to the civilized; and misery, strife, and bloodshed have given place to the comforts and amenities of social life. Education is generally sought for, and the members of the church adorn their profession; and the entire Bible is now translated into the Rarotonga dialect."

Since that time the work has been advancing with a steady progress from year to year. In 1851, there was a general awakening at three of the stations, affecting about 300 persons, most of whom gave evidence of a saving change.

Since 1846, the institution for training native evangelists and teachers at Avarua, has sent forth 15 men and 9 women to occupy different spheres of missionary labor.

On the 24th of August, the churches on the island of Rarotonga held a meeting at Ngatangai, where 700 communicants united in the celebration of the Lord's Supper, and among them were the captain and part of the crew of the missionary ship, the John Williams.

Samoan or Navigators' Islands.—These islands were visited by a French vessel, in 1787, when several of the party were treacherously murdered; and this act created such an impression of their treachery and ferocity, that for many years they seem not to have been visited by any vessel from any part of the civilized world.

The idea of introducing the Gospel into this group appears to have originated with Mr. Williams, who, in 1824, formed the plan of making a voyage to the Navigators' Islands. But the great distance of this group (nearly 2,000 miles) from Raiatea, the ferocious character of its inhabitants, and in the event of his death the desolate condition of his wife and children at so great a distance from their home and friends, naturally rendered Mrs. Williams unwilling that her husband should enter on such an undertaking. At length, however, she gave her "full concurrence," and Mr. Wil liams began to devise the means for carrying his plan into execution. Having no vessel suitable for such a voyage, he attempted to build one, and with the assistance of the natives completed it in about three months. In the prosecution of this work, the ingenuity and skill of Mr. W. was put to the test.

It was indispensable to its accomplishment that he should have a pair of smith's bellows, as well as certain tools for working in iron, which were not to be found in Rarotonga. Having killed, for the sake of their skins, 3 of the 4 goats on the island, he constructed, with much difficulty, a tolerable bellows. But when the rats had left nothing more of his new apparatus than the naked boards, all hope of accomplishing his object in the ordinary way was removed. Unwilling, however, to relinquish his purpose, he persevered in his efforts, and at last hit upon a novel expedient to "raise the wind." It occurred to him that as water is thrown by a pump, air might be projected on the same principle. With two boxes eighteen inches square and four feet high, fitted with valves and levers, and worked by 8 or 10 natives, he contrived to procure such a succession of blasts as answered all his purposes in the building of his vessel. A stone was substituted for an anvil, and a pair of carpenter's pincers for tongs. With very little iron, without a saw, without oakum, or cordage, or sail cloth, he succeeded in launching a vessel sixty feet in length and eighteen in breadth, of seventy or eighty tons burthen. It was named "The Messenger of Peace." The trees were split with wedges, and for adzes the natives used small hatchets. The bark of the hibiscus was twisted into ropes, and native mats quilted for sails, and the rudder was constructed of "a piece of a pickaxe, a cooper's adze, and a large hoe."

In the vessel so constructed, Messrs. Williams and Barff, with 7 native teachers, sailed from Raiatea for the Navigators' Islands, on the 24th of May, 1830. They proceeded first to Tongataboo, where they found Fauea, a chief of one of the Navigators' Islands, who stated that he was related to the most influential families there; that he had been eleven years absent from his home, and that he was now desirous of returning. Having heard that the Messenger of Peace was on a voyage to these islands, and that the object of the missionaries was to convey the Gospel to his countrymen, he offered, if they would take him with them, to use all his influence with his relatives and the chiefs to induce them to receive the teachers kindly, and attend to their instructions. After spending a fortnight at Tongataboo, the missionaries and the chief, Fauea, sailed for the Navigators' Islands. They had not been long at sea, when Fauea came and seated himself by the side of Mr. Williams, and said that he had been thinking of the great work which the missionaries had undertaken, and though he had no doubt that the chiefs and people would gladly receive them, he feared opposition from a person called Tamafainga, in whom the spirit of the gods dwelt, and who was a terror to all the inhabitants. He further added, that if he forbade it, the people would be afraid to place themselves under Christian instruction. After a protracted voyage, the beautiful island of Savaii was descried in the distance. As soon as the vessel reached the shore a number of natives came off in their canoes, and welcomed Fauea to his native land. After some conversation the chief inquired "Where is Tamafainga?" "Oh!" replied the people, "he is dead, he is dead! he was killed 10 or 12 days ago." Almost frantic with joy at this information, Fauea leaped about the deck, shouting, "The devil is dead! the devil is dead! our work is done; the devil is dead!"

On the first Sabbath after their arrival, canoes came off to the vessel, bringing articles for barter. Fauea informed the people that the ship was e vaa lotu, or a praying ship, and that as it was le aso sa, a sacred day, they could not trade with them until the morrow. This information surprised them, but Fauea collecting a circle around him on the deck of the ship, stated the object of the missionaries in coming among them, informed them that a number of islands had embraced Christianity, and specified some of the advantages which the inhabitants were deriving from this new religion. "Can the religion of these foreigners be any thing but wise and good?" said the chief to his countrymen. "Let us look at them, and then at ourselves; their heads are covered, while ours are exposed to the heat of the sun and the wet of the rain. Their bodies are clothed all over with beautiful cloth, while we have nothing but a bandage of leaves around our waists; they have clothes upon their very feet, while ours are like the dog's. Look at their axes, their scissors, and their other property, how rich they are!" This address was listened to with great interest by the natives, who crowded around the speaker, and with outstretched necks and gaping mouths carefully caught the words as they fell from his lips.

While Fauea was thus employed on board the vessel, his wife, who had gone on shore with the teachers and their wives, was equally diligent in describing to the natives the wonders she had seen, and the value of the religion which was now brought to their island. When food was offered, she stood up and asked a blessing in the presence of the assembled multitude. Malietoa, the king, though engaged in a war, to avenge the death of Tamafainga, received them kindly, and declared that it was the happiest day of his life.

In October, 1832, Mr. Williams sailed from Rarotonga on a second visit to the Samoa. The first island that appeared in sight was Manna, the most easterly of the group. As the vessel approached the shore, a number of canoes put off and advanced towards it. In one of them a native stood up, and shouted, "We are sons of the Word, we are sons of the Word; we are waiting for a falau lotu, a religious ship, to bring us some people whom they call missionaries, to tell us about Jesus Christ." One of the chiefs came on board, and finding that the vessel was a "religious ship," appeared highly delighted, and asked for a missionary. On being informed that there was but one, and that he was intended for Manono, he manifested great regret, and begged to be supplied as soon as possible.

The vessel next touched at Tutuila, where it was immediately surrounded by a number of canoes, filled with savage men, anxious to obtain powder and muskets. The missionaries did not land here, but passed along the coast to a district called Leone, where a person came on board, and introduced himself as a "son of the Word." He informed Mr. Williams that about fifty persons in his district had embraced Christianity and erected a place of worship, and that they were waiting his arrival. The heathen party arranged themselves along the beach, and presented rather a formidable appearance. Mr. Williams supposing his life might be in danger, desired the natives to cease rowing and unite with him in prayer. The chief who stood in the centre of the assembled multitude perceiving that the missionaries were afraid to land, directed the people to sit down, and wading into the water, addressed Mr. W. with "Son, will you not come on shore? will you not land amongst us?" Mr. W. replied that he had heard that the inhabitants of that bay were exceedingly savage, and that he did not know that he should trust himself among them. "Oh!" replied the chief, "we are not savages now, we are Christians." "Where did you hear of Christianity?" asked Mr. W. "Oh!" he exclaimed, "a great chief from the white man's country, named Williams, came to Savaii about twenty moons ago, and placed there some tamafai-lotu (workers of religion,) and several of our people who were there, began on their return to instruct their friends, many of whom have become sons of the Word." Then pointing to a group of persons sitting apart from the rest, each of whom had a piece of white native cloth tied round his arm, he added, "These are the Christians, and they are distinguished from their heathen countrymen by the cloth which you see upon their arms." Mr. Williams then informed him that he himself was the "great chief" he had spoken of, and that he had carried the "workers of religion" to Savaii about twenty moons before. On hearing this, the chief made a signal to the multitude, who instantly sprang from their seats, rushed to the sea, seized the boat and carried both it and Mr. W. to the shore. Amoamo, the chief, conducted

Mr. W. to the Christians, by one of whom he was informed that a chapel had been built, and that service was performed every Sabbath day. "And who," asked Mr. Williams, "conducts the worship?" "I do," said he, "I take my canoe, go down to the teachers, get some religion, which I bring carefully home, and give to the people; and when that is gone, I take my canoe again and fetch some more. And now you are come, for whom we have been so long waiting! Where's our teacher? give me a man full of religion, that I may not expose my life to danger by going so long a distance to fetch it." On hearing that he could not be supplied with a teacher, he was affected almost to tears, and would scarcely believe it, for he imagined that the vessel was full of them. Mr. W. inquired of the chief if he had become a worshiper of Jehovah. He replied that he had not, but added, "If you will give me a worker of religion to teach me, I will become a believer immediately." It was with sincere regret that Mr. Williams left this little band without a missionary to teach them, and returned to the ship to prosecute his voyage. He found there a party of natives from an adjoining district who were waiting to present a request that he would pay them a visit. The chief assured Mr. Williams that he and nearly all his people were Christians, and that they had erected a spacious place of worship in imitation of the one at Savaii, and that he was daily engaged in teaching his people what he had himself been taught. Seeing that Mr. W. was inclined to doubt his statements, he placed his hands before him in the form of a book, and recited a chapter out of the Tahitian primer, after which he said, "Let us pray," and kneeling down upon the deck, he repeated the Lord's prayer in the Tahitian language. The next day Mr. W. reached Upolu, when natives from various parts of the island approached the vessel, saying that they were "sons of the Word," and that they were waiting for a "religion ship" to bring them missionaries.

When Mr. Williams reached Manono, the chief, Matetau, whom he had seen on his first visit to this island, came off to the ship and inquired with great earnestness, "Where's my missionary?" Te-ava and his wife, the native teachers who had been set apart for this station, were then introduced to him. He seized them with delight, and exclaimed, "Good, very good, I am happy now!" After a hasty visit to this island, Mr. Williams proceeded to Savaii, where he was received by the teachers and people with many expressions of joy. They informed him that Malietoa, his brother, the principal chiefs, and nearly all the inhabitants of the settlement, had embraced Christianity, and that the body of the people were only awaiting his arrival to follow their example. The next day he addressed about 700 persons in the chapel. He was followed by one of the native teachers, who was succeeded by Malietoa, who declared that it was his intention to "give his whole soul to the word of Jehovah, and to employ his utmost endeavors that it might speedily encircle the land in which he dwelt."

During his stay at Savaii, Mr. Williams learned from the teachers many interesting particulars respecting the introduction of the Gospel into the island, and especially its reception by Malietoa and his family. A short time previous to the day fixed upon for the opening of the new chapel, the king called together his family, and stated that he was about to fulfil his promise and become a worshiper of Jehovah. His sons replied that if it was good for him it was also good for them, and that they also would receive the Gospel. But to this he objected, saying that the gods would be enraged with him for abandoning them, and endeavor to destroy him, "and perhaps," added he, "Jehovah may not have power to protect me against the effects of their anger. I will therefore try the experiment of becoming his worshiper, and if he can protect me you may with safety follow my example; but if not, I only shall fall a victim to their vengeance—you will be safe." The young men unwillingly consented to wait a month or six weeks; but the third week their patience became exhausted, and going to their father they stated that he had tried the experiment long enough, and as no evil had befallen him, they would immediately follow his example. Not only his sons, but all his relatives, and nearly all his people, abandoned their heathen worship. In connection with this renunciation of their old religion, a singular ceremony was observed. Every chief of note at the Samoa Islands had his etu, in which the spirit of the gods was supposed to reside. This etu was some species of bird, fish, or reptile, and if any one of that class was cooked and eaten, the etu was considered so entirely desecrated that it could never again be regarded as an object of religious veneration. The etu of Malietoa's sons was a fish called anae. On the day appointed, a large party of friends and relatives were invited to partake of the feast. A number of anae were dressed, and a portion laid before each individual, who with fear and trembling ate of the sacred food. The superstitious fears of the young men were so much excited lest they should be punished with death for their presumption, that on returning from the feast they drank a large dose of cocoanut oil and salt water, to prevent the effects which they feared might follow. The people who were spectators of this feast, expected that those who partook of it would fall down dead suddenly, but seeing no harm happen to them they changed their minds, and said that Jehovah was the true God. The result of this experiment produced a decided change in favor of Christianity, and induced many of the people to place themselves under the instruction of the teachers.

Having completed the object of his voyage, and visited all the islands of the Samoa group, Mr. W. returned to his family with feelings of gratitude and joy. In less than twenty months an entire change had taken place in the habits and character of the Samoans. Chapels had been built in all the islands, and every where the people seemed waiting to receive instruction. The desire of the chiefs and people of this group to receive English missionaries, was communicated by Mr. Williams to the Directors of the Missionary Society, and in November, 1835, six missionaries, five of whom were accompanied by their wives, sailed from London for the Navigators' Islands.

The last accounts from this group of islands is of the most interesting and encouraging character. Mr. Heath estimates that there are now on the island of Upolu 20,000 persons who have embraced Christianity. On Manono all the inhabitants, consisting of about 2,000, are professedly Christians. At Savaii there are from 12,000 to 13,000 converts. On Tutuila there are 6,000, and several hundreds on the smaller islands. What a contrast with the condition of the natives in 1830, when the heralds of salvation first visited their shores! "Then, their beautiful country was 'burned with fire;' rapine, murder, cannibalism, crimes and horrors at which the heart sickens, generally prevailed; now, with wonder and gratitude the messengers of mercy exclaim, 'Behold how good and pleasant a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity.' And this change, as great as it is blessed, has been effected within the short space of ten years. Truly may we exclaim, 'What hath God wrought!'"

In 1843, there were some painful defections among the members of the churches at Savaii and Palauli; and this was followed by a disturbance between two villages, which threatened to embroil the whole group in a general war. In November, 1843, the party at Sapapalii declared open war against the inhabitants of Palauli. The missionary and members of the church at the former place used every means in their power to turn the war party from their evil course, without effect. When the attack was made, the people of Palauli, unwilling to shed blood, fled to the district beyond, while the invaders wasted the plantations, cut down the bread-fruit and cocoanut trees, killed and devoured the domestic animals, and burnt or removed every house in the district, except the chapel and the houses of the missionaries. On the return of the party, they began to persecute the members of the church, and threatened to burn their houses and drive them from their lands. But, out of 430 members, there was a defection, during these trying times, of but about 35. This war continued to distract the country and disturb the operations of the missionaries, for several years; producing the most disastrous results, desolating many fertile districts. And yet, God overruled it for good, as it led many of those opposed to the war to seek an asylum at the station, and thus increased the attendance upon the word. Mr. McDonald wrote, in 1849, that there were nearly 400 candidates for admission to the church. This war was not brought to a close till April, 1851, when a battle was fought, which resulted in the complete triumph of the injured party; but such was the influence of Christianity upon the victors, that not a single act of retributive vengeance was perpetrated upon the vanquished, though their provocations were very aggravated. The missionaries say that the means they have used to restore peace and harmony have commended themselves to all, and convinced them that they were their friends. Yet, the war had produced a very demoralizing effect, and led to the revival of heathen customs.

The Samoan Seminary at Malua, forms one of the most interesting features of the mission. In the course of seven years from its commencement, this institution had under its instruction 53 teachers, 34 women, wives of teachers, and 50 boys; many of whom are now employed in the missionary work. And, to a considerable extent, it has been a self-supporting institution. In 1852, there were in the institution 4 Erromangans, 4 natives of Savage Island, 4 from Faté, 1 from New Caledonia, 1 from Clarence Island, 18 Samoan youths, and 36 teachers, with their wives and children, making 146 in all.

The Papists have made a descent upon these islands, but as yet have been unable to obtain a footing.

Several stations, where churches existed before the war, are not mentioned in the latest reports, and probably have been broken up; and some of the stations noticed above have a number of out-stations. Near Lepa, for instance, there are 40 villages, with a population of 15,000. It is impracticable, from the imperfect returns, to ascertain the number of native teachers, or to distinguish between teachers and preachers. The number is undoubtedly much larger than appears in the table. So also in regard to the schools, many of the stations only reporting the number of scholars, not of schools.

Austral Islands.—In 1821, a fatal epidemic prevailed at Rurutu, and Auura, a young chief, with some of his companions, fled from the island, and remained for some time at Tubuai, about 100 miles distant. On their return they were drifted about for 3 weeks, and after the loss of some of their crew, they landed at Maurua, the most westerly of the Society Islands. Here they were shown the demolished temples, prostrate altars, and broken idols, and informed that the inhabitants of these islands had become worshipers of Jehovah, the one living and true God. They immediately determined to proceed to Borabora, to see the missionaries, and from this place they went to Raiatea. They were filled with wonder at what they saw.

On the Sabbath they were conducted to the chapel, and beheld with astonishment the assembled multitude. The songs of praise in which the people joined, and the sermon from one of the missionaries, excited the deepest interest in their minds. They were at once convinced of the superiority of the Christian religion, and desired to be instructed in the knowledge of the true God. They became pupils in the school, and soon learned to read and spell correctly. Auura was exceedingly diligent in learning, and made very rapid progress. In a little more than three months he was able to read and write well, and had committed to memory the greater part of the catechism. Having publicly renounced their idols and professed themselves worshipers of Jehovah, the strangers became anxious to return to their own island, that they might carry to their countrymen the knowledge of the true God and of his Son Jesus Christ. An opportunity occurring for them to go in a vessel bound for England, Auura and his friends were delighted with the prospect of returning to their country, but they objected to going to their "land of darkness without a light in their hand." Hastening to the missionaries, the chief earnestly requested them to send instructors to his native land. On assembling the people and inquiring who among them would go, two of the native deacons, Mahamene and Puna, came forward and said, "Here are we; send us." Every member of the church at Raiatea brought something as a testimony of his affection, which they presented to the teachers. The missionaries supplied them with elementary books and a few copies of the Gospel in the Tahitian language, from which their own does not essentially differ. Thus equipped, the Raiatean Christians embarked on the 5th of July, 1821, with Aaura and his friends, and on the third day after their departure arrived at Rurutu, where Aaura was welcomed by the remnant of his countrymen. The tidings of his return soon spread through the island, and the whole population came to offer their congratulations. On the night of his arrival, Aaura conveyed his own idol on board the ship in which he had returned, and on the following day convened a meeting of his countrymen. The little band of Christians entered the assembly, and Aaura demanding attention, informed them of the incidents of his voyage, and the islands he had visited, and of the knowledge he had obtained respecting the true God, the destiny of man, and the means of happiness in a future state. He declared that the god whom they worshipped was the foundation of all deceit, that their idols were mere images, and their priests impostors. He therefore proposed to his countrymen to follow his example by renouncing their false religion, and adopting that which would lead to immortality. The priests opposed this startling proposition, but the king and chiefs replied, "We will receive the word of life; we will burn the evil spirits; let every thing made by our hands as an object of worship be totally charred in the fire." An aged man, who had listened to Aaura with deep interest, arose and said, "Behold you say, O Aaura, that we have souls; till now, we never knew that man possessed a soul." The chief then introduced the two missionaries from Raiatea; stated their object in coming to Rurutu, and recommended them to the kind attentions of the people. The missionaries then briefly addressed the meeting, and concluded by recommending to the chiefs to provide an entertainment the next day of a number of kinds of food which were considered as sacred, and of which it was thought a female could not partake without instant death. The feast was accordingly prepared, and Aaura, his wife and friends, with the Raiatean Christians, unitedly partook of the sacred food. The chiefs and people stood around, expecting to see those who had thus openly violated the law of the gods, either fall into convulsions or expire in agony. But when they saw that no harm befell them, they simultaneously exclaimed, "The priests have deceived us," and hastening to their temples, they hurled the idols from the places they had so long occupied, burnt to the ground their sacred buildings, and then proceeded to the demolition of every marae in the island.

In October, 1822, the island was visited by Messrs. Tyerman and Bennet, who found the results of a little more than one year's exertion surprising. Many had learned to read, and some to write. The teachers had erected neat plastered dwellings for themselves, and under their direction the people had built a chapel eighty feet long and thirty-six feet wide. The railing around the table, in front of the pulpit and by the side of the stairs, was composed of the handles of warriors' spears. "The people here," says a missionary, "learn war no more, but all submitting to the Prince of Peace, have cast away their instruments of cruelty with their idols."

In 1823, Rurutu was visited by Mr. Williams. He found that the industry and improvement of the people had been progressive. "Many of the chiefs were dressed in European clothing, and all were attired in the most decent and becoming manner. In the house of God, no congregation could have behaved with more propriety. Not a vestige of idolatry was to be seen, not a god was to be found in the island."

In 1825, the Falcon, a large American ship, commanded by Captain Chase, was wrecked at Rurutu. The chief officer and crew remained some time on the island, and the captain on his departure left the following testimony with the native teachers: "The natives gave us all the assistance in their power, from the time the ship struck to the present moment. The first day, while landing the things from the ship, they were put into the hands of the natives, and not a single article of clothing was taken from any man belonging to the ship, though they had it in their power to have plundered us of every thing. Since I have lived on shore, myself, officers, and people have received the kindest treatment from the natives, for which I shall ever be thankful."

Captain Chase afterwards rewarded the natives for their assistance, by giving them a portion of the oil. They immediately formed a native missionary society, and contributed a considerable part of the oil in aid of the funds of the Parent Society. It was afterwards sold for £66, and the proceeds sent to the Society in London.

In 1829, this island was again visited by Mr. Williams, who found that the people, although their teachers had left them, continued to observe all their religious services, and that Aaura officiated as minister. During the previous year, they had contributed to the Missionary Society 750 bamboos of coconut-oil. They earnestly requested that another teacher might be sent them, saying that "one-handed people were very good, but that two-handed people were much better."

On the return of Aaura to his native island, he found there a number of the inhabitants of Rimatara. These followed the example of the Rurutuans in destroying their idols and receiving Christian instruction. They shortly afterwards sailed for their own island, and induced many of their countrymen to abandon their idols and embrace Christianity.

In June, 1822, two native Christians were sent from Borabora, to instruct the inhabitants of Rimatara in reading, writing, and the first elements of religion. These teachers labored with so much diligence and success that, when the island was visited by Mr. Williams in October, 1828, the inhabitants had renounced their idols, and were living in harmony with their teachers. A chapel had been erected for the worship of the true God, which was opened during Mr. Williams's visit. The females were neatly dressed in white native cloth, with bonnets which the teachers' wives had taught them to make. The entire population were receiving instruction, and the school for children contained one hundred and thirty scholars. In 1825, Rimatara was visited by Mr. Bourne, who was delighted with the appearance of the station, and in 1819, Pomare, king of Tahiti, left a man on the island of Raivavai, who, though ignorant and immoral himself, undertook to teach the people; and in 1821, when visited by Capt. Henry, they had made such improvement of this poor instruction that the renunciation of idolatry had become general throughout the land; and he says of them, "The very quiet, devout, and orderly manner in which they conducted themselves, not only in church but during the Sabbath, excited my highest admiration. They sent a request for suitable teachers, and in 1822, three native missionaries were sent from Eimeo. In 1826, a Christian church was formed among this people, and sixteen persons, after examination, were admitted to its privileges.

The inhabitants of the neighboring island of Tubuai, hearing that the people of Rurutu and other islands had renounced their idols and embraced Christianity, sent a deputation to Tahiti, requesting teachers and books. Two native teachers, with a supply of useful articles, embarked, in June, 1822, for the island of Tubuai, accompanied by Mr. Nott. On arriving at Tubuai, they found the whole population engaged in war and on the eve of a battle. They went immediately to the king, acquainted him with the design of their visit, and requested that hostilities might be suspended. The king expressed a willingness to accede to their proposal, provided the consent of the opposing party could be obtained. A chief having been despatched with a message of peace, his proposal was accepted, and the next morning, the two parties met, and peace was concluded. The chiefs then embraced each other, and the warriors, perceiving the reconciliation of their leaders, dropped their implements of war, and rushing into each other's arms, presented a scene of joy, far different from the conflict in which they expected to be engaged. The next day, the inhabitants of Tubuai were invited to attend public worship, when Mr. Nott delivered the first Christian discourse to which they had ever listened. In 1826, when this island was visited by Mr. Davies, the profession of Christianity had become general throughout the island, and the chiefs and people were assisting the teachers in erecting comfortable dwellings, and a substantial house for public worship.

In the year 1825, Rapa was visited by a vessel from Tahiti, which on its return carried two of the inhabitants to that island, who were astonished and delighted at the strange objects presented to their notice. Having attended the schools and places of public worship, and learned the alphabet, they soon after returned to their own island, accompanied by two Tahitians, to whom the inhabitants became so much attached, that they were invited by the chiefs and people to reside among them permanently. In January, 1826, two Tahitian teachers with their wives, accompanied by a schoolmaster and a mechanic, sailed from Tahiti for Rapa. They carried with them not only spelling-books and copies of the Tahitian translation of the Scriptures, but also a variety of useful tools, seeds, and plants, together with timber for a chapel. Mr. Davies, one of the senior missionaries at Tahiti, accompanied the teachers to their new station. The chiefs received them with every mark of respect, and promised them protection and aid. On the first Sabbath after their arrival, Mr. Davies preached in the Tahitian language to a number of the natives, who seemed impressed with the services. This island was visited in 1829 by two missionaries, who found that four chapels, in which religious instruction was statedly given, had been erected at different stations. The people manifested an increasing interest in religious things, and their improvement exceeded the expectations of their visitors.

The work has continued to be carried on by native agency alone, except the occasional visits of missionaries; and, owing to their remote situation, it is seldom that any intelligence is received from the mission. Mr. Rodgerson visited Raivavai and Tubuai in 1838, and Mr. Orsmond, Rurutu and Rimatara, in 1839; when they observed many signs of improvement. In May and June, 1846, they were again visited by Mr. Barff, of Huahine, who was greatly encouraged by what he witnessed.

Peace and purity prevailed among the native believers ; and the native agents were faithful and zealous in their work, and their labors appeared to have been crowned with the divine blessing. The population of these islands is small, probably not exceeding 1,000.

Paumotu or Pearl Islands.—In the early part of the reign of Pomare II., king of Tahiti, many of the inhabitants of the Paumotu or Pearl Islands fled to the Georgian Islands for security during a war. They were protected and hospitably entertained by Pomare, and when the Tahitians renounced idolatry, they also cast away the idols they had brought with them, and placed themselves under the instruction of the missionaries. In 1827, they returned to their own islands, and immediately after their arrival, Moorea, one of the number, who had learned to read and had been hopefully converted, began to instruct his countrymen. He met with such success, that with the exception of the inhabitants of one district, the whole population agreed to renounce heathenism. Moorea was subsequently charged with having deceived his countrymen, in the accounts he had given of the change at Tahiti, and, to save his life, was obliged to leave the island. But when the people afterwards became convinced that they had accused him falsely, they burnt their idols and demolished their temples. Several hundreds of them soon after sailed to Tahiti, a distance of three hundred miles, for the purpose of obtaining books and receiving instruction, and, before they left the island, several of them were admitted to Christian fellowship. Early in the year 1822, Moorea and Teraa, another Christian native, were publicly set apart as teachers, and soon after sailed for Anaa, or Chain Island. Shortly afterwards, a canoe from this island arrived at Tahiti, bringing the pleasing intelligence that the inhabitants were willing to receive Christianity ; that war, cannibalism, and idolatry had ceased, and that a place of worship was building in every district. Two other native teachers were afterwards sent to these islands.

Mr. Orsmond visited Chain Island in 1839 ; where he addressed congregations of 300 or 400, and formed a church of 43 members.

Marquesas Islands.—In 1797, Captain Wilson, after landing the missionaries at Tahiti and Tongataboo, sailed for the Marquesas. At Santa Christina he left Mr. Crook, who, after residing on the island about a year, became discouraged and returned to Tahiti. In 1825, Mr. Crook returned to Santa Christina with two native teachers from Huahine, and one from Tahiti. He found that some of the inhabitants had destroyed their idols, but the greater part were exceedingly rude, vicious, and disorderly in their behavior, and strongly attached to their superstitions. After remaining about a month among them, Mr. Crook left the native teachers under the protection of a friendly chief. Their prospects of usefulness were at first encouraging, but the wickedness of the people was so great, and their conduct so violent and alarming, that the Tahitians (whom they threatened to kill and devour) were obliged to return. They were succeeded by others in 1826, who were obliged to leave in 1828. In the following year, Messrs. Pritchard and Sampson visited the islands, but so turbulent and repulsive was the conduct of the natives, that they deemed the establishment of a mission impracticable. In 1831, Mr. Darling, one of the missionaries stationed at Tahiti, visited the Marquesas, and in consequence of his report, the Directors of the Missionary Society, in 1833, sent two missionaries, Messrs. Rodgeron and Stallworthy, to commence a mission in those islands. Having been joined at Tahiti by Mr. Darling and four Tahitians, they were kindly received at Santa Christina by Iotete, the king, who promised to protect them, and gave them half of his own house for their residence.

These missionaries labored for a number of years, in great discouragement, and at the peril of their lives. In 1838, Mr. Rodgeron, coming to the conclusion that he could not remain there with his family, removed to Raiatea ; Mr. Stallworthy continuing his labors alone. In August, 1838, two Roman Catholic missionaries from the Popish College at Valparaiso were brought to the island by the French frigate La Venus. Mr. Stallworthy made strong objections to their settling at any station where missionaries had been placed by the London Missionary Society, but without effect. The chief having received several presents from the captain of the frigate, cordially received the priests, and gave them a piece of land for a garden. He, however, evinced an unshaken attachment to the missionary who resided on the island, but the people showed the same indifference to the Gospel which they had always done. Early in the following year seven more Romish missionaries arrived at Santa Christina, and established themselves in various parts of the island. The imposing ceremonies connected with their worship, their insinuating manners, and their skill in operating on the self-interested motives of the people have not been without effect.

This mission was continued, in the face of great discouragement, and without any visible fruit, till 1841, when the missionaries, Messrs. Stallworthy and Thompson, abandoned the field, and removed to Tahiti. The group has since been seized by the French ; but the Romish missionaries have been no more successful than the Protestants. Native teachers have recently been sent from the Sandwich Islands. (See Sandwich Islands.)

New Hebrides.—Mr. Williams's last Voyage and Death.—After seventeen years of unremitting toil, the illness of both Mr. and Mrs. Williams obliged them, in 1833, to leave the Islands. In June of the following year, they arrived in England. His own health and that of Mrs. Williams having been recruited by the voyage, and by a residence of four years in England, Mr. W. became anxious to return to the scene of his former labors. The plan proposed by him was to undertake an exploring voyage among the groups situated between the Navigators' Islands and New Guinea, and to place on them native teachers. For the prosecution of this object, it was deemed advisable to purchase a ship which should be exclusively devoted to missionary purposes. And for this purpose an appeal was made to Christians in England, which was speedily responded to in a very generous manner. The interest which Mr. Williams' narrative excited throughout England, seconded by his personal representations, was so great that he found easy access to the hearts and the charities of those whom he addressed.

A sum more than sufficient for the purchase of a ship was soon raised, and the Directors of the Missionary Society purchased the Camden, a vessel of two hundred tons burthen. Every arrangement for the safety of the vessel and the comfort of the passengers was made as soon as possible, and on the 4th of April, 1838, a meeting was held in London, at which Mr. and Mrs. Williams and ten other missionaries, one of whom was Mr. John Williams, Jun., received their parting instructions. The meeting was one of intense interest. On the 11th of April, 1838, these missionaries embarked, being escorted to the vessel by an immense crowd of the friends of missions, who followed them with their prayers.

After visiting the Navigators', Georgian, and Society Islands, Mr. Williams, in conformity with his original plan, proceeded to visit the New Hebrides. He was accompanied by Captain Morgan, Mr. Cunningham, vice-consul for the South Sea Islands, and Mr. Harris, who was intending to go as a missionary to the Marquesas.

On the 19th of November, 1839, this apostle of the Pacific unfurled the banner of peace on the island of Tanna, one of the New Hebrides group, where the barbarous people showed him no little kindness, and received the Christian teachers from Samoa gladly. In the evening, having recorded his gratitude to God, who had done such great things for them, he assembled with his beloved companions for the solemn exercise, which Captain Morgan so appropriately styles their "family prayer," and Mr. Harris, in the orderly course of their Scripture reading, read the 15th chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians—the sublime record of the believer's triumph over death!

The next day they proceeded to Erromanga, another island of the same group. The natives appeared quite different from those of the other islands, being more rude and barbarous in their behavior. They were at first averse to holding any intercourse with the strangers, but having received presents of fish-hooks and beads, they brought the missionaries some cocoanuts. They were still, however, exceedingly shy. Thinking that they had gained the confidence of the natives, they all went on shore. While Capt. Morgan stopped to see the boat safely anchored, the missionaries walked up the beach. The captain soon followed them, but had not gone far before the boat's crew called to him to come back. He looked round and saw Mr. Williams and Mr. Cunningham running towards the sea, the former closely pursued by a native. Captain Morgan immediately returned to the boat, from which he saw a native strike Mr. Williams, who had just reached the water. The beach was stony and steep, and in consequence of the blow, Mr. Williams fell backward to the ground. Other natives soon came up, one of whom struck him with a club, and another pierced his body with several arrows. Mr. Harris was also overtaken and shared the same fate. Captain Morgan made several attempts to obtain the bodies, but neither of them could be procured. The natives seeing the boat approaching the shore for this purpose, attacked the persons remaining in it, and left one of their arrows sticking in its side.

The news of this sad event reached England a few days before the annual meeting of the Missionary Society. The particulars respecting it were communicated to the assembly, and resolutions passed by the Society expressing the deepest sympathy with the bereaved families of their lamented missionaries. A subscription was soon after commenced in aid of Mrs. Williams and her children, and a handsome sum was raised and appropriated to their use.

On the 1st of February, 1840, the British ship Favorite sailed from Sydney to search for the remains of Messrs. Williams and Harris. The expedition was accompanied by Mr. Cunningham, and a Samoan chief to act as interpreter. At Erromanga they had an interview with the natives, and by means of presents and threats obtained from them part of the bones of the two missionaries. The vessel then sailed for the Samoas, where the recovered bones were interred, amid the respectful regrets of the officers of the Favorite, and the tears of their brethren, and of hundreds of Samoans, who remembered Mr. Williams as the first herald of salvation to their shores.

After the death of Mr. Williams, Mr. Heath of the Samoa mission was requested by his brethren to make an exploring voyage in the Camden. He visited the New Hebrides, and left native teachers at four of the islands, one of which was Erromanga, the very island on which the missionaries were murdered.

One object which Mr. Williams had in view in his last voyage to the South Sea Islands, was the establishment of a college for the education of native teachers. The missionariat the different stations entered fully into his plans respecting it, and one was immediately commenced at Barotonga, which soon numbered eleven students. A large piece of ground on which to erect the building, was purchased of the king, and there is every reason to hope that the institution will prosper.

Messrs. Turner and Nisbet, having been appointed to this mission, arrived at Tanna on the 30th of June, 1842, and having assembled the principal chiefs, and made known their object, were kindly received, with assurances of protection; and on the following Sabbath they held the first religious service, and preached to over 200 people. They soon found, however, that the character of the people was depraved and cruel in the extreme, and that they were distracted with internal division and strife. The natives with whom they were immediately located, manifested some attachment to them; but by all others they were regarded with distrust and hatred. More than once their destruction was secretly attempted. At length the chiefs in the interior, under pretext that a fatal disease which prevailed, was to be attributed to their arts, demanded their expulsion from the island. This was resisted by their few adherents, and led to a savage war, which compelled the missionaries to quit the island in their small open boat. They were driven back, where death in its most horrid form seemed inevitable. But a merciful Providence prepared them an ark. Just as they were entering the harbor, an American vessel appeared off Tanna, in which they embarked for the Navigators' Islands.

In the Isle of Pines, where native teachers were stationed in 1840, the result was still more tragical. In 1842, the crew of the brig Star, being treated with apparent friendship, went on shore to cut timber, when they were treacherously murdered and devoured by the natives. After which the Samoan teachers, after assisting to tow the vessel ashore, were murdered at the command of the chief. This was done, however, not from opposition to the teachers or to what they taught, but as an act of revenge for the outrages previously committed among them by European and American traders. This is believed also to have been the cause of the death of the lamented Williams. The visits of these trading vessels have been marked by robbery and murder. The natives, on one occasion, having offered some resistance to these outrages, they were attacked with deadly weapons, many of them slain, and others, having taken refuge in a cave, were suffocated by fire at its mouth. The immediate cause of the death of these native teachers is supposed to have been that some traders presented them with forged letters from missionaries, directing them to assist in promoting the objects of the traders, thereby exciting the jealousy of the people against them.

In 1845, the mission at the New Hebrides was renewed. Messrs. Murray and Turner landed at Tanna with 15 native teachers, where they were most cordially welcomed and kindly treated by the inhabitants. They left four new teachers at this island, and two native evangelists at Nina; after which they proceeded to Erromanga; but, from the appearance of the natives, they came to the conclusion that the island was still closed against the Gospel, and did not land. They next proceeded to Sandwich Island, a beautiful island about 50 miles from Erromanga, teeming with a population of noble aspect and gentle manners, where they introduced four native evangelists, who were received with hearty good will by chiefs and people. They also left teachers at two of the New Caledonia group; but at the large island of New Caledonia they found things in such a state from the influence of Matakū, chief of the Isle of Pines, that they thought proper to withdraw the native teachers who were there before.

The last intelligence from the Western Polynesian Islands was obtained by a visit of Rev. Messrs. Murray and Sunderland, of the Samoa mission, in 1852. They took with them five native teachers, with their wives, from the Hervey Islands, two unmarried teachers from Samoa, four natives of Savage Island, four Erromangans, and four Fatese, who having been for years under Christian instruction at Samoa, were now returning to carry the Gospel to their native isles. In nearly all the islands they found an extraordinary change in the sentiments and habits of the people had taken place since the previous voyage of the John Williams; and large numbers had renounced idolatry and put themselves under Christian instruction. Commodious places of worship and dwellings for teachers had been erected, congregations and schools gathered, and a few were hopeful candidates for church fellowship.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF NOVA SCOTIA.—Aneiteum is an island of the New Hebrides group, situated, according to Captain Cook, in lat. $20^{\circ} 8' S.$, and long. $170^{\circ} 4' E.$ It is about 30 or 35 miles in circumference, and contains a population of 3,000 souls. Its exterior appearance is pleasing and rather imposing, rising to the height of 2,000 feet above the level of the sea, and presenting an interesting variety of mountain and valley, large tracts of low land in some parts of the coast, and a bold shore in others; high land and deep ravines running to a great distance inland; well wooded and watered, having streams of considerable size, and valuable timber, available for almost any purpose. The soil is not remarkably rich in general, though in some parts it appears very fertile. The natives of Aneiteum are very low in civilization, and their moral and social condition, like that of all other heathen tribes, is such that it cannot fully be brought out to light. They & not live together, like the Eastern Polynesians, in regular villages. In language, in color, in manners and customs, in religion, in almost every thing that distinguishes one race of men from another, they differ from the eastern tribes. They are generally of small stature, very dark, slender, and lacking in the spirit and energy which characterize adjacent tribes; yet there are some fine-looking people among them, and the mental capabilities of many of them are of a very fair order. They are not destitute of ingenuity, as appears from their ornaments, their war weapons, their plantations, &c. War was very frequent among them before the introduction of the Gospel. Cannibalism is found in all the islands of the New Hebrides group. One of the most revolting practices found on Aneiteum, and one which appears to be confined to this island, is the strangling of widows. Till very lately, an old woman was scarcely to be seen on the island. Even since the English missionaries have been located there, as many as 11 widows have been known to be strangled within a single year. The monstrous deed is done by the brother of the woman, if she have a brother, and when that is not the case, by some other relative or friend. The idea of the people is, that the soul of the wife should accompany that of her husband to the other world. It is remarkable that the greatest difficulty in removing this practice, has all along arisen from the widows themselves. What an amazing hold must their religious belief have upon their minds! Here is one of the very strongest instincts of our nature—the love of life, fairly overmatched by it. Something, however, is to be attributed to other than religious influences. It would be considered disgraceful not only to the party herself, but to the whole family to which she belongs, were she to continue to live. How potent is public opinion even among savages! Of late years, this inhuman practice has received an extensive check, and, as the last heathen district has abandoned idolatry and besought the aid of missionary teachers, it may now be said, to have almost ceased to exist. From what has been said, it will be seen that the people of Aneiteum believe in a future state of existence. They believe in gods many and lords many. They have gods of the sea and gods of the bush; and among themselves are men who pretend to have, and are believed to have, power over diseases, over the sea, the winds, thunder, rain, &c. They make a difference between the future abode of the righteous and the wicked; but their hell lacks, and their heaven abounds with such sensual gratifications as they most prize on earth. It does not appear that the island was much visited prior to the introduction of the Gospel. That important event took place in March, 1841. On the 20th of that month, the London Missionary Society, by their zealous agents, succeeded in obtaining a footing, and introducing Christian teachers. This was a work of no small difficulty. The people were in a state of pure barbarism; they were shy and suspicious of the missionaries, and the missionaries had no confidence in them. It was by the aid of an individual, himself a savage, and chief of a neighboring island, that communication was held with the natives, and they were induced to receive the teachers. The names of these teachers, who began the work of evangelization, were Tavita (David) and Fuatieve. They were natives of the island of Savaii, Samoan group. During the early years of the mission, no visible impression was made. The teachers passed through great hardships and difficulties. One of them, with his wife, died, after a short course of service. The mission was sustained by a reinforcement from Tanna, sent by Messrs. Turner and Nisbet, of the London Missionary Society, who were on the island at the time. Apolo (Apollon) and Simeona, (Simeon,) who were thus introduced, labored usefully on the island for several years. It was not till 1845, that any visible success was obtained. In April of that year the island was visited. The teachers had suffered severely from scarcity of food, frequent attacks of illness, the unkindness of the natives, &c. They had, however, been sustained under all their trials, and enabled not only to keep their ground, but to make a little advancement. A few of the natives had attended for some time on their instructions, and one man had decidedly attached himself to them, and had acted towards them with great kindness. Up to this time, only one station had been occupied, viz., Ipeki, on the north-west side of the island. Now, operations were commenced at another part. Two teachers were placed at Aniliganhat, where is the principal harbor. After this visit, the prospects of the mission were again overcast, and when the island was visited in 1846, about twelve months after, it appeared as if it must be abandoned altogether. The teachers had, from various causes, suffered so severely, and their labors had been so unproductive, that they were greatly discouraged, and were ready to give up in despair. Two of them, however, were induced to stay, and thus the door was kept open till it was possible to locate English missionaries. In July, 1848, the Rev. John Geddie and a catechist from Nova Scotia, N. A., and the Rev. Thomas Powell, from Samoa, were placed on the island. Aniliganhat was thought the most eligible place at which to commence their labors, and they accordingly settled there. Difficulties and trials, similar to those which had been encountered by the teachers, were experienced by the missionaries, and a considerable time passed before any marked impression was made. In July, 1849, the mission was visited, and slight symptoms of an improved state of things had begun to appear.

A small plastered chapel had been erected, and a plastered dwelling-house. Services were being regularly conducted by the teachers in the native language, and, though the attendance on these was both small and irregular, yet a little progress was being made. Five or six individuals had begun to exhibit symptoms of an awakening interest in the truths of religion. The night was passed; the morning had dawned. New troubles, however, awaited the mission; circumstances led to the separation from it of the catechist, and Mr. Powell returned to Samoa. Thus, Mr. Geddie was left to struggle, single-handed, with the great and formidable difficulties through which the mission was destined to pass. It is found, in the history of missions, that the most severe trials do not generally occur till the Gospel begins to take effect. So long as all remains in the stillness of spiritual death, the missionary is generally permitted to carry on his work with comparatively little molestation; but when the power of divine truth begins to be felt on the heart, and decided symptoms of spiritual life show themselves, then it is found that the Lord of missions did not say in vain, "Suppose ye that I am come to give peace on the earth? I tell you, nay; but rather division." It was thus with the Aneiteum mission. The opposition encountered in its early years was trifling, compared with what it had to pass through after the truth of God actually took hold of the hearts of men. When that was the case, parties among the heathen, generally official characters, whose craft was in danger, and other parties also besides the natives, whose proceedings and pursuits were incidentally interfered with by the new religion, were greatly enraged against the faithful missionary and his adherents; and many and formidable were the combinations entered into, and the attempts made, to rid themselves altogether of his unwelcome presence. In one instance, the infatuated heathen vented their rage on one of their own countrymen. They entrapped and killed a young man, named Waievai. Thus, martyr blood has flowed on Aneiteum. The mission property and lives of the mission family were seriously endangered by incendiarism. On this subject, Mr. Geddie says: "We often look back on those days of trial with trembling and with thankfulness to God. This hostility to the mission seemed to have reached its crisis in 1851, when an attempt was made on my own life and that of my family, by setting fire to my house at midnight; but the arm of the Lord was stretched out for our protection, and no harm was permitted to befall us. The excitement which that act caused among the Christian party was very great, and it required all the influence that I possessed among them to control it. The enemies of the cause of God were then convinced that the truth had taken a stronger hold of the hearts of the natives than they had expected, and if they opposed it by violent means, it must be at their peril. The last exciting event occurred about two years ago, (August, 1852,) when the heathen district of Anau-un-se contemplated an attack on the people of a Christian village. The Christian party from all parts of the island assembled at the hostile district, with a view to reason with the heathen and warn them. The meditated attack was abandoned, and all parties returned peaceably to their homes. We have ever since been permitted to labor without interruption or harm."

The truths of the Gospel first took decided hold on a few individuals in the immediate neighborhood of the missionary. Among them were five or six men adapted to be useful to their countrymen. These were employed by the missionary to assist in diffusing the truths of the Gospel in such ways as they were able. In the warmth and zeal of their first love they went forth to beseech their fellow-countrymen to turn from the vanities and abominations of pagan idolatry and embrace the pure and holy religion of the Bible. Astonishing results followed their labors in connection with those of the missionary. A spirit of inquiry was awakened, large numbers abandoned heathenism and embraced Christianity, and a goodly number there is reason to believe became anxious inquirers after salvation. Heathen worship and heathen practices were extensively abandoned, and a series of changes commenced which have already led to the most beneficial results, and promise to continue till every vestige of heathenism be swept away, and the religion of Jesus fill the island with its own blessed fruits. The Rev. A. W. Murray and Rev. J. P. Sunderland of the London Missionary Society, visited the island in June, 1852, and again in company with Rev. W. Gill, in December of the same year. Mr. Murray had several times visited it before, and knew it as it was while the reign of heathenism was unbroken. He had it before his mind as it was under that reign, and though he had heard something of a change being in progress, his expectations were not highly raised. Let the reader judge of the grateful surprise, when, on approaching the shore, instead of a crowd of naked, wondering, rude, suspicious savages, with long hair and painted bodies, and armed with clubs, spears, and other weapons, he found a company of quiet, orderly people, all more or less clothed, with confiding, affectionate countenances, long hair, and other marks of heathenism almost entirely gone, and not a weapon of war to be seen—all pressing forward, each eager to be foremost in giving the most cordial welcome. The visitors did not need to be told that a mighty change was in progress, and all they saw and heard during their stay in the island tended to confirm their first impressions. A large number, probably about half the population of the island, had embraced Christianity. The services and schools were being attended by large numbers ; many had learned to read, and hundreds were striving with the utmost diligence to do so. A moral change, moreover, was in progress, corresponding to the great external one that was everywhere visible. A considerable number were professedly seeking the salvation of their souls, and some among them had, according to the opinions of the missionaries, really found the pearl of great price. Mr. Geddie was waiting the arrival of the John Williams, that he might constitute a Christian church. Accordingly it was the high privilege of the deputation to witness the baptism of 11 of the natives of Aneiteum on the Sabbath following, and to unite with them in commemorating the Saviour's dying love. The occasion was one of the deepest and most hallowed interest. It was an era not only in the history of Aneiteum, but of the entire group to which it belongs. The work is now fairly begun. God has unmistakably affixed the seal of his approbation and given a pledge of ultimate and complete success. In December, 1852, the little church had increased to the number of 24, and every thing indicated a healthy and advancing state.

The Rev. John Inglis, a missionary from the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland, who had been several years in New-Zealand, had joined the mission. Mr. Inglis had been about six months on the island, and Mr. Geddie and he were most harmoniously and zealously prosecuting their interesting and delightful work. These esteemed brethren are contemplating great things. In addition to plans now in operation, they are about to commence an institution for the training of native teachers to assist them in carrying forward and extending their operations in Aneiteum, and also on the neighboring islands. This is to be at Ipeki, under the care of Mr. Inglis. Mr. Geddie is at Aniliganhat ; and in addition to his other duties, manages the printing department. Thus Aneiteum is fully embraced, and if the lives and health of the devoted and excellent men who occupy it are continued, we may anticipate the happiest results, not to Aneiteum alone, but also to the extensive region beyond. They expect a reinforcement from their respective churches, ere a great while, and when that arrives, they will, Providence permitting, extend their operations to the neighboring islands. Under date October 1, 1853, Mr. Geddie writes to the effect, that the church erected at his station about 15 months previously, and in dimensions 62 feet by 25, was found quite too small, and an enlargement was contemplated to be made in the course of a few months. A mission house of stone, 56 by 19, with a room attached to the rear 19 by 13, has taken the place of the former temporary and incommodious building. The attendance at both stations is on the increase, and the hearts of the missionaries are cheered with the most attractive prospects.

The home churches are earnestly at work in their efforts to send additional laborers, and it is gratifying to know, that while there are few found to respond to the call, "Who will go for us?" there has never yet been found any difficulty to defray most liberally all necessary expenditure. Besides the annual salaries of the missionaries, funds to a large amount have been raised for boats and other contingencies. Last year, and the earlier part of the present year, the free-will offerings of the church in Nova Scotia, in clothing and other supplies, additional to the necessary expenditure, amounted to £400, a sum more than equal to the salary of two missionaries. The Synod, at its recent meeting, instructed the Board of Foreign Missions to secure, if possible, the services of two additional missionaries, besides the present candidate for the same field now engaged in preparatory study. Should their efforts be successful in procuring this large accession to the mission staff, the island of Aneiteum will soon become the centre of a very widely extended scene of missionary effort. It is presumed that the Reformed Presbyterian Church in Scotland, whose zealous agent, Mr. Inglis, has within so short a period exercised great and permanent influence on the prospects of the mission, will soon secure a similar reinforcement. The churches in Sydney, New South Wales, have raised £2,000 for the permanent support of two missionaries on the same group ; and as there are peculiar facilities of communication between Australia and the New Hebrides, the amount of effective aid from that prosperous colony is capable of great extension.—REV. J. BAYNE, of Pidou, N. S.

Owing to the difficulty of access to these islands, several years frequently elapse between the communications received from them, and hence the returns must be very imperfect.

WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The missions of the Wesleyans in the South Seas are situated in the Friendly Islands and neighboring groups, and also in the Feejee Islands ; the former mission was begun in 1822, and the latter in 1835.

Friendly Islands.—The Friendly or Tonga Islands are situated in the Pacific between lat. 18° and 25° S., and long. 173° and 176° W. They consist of three separate groups, which are said to contain more than 150 islands. Fifteen of them rise to a considerable height, thirty-five are moderately elevated, and the rest are low. The most southern group, the Tongataboo Islands, were discovered by Tasman in 1643. Tonga, the largest of them is about 20 miles long and 12 wide, in its broadest part. The highest part of Tonga, the little mount of Nukualofa, on which a chapel stands, rises about 60 feet above the sea. The surface of the island generally is only a few feet above the level of the ocean. The central group, called the Habai Islands, is composed of a considerable number of small islands. The most populous of them is Lefuka, about 8 or 9 miles long and 4 broad. These islands are very fertile. The most northern group is formed by the Havau Islands, which are somewhat larger and higher than the Habai Islands. The island of Vavau, which is a fine island, is about 36 miles in circumference; its surface is uneven, and, on the northern side, rises to a considerable elevation.

The climate of the Friendly Islands is humid, and the heat rather oppressive, rising frequently to 98° in the shade. Much rain falls periodically. The trade-winds are not constant, and westerly winds occasionally blow in every season, which, from their variable character, have obtained from the natives the name of "foolish winds."

These islands are remarkable for their fertility, and the variety of their vegetable productions. Ewa is so fruitful as to be designated the granary of "Tongataboo." The island of Tongataboo, which is nearly a dead level, with the exception of a few hillocks, 30 or 40 feet high, has a rich and fertile vegetable mould, which is not composed of sand, as in the other coral islands. The Friendly Islands abound in tropical fruits and productions. The inhabitants of these islands belong to the same general stock, and resemble those of the other South Sea Islands, already described. The population is estimated by missionaries at about 50,000.

Their political constitution is despotism, supported by a hereditary aristocracy. In one view, however, the government may be considered as a kind of family compact; for the persons holding offices and titles address one another by the names of father, son, uncle, and grandfather, without any reference to kindred. Their ranks are, king, chiefs, matabooles, toos, and tamaioeikis, or slaves. The matabooles rank next to the chiefs, and are a sort of ministers. They are always looked up to as men of experience, and superior information. The sons and brothers of matabooles assist at public ceremonies, under the direction of the matabooles. The matabooles attend to the good order of society, and look to the morals of the younger chiefs, who are apt to run into excesses, and oppress the lower orders. They are much respected by all classes. The commonalty are called Toos.

The present king of these islands is an exemplary Christian, and a preacher of the Gospel. The inhabitants are in a transition state. A new order of things is springing up. Club arbitration, which formerly prevailed, has been laid aside; a code of laws has been framed; governors are appointed to the different groups, and courts of justice instituted.

The first attempt to introduce Christianity into the Friendly Islands was made in the year 1797, when Captain Wilson of the "Duff" left ten mechanics at Hihifo, a town on Tongataboo, in the capacity of missionaries. After having resided together some time, they separated, for the purpose of being more extensively useful. The chief under whose protection they resided, was murdered by his own brother, and the island involved in a sanguinary and desolating war. Three of them were murdered by the natives; the others were obliged to take refuge among the rocks and dens of the island. They were plundered of their property, stripped of their clothing, and subjected to various kinds of insult. When the strife terminated, the missionaries endeavored to support themselves by hard labor. The natives, however, having stolen every thing they possessed, it was with great difficulty they succeeded in constructing a forge. When this was accomplished the thievish inhabitants brought the articles they had stolen, in order to have them manufactured into some other form that pleased them better. In 1800 an English ship arrived among the islands, the captain of which offered the distressed missionaries a passage to New South Wales; and they being utterly destitute, and having but little prospect of usefulness among the natives, gladly accepted the proposal. For 20 years after this, no missionaries visited these islands.

The Rev. Walter Lawry, of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, arrived at Tongataboo in August, 1822. He was kindly received by the people, and for a time well treated. Like his predecessors, however, he experienced but little encouragement. The natives received him as the harbinger of soldiers who would shortly come to kill them, and seize their island; and consequently treated him with suspicion. In 1823 he was obliged to remove to the colony of New South Wales, on account of domestic circumstances. In 1825, the Rev. Messrs. John Thomas and John Hutchinson were appointed to Tongataboo, where they arrived in June, 1826. They fixed their residence at Hihifo, where they erected a substantial dwelling-house, and commenced the study of the language and the instruction of the people. They also met with great opposition and with little success.

In the year 1827 they were reinforced by the arrival of Rev. Nathaniel Turner, Rev. William Cross, and Mr. Weiss. They found at Nukualofu, one of the chief towns of the island, two native teachers from Tahiti, who had been some time employed in that locality, preaching to the people in the Tahitian language. They had erected a chapel, and 240 persons attended their teaching.

In January, 1830, Mr. Thomas proceeded to Lifuka, the chief of the Habai Islands. On his arrival he found that the king Taufaahau had renounced idolatry, and acknowledged Jehovah as the true God, and that the houses that were formerly held sacred were used as common dwellings. The chief had visited Tonga a few months before, and on his return he was accompanied by a young man and his wife, who had been baptized, as teachers. Immediately on his arrival, Mr. Thomas began to preach to the natives. He also opened schools both for males and females, which were well attended, chiefly by adults. They were taught principally by the natives themselves. Such as had learned a little taught others what they knew. The king and others of the chiefs attended, and stood up in the same ring with their people, to be catechized every morning.

Mr. Thomas, after being some months in the Habai Islands, baptized a number of the natives, among whom was Taufaahau, the king. He and his people erected a large building for public worship, which was usually attended by great numbers of the natives, there being generally from a thousand to fifteen hundred persons present. The king was very zealous in bringing over the people from idolatry, and young and old, rich and poor, masters and servants, might now be seen renouncing the worship of idols, and turning to the true God. Among others was Tamaha, a female chief of the highest rank, who had been regarded as a deity, and was one of the pillars of the popular superstition.—Meth. Mag. 1832, p. 144; Miss. Not. Vol. VII, p. 513.

Idolatry also received a heavy blow in the island of Vavau. Three years before, Finau the king appeared anxious for a missionary, but afterwards he acted the part of a persecutor, and was mad on his idols. The king of the Habai Islands, and some of his people had, however, gone on a visit to Vavau, with 24 canoes, and the missionaries wrote a friendly letter to Finau. The king of Habai exhorted him to turn to God, and put away his lying spirits, and he at length yielded, saying, "Well, I will; and I will spend the Sabbath with you, in worshipping your God." He then gave orders to his servants to worship Jehovah, and to set on fire the houses of the idols. These orders were promptly obeyed. Some of the houses of the idols were taken by the people for their own use; others, to the number of 18, were burnt to the ground, and their gods in them. Some, however, were much alarmed at these proceedings; but a thousand people at least, it was supposed, joined with the king in renouncing idolatry. They showed great eagerness to hear about the new religion. The Habai people had no rest from them day nor night. When they had done with one company another would come for instruction, and thus they were kept constantly employed.

In March, 1831, Messrs. Nathaniel Turner, J. Watkin, and W. Woon, three new missionaries, arrived at Nukualofa, in Tongataboo, the last of whom was a printer. Hitherto the missionaries had had great trouble in writing out books for the natives; but now a press was established, at which were printed large editions of several school-books, select passages of Scripture, hymn-books, catechisms, and other useful works. The people were greatly delighted, and not a little surprised when they first saw the press in operation. Thousands of these little books were in a short time circulated, and were read by them with great interest. The desire for books was very great, and the missionaries, availing themselves of this, did not think it advisable to give them generally gratuitously. But the people were so poor that many found it difficult to purchase them. The missionaries were greatly assisted by a host of native helpers, not only teachers of schools but class-leaders, exhorters, and even local preachers. The overthrow of idolatry and the reception of Christianity in the various islands was in fact effected very much through the instrumentality of the natives themselves. In the schools were some thousands of scholars, of whom a large portion were adults, and about one-half females. Several hundreds of the natives, both male and female, were employed as teachers, among whom were some of the most influential of the chiefs, and their wives. Many of the females, besides learning to read, were taught to sew by the wives of the missionaries, and it was truly surprising to see the rapidity with which they acquired this useful art, and the neatness of their work. There was a great desire among them to adopt the style of dress worn by English women. The religious instruction communicated by the natives contributed essentially to the overthrow of idolatry, not only in their own and neighboring islands, but even in islands at a great distance. One day the missionaries in Vavau observed three canoes approaching the shore, which proved to be from the island of Nina-Fo-on, 300 miles distant, where 10 missionaries had ever visited. Some of the Vavau converts, however, had been there, and such was the effect of their statements that the whole of the inhabitants had cast away their idols. One of their visitors they had deigned to afford them further instruction.

In July, 1834, a powerful religious movement began in Vavau, which quickly extended to the whole of the Habai Islands, and afterwards, though in a less degree, to the Tonga group. Thousands of the natives had before been nominally Christians; yet, the number who gave evidence of true conversion was not considerable. Now, hundreds of men, women, and children, including some of the principal chiefs, might be seen in deep distress, weeping aloud and crying to God for mercy. Often as soon as the service commenced, the cries of the people began. Many trembled as if they were about to be judged at the bar of God. For a time, the people laid aside their ordinary employments, and gave themselves up entirely to religious exercises. The missionaries went about among them, imparting instruction, and pointing them to Christ, and many of them soon found peace in believing. The work was not confined merely to the principal islands, but spread, like fire among stubble, through the whole of them. In a short time, every island had caught the flame: everywhere the people were earnestly seeking the Lord, or rejoicing because they had found him. This religious movement was followed by a remarkable reformation of manners. Among other sins, polygamy was now abandoned; marriage became general; and they were more decent and modest in their apparel, many of them dressing in the English style. They set a high value on the means of grace. They kept the Sabbath with remarkable strictness, resting from labor; and employing the whole day in the public and private exercises of religion. They also maintained morning and evening worship every day. In their prayers there was an affectionate simplicity. Their former hatred of each other was now exchanged for love. The missionaries had great pleasure in laboring among a people so affectionate in their dispositions, so attentive to their instructions, and so tractable in their manners. To assist the reader in judging of the character of the work, we shall here give a few extracts from the letters of the missionaries:

"On Tuesday, July 27th," says Mr. Turner of Vavau, "we believe that not fewer than 1000 souls were converted; not now from dumb idols only, but from the power of Satan unto God. For a week or two we were not able to hold the schools, but had prayer meetings six times a day. We could not speak five minutes before all were in tears, and numbers prostrated before the Lord, absorbed in deep concern about salvation. Frequently their words were, 'Praise the Lord! I never knew Jesus until now, now I do know him, he has taken away all my sins; I love Jesus Kalaise.' Some were so filled with joy that they could not contain themselves, but cried out for 'hearts to praise the Lord.' This has not been like the dew descending upon the tender herb, but as the spring-tide, or as the overflowing of some mighty river; all the mounds of sin have been swept away; the Lord has bowed the whole island to his sway. We have to hold two prayer meetings daily. We have ascertained that the total number in society, is 3066: and the number converted, for the most part, within the past six weeks, is 2262."

"In the morning," says Mr. Tucker, of the Habai Islands, "we repaired to the house of prayer as soon as it was light. The Lord made 'the place of his feet glorious,' the stout-hearted began to tremble, there was a mighty shaking among the dry bones. As soon as service began, the cries of the people commenced—what a solemn but joyful sight to behold! One thousand or more individuals bowed before the Lord, weeping at the feet of Jesus, and praying in agony of soul! I never saw such distress, never heard such cries for mercy, or such confessions of sin before. These things were universal, from the greatest chiefs in the land to the meanest individuals, and of both sexes, old and young. The Lord heard the sighing of the prisoners, he bound up many a broken-hearted sinner in that meeting, and proclaimed liberty to many a captive. We were engaged nearly the whole day in this blessed work. I attended four services and witnessed hundreds of precious souls made happy by a sense of the Saviour's love, on that day and the preceding evening. We have not yet received an account from all the islands of those who have obtained peace with God during this revival, but from the number already brought in by the leaders, we believe that upwards of 2000 were converted to God in the course of a fortnight."—Miss. Notices, Vol. VIII, p. 149.

Not the least remarkable of the converts was Taufaahau, the king both of the Habai and Vavau Islands, and who, at his baptism, was called George, while his queen was named Charlotte. They both adorned their Christian profession, and were truly zealous, devoted persons. They both met classes and superintended schools. The king is a very excellent local preacher, and never sought to be preferred before others, but went wherever he was sent, fulfilling his appointments with the greatest cheerfulness. Mr. Tucker, having one day in the course of conversation, stated his views on the subject of slavery, and mentioned the emancipation of the negroes in the West Indies, he (King George,) said several of his servants were slaves, having been given to him by his father and other chiefs; but that he would liberate them that very day. In the evening, he accordingly called them all together and set them at liberty. The scene was very affecting. He told them of the many evils which were practised among them during the reign of heathenism, and spoke of the love and mercy of God, in sending the Gospel to them with all its attendant blessings. He told them how much he loved them, and then said, "You are no longer slaves: you are your own masters, and may go and reside where you please."

They all burst into tears and wept aloud; the king himself and his queen could not refrain from tears. Two of them begged to be allowed to live and die with him; but he would not consent to their remaining as slaves. "If you wish," said he, "to reside a little longer with us, well; if you desire to go and dwell in any other island, just please yourselves."—Miss. Not. Vol. VIII. p. 315, 317, 320.

The missionaries were indebted to the king for the erection of a very large chapel in Habai. It was 110 feet by 45 inside, and was expected to be capable of holding all the inhabitants of the island. It was probably the largest and most elegant building ever erected in the Friendly Islands, and was a fine monument of the zeal and good taste of the king. It was built in little more than two months, and for several weeks there were about a thousand people engaged in the work. Most of the chiefs were employed in plaiting kafa or cinet, while the common people did the heavier work. The pillars and other timber used in the frame work were brought from other islands. The labor was regularly divided among the inhabitants of the whole group, and each party tried to excel the others in their workmanship. As they had no nails the timbers were fastened with kafa, made of the fibres of the cocoa-nut husks, and dyed black, red, and other colors. These colors they interweave with almost mathematical accuracy, which makes their work appear to great advantage. The king gave several beautifully carved spears which were left to him by his predecessors, and had often been used in war, to be converted into rails for the communion-table, and two beautifully carved clubs, which were formerly worshiped as gods, were now fixed at the bottom of the pulpit-stairs.

At the opening of the chapel, the natives assembled in great numbers from all the islands, on many of which the sick and aged only were left. On this occasion, the king delivered a very appropriate sermon from Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the temple. King George is one of nature's noblemen: he is six feet four inches high, well made, with an intelligent and benevolent countenance.

Commander Wilkes, of the "United States Exploring Expedition," describes his late reception by the Friendly Islanders in terms of great interest. He says, "On the morning of the 24th, I landed at Nukualofa with all the officers that could be spared from other duties. We were received on the beach by Mr. Tucker, one of the missionaries, and were at once surrounded by a large number of natives. It was impossible not to be struck with the great difference between these people and those we had left in New-Zealand; nothing of the morose and savage appearance, so remarkable there, was seen. Here all was cheerfulness and gayety; all appeared well fed, and well formed, with full faces and muscles. The number of children particularly attracted our notice, in striking contrast with the New-Zealand group, where but a few were seen. We waited some minutes for King George. When he made his appearance, I could not but admire him; he is upwards of six feet in height, extremely well proportioned and athletic; his limbs are rounded and full; his features regular and manly, with a fine open countenance, and sensible face; all which were seen to the greatest advantage. He at once attracted all eyes; for, on approaching, every movement showed that he was in the habit of commanding those about him. With unassuming dignity he quietly took his seat."

King George is now about fifty years old. He was converted during the great revival in Tonga, in July and August, 1834. He succeeded to the sovereignty of all the islands in 1845. He has thrown the whole weight of his influence in favor of Christianity. Mr. Lawry says, "What God declares to be wrong, he causes to be refrained from, or punished when done; but religion, in all its operations, he leaves, where God leaves it, between God and the conscience."

In February, 1835, Mr. Peter Turner, accompanied by some of the natives, sailed from Vavau for Niua-Tubu-tabu, or Keppel's Island, about 170 miles distant. After the arrival of Mr. Turner, a work similar to that which had lately occurred in the Habai and Vavau Islands, commenced here. Mr. Turner remained on the island between three and four months. He baptized 514 adults and 200 children, united the former into a Methodist Society, and married 240 persons, while in the schools there were 557 scholars, male and female, old and young. He now left them under the care of the native teachers. Mr. Thomas, on a subsequent visit to the islands of Niua-Tubu-tabu and Niua-fo-on, baptized 778 adults and 403 children, forming, with those previously baptized, the greater part of the population.

In 1836, auxiliary Missionary Societies were formed in the islands of Habai and Vavau. Great numbers of the natives were present at the meetings for their formation, and their speeches were deeply interesting. The contrasts which they drew between their past and present condition, were affecting. The subscribers were very numerous, and included persons of all ages, and of all ranks, from the king down to the poorest of the people. In the absence of a circulating medium, their contributions consisted chiefly of articles of native manufacture. The most valuable of these were fine mats, which many of the chiefs presented. A few gave pigs, many gave native cloth, some native fish-hooks, others oils, yams, arrow-root, tortoise-shell, baskets, ornaments, &c. The king was particularly zealous in carrying on these auxiliary societies, and on one occasion he and his queen gave a donation of ten sovereigns, which had been received by King George as a present from the captain of an English war ship.

In March, 1839, King George promulgated, in a large assembly of the chiefs and people, a code of laws, which had been drawn up for their government, and appointed judges to hear and decide all cases of complaint which might arise among them. No one, whether chief or private person, was now to take the law into his own hand; but must bring every matter of importance before the judges. It is evident, from the character of this code, that the missionaries had some hand in its formation. And, although it may not be free from defects, yet its adoption was an important step in the progress of civilization, laying the foundation for the security of life and property, and for the future improvement and happiness of the people.

In Tongataboo, Christianity had made much less progress than in Habai and Vavaa Islands. There heathenism had all along maintained itself in vigor, particularly in the district of Hihifo, where the missionaries originally settled, but which, after two or three years, they left in consequence of the opposition they encountered. Tonga was, in fact, the centre of the superstition of the Friendly Isles. Its very name, Tongataboo, or Tonga, the holy or consecrated, would seem to mark it out as a stronghold of the ancient religion. Though many of the natives, particularly at Nukualofa, embraced Christianity, yet there were thousands throughout the island who clung to idolatry, and from time to time they manifested determined hostility to the Christians.

In June, 1840, the heathen chiefs of Tonga broke out in rebellion. Capt. Croker, of the British ship Favorite, happening to arrive just at this time, united the force under his command to that of King George, in the hope of bringing the quarrel to a speedy conclusion. But he, with two of his officers, were killed, and the first lieutenant and 19 men dangerously wounded. By this unfortunate occurrence the mission was broken up for a time, but was resumed again at the restoration of peace.

Of late years, Christianity has greatly extended itself in the Friendly Islands, notwithstanding the opposition of heathenism and popery. Quite lately the character and actions of the Christian king of these islands has attracted considerable public attention. Tonga, the principal island, has been again the scene of a rebellion, instigated by a few chiefs who still adhere to heathenism. The rebels were aided by Romish priests, who, for some years, have had a settlement on the island. An ecclesiastic, said to be a bishop, was prominent in the quarrel, and went in search of a French ship of war to chastise King George. Fears were excited that there might be a repetition, in the Friendly Isles, of those acts of despotic tyranny practiced by the same power in Tahiti a few years ago. In the interval many prayers were offered up to God in behalf of King George and his people. During the bishop's absence, the British war ship Calliope, commanded by Sir E. Home, came into the harbor of Tonga. Meanwhile King George's efforts for suppressing the rebellion were successful; the rebels surrendered, and were magnanimously pardoned, and the war was brought to a happy termination. The king by his forbearance and generosity, in the hour of triumph, and by the practical wisdom of other parts of his conduct, has eminently adorned his Christian profession. The chiefs of the fort called Hound, having first notified their intention to submit, a day was appointed to receive this submission; and as the custom of the nation is to destroy the vanquished, the missionaries thought it right to be present at the ceremony, that they might intercede for the captives, if needful. But their good offices were not required. The king caused it to be proclaimed that he did not intend to take from these chiefs either their lives, their dignity, or their lands, but that he "freely forgave them for the sake of lotu alone." The clemency of Christianity, which thus shone so conspicuously in the king's conduct towards the rebels is the more marked when we remember that they had barbarously murdered some of his own relatives, among the many victims that fell into their hands. His conduct on this occasion won the hearts and allegiance of even his bitterest enemies. The pardoned chiefs returned from the assembly to the king's house, and that same night renounced their heathenism, and at the family altar of King George, for the first time in their lives, they bowed their knees to the Lord Jesus Christ. More than 100 persons followed their example when Mr. West visited the fort a few days afterward. On the 16th of August the remaining fortress surrendered, and was destroyed; and mercy again triumphed in saving the lives of the vanquished. The Romish priests who had persisted in remaining in it to the last, notwithstanding the remonstrances addressed to them both by the king and Sir E. Home, escaped without injury, and their property was saved from destruction by the personal exertions of the king and the baronet, who went through the midst of burning houses and falling trees to save their goods. Thus did Providence guard this worthy king, and reward his Christian courage and consistency and mercy. Sir E. Home was surprised and delighted, and afterwards said to one of the missionaries, "I saw the noble and Christian conduct of King George. He can only be compared to Alfred the Great, of blessed memory. He is worthy of being called a king. He is the greatest man in these seas."

These events took place in August, 1852. In November, Sir E. Home returned in the Calliope to the Friendly Isles, that he might learn the result of the visit of the French ship of war. He seemed very anxious that no harm should happen to the Friendly Islanders or the king. His visit was an occasion of much joy to all parties. However, the French ship had not arrived. But on the 12th of November, two days after Sir E. Home left Tonga, the Moselle made her appearance. Her commander, Captain Belland, was commissioned by the Popish governor of Tahiti to inquire into certain complaints lodged against King George by the captain of a French whaler, the Gustave of Havre-de-Grace, and also by the Romish priests residing in Tonga. The king obeyed the summons of the captain, and went on board the Moselle, taking with him his state paper box, in which he had copies of all his correspondence, especially that with the Romish priests. This correspondence he laid before the captain, who viewed the king and his papers with astonishment. At the close of their long interview, which lasted five hours, and throughout which the king conducted himself with the greatest Christian propriety, the French captain expressed himself entirely satisfied, and stated to the king that "the French government, through him, acknowledged George as king of the Friendly Islands; and that the only condition he would impose was that, if any Frenchman chose to reside in his dominions, he should be protected, so long as he obeyed the laws; and that if any of the king's subjects chose to become Roman Catholics they should be allowed to do so." To these conditions the king agreed, and the dreaded French war ship took her departure, the captain declaring that he "had seen and conversed with many chiefs in the South Seas, but that he had not seen one to be compared in knowledge and ability, in courage and dignity, to George, the king of the Friendly Islands."

And thus this man, who 29 years ago was a savage, noted through the South Seas for his bravery and fierceness of disposition, has become "a wonder unto many"—a monument of the enlightening and transforming power of the Gospel of Christ. In 1844, he lost his peace, and became a "backslider in heart;" but it was only for a short time. Publicly, at a love feast, he penitently acknowledged his fall, and immediately found peace anew, and ever since he has maintained a walk conformable to the Gospel.

The war, thus brought to a close, had an unfavorable influence on the mission; but much is hoped for from the moral influence of the events connected with its termination. In the month of October a great council was held, at which all the ruling chiefs were present, and many important regulations were enacted. The following extracts will speak for themselves: "The system of tabu is abolished. All slaves are hereby set at liberty; and no man is to keep a slave or other person in bondage. All persons are to dress modestly and becomingly. All crime will be punished; and the laws already printed are to be enforced throughout the land. All children are to be sent to school, for on this depends the future welfare of our nation."

In no other mission of the Wesleyans has so large a number of native preachers been raised up to proclaim the Gospel to their countrymen as in this mission. Nearly 500 of the Friendly Islanders are regularly licensed to preach. In this great result, the institution for training a native ministry has exerted an important influence, and was early brought into operation.

The printing-press also is worked with great efficiency, and so is also their system of day schools, in which are nearly 8,000 children. Altogether this mission is worthy to stand by the side of that to the Sandwich Isles, as a witness before the world of what the religion of the cross can effect, even among a savage people, in the short space of thirty years.

The Rev. Robert Young, the deputation lately sent from London to visit these missions, has just returned, and in his report bears the most delightful testimony to what the religion of Christ has done for this people. Among other things he says: "With the exception of about 50 persons, the entire population have embraced Christianity. It is true they have not all felt its saving power, yet they have all been more or less benefited by its influence, and some thousands of them have experienced its transforming power, and are now, by the grace of God, adorning the doctrine of God their Saviour. There were many things that delighted me during my visit to that interesting land. I was pleased with the reverence of the people for the Lord's day. On that day nothing is heard or seen infringing upon its sacred right. If people are beheld coming from their habitations, it is that they may go to the house of the Lord and inquire in his holy temple. If a canoe is seen in the offing, it is conveying a local preacher to his appointment on some distant island, that he may preach Jesus to the people. If noises occasionally fall upon the ear, they are not those of revelry and strife, but songs of praise and earnest prayer to the God of heaven. I was also delighted with the attention of the people to family worship. That duty is strictly attended to, there being very few families throughout the length and breadth of these islands bearing the Christian name where they have not a domestic altar on which is presented the morning and evening sacrifice. I was also pleased with their proficiency in learning. Not less than 8,000 of them can read the sacred Scriptures, and 5,000 can write their own language, and some of them very elegantly. I examined several of our schools; and many of the pupils, in addition to reading and writing, had acquired a very respectable knowledge of geography, arithmetic, natural history, and some other branches of learning. A few of them were even making attempts to master astronomy. I had also the pleasure of examining the students of our normal institution, and was greatly delighted with their proficiency.

"Though as a nation they are, after all, but in a transition state, yet, in point of truthfulness, and honesty, and hospitality, and temperance, and chastity, they might be placed in most advantageous contrast with the refined and polite nations of the civilized world. King George is a most decided and exemplary Christian. I had the privilege of being with him for nearly two months, and during that period I never heard a foolish word drop from his lips, nor did I ever see anything in his spirit or deportment inconsistent with the most entire devotedness as a disciple of the Lord Jesus Christ. He is a local preacher, and I heard him preach in Feejee a most interesting, powerful, and effective sermon. On his arrival in Sydney, to which place he accompanied Mr. Young, he attended a missionary meeting. It appears that some years ago he gave to Mr. Rabone, a missionary in the Friendly Islands, an idol god which he and his family had been accustomed to worship. That idol god had been preserved by Mr. Rabone, who being at the mission in Sydney, showed this to the king, and requested him to take it with him to the meeting. King George did so, and on the platform he held up the idol and said, 'This is the thing which I and my family were accustomed to worship.' Then holding up first one hand and then the other, each of which was minus two joints of the little finger, he said, 'My father cut off these fingers and offered them in sacrifice to this very thing.' But the king had been amply revenged upon his idol gods. On his embracing Christianity, he had them all collected, and, to the indescribable alarm of his people, he hanged the whole fraternity of them in his kitchen, and left them dangling in evidence of their inability to save themselves or those who had put their trust in them."

Feejee Islands.—The Feejee Group is situated about 360 miles north-west of the Friendly Islands, between lat. $15^{\circ} 30'$ and $19^{\circ} 30'$, and long. 177° and 178° W. It comprises 150 islands, about 100 of which are inhabited. The remaining islands are occasionally resorted to by the natives for the purpose of fishing, and taking the biche-de-mer, or sea-slug. There are also numerous reefs and shoals. Two are large islands, stretching north-east and south-west, nearly throughout the whole extent of the group; and are supposed to be each about 300 miles in circumference. This group of islands comprises seven districts, and is under as many principal chiefs. All the minor chiefs, on the different islands, are more or less connected or subject to one of these, and as the one party or the other prevails in war, they change masters. War is the constant occupation of the natives and engrosses all their time and thoughts. The introduction of fire arms brought about a great change of power. This happened in the year 1809. A brig was wrecked on the reef off Nairai, which had both guns and powder on board. The crew, in order to preserve their lives, showed the natives the use of the new instrument. They joined the Mbaa people, instructed them in the use of the musket, and assisted them in their wars.

The people are divided into a number of tribes independent of, and often hostile to, each other. In each tribe great and marked distinctions of rank exist. The classes, which are readily distinguished, are as follows:—1, kings; 2, chiefs; 3, warriors; 4, matanivanua, literally "Eyes of the land." They are the king's messengers; 5, slaves, (kaisi.) The last have nominally little influence.

The climate of the different sides of the islands may, as in all the Polynesian islands, be distinguished as wet or dry, the windward side being subject to showers, while to the leeward it is remarkably dry, and the droughts are of long continuance. The difference of temperature is, however, small. Earthquakes are not unfrequent, generally occurring, in the month of February. Several shocks are often felt in a single night. By observing the plants whose flowers succeed each other, the natives are guided in their agricultural occupations.

Next to war, agriculture is the most general occupation of this people. To this they pay much attention, and have a great number of esculent fruits and roots, which they cultivate, in addition to many spontaneous productions of the soil.

The population of these islands has been estimated at 300,000. This computation, however, proceeds upon the supposition that the interior of the islands is thickly inhabited, which seems very doubtful. It is probable that the number may be about 200,000.

The Feejeans are generally above the middle height, and exhibit a great variety of figure. The chiefs are tall, well-made, and muscular, while the lower orders are meagre, from laborious service and scanty nourishment. Their complexion, in general, is between that of the black and copper-colored races, although instances of both extremes are to be met with, indicating a descent from two different stocks. They are inferior to the natives of Tonga in beauty of person. In the Tonguese there is a native grace combined with fine forms, and an expression and carriage as if educated; while there is an air of power and independence in the Feejeans, that makes them claim attention. They at once strike one as peculiar, and, unlike other Polynesian natives, they have a great deal of activity both of mind and body, which may be ascribed, in some measure, to their constant wars, and the necessity of their being continually on the alert to prevent surprise. They are much more intelligent than those of other parts of Polynesia, and express themselves with great clearness and force. They excel the inhabitants of Tonga in ingenuity, as appears from their clubs and spears, which are carved in a very masterly manner, neatly formed, and ponderous; cloth beautifully checkered; variegated mats; earthen pots; wicker-work baskets, and other articles; all of which have a cast of superiority in the execution.

The faces of the greater number are long, with a large mouth, good and well-set teeth, and a well formed nose. Instances, however, are by no means rare, of narrow and high foreheads, flat noses, and thick lips, with a broad, short chin. Still, they have nothing about them of the negro type. Their eyes are generally fine, being black and penetrating. The expression of their countenances is usually restless and watchful; they are observing and quick in their movements. Their hair is somewhat curly and rather disposed to be woolly. Their whole external character, viewed generally, is fierce and warlike, rather than brave and noble. For an account of their cannibal propensities, see Cannibals.

A feast frequently takes place among the chiefs, to which each is required to bring a pig. On these occasions, Tanoa, king of Mbau, from pride and ostentation, always furnishes a human body. A whale's tooth is about the price they put on a human life, even when the party slain is a person of rank. This is viewed by the relatives of the victim as a sufficient compensation. It is, therefore, not to be expected, that a people who set so little value upon the lives of their own countrymen should much regard those of foreigners. Hence the necessity, while holding intercourse with them, to be continually guarded against their murderous designs, which they are always meditating for the sake of the property about the person, or to obtain the body for food. Several instances are related of crews of vessels visiting the islands, having been put to death and eaten.

The pantheon of the Feejeeans contains many deities. "Many of the natives," says Mr. Hunt, in his Memoirs of Mr. Cross, "believe in the existence of a deity called Ové, who is considered the maker of all men; yet different parts of the group ascribe their origin to other gods. A certain female deity is said to have created the Vewa people; and yet if a child is born malformed it is attributed to an oversight of Ové." The god most generally known next to Ové is Ndengei. He is worshiped in the form of a large serpent, alleged to dwell in a district under the authority of Mbau, which is called Nakauvandra, and is situated near the western end of Viti-Levu. To this deity they believe that the spirit goes immediately after death for purification, or to receive sentence.

All spirits, however, are not believed to be permitted to reach the judgment seat of Nden-gei; for, upon the road it is supposed that an enormous giant, armed with a large axe, stands constantly on the watch. With this weapon he endeavors to wound all who attempt to pass him. Those who are wounded dare not present themselves to Ndengei, and are obliged to wander about in the mountains. Whether the spirit be wounded or not, depends not upon the conduct in life; but they ascribe an escape from a blow to good luck. They have four classes of gods besides their malicious deities.

The occasions on which the priests are required to officiate are usually the following: to implore good crops of yams and taro; on going to battle; for propitious voyages; for rain; for storms, to drive boats and ships ashore, in order that the natives may plunder them; and for the destruction of their enemies. Their belief in a future state, guided by no just notions of religious or moral obligation, is the source of many abhorrent practices; among which are the custom of putting their parents to death when they are advanced in years, suicide, the immolation of wives at the funeral of their husbands, and human sacrifices. (See Human Sacrifices.)

Mbau, the metropolis and imperial city of Feejee, is situated on a small island about two miles in circumference. It contains nearly one thousand inhabitants, most of whom are chiefs. The houses are of a very superior description.

In October, 1835, Rev. Wm. Cross and D. Cargill proceeded from Vavan, one of the Friendly Islands, to Lakemba, one of the Feejee Islands. It was but a small island, being only about 22 miles in circumference, and did not contain above 1000 inhabitants. With a view of ascertaining the disposition of the chiefs and people, it was agreed that the two missionaries should go ashore in the boat. As they approached the beach, many of the natives were running hither and thither on the sand; and as they drew near the landing-place, nearly 200 men were standing at the distance of about 100 feet from it, some armed with muskets, others with bayonets fastened to long sticks, some with clubs and spears, others with bows and arrows, their faces painted some jet black, others red, some after one fashion, others after another. This was rather a formidable array. However, being told that the chief wished to know who they were, and what they wanted, the missionaries went on to his house, a large building within a fortress, nearly a mile from the shore. Having had their object explained to him, he appeared friendly, gave them a piece of land on which to live, and built a temporary dwelling for each of their families.

The missionaries soon began to preach to the natives, and in a few months they baptized a number of them, some of whom had previously obtained a knowledge of divine truth in the Friendly Islands. The Gospel silently made its way among the people; and every week one or more turned their backs upon idolatry. A desire to embrace the new religion prevailed among many of the inhabitants of Lakemba; but they were afraid openly to declare themselves, as the chief, notwithstanding his first profession, threatened and persecuted those who first embraced it. He himself was only a tributary chief, and appeared unwilling to take any step in favor of Christianity until he knew the mind of the more powerful chiefs of Feejee. "When Tanao," said he, referring to one of the most renowned chiefs, "leads the way, I and all my people will embrace the new religion."

In the course of a few years, the missionaries, with the aid of native teachers and preachers, some of whom came from the Vavau Islands, introduced the Gospel into various other islands of the Feejee Group, beside Lakemba, as Rewa, Vewa, Bua, Naudy, and some others of less importance. Though in some instances they had many difficulties to contend with, yet, generally speaking, they met with a favorable reception from the chiefs and people. Their motives, however, for this kind reception of the missionaries were very various, and, in some instances, altogether of a secular character. But the missionaries labored on, trying to enter every open door, and sow "the seed of the kingdom" even on Feejeean soil. Nor did they toil in vain. In 1845 and the following year, there was a religious movement in the island of Vewa, which extended also to others of the islands, similar to that at the Friendly Islands, already described. "Business, sleep, and food," says Mr. Hunt, in describing it, "were almost entirely laid aside. We were at length obliged almost to force some of the new converts to take something for the sustenance of the body. Some of the cases were the most remarkable I have ever heard of; yet only such as one might expect the conversion of such dreadful murderers and cannibals would be. If such men manifested nothing more than ordinary feelings when they repent, one would suspect they were not fully convinced of sin. They literally roared for hours, through the disquietude of their souls. This frequently terminated in fainting from exhaustion, which was the only respite some of them had till they found peace. They no sooner recovered their consciousness than they prayed themselves first into an agony, and then again into a state of entire insensibility. The results of this work of grace have been most happy. The preaching of the word has been attended with more power than before the revival. Many who were careless and useless have become sincere and devoted to God. The experience of most has been much improved, and many have become by adoption and regeneration the sons of God."

Says Mr. Watford, "The people, old and young, chiefs and common people, were broken-hearted before the Lord. The cries for mercy drowned every other sound, and the struggling and roaring for deliverance evinced indescribable agony and bitterness of spirit. They felt themselves great sinners, and their repentance was deep and genuine. The joy of those who were pardoned was as great as their distress had been. At some of our meetings the feeling was overpowering, and the people fell before the Lord, and were unable to stand, because of the glory." Perhaps the most remarkable instance of the mercy of Heaven which this revival witnessed, was the conversion of a chief, whose name was Varin. He had long acted as the human butcher of Seru, called "the Napoleon of Feejee." He was a man of a dreadful character. But by the faithful warnings and instruction of the missionaries his guilty conscience was aroused, and his haughty looks were humbled; and now, like another Paul, he is preaching "the faith he once labored to destroy."

The missionaries continued to pursue their work in the midst of dangers, and scenes of blood and cruelty, which make the flesh creep at the bare recital, and were cheered to find that the Gospel was, even in Feejee, "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." God wonderfully protected them from every evil, and the little flocks which they have gathered have grown in grace, and in numbers far beyond the most sanguine anticipations of those who projected the mission. Mr. Young, who has just returned from Feejee, bears the following testimony to the state of things: "After visiting Lakemba and Vewa, I proceeded to Bau, the capital of the country, and doubtless the deepest hell upon earth. Here I was shown six hovels in which 18 human beings had recently been cooked, in order to provide a feast for some distinguished stranger, and the remains of that horrid repast were still to be seen. I next went to one of the temples, at the door of which was a large stone, against which the heads of the victims had been dashed, previous to their being presented in the temple, and that stone still bore the marks of blood. I saw—but I pause. There are scenes of wickedness in that country that cannot be told. There are forms of cannibalism and developments of depravity that can never be made known. No traveler, whatever may be his character, could have the hardihood to put on record what he witnessed in that region of the shadow of death. I went to see Sakembow, the king of Feejee. He received me with great politeness, and got up and handed me a chair; and his queen knowing I was from England, at once made me a comfortable cup of tea—a thing hardly expected in the palace of a cannibal king. Before I left, King George (of Vavau) arrived at the palace, and I requested him to deal faithfully with Sakembow's conscience, and I believe he attended to my request, and did it with good effect, and I hope the fruit of that visit will be found after many days.

But notwithstanding the darkness and impiety, and sin and cannibalism in Feejee, a great work is being effected in that country. The foul birds of night are hastening away, and the Sun of Righteousness is about to arise with majesty and glory in that benighted land. Much good has already been accomplished. We have 3,000 of the people in church-fellowship; 4,000 in the schools; and 6,000 regular attendants on the ministry. We have 50 native teachers, who are valiant for the truth, and who in different parts of the land are making known the power of Christ's salvation." Then the people in general are beginning to understand and to value the character, the motives, and the objects of the missionaries; and the conviction gains ground, even in the minds of the priests themselves, that the idolatry of Feejee is doomed to fall before the conquering religion of the Son of God. Both in the Friendly Isles and in Feejee, the printing-press is in active operation; and by the assistance of the British and Foreign Bible Society, the natives of both have been well supplied with the Word of God, and this fact accounts for the failure of Popery among the Wesleyan missions in Polynesia. *AUTHORITIES: Annual Reports and Missionary Notices; J. Temperance.—The introduction of spirituous liquors into the South Sea Islands has proved one of the greatest obstacles in the way of the Gospel. The Tahitians were early taught by some natives of the Sandwich Islands to distil ardent spirits from the ti root, and they soon acquired such a fondness for it, that no sacrifice was deemed too great by which the gratification of their appetite might be secured. Whole districts frequently united to erect a rude still, of which, at one time, there were on Tahiti alone, 150. The first spirit that issued from the still, on account of its being the strongest, was called ao, and was carefully preserved and given to the chiefs. The less powerful liquor which was subsequently obtained, was distributed among the common people. A temporary house was erected over the still, where the men and boys assembled, and spent several days in rioting and drunkenness, and where they often practised the most atrocious barbarities. When they were either preparing a still or engaged in drinking, it was impossible to obtain from them the most common offices of hospitality. "Under the unrestrained influence of their intoxicating draught, in their appearance and actions they resembled demons more than human beings. Sometimes in a deserted still-house might be seen the fragments of the rude boiler, and the other appendages of the still, scattered in confusion on the ground, and among them the dead and mangled bodies of those who had been murdered with axes or billets of wood in the quarrels that had terminated their debauch." It was not among themselves only that they quarreled; vessels were sometimes seized, and their crews murdered. The most daring acts of outrage and cruelty occurred from time to time, and led the missionaries to feel that if these immoralities were not suppressed, the most disastrous consequences would ensue, not only to the natives but to themselves. A meeting of the missionaries was convened in 1831, for the purpose of considering what could be done to counteract the existing evils. Each one made a report respecting his station, and deeply lamented the comparative smallness of his congregation and the little regard paid to divine things. The cause which had operated in producing so sad a change was sought for, and it was found in the use of spirituous liquors among the people. The formation of a Temperance Society was proposed and agreed to by the missionaries, who all resolved to use their influence to induce the natives to engage with them to abstain entirely from all ardent spirits. Papers were immediately drawn up, stating the object of the Society and signed by the missionaries at each station. At Papara, a district on the island of Tahiti, the chief Tati entered cheerfully into the plan, and in a short time the society at that station numbered 360. "The vacant seats in the chapel began again to be filled, the schools were well attended, and attention to religion revived; the happy state of things prior to the introduction of spirits re-appeared." The people were so much delighted with this change, that they called a meeting of the inhabitants of that district, and agreed among themselves that they would not trade with any vessel that should bring ardent spirits to their shores. The chiefs and people of other districts, seeing the favorable results of this measure at Papara, followed the good example. Soon after this the "Parliament" met. Before proceeding to business, the members sent a message to the queen to know upon what principles they were to act. She returned a copy of the New Testament, saying, "Let the principles contained in that book be the foundation of all your proceedings;" and immediately they enacted a law to prohibit trading with any vessel which brought ardent spirits for sale. It was some months after the formation of the Temperance Society at Tahiti before it was joined by the queen and her attendants. In March, 1834, a meeting of the Irite Ture, or law-makers, was held to prohibit the importation of spirits, at which it was agreed that if any one was found to have used even one glass, he should be tried, and that if proved guilty he should suffer a penalty, which was, for a native, ten hogs, and for a foreigner, ten dollars, and banishment from the country. Notwithstanding this penalty, the runaway seamen who were living at Tahiti, continually smuggled liquor on shore, but whenever they were discovered their rum was poured upon the beach.

In 1831, during the absence of Mr. Williams from Raiatea, an unprincipled captain brought a cask of spirits to the island, and sold it to the natives. Encouraged by their chief, the people gave way to almost universal dissipation. As the cask which had been imported was sufficient only to awaken a desire for more, they prepared stills and commenced the distillation of spirits from the ti root. Mr. Williams, on his return, found the people in a dreadful state. A meeting was immediately called, which Mr. Williams attended, and resolutions were passed that all the stills should be destroyed. A new judge was chosen, the laws were re-established, and persons selected to go round the island and carry the resolutions into effect. In some districts they met with considerable opposition, but they made repeated circuits, and, in the course of a few months, every still was demolished, and every still-house burnt to the ground. A law was also enacted, inflicting a heavy penalty on any one who should be found engaged in the work of distillation. A temperance society was soon after formed at Raiatea, which was joined by the dissipated young chief, who said, in a letter to Mr. Williams after his return to England, "The spirits, about which your thoughts were evil towards me, I have entirely done away with, because my heart is sick of that bad path, and I am now 'pressing towards the mark for the prize of my high calling.' These are now my thoughts, that God may become my own God. This is really my wish. I am commending myself to God and to the word of his grace."

Daniel Wheeler, a member of the Society of Friends, who visited these islands in 1834, states that, though great efforts were made to suppress the traffic, yet spirituous liquors were introduced clandestinely, and in some of the islands, produced most disastrous results. He states, also, the disgraceful fact that much of this traffic is carried on by American vessels, many of them denominated "temperance ships."

During the visit of the American Exploring Expedition at the Feejee Islands in June, 1840, a series of commercial regulations were agreed to by the principal kings and chiefs on the one part, and Commodore Wilkes and some of his officers on the other, the 6th article of which is as follows:

"All trading in spirituous liquors, or landing the same, is strictly forbidden. Any person offending, shall pay a fine of twenty-five dollars, and the vessel to which he belongs shall receive no more refreshments. Any spirituous liquors found on shore shall be seized and destroyed."

If these untutored natives had been left to themselves, they might have been saved from this scourge. But one of the missionaries writes, in 1841: "We have had peace in the islands for several years, and, for the last six or seven, we have had but little drunkenness. But, of late, the French and American consuls have determined to break through all restrictions. I have seen more drunkenness at Eimeo the last six months than in seven years before." The establishment of the French Protectorate at Tahiti has removed all restraints; and the chiefs at Raiatea have followed the example of the French, and given encouragement to the traffic, which has exerted a most baneful influence, upon the young people especially. But it is gratifying to know that the members of the church have, for the most part, escaped the seductive influence.

GENERAL SUMMARY.

These returns are deficient in several important points. The number of schools is not given at half the stations, and at some of them, the number of scholars is not given; though the latter item approximates somewhat to the fact. The number of European missionaries is correctly given from the latest reports; but the number of native helpers falls far below the truth. The returns, in regard to the number of church members, are full; but some of them are several years old, so that the number here stated must fall somewhat below the fact. Taken as it is, it furnishes a very encouraging result, when compared with the labor bestowed upon the missions. Here are 283 communicants to each European laborer, which is probably much more than the average among us. And the results of the last year reported, show that the work is still progressing in an encouraging manner. Here is an increase on an average of 10 to each missionary of the London Society, that of the Wesleyans not being given.

But the peculiar feature of this mission is, that so much of the work has been accomplished by native agency. Here are 59 stations, and but 57 European missionaries; while many of the stations embrace a large number of out-stations, served by natives. And, on a large number of islands, there has never been any labor but that of natives, with the occasional visits from missionaries. Institutions for training native teachers and evangelists, were established at an early period of the mission, at Avarua, on Rarotonga, in the Hervey Group; at Griffith's Town, on Eimeo, in the Georgian Group; at Malua, on Upolu, and Leone on Tutuila, in the Samoan Group. There is, also, one or more sustained by the Wesleyans. And these institutions have been constantly turning out teachers and evangelists. Although we cannot suppose them to possess the high qualifications required for these offices in this country, yet they appear to have labored with great zeal and success, and generally to have sustained an excellent character, both in view of the natives and of the missionaries.

A missionary ship has been employed most of the time, since the establishment of the mission, in furnishing supplies, and in making voyages among the islands for the purpose of introducing the Gospel. The John Williams, the ship employed for a number of years past, was purchased by the contributions of children.

In all these islands, the languages have been reduced to writing by the missionaries, and a literature given them. The entire Scriptures have been translated and printed in the language of the Georgian, and also of the Hervey Islands, and the New Testament, in Samoan; and many thousand copies of these, and of elementary books, have been printed and sold in these islands.

Soon after the formation of churches in these islands, the natives were encouraged to make contributions for the missionary cause; and the amount contributed for the last year reported was £445.

Almost every year, since the Gospel obtained a foothold in these islands, there have been reported, at some one or more of the different stations, such seasons as, among us, are technically termed Revivals, when a community generally are simultaneously moved by the special presence of the Holy Spirit, to an awakened and earnest attention to the great concerns of the soul. And, in the wonderful events that have transpired in this mission, has been literally fulfilled the prophetic declaration, "The isles shall wait for his law."—(For a portion of this article, the author is indebted to a small work entitled, "South Sea Islands," published in Boston, by Tappan & Whittemore.)

SOUTH AMERICA: South America covers an area of 6,500,000 English square miles, its greatest length being 4,550 miles, and its greatest breadth 3,200. Three-fourths of this area lie between the tropics, one-fourth in the temperate zone. The long chains of the Andes exercise great influence over the climate of a large portion of the country. Two millions of square miles are fertilized by the Amazon, and large tracts by the rivers Orinoco and Plata. Prairies cover a large extent of country, and afford, during a part of the year, sustenance to immense herds of horses and cattle. The Pacific shore, the basin of the Orinoco, the basin of the Amazon, the country watered by the Plata, and Brazil, form five natural divisions, comprehending the whole continent.

BRAZIL.—After the Russian Empire, China, and the United States, this state has the most extensive contiguous territory of any in the world. It possesses more than 4,000 miles of sea-coast, and the coast commerce of the country is second only to that of the United States. The climate is remarkably even and healthy for a tropical country, owing to the great elevation of the whole empire. Until Dec. 1849, the yellow fever was not known, and at Rio Janeiro it was said, proverbially, that physicians could not live. The fever seems now to have left the country. In mineral and vegetable productions, Brazil is exceedingly rich. Coffee, sugar, cotton, furniture and dye-woods, india-rubber, hides, and drugs, are the principal articles for export. The coffee crop more than doubles that of the rest of the world. The Chinese tea-plant is quite extensively cultivated in some of the southern provinces, also the matté. Fruits and flowers abound, and the greater part of the empire enjoys a perpetual summer.

History.—Brazil was discovered by the Portuguese, under Cabral, in 1500. In 1530, it was divided into captaincies, by the king of Portugal. De Souza entered the bay now called Rio de Janeiro in January, 1531; and, supposing it to be a river, named it the River of January. The city founded a few years after this discovery, was called San Sebastian, a name now rarely used. Of the various early colonies, that which possesses the most interest, in a historical as well as missionary point of view, is the French Protestant colony, sent out in 1555, to Rio Janeiro, under the auspices of the great and good Admiral Coligny. The idea of building up a Protestant community on the new-found and fertile shores, excited great interest among the persecuted European reformers. Geneva sent two clergymen and 14 students to accompany the colonists. But the enterprise seemed to be attended with misfortunes at every step. Through the treachery of Villegagnon, the leader of the first expedition, the colony was soon broken up, and the whole plan frustrated. Various colonies were attempted by the French and Dutch; but finally the whole country of Brazil came under the dominion of Portugal. In 1808, Brazil became the residence of the Portuguese court, Rio Janeiro being the capital. In 1822, under Don Pedro I., it became an independent empire. In 1823 an excellent constitution was framed. The government is decentralized. Each of the 21 provinces has its own governor and legislature, besides which there is an imperial parliament, consisting of a Senate and House of Representatives. The emperor, now Don Pedro Segundo, is the constitutional head ; a fine man, descended from the houses of Braganza and Hapsburg, and connected with the Bourbon and Orleans families. The great cities of the empire being situated on the sea-coast, there is little narrow-mindedness and bigotry prevalent among the people. All denominations are free to worship God according to the dictates of conscience.

MISSIONS.

The American Seamen's Friend Society have, for many years, maintained chaplains in the cities of Brazil. The Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States have also, for a considerable time, had a mission there. In 1833, the subject of a mission to South America came before the Missionary Board.

In 1834, an invitation was received from a few pious persons in Buenos Ayres, and in the hope of being useful to the Protestants of that city, and of gaining a foothold in that land of unmitigated Romanism, the committee resolved to obey the call. Accordingly, the Rev. F. E. Pitts was sent out, and the next year Rev. John Dempster (now President of the Biblical Institute, Concord, N. H.) was appointed to follow him. A congregation was soon formed, and a church built ; and after that a parsonage, and now there is a very flourishing Society and Sabbath-school in that city. In 1837, the Board sent out Rev. Dr. P. Kidder and Rev. J. Spaulding. Much was done by Dr. Kidder in the dissemination of the Scriptures, which were everywhere gladly received. Just as he was ready to commence preaching in the Brazilian language, Mrs. Kidder died, and he was compelled to return with his family of young children. The mission is still continued, and all its expenses are borne by the people. The present missionary is Rev. G. D. Carrow.

The next missionary effort was made under the joint auspices of the American Seamen's Friend Society and the American and Foreign Christian Union. Rev. J. C. Fletcher was stationed at Rio, and labored between two and three years, both among his own countrymen, who flock to that port for purposes of commerce, and among the natives. He found copies of the Bible in the Portuguese language, which had doubtless been given or sold by Dr. Kidder. He found tracts especially useful ; and in the city, in the foreign hospitals, and in the country, tracts and Bibles were always gladly received. He there made journeys from 30 to 200 miles into the interior, always having with him a supply of Bibles and tracts. In some instances, he had discussions with the priests, some of whom were induced to receive the Bible. One not only with joy received the Word, but demanded Bibles and tracts, for distribution among his people. Mr. Fletcher heard this priest read the Bible to his people in their own vernacular. The priests, as a general thing, are ignorant, lazy, impure, and not very devoted to their own religion. Infidelity prevails among them, and an English Roman Catholic priest, of Rio de Janerio, informed Ex-Governor Kent, American Consul at Rio, that a priest of his acquaintance died a few years ago refusing the sacrament to the last. Dr. Kidder found a few excellent priests, who seemed to appreciate the Bible ; and one or two were very desirous to see it introduced into the schools of the empire. Sen. Feijo, formerly regent of the empire, was once a priest, and even a bishop ; but he wrote the most powerful book against the celibacy of the Brazilian priesthood and of the Romish clergy in general, that has appeared from any other pen either Romanist or Protestant. Through the influence of Feijo, Montezuma, and other Brazilian statesmen, this important step towards breaking from Rome, i. e., the marriage of the clergy, nearly became a law. There is a great deficiency of priests in Brazil, and for years the presidents or governors of the different provinces when delivering their messages, make this the subject of much complaint. Some parishes have been twenty years without a priest, and the country is constantly increasing in wealth and population. The priests are corrupt and the people have very little of what the French call religiosité.

An attempt was made by some foreign priests, to prevent Dr. Kidder from circulating the Bible ; but their efforts made the Bible more sought for. In 1846, an American gentleman residing in one of the southern provinces, received from the United States a number of Portuguese Bibles, from the American Bible Society. Some foreign priests persuaded a few of the people to give up these, and they were burned ; but the Brazilian priests were indignant, and at a great festival, borrowed a large gilt Bible, belonging to this American gentleman, and bore it at the head of one of their processions. During a part of 1852 and 1853, Mr. Fletcher was Secretary of the U. S. Legation at Rio, and enjoyed unusual facilities among the higher portion of the Brazilians for promoting religion. He was beginning to reap the advantage of such a position for religious influence, when he was called away by sickness in his family. During his residence there, the yellow fever raged, and he was called to witness many deaths among his countrymen, and also, to behold, in the midst of this terrible pestilence, the spiritual birth of many.

The Roman Catholic religion in Brazil, has been several times almost severed from the authority of the Pope. It is characterized by great indifference in its devotees, and by great theatrical splendor on festival occasions—the only occasions, except funerals, when the churches are full. Mr. Fletcher says : “ I have seen the Romish Church in France, Germany, and Italy ; but in show, glitter, and theatrical effect, Brazil takes the lead. The slave trade in Brazil was formally put down by British cruisers in 1850. Slavery will soon be done away with, (though nearly two-thirds of the population are slaves,) because color is not a qualification for respectability. Some of the first officers of the government, civil and military, are tinged with African blood. On the whole, there is no part of the Roman Catholic world, except the United States and England, where missionary labors are so unimpeded, or where they would be better rewarded.—The press is entirely free. There are three or four English chaplains in the coast cities. Railroads are being built, and other indications of progress are manifest.

"In 1852 and 1853, treaties were made by the United States, through our ministers, Hon. Messrs. Schenck and Pendleton, with the republics of Uruguay, the Argentine Confederation, and Paraguay (so long shut up), and clauses permitting Protestant worship and the burial of the Protestant dead, were insisted on and agreed to.

"Patagonia is still heathen ground, and so far as known, the inhabitants have very few religious rites and no idols. The Teerra del Fugians are sunk very low in barbarism, though the few that I saw in the straits of Magellan appeared as capable of elevation as our North American Indians." An attempt was made in 1850 and 1851, by some English missionaries, to labor among them; the sad account of whose sufferings and death from starvation, has appeared in the newspapers.

"Chili," continues Mr. Fletcher, "is the most peaceful, and perhaps the most flourishing of the Spanish-American republics. But, at the present time, the priests' party rule. There is no freedom of opinion in religious matters. The press is muzzled; the Bible in the Spanish language is forbidden to be circulated. Out of Valparaiso, the Protestant dead are buried like dogs. Such abject devotion to the Church of Rome does not exist even in Rome itself, as I have witnessed among the Chilians at Valparaiso. Rev. David Turnbull labored there a number of years, as a missionary of the American and Foreign Christian Union; but he now has a regularly organized church of his own. Rev. Mr. Williams, formerly of the Presbyterian church at Uniontown, Pa., is now laboring in Chili for the American and Foreign Christian Union, and has a flourishing school of Chilean youth, who are also under Gospel influences. Mr. Turnbull also has a successful school for young ladies, taught by Mrs. T. and his sister. Chili is progressing rapidly in material improvements, railroads, mining, &c."

Peru and Bolivia are both bigoted in the extreme, and nothing has been done beyond individual effort.

New Grenada.—In this state, a few years ago, religious liberty was proclaimed, and the Jesuits were banished, giving the Pope a great deal of trouble. Still, however, the priestly party is very strong, and the recent overturning of the constitutional government has given great pain to all lovers of civil and religious liberty. All the South American governments, with the exception of Brazil, have had bloody revolutions. The influence of the Americans on the Isthmus of Panama, which belongs to New Grenada, has been felt throughout the whole republic. The American Seamen's Friend chaplain, at Panama, Rev. Mr. Ravel, has done something toward distributing the Spanish Scriptures and tracts. Rev. Mr. Mont Salvatge, a converted Spanish monk, has recently been sent to New Grenada, by the American and Foreign Christian Union.

Venezuela.—This country has been almost constantly involved in revolutions, and is now under the government of two tyrants, the brothers Monagas. An agent of the American Bible Society is now at work there.

Guiana.—For the missions in British and Dutch Guiana, see West Indies.

Aborigines.—The aboriginal tribes of South America still exist in large numbers. Thousands of them are still in heathenism; but by far the greater part are very loosely connected with the Church of Rome. In the N. E. portion of the continent are the "Arrcmack" Indians, for whom a portion of the Bible has been translated. But these tribes, as to Protestant missions, constitute an almost unbroken field.

SUNDAY-SCHOOLS: The institution of Sunday-schools was inaugurated by an humble layman, a little more than seventy years ago; and it has been mainly conducted and sustained by laymen since that time, and has proved itself a powerful adjunct to the ministry and church of Christ. God has blessed it with wonderful success, and we may safely expect it has far greater blessings in store for our race. Said the late venerable Dr. A. Alexander, "Although this method of teaching the young and ignorant is so simple, yet it deserves to be ranked second to no discovery of our age. I do not know that the beneficence of Providence has been more manifest in anything that has occurred in our day, than in the general institution of Sunday-schools. Other benevolent institutions provide the means of religious instruction; but the Sunday-school makes the application of them." Says Dr. Drew, of England, most eloquently—"Honor rest upon our age. A wonderful machinery has sprung up into existence from humble and feeble sources. God gave the word, and since that blessed hour a million of teaching men and women arose on Sabbath mornings to tell infancy of Jesus, and to lead with loving hand the poor man's child onward on Zion's road. In human history no institution of man holds such an honored place. The unpaid, untiring, and unceasing efforts of Sunday-school love, are of the kindest, strongest and most effective doings of modern times. How do such teachers aid the responsibilities of parents; relieve and gladden the pastor's heart; bring Christ and all Christ's truth to warm young hearts, and captivate listening ears, and penetrate earth's dark places, led by the light of their own Bible, and cheered by the faith of their Christ-sustained souls."

The following interesting account of the origin of the first Sabbath-school is from the graphic pen of Mr. Lancaster, to whom it was communicated by Mr. Raikes when far advanced in life. "He said," observes Mr. L., "about the year 1782 he had taken a garden and wanted a gardener. He went to the outskirts of the city of Gloucester to hire one; and while waiting for the man, he was greatly disturbed by a troop of wretched, noisy boys, who interrupted him while conversing with the man's wife. He anxiously inquired the cause of those children being thus miserably neglected and depraved. 'O sir,' said the woman, 'if you were here on a Sunday, you would pity them indeed. They are then much more numerous, and a hundred times worse—it is a very hell upon earth. We cannot read our Bible in peace for them.' It was this affecting answer which moved every feeling within him. He immediately asked, 'Can nothing be done for these poor children? Is there any body near that will take them to school on a Sunday?' He was answered there was a person who kept a school in the lane who perhaps might do it. At this important moment, while revolving the matter in his mind, the word 'TRY' was so powerfully impressed on his mind as to decide him at once to action. He went and entered into treaty with the school-mistress to take a number of these poor destitute children. Here was the first Sabbath-school Britain ever saw.

"When two years had elapsed after the commencement of the first school, on retiring to rest one evening, Mr. Raikes began to consider that his schools had now been fully tried, and that it was time for the public good that they should be made generally known. On this, instead of going to bed, he directly wrote a paragraph and had it inserted in his newspaper, the Gloucester Journal, Nov. 3, 1783, in which he described the good effects of the Sunday-schools already in operation, and recommended their extension over the country. This paragraph was copied into many other papers, and in consequence he had applications from all parts of the empire; an answer to which he published in his paper. The result was, that the dormant zeal of many was called into action, and the establishment of these schools proceeded throughout the nation with the rapidity of lightning.

"Sept. 7, 1785, a society for the support and encouragement of Sunday-schools in the different counties of England was formed in London. This society engaged the coöperation of the Bishops of Salisbury and Landaff, the Deans of Canterbury and Lincoln, and other distinguished persons, and was the means of greatly advancing the cause.

"Before his death, which took place in 1811, Mr. Raikes had accounts of the establishment of similar schools in various parts of the country, embracing no less than 300,000 children. Well might he say, 'I can never pass by the spot where the word TRY came so powerfully into my mind, without lifting up my hands and heart to heaven, in gratitude to God, for having put such a thought into my heart.'"

The schools were at first conducted by hired teachers, who were paid thirty-three cents a Sabbath. This entailed a load of pecuniary difficulty upon the plan. The Sunday-school society alone expended, during the first 16 years of its existence, no less than £4,000 sterling in the salaries of teachers. Gratuitous instruction was an astonishing improvement upon the system, laying a solid basis for its efficiency, and ensuring its success. The exact time when this was first introduced was not known, nor where it commenced; but about the year 1800 this plan became very general.

The institution of Sunday-schools was now become universal throughout England. Every city and every town had warmly espoused the cause; and on July 13, 1803, the London Sunday-school Union was formed, which gave the cause an additional impulse.

Scotland, as early as 1797, entered spiritedly into this good work, enrolling 34 schools that year, and the next year adding 20 more. Wales, at a very early period, entered with eagerness into the scheme, and adorned her romantic and picturesque valleys with numerous asylums for the instruction of the poor. And the necessity of supplying these schools with Bibles, suggested the idea and led to the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society. So great was the progress of Sunday-schools in Wales, that in three years 177 schools were established, containing more than 8,000 children.

The Sunday-school system was introduced into Ireland in 1793; but its progress was not rapid until the formation of the Hibernian Sunday-school Society, in Dublin, in 1809. In April, 1815, there were 252 schools, containing more than 25,000 children, under the care of this institution. Since that time the number of schools has been greatly augmented. The first adult Sunday-school was planted by Mr. Charles, upon the mountains of Wales, in the summer of 1811.

The first Sunday-school in Asia was established by the Wesleyan missionaries in Ceylon, June 4, 1815, and gained them great favor in the eyes of the people. In the Annual Report of the London Sunday-school Union, May 1, 1818, they give us an account of Sabbath-schools in successful operation in Bordeaux and La Garde, near Montauban, France; also in Holland, in Rotterdam and Zeist; also in Sidney, Richmond, and seven other places mentioned in New South Wales, and further cheering accounts from the cause in Ceylon.

First Sunday-schools in the United States.—The Sunday-school Repository of August, 1818, states that the first Sunday-school in the city of New York (and it is believed in this country,) was instituted in 1791, and incorporated in 1796. Its object was to instruct children to read and write, gratuitously, who were unable to go to school during the week; but their instructions were carried on by means of hired teachers, and their design did not extend to the religious instruction of the scholars. In the Sunday-school Teachers' Magazine for 1824, it is stated that Mr. and Mrs. Bethune had spent part of the years 1801 and 1802 in Great Britain, where they had observed the progress Sunday-schools were then making in that country; and on their return, they conversed on the subject with their pious and excellent mother, Mrs. Isabella Graham of New York, who resided with them, and it was determined that as soon as possible they would try to introduce them here. Accordingly, in the autumn of 1803, these three Christian philanthropists opened the first Sabbath-school in this city, for religious and catechetical instruction, at their own expense, at the house of Mrs. Leech in Mott Street, which was attended by about forty male and female scholars; and their punctuality of attendance was rewarded on Monday mornings, by frequent donations of tracts, shoes &c., to a considerable amount. Mrs. Graham and Mr. and Mrs. Bethune then established two other Sabbath-schools in other parts of the city; which they attended every afternoon during the summer, and during the winter between the services of the church, when they brought their provisions with them from their residence in Greenwich, as there was no time to return to dinner. Mrs. Graham opened the first adult school at Greenwich, on the second Sabbath of June, 1814, only about two months before her departure from this scene of active benevolence to her promised rest. It was not until 1809, however, that churches or public bodies began to institute and patronize Sabbath-schools in this country. The first school on this plan, was probably one organized August 22, 1809, in the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., which met for the first time, on the first Sabbath of September, in the jury room of the Court House. It was regularly organized under an excellent constitution, and was attended by 240 children and adults. This school was formed without a knowledge of the mode of organization in Europe, and coincided in its principal features with the schools now established. In 1811 a similar school was established in Philadelphia, under the auspices of the Rev. Robert May, a missionary of the London Missionary Society, who does not appear to have had any knowledge of the school at Pittsburgh. In 1813, a school was established by a gentleman in Albany, and continued for some time. In the autumn of 1814 a school was established in Wilmington, Delaware. In April, 1815, schools were commenced in the Northern Liberties of Philadelphia, which in a few months contained 500 scholars. In 1816 they began to be generally introduced.

The citizens of New York claim the honor of forming the first society for the regular organization and conduct of Sabbath-schools. The first proposition for the formation of the Female Union Society, for the promotion of Sabbath-schools, was made by the benevolent ladies of the several denominations in this city, assembled by public invitation on the 24th of January, 1816. On the 12th of February following, the gentlemen of New York, assembled by public notice, adopted measures for the formation of a similar society for boys: and on the 26th of that month, the New York Sunday-school Union Society was instituted. Schools were immediately established; and during the first year, more than 6000 scholars were entered in their schools.

About this time Sunday-schools multiplied rapidly all over the United States. In May, 1824, the American Sunday-school Union was formed in the city of Philadelphia. This Society has been doing, as rapidly as means have been furnished, a great work for our country in exploring its waste places, establishing schools everywhere, and publishing and circulating a juvenile literature of great value and extent. Its operations during the past year embrace the organization of 2,012 new schools, containing not less than 60,000 children, with 8000 voluntary teachers in them; besides encouraging and aiding 2,961 other schools, and putting into circulation about 50,000 dollars worth of Sunday-school publications. The whole missionary work above referred to, cost $20,071 68 for the work done, or at the rate of $36 50 per month; $284 37½ for their expenses; being, in the aggregate, $1 50 per day, or 75 cents a day less than the wages for which the dressers of brown stone are said to have lately "struck" in Philadelphia. This Society has already published, and is now circulating a catalogue of 872 bound volumes of choice juvenile religious books, and an assortment of other Sabbath-school requisites. It also publishes the Sunday-school Journal, a semi-monthly paper for teachers, and the Youths' Penny Gazette, every other week for scholars. The latter has a circulation of 135,000. The sales during the year ending March, 1854, amounted to $172,041 30, or an average of 1,720,000 18mo volumes of 120 pages each.

The General Protestant Episcopal S. S. Union.—From the Annual Report of this Society, for 1853, it appears that it is quite rapidly increasing in means and influence. In 1851, its donation and collection list was reported as only $28 15, while in 1853 the amount had run up to $1,375 95. Its list of Sunday-school books numbers about 224 volumes, and receipts from cash sales in the Depository, $20,793 82. This society embraces the denomination in the U. S., and is located in the city of New York.

The Sunday-school Union of the Methodist Episcopal Church.—This Society has its headquarters in the Methodist Book Room, 200 Mulberry-street, New York. It reported in 1852 in the different states, 9,074 S. Schools; 98,031 officers and teachers; 504,679 scholars; 1,402,010 volumes in libraries; 7,213 Bible classes; 45,632 scholars in infant classes; 100,584 S. S. Advocates taken; 13,242 conversions; and expenses of schools $69,094 00. Raised for the S. S. Union, $7,258. It has an extensive list of excellent juvenile books and tracts, and is constantly adding valuable works to its catalogue.

The American Baptist Publication Society reports 103 Sunday-school books on its catalogue, while three years ago it had only 28. The society is more largely engaged in publishing and selling books and tracts for general purposes, and the Sunday-school publications are mingled with other sales.

The New England Sabbath-school Union is an organization in connexion with the Baptist denomination in New England, and has its centre of operations in the city of Boston. They have issued the past year 30 reprints, 28,000 copies, and 12 new books. They also issue the "Young Reaper," which has a monthly circulation of 16,000 copies. The entire receipts of the society for the past year were $1,803. It has increased its schools about 50 per cent. within the year, and has encouraging prospects for the future.

The Massachusetts Sabbath-school Society is the Sabbath-school publication society for the Congregational denomination throughout the country. It has received an act of incorporation from the Legislature of Massachusetts, and its capital for its publishing operations was raised some years ago by the friends of the cause, in the vicinity of Boston, where it is located.

Of late that society has made vigorous and praise-worthy exertions towards extending its Sabbath-school missionary labors and libraries among the destitute of the West. The rapid demand for Sabbath-schools and a wholesome juvenile literature has made the co-operation of this society on an enlarged scale, both timely and grateful to the public. The society has published 658 bound volumes, for the libraries. It has also an extensive series of Scripture questions, of which many hundred thousand copies have been circulated. Its juvenile paper, the "Well-spring," has an extensive circulation, and is, we believe, the only Sabbath-school paper that is published weekly. From the annual report of 1853, it appears that its sales of books amounted to $23,872 17, the last year, and its donations and legacies were $2,910 95.

Every city and almost every county in our States has a Sunday-school Union, but unfortunately they have lost the habit of reporting regularly to the parent society, so that it is impossible to give with accuracy the extent of our Sunday-school efforts in the United States. We, however, know the numbers in our cities and some of the counties, and from these we have made an estimate that approximates as nearly as our resources and judgment enables us to do. The result is, we think, all the Sunday-schools of our country contain at the present time not less than 1,800,000 children, with a noble army of 200,000 voluntary unpaid teachers and officers. Great Britain includes in her schools, it is estimated, not less than 2,000,000 children, and 200,000 voluntary teachers—a noble army of 400,000 in these kindred countries, who, with ceaseless energy, are making a vigorous onset upon Satan's kingdom. (Rev. Mr. McClure estimates the children in our Sunday-schools at 3,000,000. See United States.)

Mission Schools.—The original Sabbath-school of Robert Raikes was preëminently a Mission school; and for many years, both in England and this country the Sabbath-school effort was mostly of this character. In both countries the earliest efforts were confined to paid teachers, and the teachers or teachings were not always of a strictly religious character. Soon, however, the Sabbath-school enterprise found its home and resting-place among the churches; and the tendency of things of late years has been to gradually relinquish the mission schools, and remain satisfied with teaching the children of the churches, and such others as could conveniently be brought into company and association with them. Some noble exceptions in different parts of our country ought here to be named, among which stands preëminently the New York Sunday-school Union, and its enterprising and devoted officers and teachers. Besides some 125 church Sabbath-schools, this Union embraces between 50 and 60 mission schools, with about 1,500 teachers and 10,000 scholars. About one-fourth of these schools were formed in 1853, and their present efforts are designed to increase the number still more rapidly in future. This union comprises members and churches of 20 different denominations, or shades of denominations, and is well adapted to reach the destitute by its combined influence. About 20 mission schools are also in successful operation in Brooklyn. Some of these schools have been in operation more than thirty years, and they can refer to their well-trained children now standing at the head of the professions. Many are in the Christian ministry, some of whom are missionaries of the cross, in pagan lands, and one or two are presidents of colleges. Whole neighborhoods of the lowest classes are every year in a measure purified and elevated by the influence of these mission schools. The personal intercourse of intelligent, refined and Christian teachers and visitors, with even the most polluted and criminal, has the happiest effect in restraining, and now and then of saving. The most bitter hostility against the upper classes is thus checked and changed, so that the great book of remembrance alone can reveal how much the privileged classes are indebted to such teachers for the safety of persons and property. The poor emigrant melts into tears of joy as he witnesses the first act of kindness in this strange land, in the approach of the gentle teacher for his children. Said one old man recently, "I thought there was no religion in America until you came and led my children to the Sunday-school." And said a poor Catholic woman with a bursting heart, "Oh, you Protestants are kinder than the Catholics." There is imperative need everywhere of Christians turning their attention and labors more in the direction of this mission school movement.

In all our principal cities, and even in our country towns, there are multitudes of children, whose religious instruction is neglected. Their Sabbaths are spent in idleness and vice, and they are rapidly preparing for their appearance in our criminal courts, gaols and penitentiaries. The Sabbath-school is almost the only instrumentality that can reach them. Its success in reclaiming and saving them has often been tested; and it must occupy a prominent place in any system of measures that may be adopted for the evangelization of our great cities.—R. G. PARDEE, Esq.

SURAT: A large and populous town on the south bank of the Tuptee river, 177 miles north of Bombay. It is the head-quarters of a considerable military force, the residence of the British collector, judge, &c., and the chief tribunal for the entire presidency of Bombay. The London Missionary Society had a station at this place from 1813 to 1845.

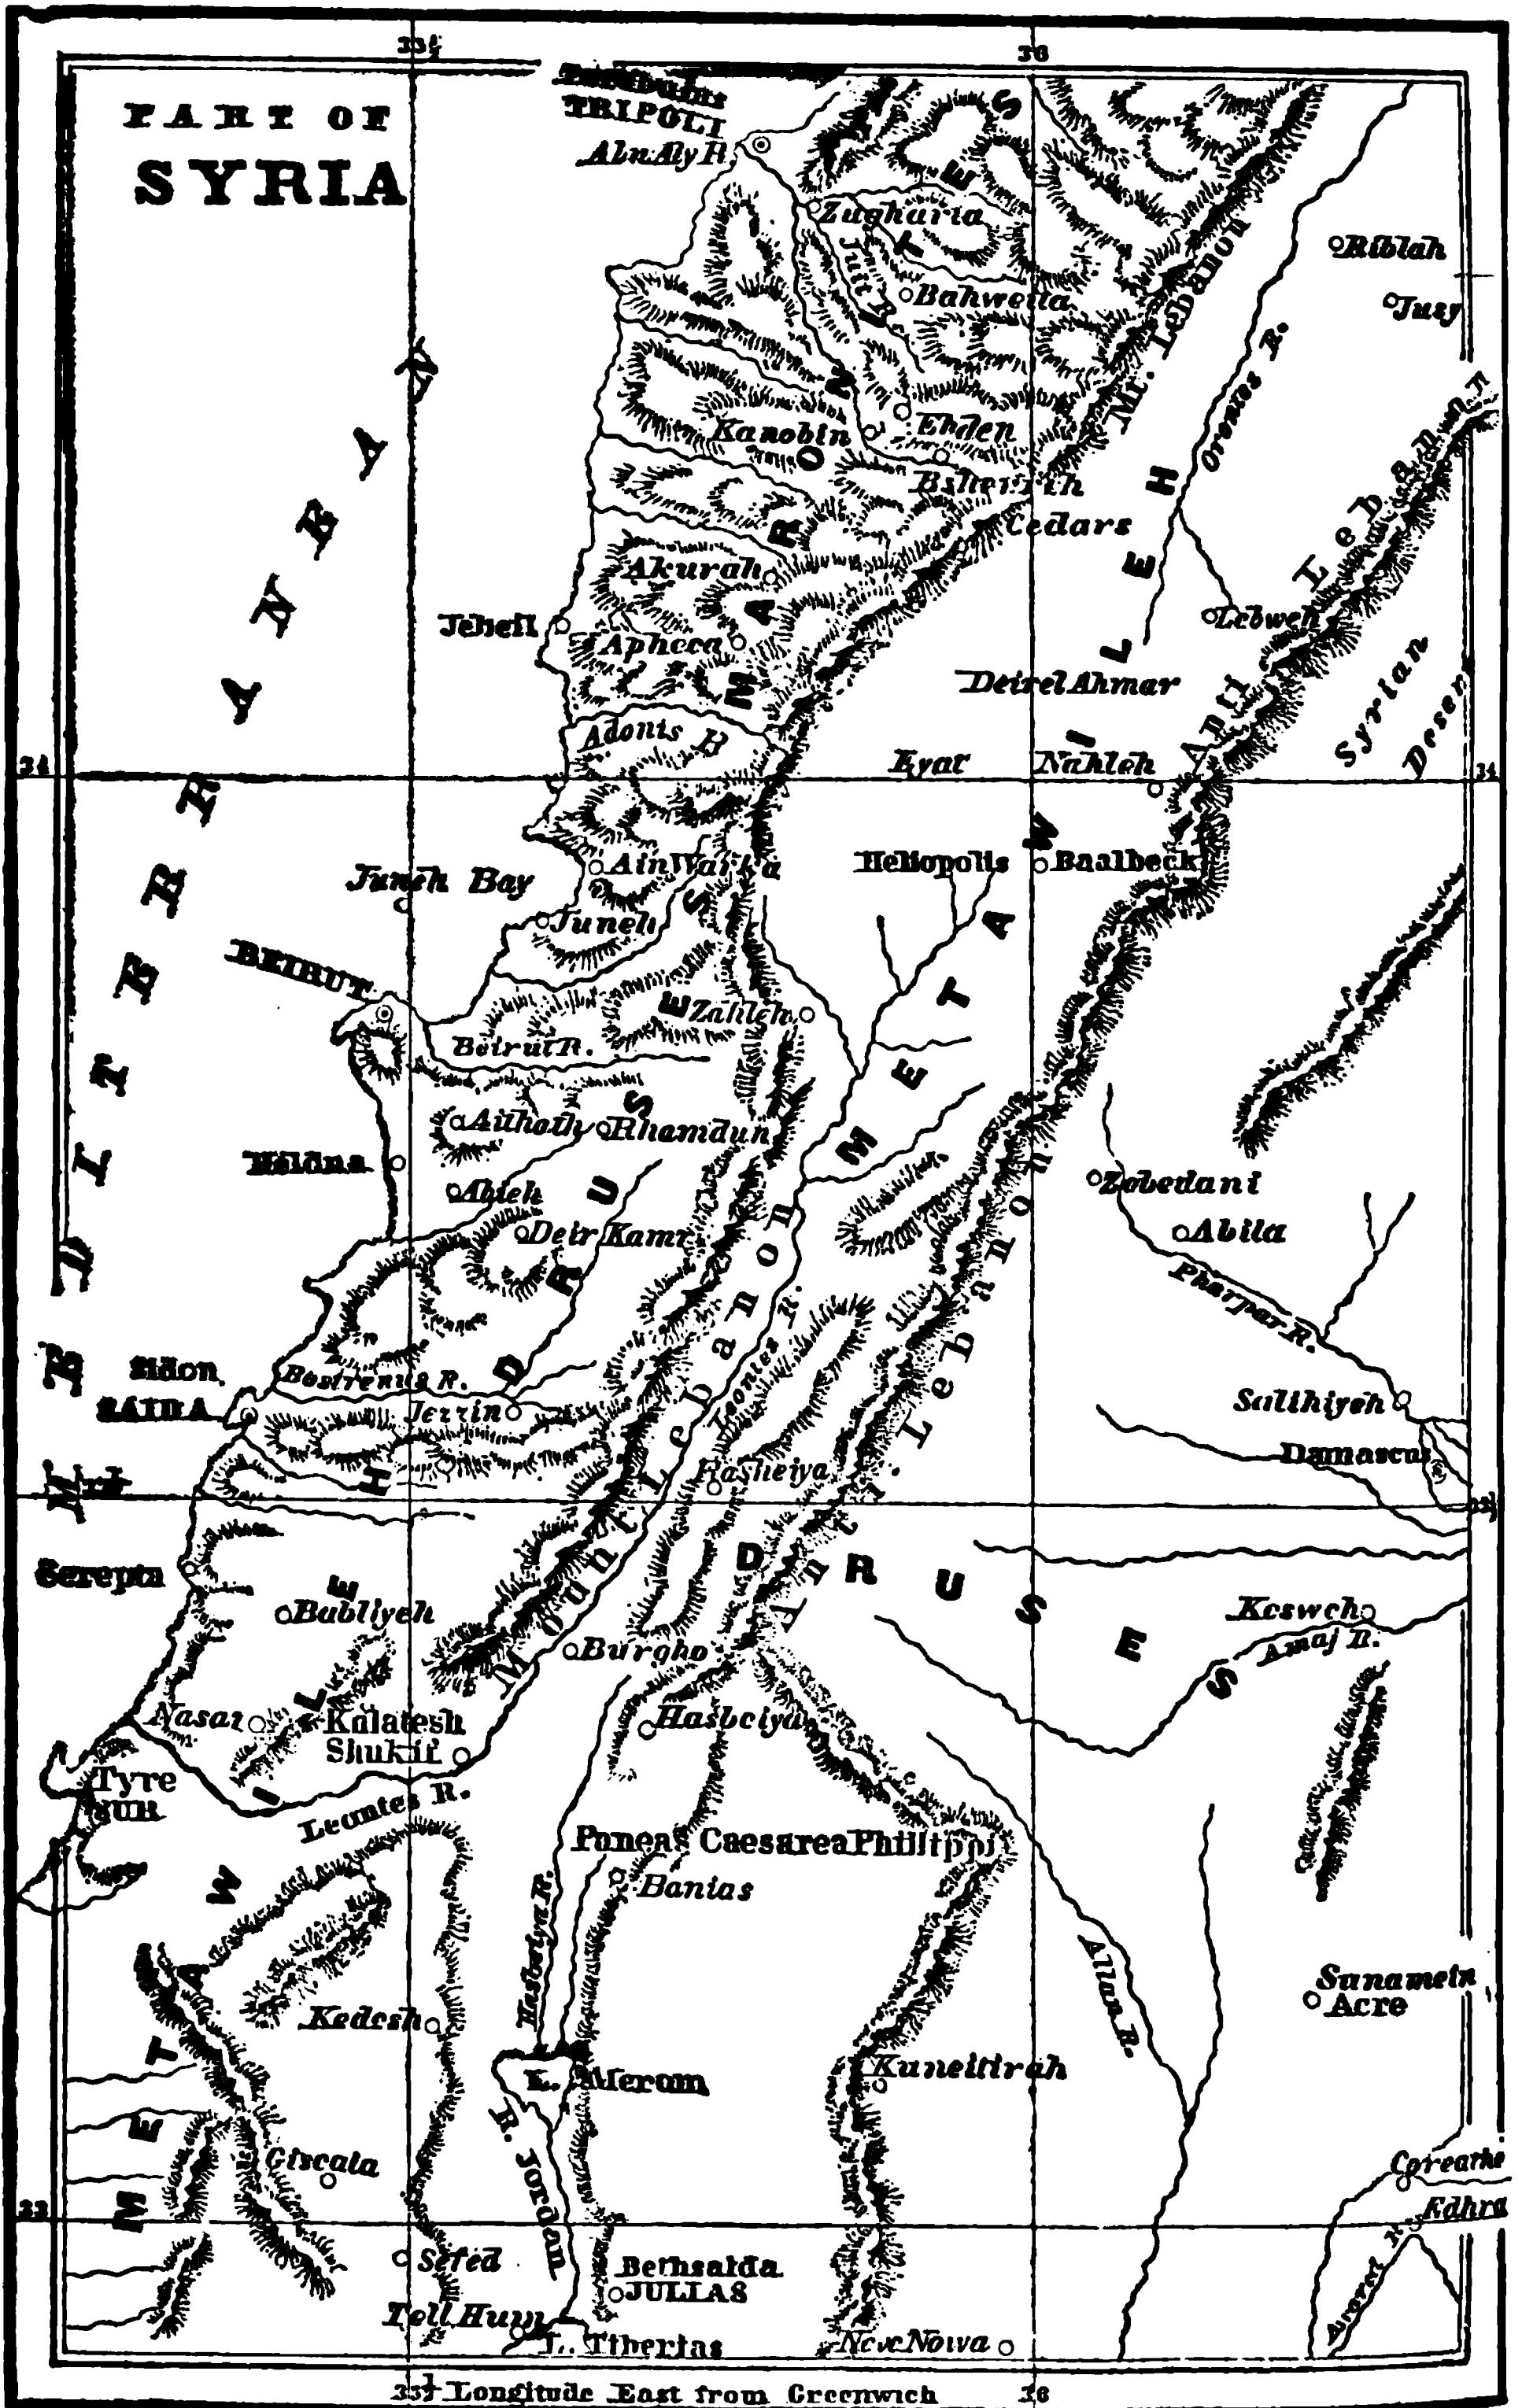

SURI: Capital of the district of Birbhum, in the province of Bengal, 130 miles N.N.W.

from Calcutta. Station commenced by the English Baptists in 1818.

SURINAM: (See West Indies.)

SUTTEE: The name given in India to a woman who immolates herself on the funeral pile of her husband, and denotes that she is considered true and faithful to him. The term is also applied to the horrid rite itself. The origin of the practice is supposed to have been the voluntary sacrifice of a widow, who was inconsolable for the loss of her husband, her affection for the deceased making life a burden; the Brahmins taking advantage of the novelty and admiration it excited to recommend the practice as most meritorious and productive of good effect to the souls of the widow, her husband, and the surviving friends, in order to turn it to their own advantage. W. Ewen, Esq., superintendent of police in the lower provinces of Bengal Presidency, was of the opinion that the widow can rarely be considered voluntary in the sacrifice. Few widows, he says, would ever think of sacrificing themselves, unless overpowered with force and persuasion, very little of either being sufficient to overcome the physical or mental powers of Hindoo females. A crowd of hungry Brahmins represent to her that, by becoming a Sutttee, she will remain so many years in heaven, rescue her husband from hell, and purify the family of her father, mother, and husband; while, on the other hand, disgrace in this life, and continual transmigration into the body of a female animal will be the certain consequence of this refusal. In this state of confusion, a few hours quickly pass, and the widow is burnt before she has had time even to think on the subject.

The details of this practice have often been given in our missionary periodicals. We need not repeat them here. But the extent to which this abomination has been carried, and the terrible sufferings which it has occasioned, will appear from the fact that, in ten years, from 1815 to 1825, no less than 5,997 widows were thus immolated. For a long time the Sutttee was winked at by the British government in India. Dr. Scudder says that in 1819, when he first went to India, no order had been issued against it. In 1828, a society was formed at Coventry, England, called the Human Sacrifice Abolition Society, the object of which was to effect, by appeals to British humanity and justice, the abolition of widow-burning, infanticide, and other superstitious murders in India. In their report for 1834, they state that the Sutttee was abolished in the Bengal Presidency in 1829, and in the other Presidencies the following year. In 1848, Dr. Scudder stated that the practice still prevailed in the native States of Meywar, Votah, Marwar, Beekaneir, Kishengur, Ulwar, and Boondoe, a portion of the country larger than New-England. He says Sutttees are rooted in the affections of the people; as an evidence of which he states that the Rajah of Ithallawar issued a proclamation denouncing any one who should assist at a widow-burning. He soon after died, and the first victim after his proclamation was his own widow. But he says that, whenever a province is taken possession of by the British government, the Sutte is immediately abolished; and that government is exerting its influence with the native kings to secure its entire abolition; in consequence of which some of them are issuing their orders against it.—The Sutte's Cry to Britain, by J. BEGGS; Miss. Her., Sept., 1834, p. 347, and March, 1848, p. 90.

SWAN RIVER: A settlement in Australia, on the river of this name, occupied by the Wesleyan Society.

SYDNEY: The capital of Australia. It is situated upon a cove which opens from the spacious basin of Port Jackson. The town is built upon the head of the cove, on a rivulet which falls into it, and in a valley between two opposite ridges. The best houses are of white free-stone, or brick plastered, and have a light, airy appearance. Population about 8,000. It is occupied by the Wesleyans and the Propagation Society.

SYRIAN CHRISTIANS: Called also St. Thomas's Christians. They inhabit the interior of Malabar and Travancore, in the S.W. part of Hindostan. They extend from N. to S. 150 or 200 miles, and in breadth 40 or 50. Between 50 and 60 churches belong to this ancient branch of the Christian church, which has preserved the Syriac Scriptures, in manuscript, from Christ and the Apostles, and, unconnected with the rest of the Christian world, has stood for ages amid the darkest scenes of wickedness, idolatry, and persecution. The tradition among them is, that the Gospel was planted in Hindostan by the apostle Thomas. Landing at Cranganore, or Changanoor, from Aden in Arabia, he was well received by Masdeus, king of the country, whose son, Zuzan, he baptized, and afterwards ordained deacon. After continuing some time at Cranganore, he visited the coast of Coromandel, and preached the Gospel at Melapoor, and finally at St. Thomas's Mount, near Madras, where he was put to death. His tomb long remained an object of veneration. Dr. Buchanan entertained a decided opinion that we have as good authority to believe that the apostle Thomas died in India, as that the apostle Peter died at Rome.

That Christians existed in India in the second century, is a fact fully attested. The bishop of India was present and signed his name at the Council of Nice, in 325. The next year, Frumentius was consecrated to that office by Athanasius of Alexandria, and founded many churches in India. In the fifth century, a Christian bishop from Antioch, accompanied by a small colony of Syrians, emigrated to India and settled on the coast of Malabar.

The Syrian Christians enjoyed a succession of bishops, appointed by the patriarch of Antioch, from the beginning of the third century till they were invaded by the Portuguese. They still retain the Liturgy, anciently used in the churches of Syria, and employ in their public worship the language spoken by our Saviour in the streets of Jerusalem.

The first notices of this people in modern times are found in the Portuguese histories. In 1503, there were upwards of 100 Christian churches on the coast of Malabar. As soon as the Portuguese were able, they compelled the churches nearest the coast to acknowledge the supremacy of the Pope; and, in 1599, they burnt all the Syriac and Chaldaic books and records on which they could lay their hands. The churches which were thus subdued, are called the Syro-Roman Christians, and, with the converts from other tribes, form a population of nearly 150,000. Those in the interior would not submit to Rome; but after a show of union for a time, fled to the mountains in 1653, hid their books, and put themselves under the protection of the native princes, by whom they have been kept in a state of depression. These are called the Syrian Christians. About 10,000 persons, with 53 churches, separated from the Catholics; but in consequence of the corrupt doctrines and licentious manners of their associates, they have fallen from their former estate, and very few traces of the high character which they once possessed can now be discovered. Their number was estimated in 1825 at about 50,000. (See Hindostan.)—Chapin's Missionary Gazetteer.

SYRIA AND THE HOLY LAND.—Throughout the Old and New Testaments there is a frequent reference to Syria, a country which has been subject first to one conqueror and then to another, and made the bloody theatre on which ambition and tyranny have displayed their fiercest energies. The Chaldees, the Persians, the Romans, the Saracens, the Mohammedans, were successively its masters. In 1517, the Sultan of Turkey took possession of Syria, and his successors held sway there without interruption till 1832, when Ibrahim Pasha fought his way into the country, and brought it under the dominion of Egypt. In 1841, with the aid of the European powers, Syria was again restored to Turkey, and it is still subject to the Sultan, though a dark uncertainty hangs over its future destiny.

In the south-west part of Syria, with the Dead Sea and the river Jordan on the right, and the Mediterranean Sea on the left, lies Palestine, or the Holy Land, which has been the scene of those great events which involve the destinies of mankind. Of the present condition of Syria and Palestine so much has been said by modern writers, that it is unnecessary to go into particulars here. But as there is a constant reference in the missionary records to the leading religious sects which occupy the country, some statistics on this subject may be of use to the reader, in the right understanding of the succeeding pages. From the statements of a missionary, as late as 1840, who had enjoyed unusual facilities for obtaining correct information, the following facts are gathered.

The population of Syria, including Palestine and Lebanon, does not vary much from one million and a quarter. Of this population, including the wandering tribes, the following is a tolerably correct division:

Moslems.....	585,000
The Antioch or Orthodox Greeks.....	240,000
Maronites.....	180,000
Greek Papists.....	40,000
Druses.....	100,000
Jews.....	30,000
Metewallea, a sect of Moslems.....	25,000
Ansaireea and Ismayelea.....	200,000
Armenians and other sects.....	20,000

The Moslems are spread over the whole country, except Lebanon and the large mountainous regions of the Ansaireea, in both which districts they are so few as scarcely to merit attention. The orthodox Greeks extend to every part of Syria and Palestine. The Druses occupy Lebanon, and particularly the southern half of it. The Ansaireea and Ismayelea occupy the large and fertile region north of Tripoli, and spread over mountain and plain all the way round the head of the sea to Tarsus and the plain of Adona. The Maronites reside chiefly in Lebanon, while about 2,000 are found in Aleppo, a few in Damascus, and small communities in other places. The Greek Papists are confined chiefly to Aleppo, Damascus, Beirut, Sidon, and different villages in Lebanon, and a few in the Haouran. The Armenians reside chiefly in Jerusalem and Aleppo. They increase along the southern frontier of Syria. The Jews, who are chiefly Spanish, German, and Polish, are confined mostly to Jerusalem, Hebron, Tiberias, Damascus, and Aleppo. Small communities are found in some of the other cities. Small Arab tribes occupy portions of nearly all the great plains in Syria and Palestine, but chiefly along the eastern frontier and in the Haouran. There is a sect called Yezzidees, worshipers of the devil, but they are few, and occupy the extreme north-east frontier.

The Druses.—This sect, though not the most numerous, yet holds a very conspicuous place. They derive their name from Mohammed Eben Ismael, surnamed El Drusi, who came from a foreign country, and became a follower of Hakem, the supposed founder of the sect in the eleventh century. The Druses acknowledge seven law givers: Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, Mohammed, and Said. They believe in ten incarnations of God, the last and most important being that in the person of Hakem. They call Hakem the creator of heaven and earth, the only God worthy of reverence in heaven, and the only Lord on earth. "He is one, the only one, who knows no consort and no number. He neither begets nor is begotten. He does what he will and as he will. He tears down and builds up. He lifts up and throws down. He says to all things, be; and they are. He is the beginning and the end of all things. He is the beginning and the end, the powerful, the excellent, the victorious. I am, he says, the foundation of religion, the way, the Lord of the resurrection and the new life, &c." This Hakem, they believe, will appear again in human form, at the judgment, to give to every man according to his desert. The time of his coming is pointed out to be when kings rule with unlimited power, and Christians get the superiority over the Moslems. At the judgment those who are called Muwahhidin, i. e. Unitarians, in opposition to Polytheists and Christians, will be rewarded, and all apostates punished. There are two classes of Druses, viz. the Akkal, or the learned and initiated; and the Jahal, or the ignorant and uninitiated. The initiated are very strict in regard to food, not eating with strangers; in regard to marriage, not marrying out of their own order; and in the use of oaths, using only the expression, "I have said it." They form a sort of sacred or aristocratic order, and perform the ceremonies of their religion in secret. From them is taken the imam, the spiritual or ecclesiastical head of the Druses. The uninitiated, comprehending the greater part of the Druses, and even the emir himself, who is not permitted to interfere in matters of religion, are very different as to religion and religious usages. They make no distinctions of meats, drink wine, marry wives out of their own sect, and wear a variegated dress. They conform to the religion which happens to predominate. With the Mohammedans they are Mohammedans; with the Christians they are Christians. This conduct is said to be commanded them in their sacred books, in order to conceal the fact that they belong to a particular sect. This class of the Druses are exceedingly ignorant and degraded, knowing but little about God, and still less about the Saviour; yet they are teachable, and not being subject to ignorant and bigoted priests, they have been found more ready to receive the Gospel than the nominal Christians of Syria.

MISSIONS OF THE AMERICAN BOARD.—Rev. Messrs. Levi Parsons and Pliny Fiske, embarked at Boston, Nov. 3, 1819, for what was then denominated the mission to Palestine, and on the 15th of the following January, they entered the harbor of Smyrna. In December of the same year, Mr. Parsons embarked for Jerusalem, where he arrived in March—the first Protestant missionary who had entered that field with a view of making it the centre of his own evangelical operations. He had, however, scarcely surveyed his field, when disease undermined his constitution, and he em-marked for Alexandria, where he died, February 10, 1822. In April, 1823, Mr. Fiske entered Jerusalem, accompanied by Rev. Jonas King. They spent some time in explorations in and around the holy city, and in excursions to Lebanon and other places, meanwhile distributing Scriptures and tracts, and studying the prevailing language. In November, 1823, Rev. William Goodell and Rev. Isaac Bird, with their wives, arrived at Beirût. As this city holds a conspicuous place in the history of the Syrian mission, a particular description of it seems desirable. Soon after their arrival the missionaries wrote :

"Beirût is pleasantly situated at the foot of Mount Lebanon, on the western side of a large bay, in latitude $33^{\circ} 49'$ N. and long. $35^{\circ} 50'$ E. It has a fertile soil, and is abundantly furnished with good water from springs that flow from the adjacent hills. The houses are built of mud, and of a soft, crumbling stone, and are dark, damp, and inconvenient. The streets are narrow and dirty, and during the winter are seldom dry. They were once paved, in a slovenly manner with stones of irregular shape, which are now wide apart, and simply furnish stepping stones in rainy weather. The filth of the city, together with its dampness in winter and its heat in summer, renders it a very undesirable place for a family. Ships are forced to lie at anchor at the eastern extremity of the bay, about two miles from the city. The port is choked up with sands, and with some of the pillars of granite, which remain as almost the only relics of the ancient magnificence of the place. On the north and north-west Beirût is entirely open to the sea, and at no great distance to the east is Lebanon, which stretches far to the north and to the south. Nearer to the city on the south, is a large and beautiful plain, varied by small hills, covered with olive, palm, orange, lemon, pine, and mulberry trees, and enlivened by numerous cottages. From the terrace of the house we occupy we can count more than 200 of these cottages, scattered here and there among the trees. Besides three large mosques and several smaller ones, the city contains a Roman Catholic, a Maronite, a Greek, and a Catholic Greek church."—(See Beirût.)

In view of this beginning of Protestant missions in a quarter of the world the most interesting and sacred, the Board say in their report for 1824: "In Jerusalem, the ancient capital of the visible Church, the standard of truth and righteousness has been erected, it is hoped, never more to be permanently removed. Among the mountains of Lebanon, the Gospel has been proclaimed to Druses, Maronites, Syrians, and Greeks. Jordan and the Dead Sea have heard the sound, and Bethlehem, Capernaum, and Nazareth. In that most interesting portion of the world, the light of life, after having been for ages quite extinguished, has been rekindled—and by whom? The missionaries of the Board—thanks unto our merciful God for the unmerited privilege—have been among the first and principal instruments. A great crowd of witnesses upon earth, and doubtless many more on the heights of the heavenly Zion, contemplate this enterprise." A prominent feature in the mission for the first few years, was the determined and systematic opposition to the circulation of the Bible, made by the Romish church; and not to the Bible only, but to the preaching of the Gospel, the establishment of schools, and the diffusion of knowledge generally. In spite of the opposition, however, a school was established and continued at Beirût, and the Scriptures were put into the hands of many, notwithstanding a proclamation from the Grand Signior forbidding their distribution. In the fall of 1825, Mr. King left the mission, having engaged in it only for a limited period. About the same time a severe loss was sustained in the death of Mr. Fisk. He had been preparing an Arabic and English dictionary, which it was necessary now to commit to other hands.

As the missionaries became acquainted with the language of the country, so as to converse with the people freely, and engage in controversy with the patriarchs and others, a spirit of religious inquiry was awakened, and the excitement became general; so that the time of Mr. Bird, and often that of Mr. Goodell, was demanded night and day to converse with men and women from different places, who were convinced of the rottenness of their old system, and wished to become acquainted with a more excellent way. As the work went on, the opposition of rulers, both ecclesiastical and civil, became more violent, threatening decrees were fulminated, and in some instances the most cruel forms of persecution were resorted to. Among the objects of this persecution was Asaad Shidiak, who had been Mr. King's teacher in Arabic and Syriac, and who was one of the most intelligent men on Mount Lebanon. He was a Maronite Roman Catholic, had been much acquainted with the bishop of Beirût, and with the Maronite patriarch, and on his showing a strong tendency towards evangelical religion, he was threatened with immediate excommunication, if he did not cease from his connection with the "Bible men." To avoid this evil he was advised to retire for a season to Hadet, in the hope that the opposition would subside. In this retirement his mind became still more serious and determined, and on his return to Beirût he was resolved to risk whatever obloquy and violence might come upon him. The suspicion that he was heretical made it necessary for him to give up a marriage contract into which he had entered; and he preferred this sacrifice rather than shut himself out from the means of access to the truth. In January, 1826, the patriarch sent his own brother to call upon Asaad, to urge him to an interview, and though warned by the missionaries of the dangers to which he would be exposed, he complied with the request, and went to the convent of Der Alma, where he met the patriarch, and had many conversations with him. The topics upon which Asaad insisted, were the necessity of a spiritual religion, in distinction from modes and form; the sufficiency of the Scriptures; and the absurdity of holding the Pope to be infallible. The patriarch was highly displeased with these bold sentiments, and uttered, first, cruel threats, and then promised honor, promotion, money, &c. The bishop of Beirût was present at several of the discussions, and threatened Asaad's life in the most angry and violent manner.

After an absence of seven weeks, he returned to Beirût, and wrote a history of what had transpired. The document was published in the Missionary Herald, and indicated great talents, a sincere love of the truth, and the spirit of a martyr in its defence. As soon as Asaad's mother, brothers, and other relations heard of his return, they flocked around him, and besought him to leave the missionaries. Against the urgent entreaties of the brethren, he accompanied four of his relatives home, in the belief that it would be safe, and that he should do some good by the visit. In about a fortnight some of his relatives took him by force, and carried him to the convent of Der Alma, and delivered him up to the patriarch, by whose order he was removed to Cannobeen, about 50 miles from Beirût. There he suffered imprisonment, chains, stripes, and revilings. To those who delivered him up, he said that if he had not read the Gospel he never should have known how to explain their conduct; but there he learned that "the brother shall deliver up the brother to death, and a man's foes shall be those of his own household." For several months he was beaten daily, and having made an unsuccessful attempt to escape, a heavy chain was put around his neck, and the other end fastened to the wall. The common people were encouraged to visit him and spit in his face, and otherwise insult him, with a view to shame him and break his spirit. His mother and one or two of his brothers, finding how cruelly he was treated, relented, and earnestly sought his release. One who visited him declared that he had been beaten till his body was of the color of blue cloth. In the midst of his sufferings he wrote a kind letter to the missionaries, but not having an opportunity to send it, the patriarch discovered it, and both he and others beat him severely on this account. For many months intelligence was received of Asaad's condition, and though his sufferings knew no abatement, the hope was entertained that his deliverance would in some way be effected. But at length communication was cut off, a dreadful uncertainty hung over his fate, and the sad conclusion was forced upon the missionaries that he had died in the hands of his unrelenting tormentors. Nothing has ever occurred to relieve this painful apprehension. The piety and constancy of Asaad Shidiak were regarded as very extraordinary. His pride of talents and of authorship, his reverence for his former tutors, patrons, and ecclesiastical superiors, and all his previous habits of thinking and acting, were opposed to his joining the missionaries and yielding to the authority of the Scriptures. To these were added the anathemas of the Church, the revilings of friends, the malice of a bigoted and bloody priesthood, and the horrors of a long imprisonment under chains and stripes till his vigorous frame became one mass of suffering; while, on the other hand, deliverance, honor, emoluments, all that wealth and power could offer, awaited him in case of his recantation. That under these circumstances Asaad should have adhered with unwavering firmness to the Gospel and the religion of Christ, must certainly be regarded as a surprising triumph of Christianity over the natural inclinations of the heart, and over the principalities and powers of this world. With propriety did the Board ask, "How many are there among ourselves, with all our means of knowledge and all the strength of confirmed religious principle, who could assure themselves that, in such a fearful controversy, they should stand like Asaad Shidiak, calm and unruffled amid the war of angry passions, deprived of every earthly support, and looking through tears, yet with a resolute eye, to heaven as his home, and to Christ as his only deliverer?" A brother of this first martyr, Pharez Shidiak, also embraced the truth, and was pursued with the same persecuting spirit, but saved himself from the fate of Asaad by a timely escape to Malta. After the occurrence of these two cases, the Maronite patriarch issued a proclamation to be read in all the Maronite churches, strictly forbidding all connection with the missionaries, in the way of buying or selling, borrowing or lending, giving or receiving, attending schools or teaching them, or rendering any service, on pain of the loss of office and the great excommunication. The patriarch admitted that the missionaries were "unwearied in their efforts;" that they went about "manifesting a zeal in compassionating their neighbors;" that they "opened schools and supplied instructions, all at their own expense," &c. The Greek Catholics manifested a similar hostility, though they were less inclined to persecute; and the Mohammedans were ready to pursue every professor of Christianity with inexorable vengeance. Thus it became evident in the early history of the mission, that those who would follow Christ, must be prepared, like the primitive Christians on the same soil, to seal their testimony with their blood. The people might turn from one form of nominal Christianity to another, and embrace the Greek, or Greek Catholic, or Maronite, or Latin faith, without giving offence; but to be Christians indeed, and take the word of God as their only rule of faith, was to incur the wrath of bishops and patriarchs, and required the spirit of a Christian hero. Along with these violent persecutions came political and warlike agitations, and all the schools which had been organized at Beirût, Tripoli, and elsewhere, had to be given up. In May, 1828, the missionaries removed from Beirût to Malta. Their reasons for this step were the prospect of war, which soon after commenced, the difficulty of holding communication with other places, and the insecurity which was felt after the removal of the British consul. After an absence of two years, during which they devoted themselves to the study of the various languages of the east, the missionaries, learning that the English consul had again taken up his residence at Beirût, returned to that place. On entering that city, they were saluted with kindness by the people, but the priests were disturbed, and soon the papal thunders began again to roar in the churches. The missionary work proceeded, however, without material interruption, except by the ravages of the plague, which prevailed through Syria, Armenia, and Persia, in 1831. In 1832, the mission sustained a severe loss in the death of Gregory Wortabed, an early and distinguished convert, concerning whom full accounts may be found in the Missionary Herald of that and previous dates. The reply of Mr. Bird to the Bishop of Beirût, in 1833, received special attention, and served to awaken a spirit of inquiry among the people. About the same time a press was established in Beirût, to be superintended by the Rev. Eli Smith, under the general direction of the mission.

Syria and the Holy Land were now under the government of the viceroy of Egypt, and embraced the four pashalics of Aleppo, Tripoli, Damascus, and Acre. Beirût, being the principal port of commerce, was assuming increased importance as a missionary station, while explorations were made in Damascus, Tripoli, Sidon, and other large towns, with a view to the occupancy of new fields. The system of schools was yet in its infancy, the missionaries not having been in circumstances to give to this subject the necessary attention. In their report for 1834 the Committee of the Board say, "They are not aware that any material change has taken place in the character and condition of the people at large, in consequence of the establishment of the mission. But the impression is said to have been extensively removed, which had been given by the Jesuits in former years, that the Protestants have no religion, no priesthood, no churches, &c. The bigotry, intolerance, unreasonableness, and worldly-mindedness of the papal priests have also been brought to light, by their opposition to the Scriptures and schools, and it is thought that image worship is growing unpopular in the vicinity of Beirût. Among the inhabitants of that place now living, the missionaries reckon but four native converts. A fifth hopeful convert is teaching a school at Tripoli. The number admitted to communion from the commencement of the mission is seven, not including the lamented Asaad Shidiak, nor Jacob, a young Armenian, who died giving evidence of repentance and faith in Christ." Corresponding with the date of the foregoing, is a joint statement by the missionaries, in which they speak of the insufficiency, in that country at least, of the mere circulation of the Scriptures. Many copies had been distributed from Aleppo to Hebron and Gaza, and after ten or twelve years' use of them, not a single soul had, to their knowledge, been by this means brought to a sense of sin, and converted to God. "Not," they say, "that the word of God has taken no effect; not that it has done no good; but we state a fact, and from it we draw the conclusion that other efforts ought to be connected with Bible distribution." The missionaries at Beirût in 1835, were Eli Smith, Isaac Bird, and William M. Thompson, with the wives of the two latter, and Rebecca W. Williams, teacher. A class of ten young men were under instruction in, geography, astronomy, and the English language, and three other schools were taught by natives, the whole number of pupils being 140. Besides these a female school had been opened by the female members of the mission, assisted by the widow of the lamented Gregory Wortabed, and eighteen pupils were in attendance. For this school a building had been erected on the mission premises, by the avails of a subscription among foreign residents. The measure met with no opposition.

Jerusalem was at this date the centre of a great tumult among the people, the mountaineers of Palestine having suddenly risen in general rebellion against the government of Egypt. That government, however, maintained its supremacy, and the whole country of Syria, under the sway of the Pacha of Egypt, was soon disarmed and quiet. In 1836 the Committee, in surveying this field, were able to say, "Almost every change opens the door still wider for missionary work. Lebanon is completely open. Missionaries can go where they please. The Druse population in particular have been rendered accessible to the truth. They are frequently seen at the chapel of the mission." At Jerusalem, Mr. Whiting found much encouragement in the distribution of books and tracts among the pilgrims who visited the Holy City from all quarters. A school was also in operation there, and a few Moslem girls were learning to read and sew. The island of Cyprus having been thoroughly explored, a mission was commenced there in 1836, by Messrs. Pease, J. L. Thompson, and Daniel Ladd. The number of Greek Christians on the island was estimated at 70,000, and there did not appear to be any obstacle in the way of spreading the Gospel among them. The death of Mrs. Smith, in consequence of exposures by shipwreck, on her way to Smyrna with her husband, was a serious loss to the mission; Mr. Smith also lost at the same time, the valuable manuscript of a journal, which he had kept during a tour through the Haouran, and the models of Arabic letters which he had procured for the cutting of a new font of type in that language. The latter he was able afterwards to replace. The printing in 1836, at the Beirut press, all in Arabic, was as follows, viz.: A Hymn Book, 24 pages, 200 copies; Watts' Catechism, 16 pages, 1,000 copies; Elements of Arabic Grammar, 168 pages, 1000 copies; Dairyman's Daughter, 96 pages, 2000 copies; making a total of 380,800 pages. Besides this there were struck off from the lithographic press 200 copies of the Arabic alphabet, for the schools; and 2000 copies of Chrysostom on reading the Holy Scriptures.

The year 1838, and a part of the following year were spent by Mr. Smith in an exploring tour with Dr. Robinson, through Arabia and Syria. The results of these observations are well known to the public. There were 6,642 books and tracts distributed from Beirut station in 1838, amounting to 490,629 pages. The larger portion of this work was effected by a native employed for the purpose. The people manifested an unexpected eagerness to receive books. The ecclesiastical rulers of every degree made fierce opposition, but very many of the people received the books in open defiance of patriarchs and bishops.

It was a highly interesting fact, recorded in 1839, that several papal priests, from different parts of the country, all of them strangers to each other, were so enlightened and so evangelical in sentiment, as to become disgusted with popery and anxious to escape from it. This and the preceding year were also signalized by an extraordinary religious excitement among the Druses. The extent and effects of this awakening, and the spirit in which it was met by the civil and ecclesiastical powers, forms an exceedingly interesting chapter in the history of the Syrian mission: but for the particulars reference must be had to the journals of the missionaries published in the Herald. The books and tracts distributed from Beirut during the year 1839, amounted to 3,543. Of these 103 were Bibles, 264 Testaments, 419 Psalters, and 2,757 smaller portions of the Scriptures. A large and convenient chapel was built at Beirut, in which were held two services in the Arabic language, one soon after sunrise, the other in the afternoon. Between these services was one in English at the American Consulate, and a Sabbath-school was conducted in the native chapel.

The free school contained upwards of 56 scholars, and the attendance was full and regular throughout the year. The school at Tripoli, already mentioned as under the care of a native, had about 30 scholars.

In the autumn of 1840, Beirut was bombarded by Turkey and her allies, and the missionaries fled, some to Jerusalem, and others to Larnica in Cyprus. The houses and other property of the mission were unharmed. In the summer of 1841, the war having ended in placing the government under Turkish rule, the missionaries returned to Beirut and resumed their labors. About the same time a printer from Boston, with an improved font of Arabic type, and Rev. Eli Smith, who had been spending a little time in America, joined the mission. The whole missionary force at Beirut, on being collected at this period, consisted of Messrs. Smith, W. M. Thompson, Nathaniel A. Keyes, Samuel Wolcott, L. Thompson, missionaries, and their wives; Mr. Van Dyck, physician; a printer; and five native assistants. At Jerusalem there were two missionaries, Messrs. Whiting and Sherman, with their wives, and one native assistant; and at a station on Mount Lebanon, called B'hamdân, there was a missionary and a physician. The country, however, was not quiet, for the war that had transferred the government from the dominion of Mohammed Ali to that of the Sultan, was followed by a civil war, in which the Maronites and Druses of Mount Lebanon contended for the ascendancy. It was in fact a war of the Druses against the Papists, who had provoked it, and ended in the complete triumph of the Druses. In view of this constant disturbance and change, Mr. Smith wrote, in January, 1842, "There is an evil, a great evil, in being thus beaten about by these political surges, and we try to avoid them all in our power, and seek the stillest waters we can find. Yet our minds are never free from anxiety, looking out for what may come next. And besides this, we are excessively troubled to give our friends at home proper and correct accounts of our labors and prospects. One of the brethren, in giving reasons for not writing home more full accounts, remarked that he could not get the world here to stand still long enough to describe it. So it is—we write home now an account of our labors and prospects, with propositions for money and men to do this or that, and before our letter reaches the United States, some revolution has taken place which materially alters our plans, and we want to do something very different from the thing proposed." Four months later Mr. Smith wrote, that the power of the Maronite patriarch, which had always presented the greatest obstacle to missionary labor, appeared to be broken; that wherever they went they had free access to the Druses, and that an impulse had been extensively given in favor of schools. And yet, he adds, "The Turkish authorities have taken such a course, that their designs remain wholly unknown; and what will be the result of the present position of things we feel entirely unable to conjecture." In spite of these perplexities ten schools were maintained, nine at Beirût and one at Jerusalem, containing an aggregate of 287 pupils, and the printing during the year 1841 amounted to 636,000 pages, half of which were portions of the Scriptures. In their report for 1843, the Prudential Committee say, "During the past year a good house for a permanent establishment has been obtained at Abeih, a mountain village about 15 miles southward of Beirût, facing the sea, sufficiently elevated to render it a safe and healthy residence the whole year, central with regard to the Druse people, with 1000 or 1500 inhabitants, and villages in all directions around it. The mission has also gained much experience during the few years past, made many favorable acquaintances, disseminated much evangelical truth, done away no small amount of prejudice, and conquered one of the most difficult and important languages of the world—the Arabic—spoken by 60,000,000 people, it being the sacred language of the vast Moslem nation." The station at Jerusalem was reported this year as having been suspended, the missionary, Mr. Whiting, having joined Mr. Thompson and Dr. Van Dyck at Abeih.

In 1844, soon after the visit of Dr. Anderson and Dr. Hawes to the Syrian mission, the committee say, "Besides the large and rapidly increasing population of Beirût, Lebanon is terraced and planted from the profoundest depths of her numerous valleys up to the dizzy summits of her majestic hills, and more than 200,000 hard-working mountaineers reside in her romantic valleys and hamlets. Here the members of the mission may abide, and travel, and teach, and preach, and distribute the word of life; and here it is the present intention of the committee, in following out the apparent leadings of Providence, to combine and concentrate the power and resources of the mission. The people are divided into different sects, but they are essentially one race, the Arab, by whatever name called; with a common language, the Arabic, spoken just as it is written, and the same as in ancient times; and the manners, customs, and social condition throughout are substantially the same." In connection with these statements of the committee, the report for this year contains a document of extraordinary interest, drawn up by the mission while Drs. Anderson and Hawes were on the ground, which gives a description of the Arabic race, and an impression of the importance of this mission, as being the only one especially to that race, which every one should examine who would fully appreciate this mission. We regret that our limits will not allow us to give the document entire. The reader is referred to the report of the Board for 1844, where it may be found in full.

At Abeih, two rooms in the house occupied by Mr. Thompson were arranged for a temporary chapel, and an Arabic service was kept up twice every Sabbath. Between the services an interesting Sabbath-school was held. The shyness and reserve of the people wore off as they became acquainted. The adverse portions of the Druses and Maronites, both of whom resided in the village, began to consult the missionaries in their mutual difficulties, and Mr. Thompson had more friendly intercourse with the Maronite priesthood during the first summer of his residence at Abeih than during all his previous missionary life.

The years 1844 and 1845 were distinguished by a sudden and wonderful Protestant movement at Hasbeiya, a village at the foot of Mount Hermon, containing a population of about 4000, composed of Greek Arabs Maronites, Greek Catholics, Jews and Druses. In February, 1844, the brethren of Beirût were visited by a party of about 50 men of the Greek Arabs of Hasbeiya, who declared their intention to become Protestants, and asked for ministers and teachers. After much conversation with them, it was agreed that a native assistant should be sent to them, and that if his report of their case was favorable, the missionaries would visit them. The intelligence proved of so interesting a character, that in May, Messrs. Smith and Whiting proceeded to Hasbeiya, when they were convinced that they had been too slow to credit the sincerity of these professed Protestants. They amounted to about 150 men, besides women and children, and among them were some of the most respectable men in the village, and a large proportion of enterprising young men. Some of them had made considerable improvement in Christian knowledge, having received many of the works of the mission, both from Beirût and Jerusalem, and heard much of the character and doctrines of the missionaries. That they were sincere in their determination to adhere to the Protestant faith, and to take the Bible alone for their guide, the missionaries could not doubt. Their separation from the Greek church appeared to be entire, and even the Greeks acknowledged that there was a decided improvement in their character; that the profane had left off swearing; that the drunkard had abandoned his cups, and that the Lord's day was carefully observed for religious improvement. Schools were established among them, and the field seemed white for the harvest. In June, one month later, another missionary visited Hasbeiya, and wrote: "The Protestants hold out and increase in numbers. They are increasing in knowledge also; some of them quite rapidly. The school has 40 or 50 scholars, and we must establish another soon." In July Mr. Whiting wrote: "We cannot but feel much anxiety for this little band of Protestants, imperfectly instructed as they are, but up to this time, although very strong efforts have been made to induce them to return to the Greek church, they have, with very few exceptions, remained firm in their adherence to the truth." At about the same date, Mr. Smith, in describing their first Sabbath in Hasbeiya, said, "How strange and exciting our circumstances. It seemed almost a dream. Here we were, in this wild corner of Syria, always peculiarly lawless, and now entirely without a government. Before us was a considerable congregation, brought up in the gross and deeply-seated superstitions of the Greek church, but now abandoning, and with a suddenness almost miraculous, all their fasts and feasts, their image and saint worship, and worshipping God with us after the simple forms of Protestantism, yet not a hand was raised to molest us, and we went through our worship with as much quiet and security as if we had been in the heart of New England."

It soon became evident, however, that this little body of Protestants was to expect no protection from the government, and that their enemies were aware of this, and had determined on using violence. In view of the storm which was about to burst upon them, and the fiery trials through which they must pass, the whole company of the Protestants assembled at Mr. Smith's house on a Sabbath evening, for the purpose of entering into a solemn covenant to stand by each other to the last. In describing this scene, Mr. Smith says: "The step was entirely of their own suggestion, and I knew nothing of it until they had begun to assemble. Being all collected, they drew up a covenant engagement in the following terms:—'We whose names are here-to subscribed, do covenant together before God and this assembly, and pledge ourselves upon the Holy Gospel, that we will remain leagued together in one faith; that we will not forsake this faith, nor shall any separate us from each other while we are in this world; and that we will be of one hand and one heart in the worship of God, according to the doctrines of the Gospel. In God is our help.' Each one took this covenant separately, standing by the table, and laying his hand upon the Bible, as it was read to him. Sixty-eight names were subscribed on the spot, and the next day the number was increased to seventy-six, all adult males. The affecting solemnity of this scene I leave you to imagine. I have been many years a missionary, and have witnessed a great variety of heart-thrilling events, but this is one of the last that I shall forget." In a day or two after this solemn transaction, the persecution broke out with great violence, and to escape the murderous hands of their enemies the Protestants fled to Abcih, as their only place of safety. They remained there till October, when learning that the unfriendly emir had been deposed, and that another governor had been appointed, with express instructions to restore the Protestants to their houses; they returned to Hasbeiya. The quiet, however, was of short duration, for by some means the new governor was soon removed, and a son of the former governor appointed in his place, so that the poor Protestants were again at the mercy of their enemies. They were publicly insulted and beaten in the streets; their houses were attacked and much injured, and no Protestant could appear in the streets without being stoned. It required more courage, faith and love for the truth than these brethren had attained, to stand firm in such circumstances, and the result was, say the committee, "That the poor persecuted people, since it had not pleased God yet to give them fully the martyr spirit, yielded the case in despair, and one after another made peace with the authorities of the Greek church." It was believed, however, that they did not fully conform to the rites of the Greek church, but were allowed considerable liberty; and one of the Protestants, in writing to the missionaries, in January, 1845, said, "We meet together and have prayers as often as we have opportunity. Thanks to God, the faith of the brethren increases; but we are thirsting to hear your prayers and spiritual instructions again. You are never out of our minds a moment. We pray for grace to wait for that privilege with patience." Thus the door was closed in Hasbeiya for the present, but in circumstances which left a strong conviction that it would be opened again ere long, and that God would yet complete the work which he had so signally begun.

In the spring of 1845, Lebanon was again disturbed with civil war. It was a struggle for political ascendancy between the Maronites and Druses, and after twenty days' fighting in different sections of the mountains, the Maronites were defeated, and driven out of nearly all the Druze quarter of Lebanon. As the Maronites were bigoted adherents of the Romish church, and the most bitter opponents the missionaries had ever met with in Lebanon, their loss of power at this time had an important bearing on the mission. In describing this event, Mr. Thompson wrote: "Again the Maronite patriarch has sunk under disappointment. He died a few days ago. Moreover, that party in Hasbeiya who opposed us and stoned our people, has been driven out of the place by the Druses, and great numbers of them killed. The whole combination is completely broken up and dispersed." Mr. Smith, in writing on this subject has the following very striking comments on the death of the patriarch:—"I cannot conclude without alluding to the death of the old Maronite patriarch. What a lesson does that event, in such circumstances teach us! After having martyred that faithful witness, Asaad Shidiak, caused the Bible often to be burned, had missionaries insulted and stoned, and boasted that he had at last left no place open for them to enter the mountains, he finds himseli stripped of all his power; missionaries established permanently in the midst of his flock, and his own favorite bishop constrained to give orders for their protection; and finally he sinks himself under his disappointment, and dies. How signally has the blood of the martyred Asaad been avenged upon him, even in this life."

At Beirût and Abeih the labors of the missionary brethren had suffered but slight interruptions during the troubles in Mount Lebanon and in Hasbeiya. In 1847, there appeared at Beirût evidence that evangelical principles were spreading with increased rapidity. Most of those who attended upon the preaching of the missionaries openly avowed their evangelical sentiments, in the face of violent opposition. More than fifty young men of the papal church refused to confess for more than a year, and this they regarded as a final renunciation of popery. At Abeih, about thirty adults were in attendance on the Arabic service, and stated preaching was maintained in four of the neighboring villages. There was evidence of the special influences of the Holy Spirit on many minds.

In April, 1848, a station was commenced at Aleppo, and Messrs. W. A. Benton and J. A. Ford were appointed as missionaries to that place. Mr. Smith, who accompanied the brethren to their station, describes the people as intelligent, social, inquisitive, and not so much afraid as elsewhere of changing sects. The Arab Christian population was the largest and most intelligent to be found in any place in Syria.

An important event of this year was the formation of a purely native church. Previous to this the native converts had joined the mission church, composed in part of missionary families. The petition for a church to be composed only of converted natives, originated with the natives themselves, and is a document of considerable length and of great interest. (See Annual Report for 1848, or Herald for August 1848. The latter contains also the constitution and discipline of the new church.)

In November, 1848, a new mission was commenced at Tripoli, and Messrs. David M. Wilson and Horace Foot were stationed at that place. They met with vigorous and determined opposition at the outset, and it was with difficulty that they procured houses in the city. At the beginning of the year 1849 there were four common schools in connection with the station at Beirût, and five in connection with that at Abeih, with an aggregate of 210 male and 55 female pupils. There was also a school at Tripoli, containing 20 scholars, and one at Hasbeiya, containing 70 pupils. The printing during the preceding year had amounted to 1,010,000 pages, and the total amount printed from the commencement of the mission was 75,765,800 pages. Mr. Smith was proceeding with the translation of the Bible into the Arabic language, aided by Butrus Bistany, one of the native brethren. Special interest was awakened in the beginning of this year by a learned Greek Catholic of Damascus who had become fully convinced of the errors of his church, and had openly declared himself a Protestant. He stated that for about six years his conscience had been troubling him; that he had embraced infidel views, but by reading books furnished him by the missionaries, and by conversation with Mr. Smith and others, he had been led to take a decided stand on the subject of religion. An open profession of his sentiments brought on a discussion between him and his patriarch; and, as Mr. Meshakah, the individual in question, was esteemed the most intelligent native layman in the country, and the patriarch the most learned ecclesiastic, attention from all quarters was directed to this controversy. Mr. Meshakah also immediately prepared a treatise in Arabic, addressed to his countrymen and friends, the object of which was to explain to them the reasons of his secession from the Catholic church, and to set forth proofs of the corruption of the doctrines and practices of that church. This book produced a great sensation.

The printing during the year 1849 amounted to 1,934,000 pages. The mission had two fonts of beautiful Arabic type, of different sizes, cast in Syria, under the supervision of Mr. Hurter, printer for the mission, at Beirût. Up to this time there had been but one mission church—that at Beirût, and the number of members was 27. Ten of these were from the Greek church, four were papal Greeks, four Maronites, five Armenians, three Druses, and one a Jacobite Syrian. In the latter part of 1850 there was an outbreak of Turkish violence at Aleppo, resulting in terrible scenes of violence and blood, and subjecting the nominal Christians to serious disadvantages. (For full accounts of these scenes see Missionary Herald for February and April, 1851.)

The report for 1851 includes Hasbeiya among its regular stations. For several years the missionaries had paid frequent visits to that place, and had held frequent correspondence with leading men of the Protestant community; but no missionary had been permanently stationed there. The time having come, as was believed, for carrying on the work there in a more systematic manner, Messrs. Thompson and Van Dyck were designated to that field; and, in July, a church was formed at Hasbeiya, composed of 16 native brethren. The necessary officers were chosen, and Mr. Thompson was requested to act as pastor till one from their own number should be raised up. But it was a church planted in the midst of enemies, and persecution still awaited it. Before the close of 1851 the government ceased to have any control over that region, and anarchy set in, robbers infested the roads, and property and life were at the mercy of lawless and marauding bands of people. This condition of things continued through most of 1852 and 1853, and of course had a most disastrous effect upon the church at Hasbeiya. It was often impossible for the missionaries or the native assistants to visit the people in safety. Nor could the people assemble for worship without danger. At a communion season, in 1853, the Protestants came fully armed, and stacked their guns, and hung their swords in the court of the chapel, forcibly reminding the missionaries of scenes often witnessed in the early planting of churches among the savages of the American wilderness. It was hardly to be expected that the Gospel would achieve many triumphs amid such disorders and tumults; and it is even more than could have been anticipated, to hear the missionaries say, as they do, in the Herald for July, 1853, "We are thankful that none of the members of the church have been terrified into submission; nor indeed have any of the old and established members of the congregation yielded to the pressure. The number who attend public worship, however, is sensibly reduced; and these absorbing social troubles have sadly distracted all minds, and diminished that earnest zeal which has at other times been so encouraging a feature of our work at Hasbeiya."

At the last accounts, civil war was again pending, and seemed almost inevitable; and yet it was evident to those on the ground, that neither war nor persecution could drive the Gospel from Hasbeiya, nor prevent its progress among a people who had begun to be enlightened and quickened by its power. The latest intelligence from Beirût is that found in the Herald for August, 1854. The native church has 26 members, 8 having been recently dismissed and formed into a church at Abeih. "Most of the members," say the missionaries, "give evidence of sincere piety, and are leading upright and useful lives. The church has sent 1,000 piastres to assist the British and Foreign Bible Society in their special effort to furnish a million of New Testaments for China." Mr. Smith was progressing rapidly with the work of translating the Scriptures into Arabic, having completed the Pentateuch, and the New Testament as far as 2 Corinthians. As an evidence of the capabilities of the mission press at Beirût the brethren say, "We have been able to print an Algebra, and have now in hand an edition of the Pentateuch, with references, using all the varieties of letters found in Algebras, and reference Bibles in English. The whole has been created since 1835, the fonts of type all having been made by Mr. Hallock, either in Smyrna or in the United States, after improved models furnished by members of the mission. We have finished printing during the year, a new edition of the Scripture spelling-book; Dr. Van Dyck's Algebra; a sermon on the second commandment; an Arabic grammar; Meshakah on Skepticism, besides some broad sheets; and we now have in the press, Schneider on Rites and Ceremonies, and a new edition of the Psalter, making in all 1,083,000 pages." There had been issued from the depository during the year 5,008 books and tracts, of which 725 were disposed of in Beirût, 923 were sent to Sidon, 1,073 to the mountain, 242 to Tripoli, 313 to Aleppo, 76 to Mosul, 71 to Damascus, 100 to Jerusalem, 20 to Alexandria, and 306 to Bombay. The primary school at Beirût had about 75 pupils. The female seminary was in a prosperous condition. Some of the studies pursued were, Watts on the Mind; Church History, in Arabic; an abridged work on Moral Philosophy; besides which the girls had read the whole of D'Aubigne's History of the Reformation, and other history, with Mrs. De Forest in an evening class, the atlas being always open before them. A Sabbath afternoon service, in Arabic, was kept up, the congregations varying from 60 to 120. The excited state of men's minds in regard to political matters and the prevailing wars, had turned away the thoughts of many from spiritual things; and it was remarked as a serious evil also, that for at least one-third of the year there must be a virtual suspension of labor at Beirût, owing to the absence of the missionaries among the mountains during the hot season. Repeated trials have shown this absence to be necessary. A good report is made of the little church at Abeih, in the Herald for May, 1854. The chapel was kept open during the year, and the average attendance was about 50. There was an increasing demand for free schools among the Druses. Six of these schools were already in operation on the mountains, and in them all a large amount of religious instruction was communicated. At Aleppo a church had been organized with six members, all of whom gave evidence that they were living branches of the true vine. Little had been done for education in Aleppo. They are an ignorant people. Though the largest, wealthiest, and most intelligent community of nominal Christians in Syria, there is not a common school in the city that deserves the name, and scarcely a person competent to teach his native tongue correctly. Yet a large and increasing number were intellectually convinced of the truth, and many were anxious for evangelical instruction. Some females were concerned for the salvation of their souls. The brethren say, "We feel that we can now work to advantage, having a hold upon the consciences of men."

Mr. Thompson, the only missionary stationed at Sidon, reports favorably of that station. In the Herald, May, 1854, he says: "Our chapel has not been closed for a single Sabbath during the year. Our Protestants carry their faith and zeal wherever they go, and make and persons that were tabued, all intercourse was prohibited. The term was also used to indicate any thing sacred or devoted. There were tabued or sacred days, when it was death to be found in a canoe. Pork, bananas, coconuts, and certain kinds of fish, were tabued to women, and it was death for them to eat these articles of food. Another tabu forbade men and women eating together; so that a man must build an eating-house for himself and another for his wife, and have separate ovens for their food. Anything of which a man made an idol, was tabu to him. If he made his idol of the native apple tree, then the apple tree was tabu to him. Birds, fowls, beasts, fish, and stones, were objects of worship, and whoever made any of these his god, they were tabu for him. So, too, of articles of food, which were employed as offerings to idols; they were afterwards tabu to the offerer. If a king died, the whole district was tabu, and his heir went to another.

TABLE MOUNTAIN: Station of the American Board among the Zulus, in South Africa, near Port Natal.

TABOO: A station of the American Episcopal Board in West Africa, about 40 miles to the leeward of Cape Palmas.

TAHAA: One of the Society Islands, and a station of the London Missionary Society.

TAHITI: The largest Island of the Georgian Group, in the South Seas.

TALUAFATA: A station of the London Missionary Society, on the Island of Upolu, one of the Samoan group.

TALAPOINS: Priests or friars of the Siamese, and other Eastern nations. They reside in convents, which are square enclosures, in the centre of which stands a temple, and round it the cells of the talapoins, like so many tents in a camp. There are likewise female talapoins, who live under the same regulations as the men, and in the same convents. They have likewise nens, or young talapoins, who wait on the old ones, and receive their education from them. Each convent is under the direction of a superior, whom they call a sacrat. These priests subsist wholly upon the sins and the liberality of the people; for they undergo a course of penance for the iniquities of such as bestow upon them their charitable benevolence. They are indulgent and hospitable to strangers; and there are two lodges on each side of the entrance to their cells, which are wholly reserved for the accommodation of their guests. They are under an indispensable obligation to live single; and those who offend against chastity are subject to be burnt at the stake.—Broughton's Dict.

TAMAKTIA: A station of the Wesleyan Society in Kaffraria, South Africa.

TAMTAM: A large flat drum used by the Hindoos.

TAMLOOK: A town about 35 miles S. W. from Calcutta, head-quarters of an agency for the government manufacture of salt, which is prepared by filtration from the mud of the Hooghly river, and is esteemed of peculiar value by the Hindoos, as being extracted on the banks of the holiest branch of the Ganges. It is a station of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel.

TANANARIVO: The capital of Madagascar, former seat of the mission of the London Missionary Society. It is situated in the interior of the island, in the district of Ankova, the most populous and salubrious part of the country.

TANGENA: An ordeal administered in Madagascar to determine the guilt or innocence of a person suspected of witchcraft or sorcery. The accused is first made to eat a hearty meal of rice; after which, three pieces of the skin of a fowl, killed for the occasion, are swallowed; and then an emetic is administered, consisting of the tangena nut. If the three pieces are returned from the stomach, the party is declared innocent, and he is led up by his friends to his village with much pomp and ceremony. If the skin is not thrown up, he is declared guilty, and immediately despatched with a club, unless a slave, in which case he is sent to some distant part of the country and sold. They are, however, sometimes thrown into the under-ground rice granaries, and scalded to death with boiling water. This ordeal is likewise often resorted to when persons are accused of other offences, as a trial of guilt or innocence. It is sometimes administered to large numbers at the same time. It forms one of the most cruel and destructive of the heathen superstitions. A similar ordeal, though varying in form, is in use generally among the different tribes of West Africa.

TANNA: An island of the New Hebrides Group, on which is a station of the London Missionary Society.

TAOUISTS: A religious sect among the Chinese. (See China.)

TAPUNA: A station of the Church Missionary Society in the Bay of Islands, New-Zealand.

TAQUOHEE: An Indian town among the Cherokees in the Indian Territory; a station of the Cherokee mission of the American Baptist Union.

TARTARY AND SIBERIA: Tartary is the name given to that immense region extending almost entirely across Asia from the Caspian Sea to the Eastern Ocean; but the name is only partially recognized within these limits. Many parts of it are bordered and even pervaded by chains of mountains; and large cities, cultivated spots, and fixed societies, here and there occur. It contains also sandy deserts of considerable extent. Still, the predominant characteristic is that of immense plains or steppes, covered with herbage more or less abundant, and occupied by wandering and pastoral tribes, whose camps, like moving cities, pass continually to and fro over its surface. The extensive chain of the Altai mountains separates the whole of Mongolia or Eastern Tartary, from Siberia, and another long chain divides it from Thibet. There is also a transverse range of mountains, called the Beloor or Bolor mountains, connecting the western extremities of these two boundary chains together, of a peculiarly lofty and rugged character, and affording only two narrow and difficult passes by which to penetrate into Eastern Tartary or Mongolia. A considerable number of rivers, descending from these high mountain ranges, traverse the great upland plain of Independent Tartary, but unable, across so many barriers, to reach any of the surrounding oceans, they expand into large interior salt lakes, two of which, the Caspian and Aral, are entitled by their magnitude to the appellation of seas. The irrigation produced by these seas breaks the continuity of the desert, and on their banks are situated the most fertile and populous tracts, and the most powerful states of Western Tartary.

Bokhara, or Bucharra, is an extensive table land, very imperfectly explored, but, according to Humboldt, much more fertile than the rest of Tartary. The cotton, the vine, and the mulberry are, in many parts, cultivated. It has also valuable mines of precious stones. The other more northerly table land of Tartary, Mongolia, is much more bleak and uncongenial. It yields in its best tracts only pasturage, and includes large expanses of sandy and saline deserts.

But that portion usually called Russian Tartary is almost the only spot, on this widely-extended tract, that has been the scene of missionary labor. It is situated between the Caspian and Black Seas, and appears to hold out the advantages of a genial climate, and a thoroughfare between more populous countries, which render it desirable as a field of missionary operations.

The province of Orenburgh forms the link between European and Asiatic Russia. Tartars compose its chief population; but many of them have been trained to regular and industrious habits by the Russians, in their mines and other works. The country is capable of every kind of culture, but is mostly covered with rich pastures.

To the south of the lofty range of the Caucasian mountains is Georgia, a region profusely gifted both with richness and beauty. It is fertilized by numerous mountain streams, and clothed with magnificent forests of beech, ash, chestnut, oak, and pine; while the ground is covered with vines, growing wild, in vast profusion. In this province are Teflis and Shusha, each having been, at different times, missionary stations. This country has been the seat of continual wars and commotions, and was, about two centuries ago, wrested from Persia by Russia. Its population, reduced ed by war and other causes, does not much exceed 300,000.

The most northern regions of Asia present an almost unbounded expanse of frozen forest desert. Some of the plains of the southern borders of Siberia are covered with pastures; but, as we proceed to the northern boundaries of the bleak shores of the frozen ocean, human life, with the means of its support, becomes more and more deficient. But those regions abound in animals producing the richest furs; and the numerous rivers furnish abundance of fish, which form the principal part of the food of the scanty, wandering tribes; and all the western districts of Asiatic Russia, which border on the Ural mountains, contain valuable mines of gold, silver, copper, and precious stones.

Selinginsk, which for twenty years was a station of the London Missionary Society, for the Tartars of the Buriat-Mongolian race, is a small town on the frontiers of Siberia and Chinese Tartary, south-east of Lake Baikal, and was built by the Russians, to facilitate their route up the river Selenga, as far as Kiachta, on the Chinese frontier. All the towns of Siberia are chiefly of Russian origin, and are built to facilitate trade and the collection of revenue. The native inhabitants of these thinly peopled and desolate regions prefer living a rude and wandering life in tents or movable huts.

The two leading races among the various tribes inhabiting this immense region, are the Mongols and Turks. The first have complexions of a dark yellow tint, broad, square, flat faces, thick lips, and small eyes inclining downwards, and scanty hair. The Turks are a much handsomer people, with a rich profusion of hair, broad foreheads, and clear ruddy complexions. The Circassian females are famed for their great beauty, fine forms, and delicate complexion. The daughters of all above the rank of slaves are exempt from degrading or oppressive labor, and occupy themselves in sewing, embroidery, or plaiting straw. The face is carefully shaded from the sun, their feet are protected by a wooden shoe, and their hands by gloves. Their food consists chiefly of milk and pastry. But their condition is a sad one; for their parents invariably sell their daughters to the highest bidder. Georgia, and still more Circassia, have been distinguished for the athletic strength of their men, and the beauty of their women, and hence they have been in great request as domestic slaves all over the Turkish empire.

The Tartars do not, like the shepherds of a civilized country, lead their flocks through remote and sequestered valleys, and spend their time in peaceful seclusion. They move from place to place, usually in large bodies, for war or plunder. Their government has a strong tendency towards despotism, which is increased by the superstition incident to a barbarous people, whose creeds are accommodated to a system of absolute power. Under the character of Mohammedan mullohs, or Buddhist lamas, many of the princes of Asia both preach and rule. In Bokhara, the former sovereign raised himself from a low rank to that high station, solely by his eminence as a mulloh, or Mohammedan doctor, and by his rigid observance of the austerities enjoined in that religion. In those parts of Tartary where Mohammedanism prevails, the Koran is enforced, not only as a sacred, but as a civil code. According to its rules, justice is administered and the revenue collected; and conformably to its precepts, a tenth part of the revenue is bestowed in alms.

Nearly the whole territory of Mount Caucasus, and the country north and west of the Caspian Sea, own the sovereignty of Russia. On the borders of Persia, where the Russians must court the natives as their allies against that power, they are obliged to allow the Tartars the unrestrained exercise of their national propensities. The vast plains on every side of Astrachan are continually traversed by Calmucks, Nogays, Kubans, and other Tartar tribes, whose internal affairs are administered by khans or rulers, who collect and transmit such scanty tribute as can be drawn from the flocks and herds of their vassals. It is only in the more northern provinces of Oufa and Orenberg, where cities with a civilized population and extensive mining establishments have been formed, that Russia has been able to mould the people into that uniform subjection which prevails in other parts of her European and Asiatic territory.

In the mountainous regions of Circassia and Caucasus, the distinctions of birth and rank are observed with all the strictness of highland pride. Under the prince are the nobles, who exercise almost absolute sway over their vassals. These are of two kinds, the bondsmen, who cultivate the soil, and the armed retainers, who attend the nobles to the field, either for war or for prey. The life led by the nobles is one constant round of war and feasting, hunting and jollity. On state occasions, they are attired in splendid robes, while their food and furniture are of the most plain and homely description. Their drink is a fermented liquor called koumiss, made from mare's milk, of which they are very fond. It supplies the place of wine, which is prohibited by the Koran. All Tartar tribes are addicted to habits of plunder; and if a stranger enters their territory, except under the protection of one of their chiefs, he is sure to be enslaved. The Russians have never yet been able to subdue the Circassians. The most she can do is to hold military occupation of the leading positions.

The kingdoms of Kiva and Bokhara form a kind of oases in the midst of the vast deserts of Turcomani, which is the name given to this whole region as far as the Caspian and the Aral.

The population of Tartary, including Mongolia and Manchuria, is estimated at about 20,000,000. The immense region of Siberia embraces 5,000,000 square miles, and is computed to contain rather more than 5,000,000 inhabitants. This scanty population consists of two distinct portions, the foreign rulers, and the native tribes. The Russian inhabitants are composed of the unfortunate exiles, who are banished to those desolate wilds for some real or fancied offence against the State, the convicts, who work in the mines, and the officers stationed at the different Russian towns throughout Siberia, to collect the furs and skins, as tribute or tax to the emperor. There are likewise the dignitaries of the church and the inferior clergy connected with the establishment. Each of the four large provinces, Tobolsk, Tomsk, Irkutsk, and Okhotsk, has its archbishop and patriarch, who reside entirely in the towns. Of the native Siberian races, those which occupy the whole of the southern frontier are of Tartar origin; and until conquered by Russia, they held supreme sway in Siberia. The people inhabiting the southern and eastern shores of Lake Baikal are the Buriats, a division of the Mongolians. The authority of Russia has suppressed the system of plunder which used to prevail among these people. The Samoyedes and Tungusi races inhabit the northern coasts, and these are unlike the Tartars, both in their persons and habits. They lead a wandering life, their sole employment being hunting and fishing. Their dress is composed chiefly of skins.

Religion.—All the eastern regions of Tartary acknowledge the supremacy of the Grand Lama, and hold the Shaman doctrine, which is a modification of Buddhism. The nations inhabiting Western and Independent Tartary are devoted to the Mussulman creed. Under the Buddhist system of religion, the various little tribes of eastern Asia have minor lamas, who hold a mixed temporal and spiritual jurisdiction over the people, and in Tartary this form of idolatry seems combined with magic and sorcery, and many similar modes of terrifying and deluding the ignorant wanderers of the desert.

Burchan is the name of the Calmuc idols, and most of their gods are supposed to have been spiritual beings, who, after passing through all the different degrees of transmigration, have at last raised themselves to the dignity of the godhead, by great deeds and extreme sufferings.

The inhabitants of the Tartar villages near Astrachan are Mohammedans, and there are also many Persians, professing the same faith, residing in this country, for trade.

That race of Mongolian Tartars called Buriats, inhabiting the southern shores of Lake Baikal, as far as the Chinese frontier, are worshippers of the Grand Lama; but they have numerous other objects of worship. Their worship abounds in burdensome and disagreeable ceremonies, but is accompanied with sanguinary rites. A portion of the people profess Shamanism, which is supposed to be the most ancient religion of the country.

MISSIONS.

UNITED BRETHREN.—In 1765, five Brethren from Hernhutt in Silesia, were appointed to undertake a mission to the wandering Tartar tribes in Asiatic Russia, and settled at Sarepta, not far from Georgievsk, one of the chief Russian towns, between the Caspian and Black Seas, on the road from St. Petersburg to Persia. They ransomed some of the Tartars from slavery, and preached the Gospel to all whose attention they could gain, conforming, in some respects, to the Tartar mode of life. They translated the Gospel and several tracts into Calmuc. They met with very little success, till 1815, when a little flock of Calmuc Tartars came out from among their heathen countrymen, and joined their congregation. In 1823, their congregation had increased to 300. About this time, the emperor refused to grant them permission to baptize their converts, 22 in number, under an old law which forbids the conversion and baptism of the heathen, unless it be done by the Russian Greek clergy! But the Emperor Alexander gave them permission to preach and distribute the Scriptures. Very valuable assistance was at this time rendered not only to the Moravian mission, but also to the Scotch and London Society's missions, by the Russian Bible Society, whose interests the Emperor and the pious Galatzin warmly promoted. This society was at the expense of printing the Scriptures in modern Russ, Mongolian, and a portion of them in Turkish Tartar, after they had been translated into these languages by the missionaries of these societies.

SCOTTISH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—This society commenced a mission in 1802, at Karass, in Asiatic Russia. They obtained from the Russian Government, a grant of land consisting of 14,000 acres, with certain immunities attached, and they seem to have obtained greater privileges than the Moravians, for liberty was given to their converts to "embrace the religion of the colony, and become members of it." They also had the privilege of giving passports to the members of their congregation to settle in other parts of the empire. In consequence of these privileges, probably, the Scotch missionary settlement continued in existence longer than any other missionary establishment in Tartary. Native youths, slaves to the Circassians and Cuban Tartars, were redeemed by the Scotch missionaries and placed in schools, where they acquired the Turkish and English languages, the principles of Christianity, and several useful arts. In 1805, a printing-press was sent out to Karass, and the New Testament was printed in Turkish, and tracts in the Tartar language. In 1814, they extended their missionary efforts to Astrachan and Orenberg; and at the former place, another printing-press was established, which printed the Tartar New Testament and other books, which were carried into Persia by the numerous merchants trading from that country with Russia. One of their Tartar converts, named John Abercrombie, was for many years printer to the London Missionary Society at Selinginsk. In 1817 they issued 4000 tracts and 5000 Testaments. These found their way, by means of Mohammedan merchants and pilgrims, and even Brahmins and Jews, to Bagdad, Persia, Bokhara, and even to China. A Tartar prince of the Crimea, called the Sultan of Katagherry, appears to have been the first fruits of their missionary labor. Walter Buchanan, a Circassian, was the next. He faithfully served the Scottish or Edinburgh Society, for many years, at Orenburgh, in Russian Tartary.

In 1822, the Scotch colony was joined by several German missionaries, sent out by the Basle Institution, some of whom settled in Tartary, and others proceeded to Teflis and Shusha, in Georgia, to labor among the Armenians.

In 1823, Mirza Mohammed Ali, son of a Mohammedan judge, was employed by the missionaries at Astrachan, as a teacher; and in consequence of the discussions which he had with the missionaries, his faith in Mohammedanism was shaken; and, after a short time, in the face of the opposition of friends, he cordially embraced Christianity. The Greek archbishop proposed that he should be admitted into that church by baptism; but he wrote a petition to the Emperor Alexander, through Prince Galatzin, asking to be allowed to receive baptism from those who had been the instruments of his conversion, which request was instantly granted. He was, therefore, admitted to the church, in the presence of Greeks and Turks, Persians and Frenchmen, Germans and Armenians, the service being in English, Turkish, and Persian. But he was afterwards treated with great harshness by the Russian government of the Caucasus, being compelled, in 1825, to enter the Russian service, and ordered to refrain from interfering or coöperating in any missionary work. In consequence of this and other restrictions imposed upon them by the Russian government, both the Scotch and the Moravian Missionary Societies relinquished their missions, though with the greatest regret; but the settlement at Karass continued to be occupied several years longer.

A great revolution also took place about this time in Russia with regard to the Bible Society. This institution, under the fostering care of the Emperor Alexander, had pursued a distinguished career, and promised to supply the Word of Life not only to the Russian population, but to the heathen and Mohammedans. A powerful opposition, however, was raised against it in 1825, the year that Alexander died; in consequence of which, Prince Galatzin retired from office, and resigned his station as Minister of Religion. Its secretary, M. Papoff, was put upon his trial in the criminal court, for allowing a book to be published, in which were some reflections considered unfavorable to the doctrine of the Greek church, in relation to the Virgin Mary! It had been intended that the missionaries at Astrachan should be employed by the Bible Society to print a new and correct edition of Henry Martyn's Persian New Testament, and the types had been ordered from St. Petersburg; but this work was now stopped, and the missionaries were told that their Tartar version of the Old Testament would have to be submitted to three archbishops of the Greek church; so that, when they had completed the translation, it was doubtful whether it would be allowed to be published. All these causes, together with the growing indifference of the native tribes, combined to cause the Scotch and United Brethren's Societies to withdraw their missionaries in 1825.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—This society undertook a mission to Selinginsk, in Siberia, in 1819. When the missionaries had finished the translation of the Gospel of Matthew, the first printed edition was sent to the governor of Irkutsk, to distribute among the Tartars on the shores of Lake Baikal; but the Calmuc Tartar character being different from that which the Buriat tribes had retained, the books were not generally understood by these people. But two of their nobles were found who could decipher the character, and were able to read and explain its contents. This so astonished the Buriat chiefs and the head lama, that each, among his own people, made a collection amounting to £550, which they sent to the Russian Bible Society, begging to have the Gospel of Matthew, and, if possible, other books of the New Testament, translated into their own dialect, and printed in a character which they could read. The two Buriat nobles who had interpreted the former edition, were sent for, and repaired to St. Petersburg to undertake the work. As they proceeded with their work, they became deeply interested, and frequently came to Rev. Mr. Schmidt to inquire the meaning of passages. When they had completed the 23d chapter of Matthew, they came to him, and declared that they had resolved to renounce their former superstitions, and embrace the Christian faith. He warned them of the trials they would have to encounter, but they replied: "It is our firm determination to be followers of Jesus, and to share in his reproach, if that be our lot; though we hope that such trials may not befall us soon, on account of our weakness in the faith." One of them died at Sarepta, in October, 1822.

In 1838, the mission is thus mentioned in the Society's report: "Shagdur and Tekshee, two of the native converts, conduct the daily Mongolian worship with much propriety, during Mr. Stallybross's visit to England. The girls' school at Khodon makes satisfactory progress. The boys are ten in number. At Ona, Mr. Swan is surrounded by a number of Buriat youth, who have been brought under the influence of religion, and whose chief desire is to impart to their countrymen the blessings they so highly prize." The whole of the Old Testament was translated into Mongolian, and printed; and some of the Gospels had been printed and circulated.

But, in 1841, the mission was suppressed by an order from the Russian Synod, the reason given being, "that the mission, in relation to that form of Christianity already established in the Russian empire, did not coincide with the views of the church and the government." The missionaries wrote, concerning the abandonment of this mission: "It is painful to bid adieu to the scenes where we have spent so many years, and to the people of whom, we trust, the first fruits have been gathered unto Christ. They are living evidences that we have not labored in vain, and earnest of the abundant harvests to be expected when the word of God shall have free course, and be glorified in this land.—Missionary Guide Book."

We may judge, from these examples, what will be the fate of our missions in Turkey, should Russia succeed in her present crusade.

TASMANIA, or VAN DIEMAN'S LAND: An island, lying at the southern extremity of New Holland, between 40° 42' and 43° 43' S. lat.; and 145° 31' and 148° 22' E. long., reckoned to contain 27,192 square miles. In general it is composed of alternate hill and dale, and even the high downs are generally fit for cultivation and pasture. The chief lines, both of mountain and river, run from north to south, through the eastern part of the colony. Table Mountain, the most elevated hill in the island, nearly overhangs the southern settlement of Hobart Town, rising to the height of 3,936 feet. Although the country is productive, and but a small portion of it is occupied by British colonists, the aboriginal inhabitants have entirely disappeared. In consequence of the incessant mutual hostility which subsisted between them and the colonists, the whole of them were hunted out, and removed in the year 1835, to Flinders's Island, in Bass's Straits, where the miserable remnant still reside. They numbered 210, but in 1842, were reduced to 54. There had been only 14 children born in 8 years.

MISSION.

WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The Wesleyan Missionary Society began operations in Tasmania in the year 1820, at a time when there was but one minister of any persuasion in the whole island. That year the committee in London directed Mr. Carosso to proceed from New South Wales and commence a mission there; but he failing to reach the island, and Mr. Horton being then on his way to New South Wales, was directed to remain in Tasmania. At that period the state of society in the island was most deplorable. The aboriginal inhabitants, greatly reduced in number, wandered about in wretchedness, constantly exposed to the hostility of the white settlers. The white population, made up of convicts and settlers, then amounted to about 8,000 persons. And on Mr. Horton's commencing his efforts, he thus describes the moral condition of the place where he was appointed to labor: "Adultery and drunkenness, and blasphemy are sins which prevail to an awful extent among all classes, associated with idleness, dishonesty, malice, quarreling, and misery. Almost every tongue has learned to swear, and among the lower classes every hand to steal. The houses are surrounded by fierce dogs, to guard them against nocturnal depredations; and yet when thieves are detected in the act of plundering, they seldom resist, but scamper off as fast as they can. Indeed a vigilant and active police prevents the frequent perpetration of very daring deeds of outrage. Before we arrived, there was only one Protestant minister, a clergyman of the established church, whose labors were almost wholly confined to Hobart Town, and one Catholic priest, who had been but a few months in the colony. The out-settlements were therefore left without the public ordinances of religion. Thus Satan enjoyed an undisturbed reign. When we landed in this country, we were not a little surprised and pleased to find a Wesleyan Methodist Society already formed, and a chapel in a state of preparation. There are about 20 who very regularly attend class, and appear to be sincere inquirers; some of whom have found peace with God."

The mission was soon strengthened by another missionary. The missionaries received every encouragement from the governor of the colony, who showed himself laudably anxious for the moral benefit of all classes of the population. In 1827 he applied to the committee for two more missionaries to be sent out; their passage, together with an annual allowance toward their support, having been voted from the public funds.

But the labor in such a mission field as Tasmania is one of no ordinary difficulty, especially that portion of it employed among the convicts. These unhappy creatures, while suffering the punishment of their crimes, retain the vicious habits and daring disregard of the laws of God and man, which have been the occasion of their banishment to those distant lands. And yet among these children of crime and sorrow the missionaries have labored with very considerable success. One of them gives it as his opinion, that out of 50 criminals executed within six years, many of them had been snatched "as brands from the burning," and shared with "the dying thief" in the kingdom of a compassionate Saviour. The missionaries gave what attention they could to schools, for the education of the young ; but they had to be held in the evening, and to be taught, at least in part, by the more educated criminals. The prisoners generally seem to have entertained toward the missionaries feelings of respect and affection. This may be partly accounted for from the fact, that usually the only words of kindness which cheered their bitter lot, fell from the lips of these men of God. In 1832, the government requested the appointment of an additional missionary for the new penal settlement of Port Arthur, and the Rev. Mr. Butters was sent out to supply that post. At this period the number of members had risen to 163, and 283 children were in the schools. Many of these had been among the most guilty and abandoned of mankind. Many even of the scholars had already been trained and graduated at the school of vice, and had arrived at early maturity in depravity and guilt. In this class of men the colonial government had found it necessary to make distinctions ; the most hardened and incorrigible being separated from the rest, and placed under severe discipline in the penal settlements or condemned stations in Tasmania. Among those thus "twice dead," the Wesleyan missionaries were appointed to labor ; and such were the results of the Gospel over the hearts and conduct of many of these outcasts, that successive governors of this colony have gratefully acknowledged the importance of the services rendered by the missionaries. In 1837, four additional missionaries were sent out to extend its operations. The mission was farther enlarged in 1839, when the statistics stood thus : 9 missionaries ; 570 church members, and 922 scholars. The Rev. John Waterhouse became central superintendent of the missions in Australia and Polynesia, in 1839. In the discharge of his official duties he performed long and perilous journeys, both by sea and land, while visiting the various stations under his care. On one of these journeys in Tasmania he was much exposed to heavy rains, the result of which was a protracted illness, which at length ended his valuable life. The excellent financial measures which he and others introduced into these missions have relieved the missionary society from the responsibility of their maintenance and now this portion of the mission field has become nearly, if not quite, self-supporting.

The gold discoveries in Australia have rather retarded the prosperity of this mission during the past three years. An extensive emigration took place, which affected every circuit more or less. Yet, under all these disadvantages, the district has sustained itself during the past year by the help of its own contingent fund ; the missionaries in general report very favorably of the spiritual state of the members who have remained at home, and encourage themselves with the hope of future improvement.—REV. W. BUTLER.

TATTOOING : A process of marking the human body with various figures, by stained lines, practiced by the natives of the Pacific islands before the introduction of Christianity among them, and still practiced by the pagan tribes. Until a young man is tattooed, he is considered in his minority. He need not think of marriage, and he is constantly exposed to taunts and ridicule, as being poor and of low birth, and as having no right to speak in the society of men. But as soon as he is tattooed, he passes into his majority, and considers himself entitled to the respect and privileges of mature years. When a youth, therefore, reaches the age of sixteen, he and his friends are all anxiety that he should be tattooed. He is then on the out-look for the tattooing of some neighboring chief, with whom he may unite. On these occasions, six or a dozen young men may be tattooed at one time ; and for these there may be four or five tattooers employed. Tattooing is a regular profession, just as house-building, and well paid. (See New-Zealand, p. 569.)

TAUTIRA : A station of the London Missionary Society on Tahiti, South Sea.

TAURANGA : A station of the Church Missionary Society in New-Zealand, on the Bay of Plenty.

TAVOY : A province and a city in Burmah annexed to the possessions of the East India Company by the treaty of Yaudaboo in 1826. The city is the seat of a mission of the American Baptist Union. The entire district has been brought in some degree under the influence of its operations.

TELLICHERRY : A station of the Basle Missionary Society, on the Malabar coast, in the western part of Southern Hindostan, 126 miles from Seringapatam.

TELOOGOO : A station of the Church Missionary Society in Southern India, on the eastern coast, and some distance north of Madras.

TENASSERIM : The name of a large river in Burmah, and also applied to the three provinces of Maulmain, Tavoy, and Mergui, annexed to the territory of the British East India Company by the treaty of Yandaboo in 1826.

TERNATE: One of the Molucca Islands, in the Indian Archipelago.

THABA BASSIOU: A station of the French Protestants in South Africa, on a branch of the river Kaledon.

THEOPOLIS: A station of the London Missionary Society in South Africa, 550 miles east of Cape Town.

THESSALONICA, (called by the Turks Seldnik, and by the French Salonica) is situated at the head of the gulf of Salonica (ancient Sinus Thermaicus) a branch of the Ægean Sea. It is about 175 miles north of Athens and 300 west of Constantinople. It is, as in Paul's day, the chief city of Macedonia, being its main sea-port, and next to Constantinople, the chief port of European Turkey. It has a population of 60,000 or 70,000, of whom perhaps 15,000 are Turks, 15,000 Greeks, 30,000 Jews (including 5,000 Mohammedan Jews), and a few thousand Bulgarians, Wallachians, Albanians, &c., &c.

In 1849, the A. B. C. F. M. established a mission among the Jews of this city. It consisted at first of Messrs. Maynard and Dodd, with their wives, of whom the former died in a few months, and his widow returned to this country. Mr. and Mrs. Dodd were subsequently joined by Messrs. Parsons and Morgan with their wives. Mrs. Morgan also died in a few months and Mr. Morgan afterwards married Mrs. Sutphen, widow of a missionary. The members of the mission suffered much from sickness, especially from fever and ague, which is prevalent in Macedonia; and at the present (July 1854) they are all absent from their stations: Messrs. Parsons and Morgan in Smyrna, laboring among the Jews there, and Mr. Dodd in America, expecting to return soon.

It is hoped that hereafter both stations may be occupied, and that in Thessalonica a more favorable residence may be secured, and better health enjoyed.

Thessalonica is the most important literary centre of the Jews in the east, and a foothold there gained will be valuable. The Jews there are peculiarly sociable and accessible to missionary influence. The missionaries have met with encouragement in their work. There have been a few cases of hopeful conversion among Jews and Mussulmans. Many others seem convinced, intellectually, of the truth, though yet unrenowned, and of a still larger circle the prejudices are broken; their esteem, and sometimes affection, is won, and they lie open to the influence of the truth. The field is hopeful.—REV. E. M. DODD.

THUGS: (See Hindustan, Dr. Scudder's Letter.)

TIAREI: A station of the London Missionary Society on Tahiti, South Sea.

TIDMANTON: Out-station to Kat River station, of the London Missionary Society in South Africa, formerly Blinkwater.

TIDOR: One of the Molucca Islands, in the Indian Archipelago.

TILLIPALLY: A station of the American Board in Ceylon, about 10 miles north of Jaffnapatam.

TIMOR: A group of the Molucca Islands in the Indian Archipelago.

TIMORLAUT: One of the Banda Islands, a group of the Moluccas, in the Indian Archipelago.

TINNEVELLY: A district in the Southern Carnatic, South India, and an important field of missionary operations.

TIRUMUNGALUM: A station of the Am. Board, about 12 miles S. W. of Madura, in Southern Hindostan, and belonging to that mission.

TIRUPOOVANUM: A station of the Am. Board, in Southern Hindostan, 8 or 10 miles S. E. of Madura, and belonging to that mission.

TOBAGO: (See West Indies.)

TOKA: One of the New Hebrides, where is a station of the London Missionary Society.

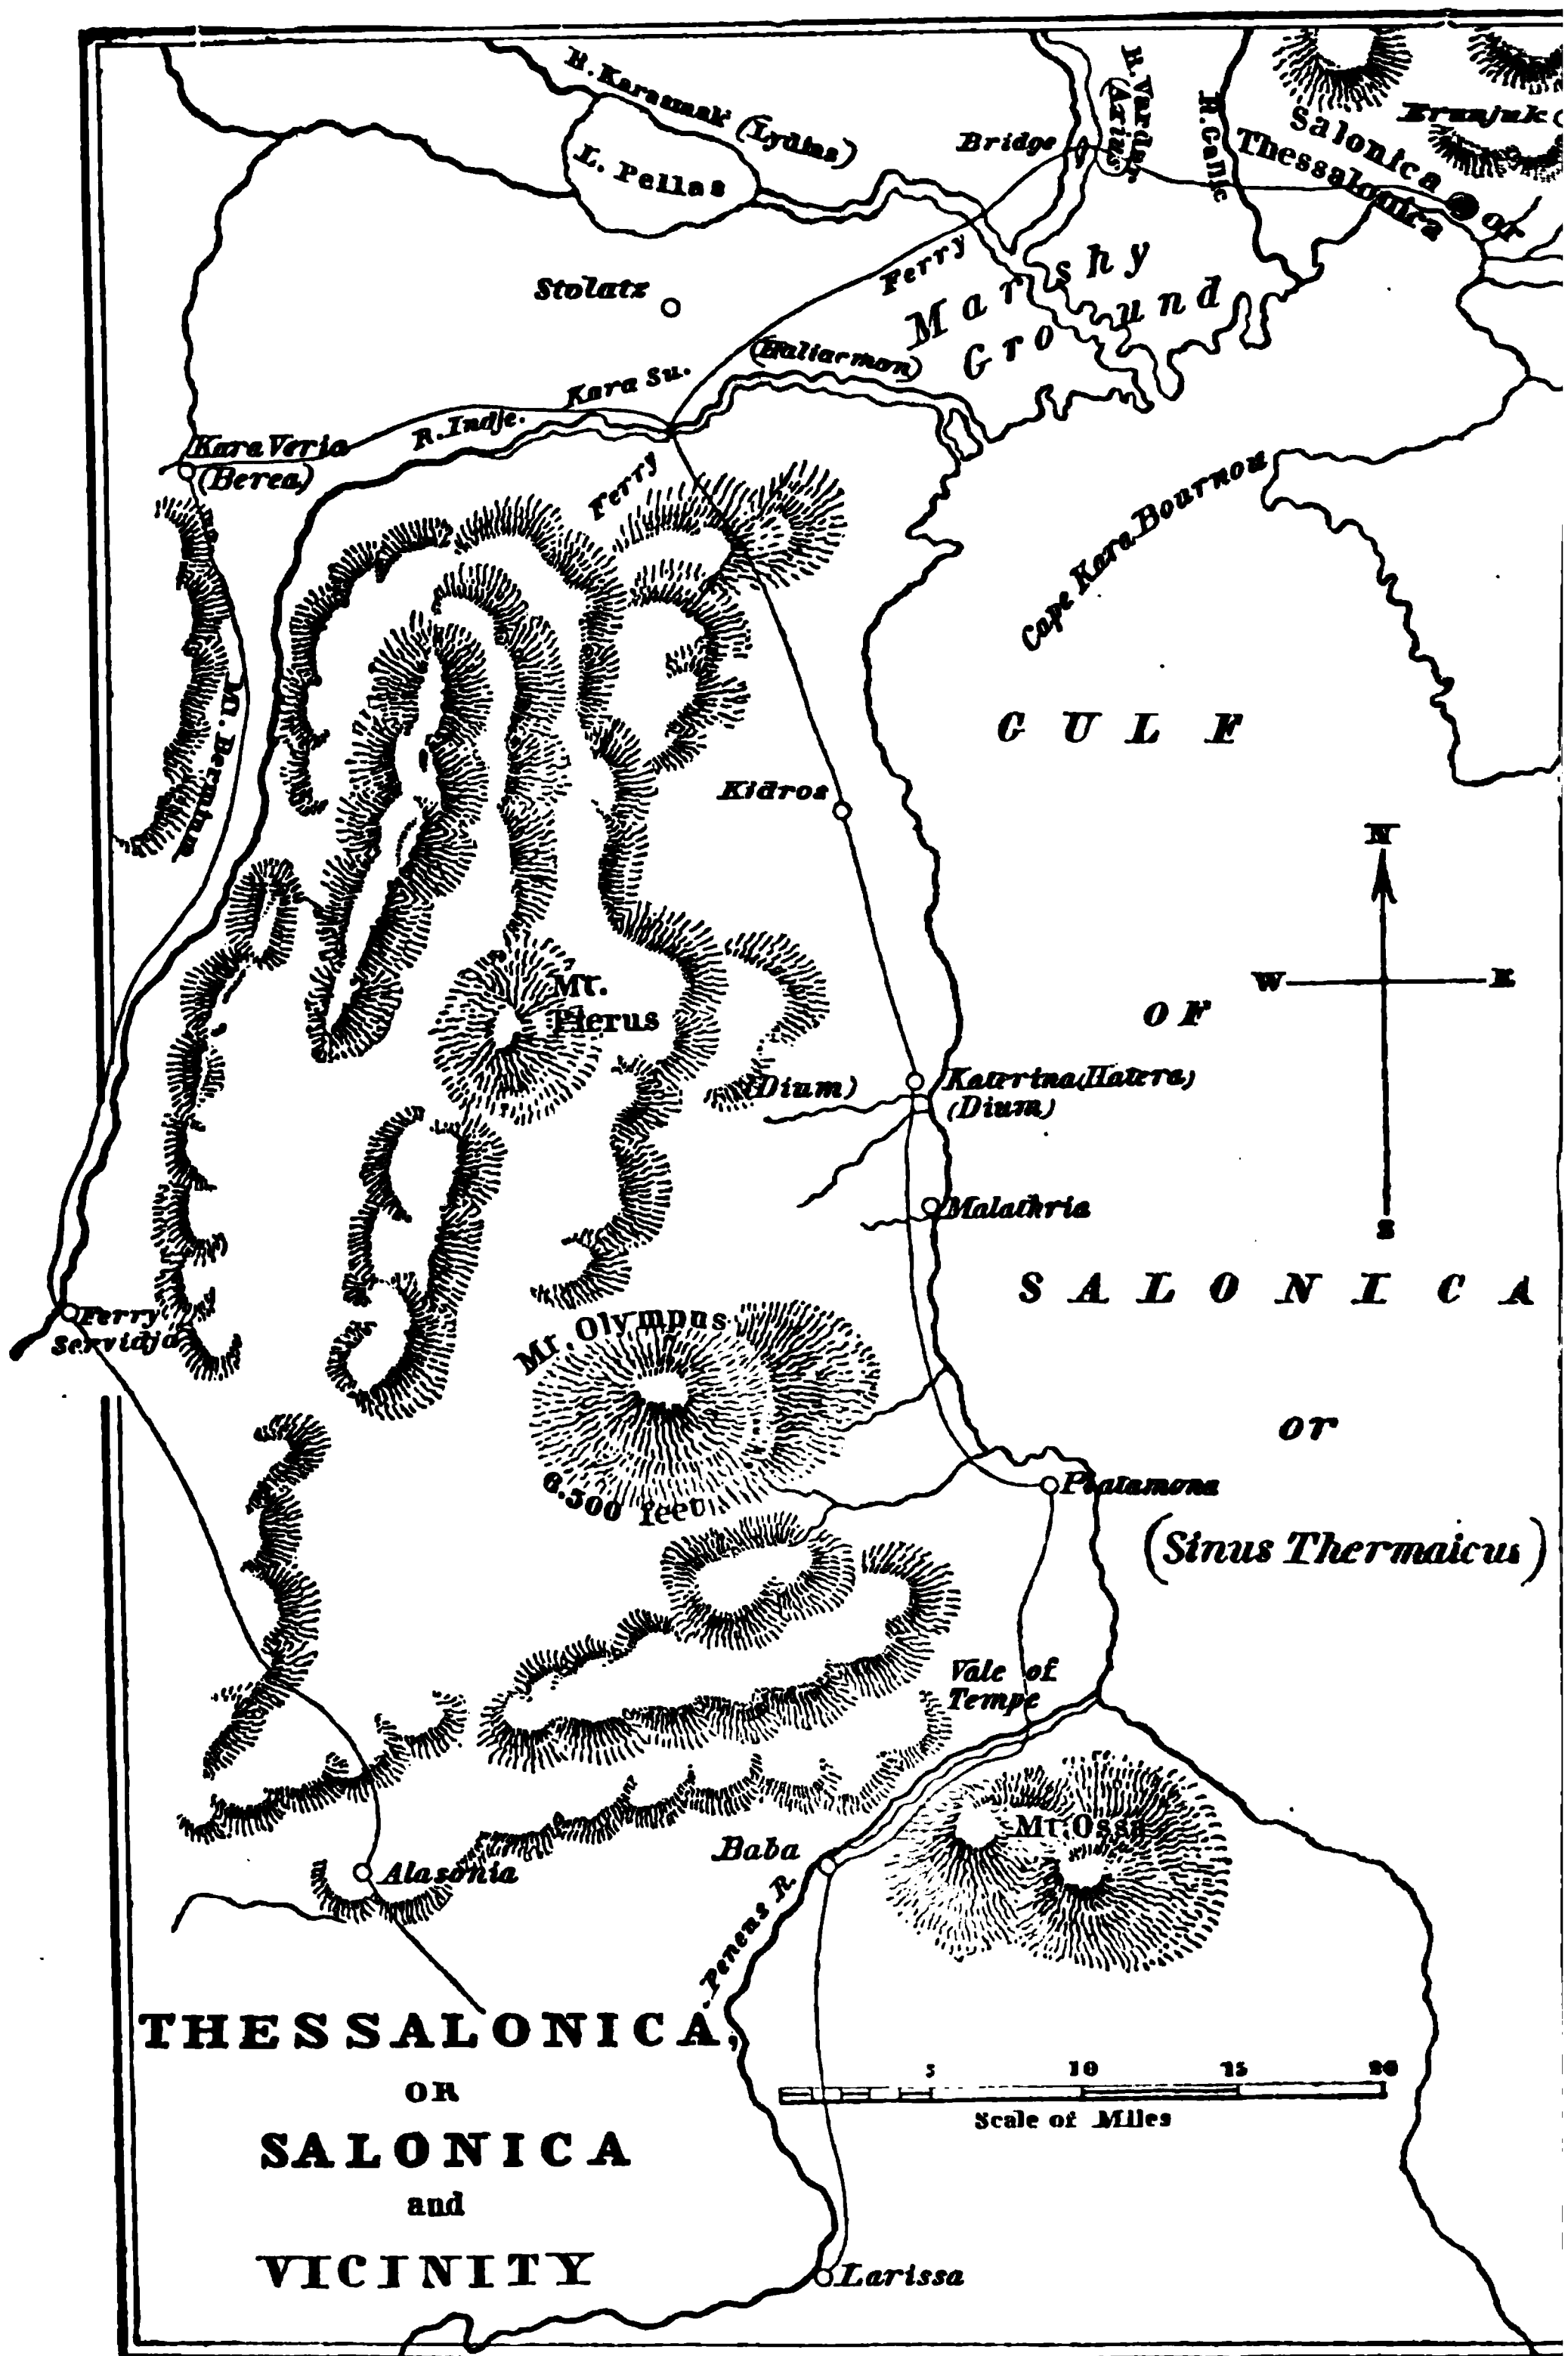

TONGATABOO: One of the Friendly Islands, a station of the Wesleyan Society.

TOUNGGOO: A large city in Southern Burmah, 100 miles above Shwaygyeen on the Sitang river. It is in territory which was annexed to British Burmah in 1852, and is the seat of a mission for both Burmans and Karens, of the Am. Baptist Union.

TRANQUEBAR: A settlement formed by the Danes, on the Coromandel coast, in 1616. It is 145 miles S. by W. from Madras. The town, and a small adjoining territory, were ceded to the Danish crown in 1621, on payment of an annual tribute of 2,000 crowns to the rajah of Tanjore. The Danish government have recently relinquished Tranquebar; and the British collector has removed there from Negapatam. This was the scene of the early Danish missions in India. The mission is now supported by the Lutheran Missionary Society at Dresden.

TRAVANCORE: The southern extremity of Hindostan, between 10° and 11° N. lat. It is about 140 miles in length, by 40, the average breadth. The population is not far from 1,000,000. The principal part of the population consists of Brahmins and Nairs; there are also many Mohammedans. The missions in Travancore are those of the London Society, the Church Society, and the Church of Scotland's mission to the Jews.

TREBIZOND: A station of the American Board, situated near the south-eastern extremity of the Black Sea, and supposed to be the precise spot where Xenophon, with his retreat ing army, first touched the sea. It has about 15,000 inhabitants, 1,250 of whom are Armenians. Its chief importance as a missionary station, arises from the fact of its being the principal sea-port of ancient Armenia, and its consequent influence over the proper country of the Armenian race.

TREVANDERAM: A station of the London Missionary Society, in the Travancore district, Southern India, near Cape Comorin.

TRICHONOPOLY: A large fortified town, capital of a district of the same name, situated on the Cavery, 186 miles south-west of Madras. Population, exclusive of troops, estimated at 74,000. Society for the Propagation of the Gospel.

TRICHOOR: A large town 50 miles north of Cochin, a station of the Church Missionary Society.

TRINCOMALEE: A town on the N. E. coast of Ceylon, 150 miles N. E. of Colombo, having one of the finest harbors in the world. A station of the Wesleyan Society.

TRINIDAD: (See West Indies.)

TSHICKSOO: A Karen village in the district of Tavoy, in Burmah, and an out-station of the Tavoy mission of the American Baptist Union.

TUBUAI: One of the Austral Islands, and a station of the London Missionary Society.

TULBAGH: Station of the London Missionary Society in South Africa, 75 miles north-east of Cape Town. Also of the Rhénish Society.

TURANGA: A station of the Church Missionary Society in New-Zealand, situated on Poverty Bay.

TURKEY: The dominion of the Grand Turk, or Sultan, extends over territory situated in Asia, Africa, and Europe, and lying between the 20th and 45th degrees of north latitude, the 10th and 47th of east longitude. The countries composing this empire are, for the most part, rich in natural resources, and have been the seats of mighty empires and republics, which at various times have exercised a controlling influence on the world's history. The entire territory covers a surface of about 210,000 square miles, including the tributary provinces of Moldavia, Wallachia, Servia, Egypt, Tripoli and Tunis.

Turkey in Europe, by nature formed to be the garden of the world, has become a wilderness, from the devastations of war and the oppressions of government. It is bounded on the east by the Black Sea, the Bosphorus, and the Sea of Marmora; on the south by the Dardanelles and Archipelago. The climate is, for the most part, temperate; the surface of the country is varied with mountains and well-watered plains. The unusually large extent of sea-coast, and the number of good harbors, afford every facility for commercial operations. The Danube carries steam navigation into the heart of the country. Constantinople, or Istamboul, including its suburbs, is situated upon both sides of the channel which separates Europe from Asia, numbers about 1,000,000 inhabitants, and commands the Euxine and the Levant. Turkey might long ago have shared the fate of Poland, had the powers of Europe dared to deliver Constantinople, the key city, into the hands of any one of their number. Moldavia, Wallachia, and Servia are tributary principalities, over which the Sultan has now but little power.

Turkey in Asia includes the countries between the Sea of Marmora, the Euxine, and Russian Asia, on the north, and Arabia on the south; between Russian Asia and Persia on the east, and the Mediterranean and Archipelago on the west. Within its boundaries lie the Holy City, the ancient seats of power, and fountain-heads of learning, and Turkistan, from whence came the savage tribe who have given their name to a great empire, and identified it with the faith of Mohammed. Many wealthy and thriving cities exist among the old ruins, supported by the Asiatic commerce which passes to Europe through these countries. Among these are Brûsa, Smyrna, Trebizond, Erzurûm, Bagdad, Tripoli, Damascus. Manufactures of steel and cloths are carried on prosperously in several towns.

Turkey in Africa consists of the tributary countries of Egypt, Tunis, and Tripoli. The universal prevalence of Mohammedanism in these countries tends to preserve the political union with Turkey, the stronghold of their faith.

Population.—By the table annexed, it will be seen that, in European Turkey the Mohammedans, although the dominant race, do not constitute a third part of the population. They hold the fortresses and important towns, but Greeks, Bulgarians, Armenians, &c., form the mass of the population. The European Turks preserve their original character of a military colony:

There are now, also, more than 2,000 in the Protestant community lately organized, and a great number, particularly among the Armenians, who have embraced Protestant sentiments. Protestantism is likely to have a rapid growth, and become an element of great power in the future of Turkey.

The Ecclesiastico Political Character of the Turkish Government, and its bearing upon the condition of the different Religious Classes of its Subjects.—The Turkish Government is, in spirit, a theocracy. Its legislation is derived from four sources; the word of God, i. e., the Koran; the Sunna, word of the prophet, the sentences of the four grand Imams, the fathers of Islamism; and the laws of the reigning sovereign, representative of the prophet. Mohammed aimed at being the founder of a new state, and the Koran was declared to be, as it now is, the civil and religious code of the Mussulmans. The Faithful are the proper subjects of the Sultan; his well-beloved children. Unbelievers are his enemies. Unable to carry out the principle of intolerance, the Sultan still recognizes the Mussulmans as his more immediate and privileged subjects. He tolerates and grants privileges to certain incorporated bodies of unbelievers, and recognizes his Christian subjects only as members of some one of the existing Christian communities, in which every individual must be enrolled. Each of these bodies, excepting the Protestants, has a Patriarch at its head, who becomes responsible to the Sultan for the whole. Every trade, moreover, is incorporated under the direction of a committee, who grant licenses to tradesmen, journeymen and apprentices, and are responsible to the head of their community. In the early years of the Armenian mission, this power, in the possession of the patriarch, enabled him to inflict intolerable persecutions upon the missionary converts. They could not withdraw from the community, without rebelling against the civil law of the country. They were finally excommunicated, were unable to obtain licenses to trade, had their property taken from them with no means of recovery, and were only preserved from starvation by the charity of foreign residents and Mussulmans.

On the 15th of November, 1847, after long-continued exertions on the part of Sir Stratford Canning, carried forward by Lord Cowley, his successor to the British Embassy, an imperial decree was issued, recognizing native Protestants, as constituting a separate and independent community in Turkey.

Reforms in the Turkish Body-politic.—For more than three centuries Turkey was the terror of her European neighbors. Her armies were as well disciplined and equipped as those of other nations, while their fanatic devotion to their religion, inseparably united as it was, with the civil power, and their intense hatred of unbelievers, rendered them almost irresistible. So long as the zeal and valor of individual combatants decided the day, the Turkish armies retained supremacy. But while civilization was advancing in the surrounding Christian nations, and martial tactics were studied and practised, there was no advance, but rather a retrogression, in Turkey. Toward the latter part of the seventeenth century the Turkish power was at its zenith; from that time, it began to decline. The Janissaries became alarmingly powerful, audacious and overbearing. While there was no progress made in the art of war, the Ottoman people gradually degenerated, and lost much of their original native valor.

Reform was commenced in 1789, by Sultan Selim. Prejudice and ignorance, on the part of his subjects, were obstacles almost insuperable to the introduction of measures which would tend to place Turkey on a level with her neighbors. An army was formed by Selim on the European plan, and various governmental reforms were introduced. These new measures were considered as sacrilegious by the body of Mussulman subjects, and a revolt of the Janissaries deposed Selim from his throne.

Mahmoud, successor of Selim, was disposed to continue the reforms commenced by that monarch, but was, for a long time, kept in check by the Janissaries. At length, on the 14th of June, 1826, they were carried off by a general massacre, and the Sultan was free to pursue his plans of reform. The red cap and trousers were substituted for the turban and loose robes. Women were allowed greater freedom. The Christians and Franks received new privileges and protection. The army was increased, the power of the Pashas limited, foreign officers, mechanics and engineers employed, and the navy renovated and enlarged. A medical college was also instituted, and quarantine laws introduced. These reforms were not appreciated nor understood by the people. They were contrary to the genius of Mohammedanism, encountered the stern opposition of the priesthood, and were carried forward with great difficulty. Their first effect was to weaken the power of the empire, and from a succession of untoward events, it seemed, at the death of Sultan Mahmoud, in 1839, to be on the verge of destruction. His son Abdül Medjid, ascending the throne at the early age of 17, however persevered in the same line of policy; and on the 3d November, of that year, the celebrated Hattı Scheriff was proclaimed in Gül Hané, a park within the limits of the Seraglio, to the assembled grandees of the empire, and in the presence of the ambassadors of foreign powers. In this extraordinary document the new sovereign, unsolicited by his people, but constrained by the necessity of circumstances, limited his own authority, guaranteed to every subject security of life and property, ordained an equal and fair system of taxation, ordered a regular method of drawing the conscription for the army and fixed the period of service; did away with the confiscation of the property of criminals and visiting punishment on innocent relatives; promised better administration of justice, and placed Mohammedans, Christians, Jews, and Pagans, on the same footing, as regarded civil rights and the law. Changes so great and opposed to Mohammedan feeling and usage, were, of course, but imperfectly executed, and the tanzimat or "new regulations," can be made a reality only by gradual steps of enforcement. The government, however, has entered upon the right path, and under the influences from abroad which must control it, is moving onward in it. The action taken in behalf of the Protestants, the guarantees given recently to the Western Powers, and the firmans addressed to the Christian and Jewish communities, are events of the happiest significance in reference to the cause of civilization, of religious freedom, and of true Christianity in Turkey.

TUTUILA: One of the Samoan Islands on which the London Missionary Society have two stations.

TUMBOO: A village beautifully situated near the sea, in Sierra Leone, West Africa, about 11 miles from Kent. Church Missionary Society.

UAWA: A station of the Church Missionary Society in New-Zealand, 36 miles north of Turanga.

UITENHAGE: A town and district in South Africa, occupied by the London Missionary Society, and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. The district is pastoral and agricultural, lying chiefly between the Chantoois and Bushman's rivers. In the neighborhood of the town, it is of extreme fertility, and has been known to yield from 80 to 90 returns of wheat. The town is regularly built, each house having behind it an allotment of garden ground; and the water from a spring in the vicinity has been laid along the principal street, furnishing an abundant supply for all. Fruit and vegetables are successfully cultivated, and sold in market at Port Elizabeth. The interior trade is carried on through Graham's Town.

ULAH: A Karen town in the district of Mergui, in Burmah, on the Tenasserim river, an out-station of the Tavoy mission of the Am. Baptist Union.

ULEMOEGA: A station of the London Missionary Society on the island of Upolu, one of the Samoan Group.

UMLAZI: A station of the American Board in South Africa, 12 miles south-west of Umlazi river, containing 100,000 Zulus.

UMPUKANI: A station of the Glasgow African Society, among the Grequas, Basutos, and Mantatees, South Africa.

UMSUNDUZI: A station of the American Board among the Zulus in South Africa, near Port Natal.

UMTWALUMI: A station of the American Board among the Zulus, near Port Natal, in South Africa.

UMVELO: A station of the London Missionary Society in South Africa, formerly called Botman's Kraal.

UMVOTI: A station of the American Board in South Africa, about 40 miles north of Port Natal, on the Umvoti river. It is a most delightful site for a mission, well-watered and wooded, with good arable and pasture grounds, so that several thousands of natives might live within a short distance of the missionary's residence.

UPOLU: One of the Samoan Islands, on which the London Missionary Society have seven stations.

USSA: Danish Akra, occupied by the German Missionary Society.

UTUMAORO: A station of the London Missionary Society on the east side of the island of Raiatea, situated on an open bay.

UVEA: One of the Friendly Islands, the most remote in the district of Habai, occupied by the Wesleyans. A Romish bishop, two priests, and an old friar have taken up their residence here, and done much mischief, by kindling up a religious war and setting the people to destroy one another.

UNITED STATES: I. Extent of Territory.—In 1819, the territory belonging to the United States included not less than 2,300,000 square miles. Since then, at different times, another million has been acquired by various treaties. The present area of our "real estate" is about 3,300,000 square miles, and there is the prospect of further annexations. Within a single generation, the star-spangled flag has moved southward, from the "still St. Mary's river," on the confines of Georgia, to the Sunken Floridian keys; and westward to the Rio Bravo, on the farthest Texian border; and beyond that, southward and westward still, to the Rio Gila and the Californian gold coast. The bannered eagle, which, till of late, fluttered only on the Atlantic breezes, has sped her flight across the "Father of Waters," and over the rugged sierras or saws of the Rocky Mountains, and now hovers in proud supremacy on the gales of the Pacific, and "the stretching out of his wings filleth the breadth of the land." Neither the empire of Rome nor even that of Alexander spread so far. The sun is more than two hours and a half in rising to the view of all our people, and bringing morning to the whole land. Before the denizens of San Francisco have eaten their breakfast, their fellow-citizens of Eastport are beginning to think of their dinners. From north to south, "as the wild goose flies," in passing from his summer retreats among the Canadian lakes, to his winter quarters on the Mexican Gulf, the poor bird must wing an aerial journey of 1500 miles ere he is safe from the guns of our sportsmen. An indented coast-line, meandering through more than 30,000 miles, affords numerous harbors for the purposes of commerce; and these still further favored by even a greater number of miles of inland communication by those natural canals, our noble navigable rivers. Nearly the whole of this vast area is within easy reach of water conveyance.

It was said by the cynical Randolph, that Washington is "a city of magnificent distances;" and, in this respect, our national capital is a fit type of the great country whose political interests centre there. The mind, which can traverse any space with the quickness of thought, is bewildered in wandering over this vast domain. And as for the body, there be few indeed, even in our huge "traveling community," with its restless ramblings, who have so much as set foot in each one of our States and organized Territories. Out of our country there could be carved 38 such kingdoms as Great Britain, and 16 such empires as France. The possession of land has ever been regarded as one of the grand elements of national greatness, wealth, and power.

II. Physical Resources.—Of these we can catch but a hasty glimpse. With a country, of which portions are buried for half the year in ice and snow, while other portions have never seen so much as a snow-flake;—a country where the rivers—those liquid roads of commerce, roll in paths of a thousand miles,—a country affording every variety of climate, yielding in teeming exuberance almost every useful vegetable product, and whose mines of the most valuable metals are beyond exhaustion,—a country stored with the endless treasures of the forest and the quarry,—a country endowed with such resources, and fast filling up with a people who know how to find and use them;—with such a country, and such resources, it is impossible we should not heap up riches, and rapidly rise to that eminence of moral and political power, which amplitude of material means secures. Take a few items from the census returns of 1850. The annual crop of only one of the cereals, Indian-corn, reached the inconceivable amount of 600,000,000 of bushels; the yield of wheat was 100,000,000 bushels; that of cotton, 1,000,000,000 of pounds. A very large proportion of the soil is of the richest kind; though this is of the less consequence, as, by the help of modern science, and agricultural chemistry, the poorest soils can be made permanently fertile. As to mineral wealth, we have already ascertained 218,000 square miles of coal-formation, equal to twenty-seven States like Massachusetts. Not less than 1,100 cubic miles of this fuel are deposited beneath the surface of our soil; and one of these cubic miles, at the present rate of consumption, would last 1,000 years; so that a million of years would not exhaust the stock. Of iron, so far as utility is concerned, the most precious of the metals, there are vast deposits everywhere in the Mississippi valley, along the central axis of the country. Some of them are prodigious. There is a mountain in Missouri 500 feet in height, and miles in circuit, almost wholly composed of iron. The abundance of it is even greater in the region of Lake Superior; and it is also richly, though less profusely, scattered over the Atlantic slope. The lead formations in the great central valley occupy 3,000 square miles, annually yielding more than 20,000 tons. The copper deposits in the wide regions of the north-west are still more extensive, affording thousands of tons every year, though the exploration is but just begun; and some of the Southern States are found to be still richer in this metal. To say nothing of silver, zinc, and other metals used in the economy of civilized life, gold is found all along the eastern slope from Texas to Canada, in many places profitably mined; while, on our Pacific slope, it is so lavishly diffused, that there is enough to reward the industry, and excite the greed, of generations to come.

III. Commerce.—The internal traffic is beyond all computation. Its statistics are too huge to be meddled with. The active transfer of property to and from all portions of the land, and the exchange of values in crude and manufactured articles, employ and reward an inconceivable amount of industry and capital. To say nothing of the traction on common roads, illimitable for extent and ramification, and of the freightage on our immense system of railways and canals, the tonnage of the steamboats occupied with our inland trade is more than 400,000 tons.

Our foreign trade is also conducted upon an enormous scale, employing above 4,000,000 of shipping in the transportation of above 400,000,000 in value of imports and exports. Our sails are courting every breeze that blows, and seeking every shore. Our sinuous coast affords abundance of bays and harbors for these floating bridges and ferries of the sea. The winds and the waves are wafting to us the commodities of the world. Our merchant-princes and maritime adventurers are continually extending the range and magnitude of their enterprizes.

IV. Population.—Since the revolution, when it was but little more than 3,000,000, it has swelled, at the last census, in 1850, to more than 23,000,000. At each decennial census, since 1790, it has been found that the increase has been at a rate so surprisingly uniform, that we can safely estimate its increase for future periods. By the year 1875, it will be close upon 50,000,000, and will far exceed 100,000,000 by the end of the nineteenth century. Even then, it will not be a densely peopled country, being capable of sustaining a far greater population than that. We have now, on the average, but seven inhabitants to each square mile of territory. In Great Britain, there are 223 to the square mile. If this country becomes only one half as populous, we shall have 350,000,000. As yet, but one-fourteenth part of our land is occupied at all. But the immigration from all parts of the world brings half a million every year to fill the vacant space; while, in the same time, even a larger number is born upon the soil. Thus, our widespread territory is rapidly rescued from the dominion of savage nature, and is replenished with a population intelligent and active, brave and free, full of the republican spirit, glowing with patriotic fire, and waxing bold as to their country's glorious destiny, and the part she is yet to act in propagating among the nations a nobler system of political and social life.

V. Public Works.—The old historic empires fell to pieces, like uncemented masses of masonry, by their weight. Their magnificent capitals, the seat of power and the heart of government, could not, with their mightiest throbbings, send out and draw back a quick and healthful circulation through their remoter members. But this fatal difficulty is quite remedied for us, by those modern means of inter-communication, whereby the pulsing life-blood of our grand confederation is carried in full vigor to the most distant bounds of our sovereignty. Cheap postage keeps up a constant ripple along the innumerable mail-routes, whose branching veins run, like a vascular network, over the whole body politic. The aggregate of mail-service under contract for the present year is more than 200,000 miles. 24,000 miles of telegraph-wires, like a vital nervous system, with its numerous ganglionic centres, carry instant sensibility to every chief limb and member; so that all parts of the nation are touched at once by the same sympathies, and excited by the same volitions. 15,000 miles of completed railroad, and as many more in the course of construction, like iron sinews of vast strength and wondrous flexibility, are linking joint with joint; and, compacting the whole by that which every joint supplieth, are giving to the huge body corporate a ready command over all its movements and resources. On land and water, the steam-power, with hot breath, inflates the lungs with vital energy, and breathes through all the nation an animating principle, which puts vigor into every muscle, and sharpens every sense. For all the practical purposes of locomotion, and intercourse and business interests, and political efficiency and military operation, this country, notwithstanding its recent prodigious annexations of territory, is not one-tenth as large as it was thirty years ago. Quick as her growth has been, still more rapid is the diffusion of her working power, and the concentration of her governing capacity.

VI. Geographical Position.—The oceans which for ages separated this continent, and hid its existence from the rest of the world, have now become broad and easy highways of intercourse with all nations. Nearly every pagan, papal, and Mohammedan land on the face of the earth may be reached by lines of communication almost direct, drawn from our eastern, western, or southern ports. Along these lines of marine travel immigration is pouring in its thousands and tens of thousands, while our people are passing out by the same lines, scattering themselves everywhere in prosecuting all the great material, intellectual, and religious interests of life. Our country presents one front to the civilization of Europe and the degradation of Africa, and another front to the barbaric wealth of Asia and the luxuriant isles of the southern seas, and offers to mediate among them all. On her north flank, she lifts a mighty arm of warning and menace against the aggressive despotism of Russia; and on her southern side, she is beginning to stretch out a hand of help towards the distracted governments and the sweeping solitudes of the other American continent. The four corners of the heavens seem to be bending towards her, to lift her to the highest sphere of moral and political influence over all the globe. Her very location on the map of the world seems to mark her out as "the glory of all lands," "an eternal excellency, a joy of many generations."

VII. Peculiar character of the people.—Prominent and offensive as its faults may sometimes be, we find in the very genius of the people strong elements of national power and influence in the world. It is said, that the most fertile soils are made by the commixture of earths obtained by the crumbling of different kinds of rock. And the different races of men sending hither their most resolute and venturous spirits, have blended the more active traits of their several nationalities in a new and highly energetic and practical type of the human kind. When the beloved Lafayette made his triumphal progress through this country in 1825, he was asked by the governor of Massachusetts, what nation of the old world we most resembled? The bystanders expected, that in one of his neatly turned compliments he would liken us to his own "beautiful France;" but the smiling veteran replied: "Sir, the American is an Englishman reinforced!" To the original Anglo-Saxon stock, with the old British hardihood and steadiness stimulated by freer scope for activity, there is an in-wrought re-inforcement of the more mobile and versatile spirits of other European races. Puritan, Covenant-er, Huguenot, Hollander, and many more, have mixed their firmness, their vivacity, their piety and other active ingredients in our national composition. Our people have a wondrous talent for self-government and social organization anywhere, and at the shortest notice. So completely is the government the offspring of the public sentiment and will, that if the matter were to be put to the vote to-morrow, not a thousand ballots among millions would be cast in favor of any essential change in the form of government. Such a government has no need of any standing army to maintain it at home, and we have never had one for that purpose. Where, on the face of the earth, is there a form of government so firmly and safely established as ours? It is wonderful to see the peaceful party revolutions, which, even after the most violent political agitations, are so calmly acquiesced in, at our great periodic elections. The power of the nation is transferred to new hands at the bidding of a majority of one vote, as quietly as at that of a million. In all the settled parts of the country, the authority of the law and the magistracy is acquiesced in by the native population, without a thought of resistance, and without a show of force. All the mobs and popular tumults which have occurred in the Atlantic States for the last half century, if taken together, would not equal for violence the famous "no-papery mob," headed by Lord George Gordon, at London, in 1780.

Our nation has proved itself able thus far, by the Divine blessing, to absorb and assimilate a vast amount of foreign immigration. It abounds in inventive talent, in the faculty of adaptation to circumstances, in practical efficiency, and in tireless industry. As such a people advance in wealth and industry, it must roll an enormous weight into the "balance of power," among the nations of the earth. The popular voice uttered from this continent, will, ere long, speak in tones of decision in the arbitrament of the great political questions which agitate the world. May it be a voice of truth and love, as well as power!

VIII. Education.—The statistics of this subject are so great as to crowd themselves out of the narrow space that could be afforded here. We have 160 colleges and theological seminaries, all but 14 of them Protestant; and with very few exceptions, and these not infidel, under decidedly evangelical auspices. They have 20,000 students under more than 1,000 professors. In at least 12 of the States, the public school system, which offers gratuitous instruction to every child, is established by law. In many of these States it is all but impossible to find an adult native of either sex who cannot read and write. This system of free schools is constantly rising in efficiency, in importance, and in public estimation. It is spreading into the States contiguous; and it can hardly be, in course of time, but it will be adopted in all. In the new States of the West there are reservations of the public lands set apart for this object, which will form a most munificent endowment. In the Sunday-schools sustained by different branches of the church, 3,000,000 of children and youth are taught "the first principles of the oracles of God." It is a most gratifying fact, that this immense array of means for the right training of "young America" is almost wholly administered by men of high moral feeling, and generally of strong religious principle. But even this mighty enginery for mental discipline will not suffice for the safety of our country, unless true religion shall keep pace with its progress, and guide it to right results.

IX. Religion.—The grand idea of full religious liberty is to leave religion entirely to itself, except so far as it may be necessary to protect it from violence. This idea was early introduced, and in time won complete ascendancy. It has now few enemies, unless it may be among the more bigoted part of the adherents to the Romish hierarchy. We have now rather more than 12 Protestants to every Papist, and this majority is ever increasing. The spirit of Popery is so contrary to the spirit of our people, and of their history and institutions, that Romanism would rapidly dry up but for the streams of immigration running over from so-called Catholic Europe. Their best-informed ecclesiastics represent that one-half of all the children born in this country, fall off from their communion. So, too, infidelity, which has never been very prevalent in this country, has been on the wane ever since the beginning of this century, among the in-born population; and like Popery, depends mostly for its continuance on foreign importation.

The supporting of religion on the voluntary system has worked well. Never, since the primitive age of the martyrs, has there been an experiment so successful and instructive.

Nothing trias the strength of this system more thoroughly than the building of churches to meet the growing wants of the people. And yet the careful estimates of Dr. Baird show that more than 3,000,000 of dollars are expended for this purpose alone in each year. The last census proves that there were then over 36,000 church edifices by actual enumeration; and also that in these there were almost 14,000,000 of sittings, sufficient, if these buildings were located as the population is, to accommodate nearly two-thirds of it, which is quite as much as could be in attendance at one time. The amount thus voluntarily invested in church-property was over $86,000,000 in 1850; and, by this time, can be little, if at all, short of $100,000,000. By careful estimates, it is found that during the last year above nine millions of dollars were expended in the current expenses of the churches, such as the sustentation of ministers, &c.; three millions more in the erection of new houses of worship; and two millions and a half in the various missionary and benevolent operations of all denominations; making in all a self-imposed tax of not far from fifteen millions of dollars for the support of the Gospel, and the spread of its institutions. So much for leaving the Gospel to its own vital resources, and to the blessing of Him, who gave it to make men liberal and free like Himself. These expenditures have not been in vain. God has made them, as we shall see, of great effect in promoting the spiritual welfare of the nation. Yet, the sum so expended the last year, great as it seems in the aggregate, is not burthensome by any means. It is but one dollar upon every four hundred of the valuation of improved lands, or one quarter of one per cent. It is but one dollar upon every sixty of the valuation of only the agricultural products of the country for the same year.

In the first fifty years of this century, the population of the United States increased a little less than fourfold and a half. During the same time, as appears by their several statistics, the number of members in the various churches called Evangelical, has increased nearly tenfold. That is to say, the church membership has increased more than twice as fast as the population. If these rates of increase shall continue the same for the next fifty years, the whole adult population of the United States must be included in these churches before the century is ended. Where is there in the world another field which can show such wonderful religious prosperity? "It is the Lord's doing; and it is marvelous in our eyes!"

X. Pauperism and Crime.—In the year ending June 1st, 1850, the whole number who received aid as paupers in the United States was 135,000. These were less than one in a hundred of the free population; and of these above 68,000, or more than half, were foreigners.

The native paupers were not two-fifths of one per cent. in the population. This indicates that there is an abundance of the means of subsistence here; and that this ought to take away from the inducement to commit crimes against property. The whole number of persons convicted of crime during the year above-mentioned, was about 27,000. This is a sad array; and such a host of culprits may seem to indicate a low standard of morality. But, happily for the reputation of our country, it is found that 14,000 of these malefactors are foreign-born; so that there are eight times as many criminals from our foreign, as from our native, population, in proportion to the number of each. Very many of the native criminals are the children of foreign-born parents, and ought to be classed with those who trained them. Our stock, both of paupers and criminals, would be admirably small, were it not for the constant supplies with which we are furnished by the nations of the old world.

Most of the European immigrants, (seven-eighths of them,) settle in the free States; and hence the larger proportion of poverty and crime to be found in those States. The immigrants are also prone to locate themselves in the large cities of the free North and West, whose alms-houses and jails are almost wholly filled by the imbecility and demoralization of the lower orders of European society. Thus, in one of the largest cities of New Jersey, it was found, last year, that all the inmates of the poor-house were Irish; and of a larger number who received out-door relief, all were foreigners but two. Of 4,000 charged with minor offences before the city police, only 80 were native Americans.

The prospects of our large cities would be gloomy indeed, were it not for the moral energy of the resident natives, and their promptness to aid in the execution of the laws. There is also at work among them a vast amount of organized benevolent effort, working with silent and unrecognized power, but with the noblest results, for the relief of the miserable, the instruction of the ignorant, the reclaiming of the profligate, and the prevention of crime. Numerous voluntary associations for these purposes, besides the various churches, are engaged in these objects with remarkable wisdom and zeal; and the ramifications of their influence reach all parts of the mass of suffering, ignorance, and vice.

The temperance reform, which began here some 25 or 30 years ago, has wrought its wonders; and, ere this, would have won what might be called a complete victory, but for the resistance it meets from the Irish and Germans among us. Already several of the States have adopted and rigorously enforced a system of prohibitory legislation, aiming at the entire suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors as a beverage. Other States are on the point of adopting the same protective policy against this prolific source of penury and crime.

Among the means by which it has pleased God mainly to sustain the spiritual life and moral health of this great and growing nation, the highest place must be assigned to what are called "revivals of religion." The numerical statistics of these can only be tabled by recording angels, and fully published at the judgment day. But the men among us best qualified to judge of their power, extent, and fruits, do not hesitate to speak of them as the salvation of America.—REV. A. W. McCLORE.

UNITED BRETHREN'S MISSIONS: Early in the history of the Moravian Brethren they were baptized with the missionary spirit. Count Zinzendorf, having resigned his civil dignities and become a minister of the Brethren's Church, devoted himself, with his whole estate, to the diffusion of the Gospel, in connection with that church. Having been, through false accusations, banished from Saxony, on receiving the elector's order to quit the kingdom, he made the following characteristic remark, which contains the germe of the future missionary history of the Moravian Church: "Now we must collect a Congregation of Pilgrims, and train laborers to GO FORTH INTO ALL THE WORLD, AND PREACH CHRIST AND HIS SALVATION." "Viewing the Brethren's Church as a society revived by the Lord, for the special purpose of diffusing the Gospel throughout the world, Zinzendorf considered himself solemnly pledged to see to it, that this, its destination, should be carefully attended to, and, as far as possible, faithfully executed. When banished from Saxony, he saw no other way for obtaining the proposed end, than by having, besides his own family, those persons constantly about him who were under preparation for service in the church. These were occasionally joined by missionaries who had returned from pagan countries, and by Brethren, who had come back from their deputations to different parts of Christendom, and who mostly remained with the Count, till they resumed their former employment, or received new appointments. These persons constituted the Congregation of Pilgrims, which, strictly speaking, was never stationary; for, whenever the Count changed his place of residence, the greater part of the company followed him. Special attention was paid to the design of their Institution; and for this purpose, days and even weeks were sometimes occupied in conferences, for deliberating on subjects bearing on the enlargement of Christ's kingdom."

When the refugees on Count Zinzendorf's estates, scarcely amounting to 600 persons—where they had themselves just found rest from suffering, and were beginning to build a church and habitations, where there had previously been a wilderness,—the missionary spirit was sent down upon them with such constraining influence, that within the short period of ten years, they had sent missionaries to St. Thomas and St. Croix in the West Indies, to Greenland, to the Indians in North and South America, to Lapland, to Tartary, to Algiers, to Western Africa, to the Cape of Good Hope, and to Ceylon; as they did subsequently to others of the West India Islands, to Persia, to Egypt, to Labrador, and to India. In several of these countries, their attempts to Christianize and civilize have proved unsuccessful. In some instances the missionaries sent out never reached the places of their destination; and in others, the political state of the country, to which they went, rendered their immediate return an imperious duty; and in several cases, they were compelled to relinquish their benevolent designs, after years of patient perseverance and heroic fortitude, spent in fruitless endeavors to impress the wretched natives with the importance of the Gospel. Going forth as hardy pioneers, who penetrate the thickest forest, unrestrained by dangers and privations, their earlier missionaries submitted to the most painful sacrifices in order to communicate the blessings of the Gospel to the heathen.

The missions of the United Brethren in foreign countries had their origin in a Providential circumstance, which directed the attention of the Brethren to the condition of slaves in the West Indies. Count Zinzendorf being in Copenhagen in 1731, some of his domestics became acquainted with a black man named Anthony, who told them of the sufferings of the slaves on the island of St. Thomas, and of their earnest desire to be instructed in the way of salvation. The Count was deeply affected by the statements of Anthony, and on his return to Herrnhut mentioned them to his congregation. The zeal of the Brethren was awakened for the conversion of the heathen, and they determined, at whatever cost, to send a mission to the slaves, in whose condition they had become so deeply interested; and in the following year two brethren sailed for the Danish Islands. And such was their devotion to the work that, having heard that they could not otherwise have access to the slaves, they went with the determination of submitting to be themselves enslaved, that they might have the opportunity of teaching the poor captive Africans the way of deliverance from the bondage of sin and Satan. Although this sacrifice was not required of them, they still maintained themselves by manual labor, under a tropical sun, employing every opportunity for conversing with the heathen. A similar zeal characterized the first missionaries to Greenland, in 1733. While at Copenhagen, Count Pless, who was much interested for them, asked them how they intended to procure a livelihood in Greenland? Unacquainted with the situation and climate of the country, the missionaries replied, "By the labor of our hands, and God's blessing;" adding, that they would build a house, and cultivate a piece of land, not wishing to be burdensome to any one. Being told, there was no wood fit for building in that desolate region, they said: "In that case we will dig a hole in the earth, and lodge there." So successful has this mission been, that nearly the whole of the Greenland population in the neighborhood of the settlements has been converted to Christianity.

The following short notice of the Doctrine and Constitution of the Moravian Brethren's Church, as far as they affect the missions, may not be misplaced here. It is the constant aim of their missionaries to make known "Christ and Him crucified." Their motto is: "To humble the sinner, to exalt the Saviour, and to promote holiness."

The internal regulations are the same in every mission. Such heathen as from the hearing of the Gospel, or the private conversations of the missionaries, are led to serious reflections, and desire their names to be put down, for further instruction, are called new people, and reckoned to the class of catechumens. If they remain steadfast in their resolutions to forsake heathenism, and desire baptism, they are considered as candidates for that ordinance; and after previous instruction, are baptized. If their conduct proves consistent with their professions, they at length become candidates for the communion, and finally communicants. When the number of converts is very large, assistants are chosen, who have particular districts assigned them, in which they visit the people, attend to the poor, the sick and infirm, and are occasionally employed to hold meetings, and to preach at the outposts.

The external regulations vary in the different missions. Among free heathen, as in Greenland, North America, South Africa, &c., most of the converts live together in regular settlements, and thus enjoy the advantages of various regulations for promoting their progress in spiritual knowledge, and in civilization, which regulations are impracticable in missions among slaves.

Church discipline is exercised without respect of persons; and consists according to the nature of the offence, either in exclusion from the meetings of the baptized, or in suspension from the Lord's Supper, or in total separation from the church.

The general superintendence of the missions is vested in the synods of the church. But, as these are convened only occasionally, the elders' conference has the oversight of the mission. The missionary service is in the strictest sense, voluntary. Any person desirous of engaging in it, makes known his wishes to the directors; and if, after being informed of the difficulties and dangers attending the life of a missionary, his resolution remains fixed, he is considered a candidate for the service. Should he eventually feel any reluctance, he is at full liberty either to accept or decline any proposal or call, which may be offered him.

The Brethren's Church has no permanent fund for the missions. They are maintained by voluntary contributions collected mostly at stated times in their congregations; and also by the many female, young men's, and juvenile missionary societies in the church. Not able, however, to raise one half of the sum annually required, friends, and societies in other Christian communities have hitherto been most liberal in their donations.

The Moravians now have 17 settlements and congregations on the continent of Europe, with 46 home mission stations. The aggregate number of persons in these congregations is 5,900. They have institutions of learning in Nisky, Gnadenberg, Gnadenfrey, Neusalz, Neuwied, Koenigsfeld, and Zeyst. There is also a high-school at Nisky, and a college for training candidates for the ministry at Gnadenfeld. In Great Britain and Ireland, they have 34 settlements and congregations, with six home mission stations in Ireland, and a membership of 5,000. They have institutions for the education of youth at Fulneck, Gomesal, Mirfield, Ockbrook, Bedford, Tytherton and Gratehill. In the United States, they have 28 settlements and congregations, with home mission stations in Philadelphia, Green Bay, Sturgeon Bay, among the Norwegians, New York, Olney, and Richland. Their institutions of learning in the United States are at Nazareth, Bethlehem, Litiz, and Salem.

They now have missions in Greenland, Labrador, Danish West India Islands, Jamaica, Antigua, St. Kitts, Barbadoes, Tobago, Surinam, South Africa, Australia, and the North American Indians.

Missions have been undertaken by the Brethren, at various periods, and abandoned as unsuccessful, in Lapland, in Siberia, among the Jews in Amsterdam, among the gypsies; in Guinea, in Egypt, in Tranquebar, in Ceylon, in Persia, in the West India, and in South America.

The following table exhibits the present state of their missions:

The whole number of missionaries employed by the United Brethren, from the commencement of their operations, is 1947,—1150 males and 797 females. 643 of these have died in the mission service: 9 of whom have deceased on journeys made during service, 11 on the journey out, and 2 on the way home; 22 met with an untimely end, mostly by shipwreck; one was murdered by the Esquimaux in Labrador, and one by the Indians near Gnadenhütten, and 10 were shot or burned to death on the Mahoney, in North America.

That so small a body of Christians should have accomplished so much missionary labor, is truly wonderful. Yet, the fact does but show what might be done by the whole Protestant Church, were they to enter upon the work of evangelizing the world, with the same singleness of purpose and spirit of consecration which have, from the beginning, distinguished this little band of brethren.

We have no means of ascertaining the aggregate receipts of the United Brethren's Missions from their commencement. We give the income of several years, which will enable the reader to judge of the average receipts:

1848.....	£12,442	} Average for four years, £12,640.
1849.....	11,043
1850.....	14,026
1852.....	13,061

The London Association in aid of the Missions of the United Brethren, which has existed for thirty-six years, contributes to their funds between £4,000 and £5,000 annually, which is included in the amounts above stated. Considering the extent of the Brethren's operations, it seems unaccountable that they should be able to maintain them with so small an expenditure. They have, however, been conducted, so far as practicable, on the self-sustaining principle. Their missions are "settlements," containing farmers and artizans, who live on lands belonging to the mission, and, by their labor, contribute to its support. With so small a body, possessing such slender means, this plan appears to have been a matter of necessity, like that of Paul's laboring with his hands while preaching to the heathen. But, with the wealth now in the possession of the Protestant churches, it must be the height of injustice to send a man to preach the Gospel to the heathen "at his own charges;" as it is, also, the poorest economy to employ men capable of doing missionary work, in laboring for their own bread.—Holmes's History of the Missions of the United Brethren; Moravian Missionary Atlas.

VALVERTY (ODOOPITTY): A station of the American Board in Ceylon.

VAN DIEMAN'S LAND: See Tasmania.

VARANY: A station of the American Board in the Jaffna district, Ceylon, a little east of Oodooville.

VARTABED: A religious teacher, or doctor of divinity, among the Armenians. This degree is conferred with the solemnities of ordination, and those who receive it are appealed to in all religious debates. They preach in the churches, reconcile differences, and exert themselves to maintain the Armenian creed. They are supported by the voluntary contributions of their hearers, and of those who apply to them for the decision of any religious question.

VEDAS: The sacred books of the Hindoos, believed to be revealed by God, and called immortal. They are considered as the fountain of all knowledge, human and divine. They are four in number, the principal part being that which explains the duties of man in methodical arrangement. The fourth book contains a system of divine ordinances.—Asiatic Researches.

VEWA: A small island, about 3 miles in circumference, in the Feejee group, having every variety of hill and dale in miniature. It is nearly covered with bread-fruit trees and eve, a kind of chestnut, the flowers of which have an odor like the violet, that fills the whole island with its fragrance. Population, 150. VICTORIA: The chief city of Hong-Kong, China, situated in lat. 22° 16' N., and long. 114° 8' E. (See China.)

VIZAGAPATAM: A station of the London Missionary Society, situated on the eastern coast of Hindostan, in the Northern Circars, about 500 miles south-west of Calcutta, and north-east of Madras about the same distance.

WADAGAUM: A town in Hindostan, 30 miles south of Ahmednuggur,—became a station of the American Board in 1845.

WADEVILLE: A Karen village, near Tavoy, in Burmah, named for Rev. Dr. Wade, the missionary. It is an out-station of the Tavoy Mission of the American Baptist Union.

WAGENMAKER VALLEY: See Wellington.

WAIALUA: A station of the American Board in the Sandwich Islands, on Oahu.

WAIANAE: A station of the American Board in the Sandwich Islands, on Oahu.

WAIMEA: One of the three first stations of the American Board at the Sandwich Islands, situated on the north-west coast of Kauai. Also, an interior station on the island of Hawaii.

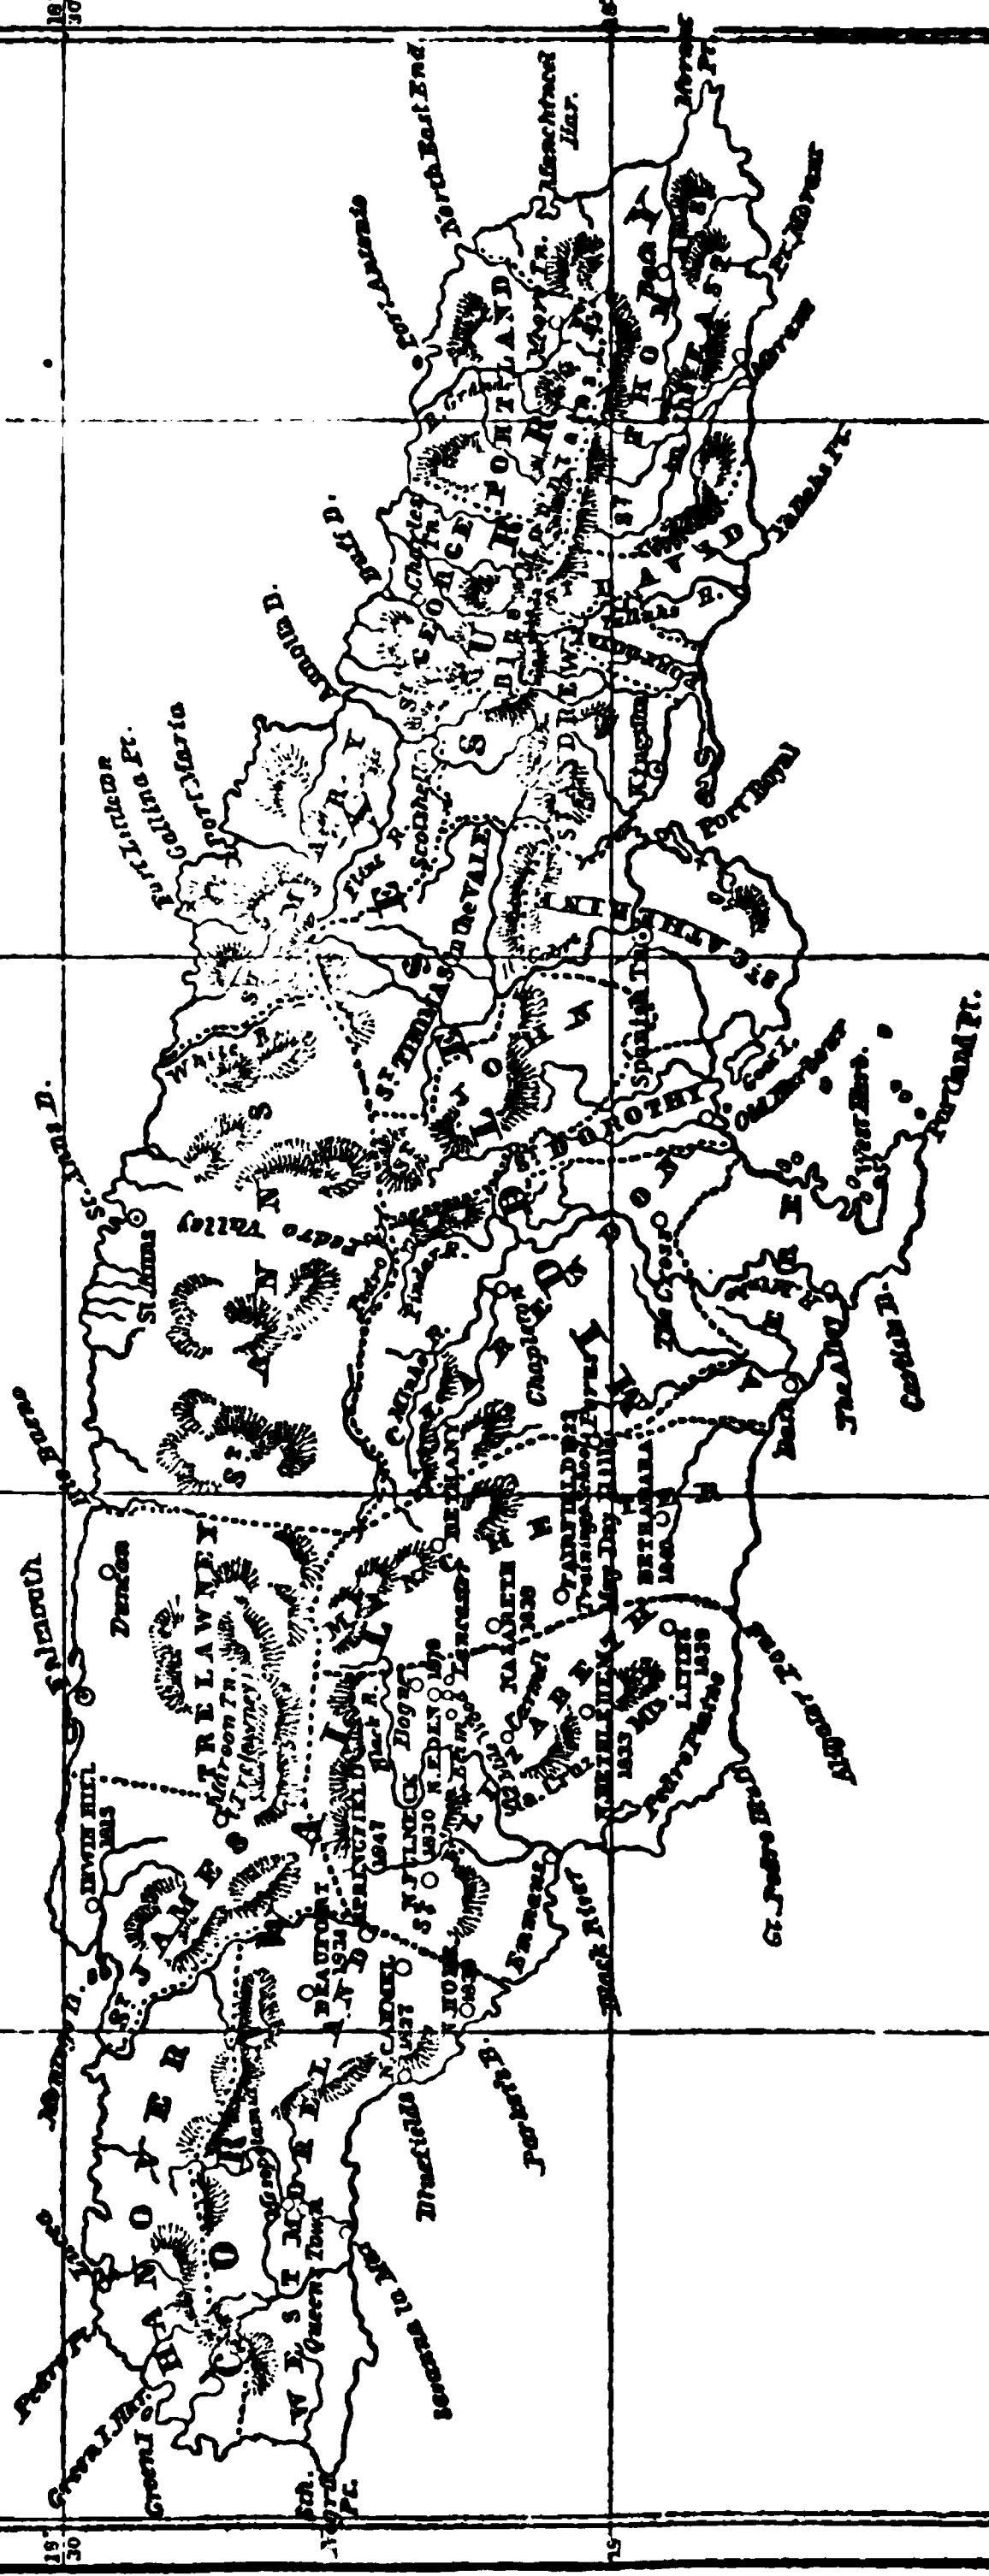

WAIKANAE: A station of the Church Missionary Society in New-Zealand.

WAIOLI: A station of the American Board, in the Sandwich Islands, on the island of Kauai.

WAIROA: A station of the Church Missionary Society in New-Zealand, situated on the shore of Hawke Bay. It is a very pretty station, with a beautiful river winding through an extensive plain, and communicating with a chain of inland lakes.

WELSH CALVINISTIC METHODIST FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY:—The Welsh Calvinistic Methodists arose during the revival of religion in England under Wesley and Whitefield; chiefly from the devoted labors of Howell Harris, Esq., of Trevecca, in Brecknockshire. Having obtained peace with God himself, he began a course of missionary labor in his native Wales, then sunk down in formalism and impiety. He visited from house to house, and preached in the open air to thousands, who were drawn by the novelty of the scene and the burning zeal of the preacher. God owned his word, and great numbers began to be aroused to seek after God; and, when they had obtained, "like precious faith" in Christ Jesus, they joined their efforts to those of their beloved teacher, and thus the work spread like fire among the dry stubble. In a few years, Mr. Harris had established 300 societies or churches in South Wales. Several clergymen of the Episcopal Church joined themselves to him, and the great work operated like the Reformation in Scotland, or Wesleyanism in England. Mr. Harris and his associates itinerated through the country, so that in 1742 he had 10 clergymen, and nearly 50 lay preachers helping him. In the mean time, North Wales began to be aroused in a similar manner. The Rev. Thomas Charles of Bala, afterwards one of the founders of the British and Foreign Bible Society, was, towards the close of this century, a prominent instrument in this great work of God. In 1811, the societies formed themselves into an independent connection with a polity similar to the English Wesleyans, but differing from them, as their name imports, in some doctrinal views. In 1853 they had 207 ministers, 234 local preachers, and 58,577 members.

Previous to 1840, the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, operated through the London Missionary Society; but, in May of that year, an association was formed among them for sending missionaries to the heathen, and in November following, a mission was commenced in the north-east part of Bengal among the Kassias, a hill tribe. Besides this mission, they have a mission station in Brittany, south of France—the language of that country being a sister dialect of the Welsh. The Bretons themselves are a branch of the Welsh nation. The Calvinistic Methodists have also a mission to the Jews, which is now served by the Rev. John Mills. The General Secretary of this society is the Rev. J. Roberts, 12 Hiskisson-st., Liverpool, England.—Prize Essay Jethro; Census of WEST INDIES AND GUIANA: We have connected Guiana with the West Indies because they are thus connected in missionary operations. The following table, which exhibits a list of the West India Islands, with the date of settlement, population, &c., is taken, with some modification, from the "Missionary Guide Book," published in London in 1846. The author of that work gives as his authority as to the population of the British Islands, "Murray's Encyclopedia of Geography."

The Bermudas.—These are a numerous cluster of small islands, in the Atlantic Ocean, extending about 45 miles from south-west to north-east, and having their northern point in long. 63° 28' W., and lat. 32° 34' N. St. George's, the principal island, is about sixteen miles long, and three in breadth. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in shipping and trade.

Bahamas.—The Bahama Islands are the most western of the West Indies, extending along the coast of Florida towards Cuba. They are 400 in number, most of them mere rocks. About 14 of them are large; Bahama, the principal one, being 63 by 9 miles. They enjoy a mild, equable, and delightful climate. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in fishing and wrecking.

Jamaica is oval-shaped, 160 miles long by 45 broad. Its scenery is magnificent and delightful. It is reckoned as one of the most romantic and highly diversified countries in the world. The Blue Mountains, an elevated ridge, towering in some places nearly 8,000 feet above the sea, run through the island from east to west.

Hayti is a very fine island, lying between Jamaica and Porto Rico, 450 miles long by 110 in width. In the centre rises the lofty range of the Cibao mountains, the highest peak of which is 9,000 feet. These mountains are covered with vegetation nearly to their summits, from which descend numerous streams, that unite in four rivers, which render the plains below exceedingly fertile. This island was settled about the middle of the 16th century by a daring band of French buccaneers. The French revolution, in 1791, which proclaimed universal equality, produced a contest between the white and free colored population; and while they were contending, the slaves rose and drove out or massacred both classes, and became possessors of the French part of the island. Since that time, the island has been the scene of successive revolutions; and at the present time, the French part is governed by a black emperor, and the Spanish part is an independent republic.

St. Thomas lies in lat. $18^{\circ} 22'$ N. and long. $64^{\circ} 50'$ W., and is 18 miles in circumference, having considerable trade.

St. Eustatius consists almost entirely of the sloping sides of one high conical hill, terminating in a rocky summit, but it is productive, and cultivated with care.

St. Kitts or St. Christopher's is peculiarly rugged and mountainous, but the plain along the sea shore surpasses in richness and beauty the other islands.

Nevis is a small but beautiful and fertile island, consisting of one conical mountain, about 20 miles in circumference.

Antigua is about 21 miles in length, nearly the same in breadth, and 50 in circumference. John's Town, the capital, is admired for the agreeableness of its situation and the regularity of its buildings, and is a favorite place of resort.

Montserrat is about 9 miles in length, and as many in breadth; about twenty miles south-west of Antigua; a beautiful and pleasant island.

Barbadoes is about 22 miles in length, by 14 in breadth; its rich plantations being diversified with gentle hills, which present a delightful landscape.

St. Vincent's is a very beautiful island, about 24 miles long and 18 broad, and contains the only active volcano on these islands. It is said to contain small remnants of the aboriginal race, mingled with the negroes.

Grenada is about 20 miles in length by 10 at its greatest breadth. It is mountainous, abounding with streams and rivulets.

Tobago is a small but fertile and beautiful island. The heat of its southerly situation is tempered by breezes from the surrounding ocean, while, at the same time, it appears to be out of the track of those hurricanes which have desolated so many of the other islands.

Trinidad is separated from the coast of South America by a strait. It is a fertile island, in extent next to Jamaica.

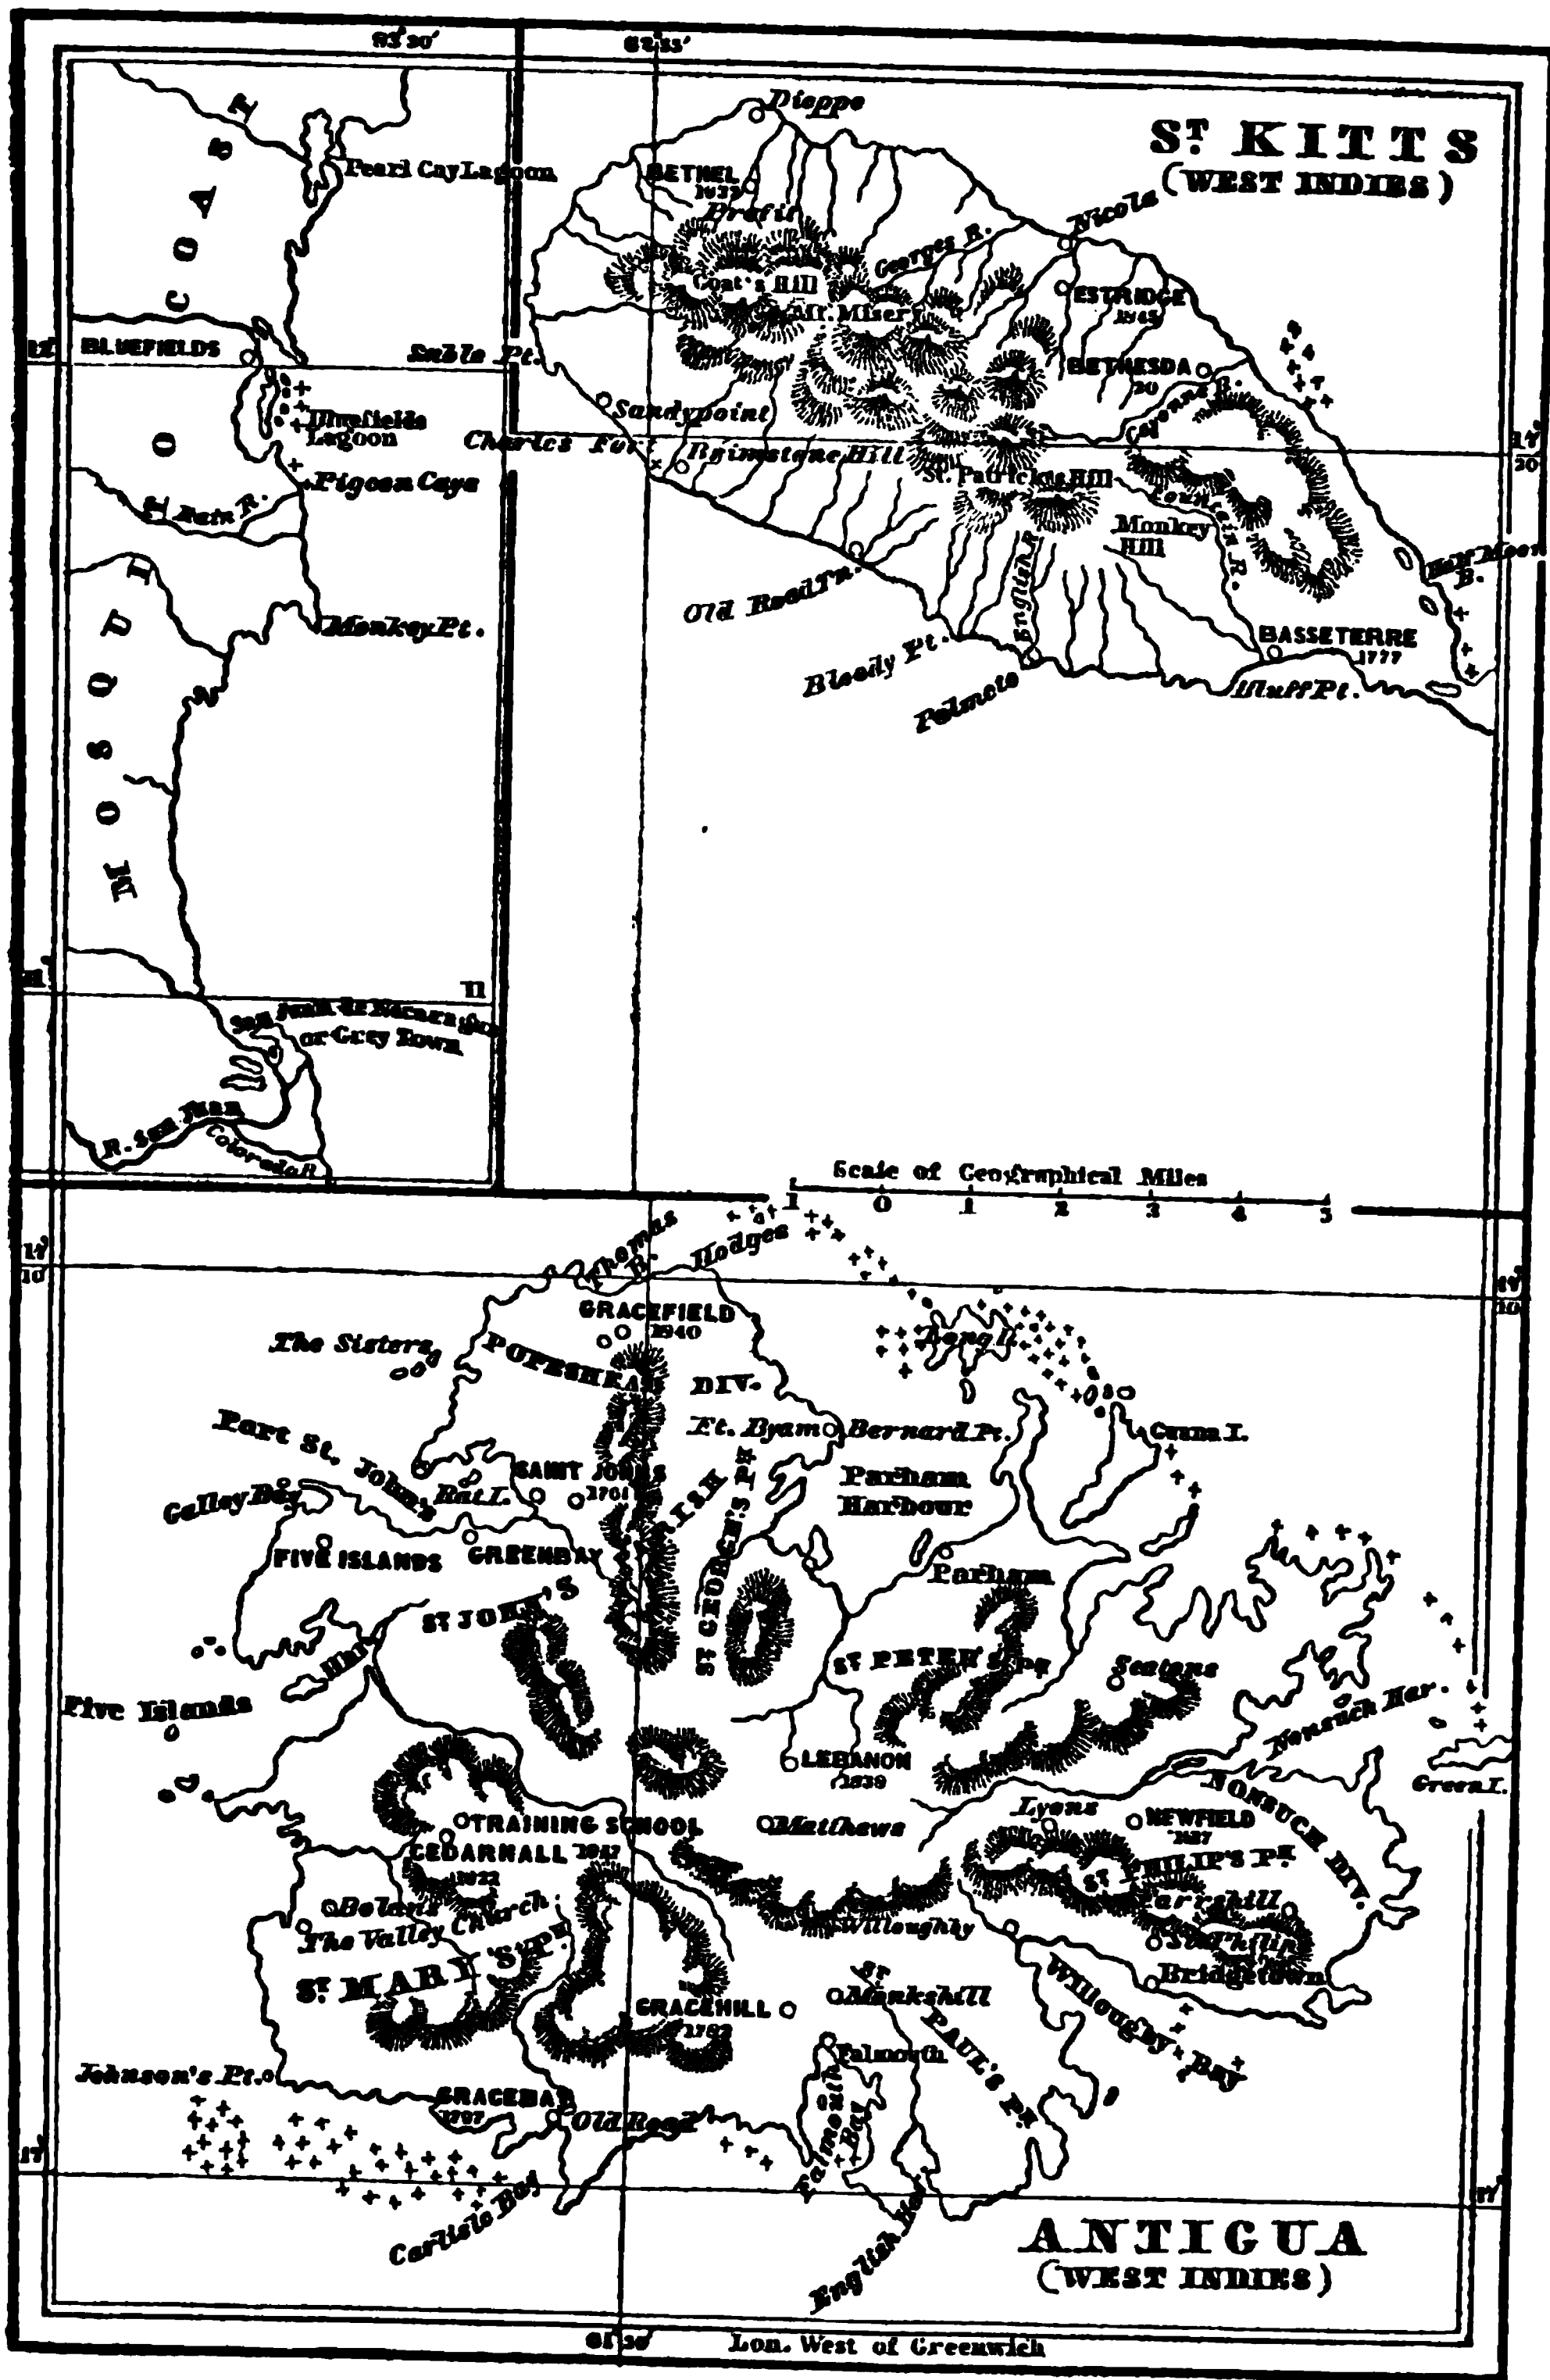

British Guiana lies on the coast of South America, and includes Essequibo, Demerara, and Berbice, or all the maritime tract between the river Coventen, the western limit of Surinam and the frontier of Spanish Guiana, at Cape Nassau.

Surinam, on the coast of Guiana, constitutes the most important of the Dutch western possessions. They have, of late, made very considerable efforts for improvement, and it is rising in importance.

Inhabitants.—When Columbus first discovered the New World, he found the whole continent and every island thickly peopled by different classes of Indians. But within a few years after the discovery of the West India Islands, these native races had, for the greater part, perished. Millions of them had been swept from the earth or sent to work in the mines of South America, where they sunk into a premature grave, the victims of avarice and cruelty. When the Spaniards found how rapidly the aboriginal population perished under the system of forced labor which they had introduced, they resorted to the expedient of importing negro slaves from Africa, and their example was soon followed by the Portuguese, Dutch, French, and English. At the present time, the population of Guiana and the West Indies consists of three descriptions of people: whites, mixed races, and negroes. The whites, or Europeans, chiefly British, consist partly of proprietors, superintending the cultivation of their own lands, and partly of agents and overseers. The negroes have always formed by far the largest portion of the population. Since the 1st of August, 1834, they have enjoyed a state of freedom in the British portion of the West Indies. As the negroes are of African origin, we must refer to Africa for a description of their native character and habits.

MISSIONS.

WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—Antigua.—Nathaniel Gilbert, Esq., the speaker of the House of Assembly in Antigua, coming to England for the recovery of his health, was led to attend the ministry of Mr. Wesley, which he found to be the power of God to the salvation of his soul. Happy in the enjoyment of the Divine favor, and full of holy zeal, he returned to Antigua in the year 1760, where he began to teach Christianity to the African slaves, many of whom, by the blessing of God upon his labors, were made the Lord's free men. Nearly 200 persons were united in fellowship under his superintendence. While thus usefully and honorably employed, (though encountering bitter hostility,) he was removed by death, and the flock he had gathered were left "as sheep without a shepherd," yet they were not finally forsaken. John Baxter, of the royal dock yard at Chatham, who had been connected with the Methodist society about 12 years, and had also for some time been a class-leader and a local preacher, was sent out by the government as a shipwright. He collected the remains of the society, and writing to Mr. Wesley under date of April 2d, 1778, he says: "The work that God began by Mr. Gilbert is still remaining. The black people have been kept together by two black women, who have continued praying and meeting with them. I preached to about 30 on Saturday night and Sunday morning, and in the afternoon to about 400 or 500. The old members desire that I would inform you, that you have many children in Antigua, whom you never saw."

For about eight years he continued his labors, working in the dockyard for his support. About 2,000 were united together in religious society; when he was at length relieved by the arrival of missionaries. In 1786, Dr. Coke, having embarked for Nova Scotia with three missionaries, two of whom were destined for North America, and one for the West Indies; after being tossed about for a long time by the winds and waves, and nearly suffering shipwreck, they were obliged to put in to the West Indies, and were carried directly to Antigua. Landing on Christmas day, they met Mr. Baxter, as he was going to conduct public worship. They embraced each other with a joyous surprise; and the Doctor that day occupied Mr. Baxter's pulpit, and administered the Lord's Supper to the people. He remained about six weeks in the West Indies, and while there had an offer of a salary of £500 to remain in Antigua; but he was too intent upon the spread of Christ's religion in the world, to confine his labors to one place. He visited several of the islands, and having fixed Mr. Warrenner at Antigua, Mr. Clarke at St. Vincent's, and Mr. Hammet at St. Christopher's, he sailed for the American continent. From this time the Wesleyan mission in the West Indies was carried on with increasing success.

The mission in Antigua appears to have enjoyed for many years an almost uninterrupted prosperity. Such was the importance attached to it by the authorities of the island, that in the year 1795, when they dreaded an attack from the French, the missionary was requested to organize a military corps from the members of his society to assist in defending the island. This request was promptly responded to by both the missionary and his people: but happily the French never came. In 1826, this mission met with a most melancholy loss, all the missionaries, with part of their families, 13 in all, having perished at sea. This sad event occurred as the mission party were returning from a district meeting, which was held in St. Christopher's. They encountered a storm, and as they were approaching Antigua, their vessel was thrown upon the breakers and broken, and they were precipitated into the sea. Some of the party were left clinging to the wreck for two days and nights, but none but Mrs. Jones was saved.

In 1839, Rev. Mr. Codman wrote from Antigua: "The number of members in our societies is now some thousands more than when I came, (1826) and the scholars have more than doubled. Nor must the great number who have died in the Lord be forgotten. I should think, that five or six thousand have left the church militant for the church triumphant. The work is prospering in several islands, especially Antigua. In the island of St. Kitt's the attendance at all our chapels is increased, and some of them have been enlarged, and new ones built."

In the year 1843, a violent earthquake visited the island of Antigua, by which, with scarcely an exception, every edifice constructed of stone was left a heap of ruins. Out of nine Wesleyan meeting houses, only one escaped without serious damage. This sad event, however, did not essentially retard the prosperity of the mission. It has still gone on increasing in numbers and influence. In 1853, the number of church members in connection with the Methodist mission on this island, amounted to 2,472.—See Rep. Meth. Miss. Soc. 1853, p. 106.

St. Vincent's District.—In January, 1787, Dr. Coke and three of the Brethren visited St. Vincent's; and Rev. Mr. Clarke remained, encouraged by the promise of several planters, that their houses should always be open to receive him, and their negroes ever ready to receive his instructions. His congregations were large, and his exertions appeared to be crowned with considerable success, yet he was not without opposition. But for several years it was confined to some lawless individuals who on one occasion broke into the chapel, defaced the benches, and stole the Bible and hung it on the public gallows. And at length, the arm of authority was itself turned against the mission. In December, 1792, the Assembly, with the view of rooting out the Methodists from the island, passed a law, that no person except the rectors of the parishes should preach without a license; and that no individual should receive a license until he had resided at least twelve months on the island—a clause admirably calculated to banish the Methodists from among them, as their preachers would never consent to lie idle a whole year, in order to have liberty of petitioning at the end of that period for a license, which after all, would probably be refused. For the first offence, the culprit was to be punished by a fine of £18, or by imprisonment; for the second, by such corporeal punishment as the court should think proper; and by banishment from the island; and to crown the whole, if he returned from banishment, he incurred the penalty of DEATH! In justice to the people in general it may be well to say that the majority were hostile to the law. But, the next Sabbath after the passage of the law, Mr. Lamb, the missionary, preached as usual. He was apprehended, and on refusing to pay the fine, was thrown into prison. When the period of his imprisonment had expired he was released, but it was a release only to silence or voluntary banishment. He preferred the latter, and retired from St. Vincent's. The law, however, was in force only for a short time, being disallowed by the king, as contrary to the principles of toleration, which were now an established part of the British Constitution. In 1794, Messrs. Thomas Owens and James Alexander were sent to renew the mission. Before this, the members of the Methodist Society amounted to about 1,000; but soon after its passage, they were reduced nearly one half. Many now returned from their wanderings, and the congregations began to increase; but the spirit of hostility was rather smothered than subdued. In March, 1797, a mob, headed by a magistrate, attacked the Methodist chapel, threw down the railings, broke the lamps, pulled down the communion rails, and tore the Bible in pieces and scattered them on the ground. About a year after an attempt was made upon the lives of the missionaries. Their house was broken open at the dead of night, and some ruffians armed with cutlasses, entered the sleeping apartments, turned up the bed and searched for them in every corner. Happily the missionaries, anticipating the attack, had taken refuge for the night at the dwelling of a friend.

In the year 1841, a young man, who was brought to a knowledge of the truth through this mission, hearing of the sad mortality attending the agents of the Methodist Missionary Society in South Africa, offered himself as a missionary to that land, where he is now actively laboring.

Trinidad and Demerara.—During the past few years thousands of immigrants have been introduced into Trinidad and Demerara, from Africa and Hindostan, for whose religious instruction the Wesleyan Missionary Society has endeavored to make provision. This emigration has had an unfavorable effect on the mission, and preceded as it was, by a reduction of wages, it led several of the church members to leave, while the newly arrived immigrants from Africa, with few exceptions, only tended to demoralize the people by their heathenish practices. It is very much questioned too, whether the church members from Sierra Leone were much improved in their temporal circumstances, by emigrating to Trinidad; but it is certain, that there is no comparison between the two countries as to religious advantages. In Trinidad the greater number of Wesleyan emigrants from Sierra Leone were placed beyond the reach of their own missionaries, or any other Protestant ministers; and were thus exposed to the temptations of joining in the barbarous practices of their heathen countrymen, or of being led astray by the delusions of Popery.

A review of missionary operations in Demerara, during the past thirty years, gives rise to the most grateful recollections. The missionary during the first year of labor in that colony, was often denounced as "an execrable wretch who ought to be put out of the world," and himself and his people frequently suffered persecution. At a public meeting, held only 20 years since, all the leading persons in the colony unanimously resolved, that the Court of Policy be forthwith petitioned to expel all the missionaries from the colony, and a law be passed prohibiting the admission of missionary preachers into the colony for the future. But in 1845, the principles and designs of the missionaries had been so well ascertained and so highly appreciated, that all the leading persons in the colony, including the Governor, have cordially and liberally subscribed towards the erection of a new Wesleyan chapel.

About the year 1850, various causes exerted an adverse influence on the missions in Demerara. Emigration from India, Africa, and Madeira, introduced classes of persons sunk in gross superstition and wickedness. British Guiana witnessed during this year the erection of the swinging-pole; and human beings have been suspended from it, to the wild admiration of the wretchedly deluded Hindoo, and to the agonized mortification of the Christian. Many thousands of the Creole laborers have withdrawn from the cultivation of the estates, and have retreated to the backwoods and river districts above the Falls. This painful state of things has furnished a new motive for effort on the part of the missionaries. "The country," they write, "is becoming daily more missionary in its character, and more difficult of moral cultivation; it, therefore, commends itself to the truest sympathies of the Committee." An important opportunity for effecting extensive good is presented on this island, by the case of some thousands of emigrant coolies. These persons have lately applied to the missionaries for instruction in their own language; and Rev. Mr. Bickford sent home to the Committee a document drawn up by one of them, Samuel Johnson, who had been baptized, and who felt intensely for the moral and spiritual improvement of his wretched countrymen. This document was accompanied by a request for a returned East India missionary to labor among them. The Committee immediately sent out a supply of Tamil Scriptures and tracts; and, in 1852, Rev. J. E. S. Williams was sent to labor among them, thus carrying the Gospel to 5,000 heathens.

The work of the mission at Georgetown and Essequibo proceeds in an encouraging manner, upwards of 60 having been added to the Society, and the congregation enlarged by African emigrants; 36 of whom have been baptized, and 52 are on the schoolmaster's roll-book.

In 1853, the missionary to the coolies visited many of the estates where they were employed, and many of them called on him for instruction; and he had received much encouragement from the interest manifested in his work by official persons and others, in the colony; but no special results are reported among the coolies.

The number of church members in this mission, in 1853, was 4,813.

St. Eustatius.—In 1787 Dr. Coke visited this island; but in consequence of the jealousy of the Dutch government, he was not allowed to preach to the negroes. However, he employed himself in instructing small companies, in the house of a free black, with whom he lodged. In December, 1788, he again visited the island, and notwithstanding persecution, the Methodist Society numbered, before his departure, no less than 258. He preached once; but next morning received a message from the governor forbidding it, under severe penalties. He left the island, and afterwards went to Holland to endeavor to secure from the Dutch government the toleration of the Methodists in St. Eustatius; but his application was unsuccessful. In 1810, two Methodist missionaries waited upon the governor of St. Eustatius, which had lately been captured by the British, and obtained liberty from him to establish a mission. They experienced considerable hostility at first, but at length triumphed over all opposition. The king of Holland, to whom the island has been restored, has ordered a grant of 600 guilders annually to be made to the mission. The tranquillity they now enjoy forms a striking contrast to the intolerance of former years. The congregations are large; and many of the white people, as well as the negroes, hear the Word with great attention. In 1853, the number of church members was 315.

Barbadoes.—In December, 1788, Dr. Coke and Mr. Benjamin Pearce visited Barbadoes; and, having obtained liberty to instruct the slaves on several plantations, Mr. Pearce remained, and commenced his labors with great energy and zeal. But he soon experienced violent opposition on the ground that he was disseminating among the negroes notions incompatible with their condition as slaves. Repeated attempts were made by the mob to interrupt the meetings for worship, in which they conducted in the most violent and outrageous manner. Mr. Pearce applied to a magistrate for redress, who heard his statement with apparent indignation at the rioters, issued warrants against several of them, and promised to do him justice. But when the outrage had been clearly proved, the magistrate gave this extraordinary decision: "The offence was committed against ALMIGHTY GOD: It therefore does not belong to me to punish it!" Mr. Pearce was left, with all his expenses to pay, a prey to a lawless mob, at once the scorn and pity of his foes. This emboldened the rioters, and they again attacked the chapel, and attempted an assault upon Mr. Pearce; but on his appealing again to the law, the magistrate reprimanded them, and ordered them to pay the expense of the proceedings. But persecution did not cease. Soon afterwards the rioters attacked his dwelling with stones during his absence, and struck his wife with violence.

In 1791, he was succeeded by Mr. Lamb, who, on his arrival, found the prejudices of the planters so far dispelled, that he had access to more estates than he was able to visit. Persecution had now nearly ceased, but it had given place to a settled contempt for divine things. But in October, 1823, intelligence was received that an insurrection had broken out among the slaves in Jamaica, and the Methodist missionaries were accused of being accessory to it, by teaching sedition under pretence of giving instruction. This intelligence raised a storm of wrath against the mission, and every indignity was heaped on the missionary. A mob assembled and tore down the chapel, and Mr. Shrewsbury's life being in danger, he left the island and went to St. Vincent's.

These outrages led to a censure upon the inhabitants of the island from the British House of Commons; and to relieve themselves of the odium, 94 of the principal men signed a declaration, expressing their regret at the occurrence, and their concurrence in the sentiments of the House. But when another missionary, Mr. Raynor, was sent to the island in 1826, placards were posted up on the day of his landing, calling upon the mob to tar and feather him, and the president refused him a license to preach. Yet, afterwards, he proceeded in his work without molestation. A new chapel was erected, the prejudice against the Methodists subsided, and a prosperous mission was established.

Virgin Islands.—In January, 1789, Dr. Coke, with other brethren, visited Tortola, and, finding a prospect of usefulness, Mr. Hammet remained and soon collected a large society. On the arrival of other preachers, they extended their labors to Spanish Town, and many of the other islets which are scattered up and down in that vicinity, and, like solitary rocks, lift up their heads above the waves. To several of these they paid frequent visits in open boats, at the risk of health and life, in order to preach to the few forgotten families who inhabited them. The governor of the island, on a threatened invasion by the French, solicited the superintendent of the mission, Mr. Turner, to place himself at the head of the negroes, as he was unwilling to trust them with arms under the command of any person of less influence. As there was no other means of defending the island, Mr. Turner considered it his duty to comply with the request. But, happily, the French abandoned their design and withdrew their squadron. In December, 1805, a most brutal outrage was committed on Mr. Brownell, one of the missionaries in Tortola, by a mob, by which he came near losing his life, in revenge for an alleged publication of his in England, respecting the morals of the people of the island.

Before the commencement of this mission, every species of wickedness prevailed among the negroes, and among others, a lascivious dance, called cam sen, in which all manner of iniquity was practised, and a pretended intercourse was carried on with the spirits of departed friends, who directed them to seek revenge of injuries they (the spirits) had received during life; and the scene begun in mirth often ended in blood. But, since the Gospel entered, these superstitious practices have been abandoned. The church in Tortola, in 1853, numbered 1,604.

Jamaica.—Dr. Coke visited Jamaica in 1789, and was received with such extraordinary kindness, as to encourage him to commence a mission, and, soon after, Mr. Hammet was appointed to Kingston. But he very soon met with violent opposition and abuse from the white people; his meetings were disturbed, and attempts made to burn and to tear down his chapel; and when he sought legal redress, the culprits were acquitted against the clearest testimony, and the grand jury declared the missionaries and their chapels to be nuisances! The prejudice, however, after a time, subsided, and they were allowed to labor in peace for a number of years. But the storm again burst forth, and raged with greater fury than before. The Legislative Assembly of Jamaica, in 1802, passed an act that no person, unless duly qualified by the laws of that island and of Great Britain, should preach or teach in meetings of negroes, or people of color, under the severest penalties. The Methodist ministers, being regularly licensed in England, did not consider themselves endangered by this arbitrary law. Mr. Campbell continued to preach as usual at Kingston, and met with no interruption; but, on preaching at Morant Bay, he was seized and imprisoned. On his release, he obtained license at Kingston, but, on returning to Morant Bay, he was again persecuted, and believing his usefulness at an end, he left his flock at Kingston in charge of Mr. Fish, and returned to England. But the king of England refused to sanction this intolerant law; and after two years, they were permitted to resume their meetings. But, in 1807, the Common Council of Kingston passed a law of similar import, but of a still more stringent character, which forbade unlicensed preaching or exhorting, and all meetings earlier than six in the morning, or later than sunset in the evening, which completely cut off the slaves from public worship. And, not long after, one of the missionaries was sentenced to a month's imprisonment, because a newly-arrived missionary had sung a new tune in meeting! The Legislative Assembly, in the mean time, passed an act equally cruel and intolerant, by which a complete stop was put to the labors of the Methodists in Jamaica.

These unrighteous laws coming before the home government, were immediately repudiated; and the king, to prevent the repetition of such shameful proceedings, issued a general order to the governors of the West Indies, commanding them, on no pretence whatever, to give their assent to any law relative to religion, until they had first transmitted a draft of the bill to England, and received the royal assent. This greatly enraged the Assembly, and led to violent proceedings, in consequence of which, the governor (Duke of Manchester) immediately dissolved the assembly. It was not, however, till the month of December, 1815, that the missionaries obtained permission to resume their public labors. Mr. John Shipman obtained a license, and immediately began to preach again in Kingston, after the chapel had been shut, with one short interval, for more than eight years. Other missionaries obtained similar licenses, and, having divided the island into districts, they proceeded in their labors with increased energy and zeal. They now received more invitations from planters to preach on their estates than they had ever done before. Their congregations greatly increased, and their societies were augmented to an extent unknown in any other island.

In 1824, the spirit of opposition again broke out, in consequence of the House of Commons having taken some incipient steps towards the extinction of slavery. The missionaries were accused of being agents of the African Institution, and every effort was made to blacken their characters and send them away from the island. The Assembly again passed a law, which, though it left Roman Catholic and Jewish teachers at liberty, cut off the Methodists from their public duties. Under this act, one of the missionaries was imprisoned; and, instigated by an inflammatory sermon preached by the rector of the parish against the Methodists, a company of militia attacked the residence of the missionaries, and left seven balls in the walls of the house, though none of the inmates were injured.

Two others, Messrs. Whitehouse and Orton, were imprisoned in a filthy cell, at Montego Bay, on a charge of preaching without a license for that parish; but on being brought before the chief-justice, they were discharged, and the lieutenant-governor, Sir Thomas Keane, dismissed from office the two magistrates who had committed them. Another slave act was passed by the Assembly similar to the rejected ones, and approved by the governor, Earl Belmore, notwithstanding the instructions of the king to the contrary; but it was promptly disallowed by the home government.

In December, 1831, an insurrection broke out on the north side of the island, in the parish of St. James's, and quickly extended to Trelawney, Hanover, Westmoreland, St. Elizabeth, and partially to Manchester, Portland, and St. Thomas in the east. It does not appear to have been the design of the slaves to take the lives of the white people, their object being simply to obtain their freedom, which they erroneously supposed had been granted by the king, but was withheld by the local authorities. A violent outcry was now raised against all missionaries, particularly the Baptists and Methodists, as if they had been the cause of it. Without trial, without evidence, they were proclaimed guilty, and a violent outcry was raised for summary measures to be taken with them. Some of the missionaries were arrested, but as nothing could be proved against them, they were discharged. Immediately after the suppression of the insurrection, associations were formed throughout the island, the object of which was to expel from the country all ministers except those of the established church. The proceedings of these associations were of the most violent character. A mob was raised, the chapel of St. Ann's Bay was destroyed, and the missionaries hung in effigy, and every indignity offered them.

During these persecutions, the societies in various places were left without pastoral care, and the congregations without public worship, the missionaries not being allowed to exercise their ministry. Meanwhile, Earl Mulgrave arrived as governor of the island, and showed his determination to maintain the cause of religious liberty, and to protect the missionaries in the enjoyment of their rights and privileges. In January, 1833, 13 months from the commencement of the disturbances, a royal proclamation was issued in Jamaica for putting down the lawless colonial church unions, and maintaining religious toleration. This was accompanied by a circular, requiring the prompt obedience and coöperation of the magistrates in enforcing it. It was now decided by the grand court that the toleration laws of England were applicable to Jamaica; yet, notwithstanding this and the governor's proclamation, one of the magistrates, on Mr. Greenwood's applying for license according to the provisions of the toleration act, behaved in such a violent manner that Mr. G. was obliged to retire from the court, to save himself from personal injury. But, in consequence of the energetic course of the governor, the missionaries were, after some time, allowed to carry on their labors without molestation.

On Friday, the 1st of August, 1834, slavery was abolished in the West Indies, in conformity with an act passed the preceding year by the newly reformed Parliament of Great Britain—a memorable event, mainly brought about by missionary labor and suffering. A graphic description of the inauguration of freedom at the Wesleyan chapel at Kingston is given by Rev. H. Bleby, but our limits will not allow us to give it at length. A sermon was preached the night before, by the missionary; after which the whole assembly knelt in prayer, and remained on their knees till the town clock struck the hour of midnight, when thousands of voices joined in the shout, "Glory be to God! we free! we free!" Free scope was then given to the general outburst of joy; after which a hymn of praise was sung, a prayer offered, and the crowd dismissed with the benediction.

The emancipation of the negroes was quickly followed by very important changes. The Sabbath was observed with hallowed strictness. Nothing was to be seen on that day but decently-dressed people going to and from their places of worship; congregations were increased and multiplied; old chapels were enlarged, and new ones erected. Education was also greatly extended. A great change took place also in the public opinion of Jamaica as to the Methodist missionaries. Formerly no names were too vile, no treatment too bad for them; even their chapels were shut up or razed to the ground as public nuisances. Yet within five years after the late insurrection, the House of Assembly of Jamaica made a grant of £500 to aid in the erection of a Methodist chapel in Kingston; and in the discussion of the subject the highest eulogiums were pronounced on the usefulness of the Wesleyan missionaries. The Common Council of Kingston and several of the parochial vestries followed the example of the Assembly, and made grants for similar purposes. Yet, though at first the prospects of the mission seemed to brighten, after a few years they grew worse. Many of the colored people purchased small lots of land, sometimes in the mountains, built cottages, and cultivated the ground for their living. Many left their old homes and sought employment elsewhere, often at a distance from the house of God. Many grew worldly-minded, made money the great object of their pursuit, and sought for happiness in earthly things. Some even returned to their vile heathenish practices, which it was hoped they had utterly forgotten.

In 1853, the number of church members in connection with the Jamaica mission was 19,478—a considerable decrease from former years; for in 1844 they amounted to 26,585. The stations of the missionaries are no longer confined to the chief town, but are to be found in all parts of the island, both in the towns and in the country places.

Bermudas.—In 1779, Mr. John Stephenson commenced a mission on Somer's Island where he had to encounter the prejudices of the whites and the heathenish superstitions of the blacks; the latter of whom he found under the slavish dominion of witchcraft, as it prevails in Africa, and for a description of which, and the bondage under which its victims are held, the reader is referred to the article on Western Africa. It appears that a particular species of charm called Obi, was made and sold at these islands, and was supposed by the negroes to have great power. It was to a people sunk under such superstitions that Mr. S. came; but it was not long before the Gospel began to exert its influence. Yet this was no sooner manifested, than the hostility of the whites was aroused. Laws were passed similar to those in Jamaica, and Mr. S. was imprisoned six months in the common jail, by which his health was so impaired that he was recalled, and the island was left without a missionary for six years. In April, 1808, Mr. Joshua Marsden proceeded from New Brunswick to Bermuda, but found the society gathered by Mr. S. dispersed. He obtained permission from the governor to preach, but he met with no very great success. In 1853, the number of church members in connection with the mission in this island amounted to 445.

Bahama Islands.—In October, 1800, Mr. William Turton arrived at New Providence, where he obtained permission to preach; and though a law had previously been enacted, prohibiting the instruction of the slaves, he was attended by considerable congregations, and succeeded in raising a small society. Other missionaries having afterwards arrived, they extended their labors to Eleuthera, Harbour Island, Abaco, and others of the Bahamas. On some of these their prospects were highly encouraging; their congregations were large, attentive, and respectable, and a great reformation followed their labors. But in 1816, the legislature passed an act prohibiting, under severe penalties, meetings for Divine worship earlier than sunrise and later than sunset, thus depriving the slaves of the privilege of attending. Many of the negroes came to the missionaries in tears, lamenting the loss of their religious privileges. It was truly affecting on the Sabbath morning to see some of the oldest members ascending a neighboring hill to see whether the sun was risen, before they durst begin to sing the praises of their Creator. After a few years, however, the legislature retraced its steps, and repealed the restrictions which it had laid upon the poor negroes. In 1853, the members of the Methodist Society in the Bahama Islands were as follows:—

New Providence,	. . .	816
Eleuthera,	. . .	804
Harbour Island,	. . .	538
Abaco and Andros Island,	. . .	264

St. Domingo.—Having been previously informed by the secretary of state of the republic of Hayti, that Protestant missionaries would not only be tolerated but welcomed, Messrs. John Brown and James Catts sailed from England for Port-au-Prince, in November, 1816. They soon gathered a numerous congregation at the capital, and in the country they were uniformly treated with kindness and respect. The inhabitants, indeed, were extremely ignorant, wicked, and superstitious; yet, in a short time a number of them appeared to be impressed with divine things, and were formed into a society. By the government they were treated with great condescension and kindness. President Boyer manifested the greatest readiness to encourage and promote their plans, particularly in regard to the education of youth. Yet, after a residence of about two years in St. Domingo, they were obliged to withdraw from the island, in consequence of the tumultuous opposition of the populace. But on their departure, President Boyer not only expressed himself highly satisfied with their conduct, but transmitted a donation of £500 to the society. The constitution of Hayti recognized the church of Rome as the religion of the state, but tolerated all others. It may be questioned, however, whether the principle of toleration was at all understood; practically, at least, the Methodists enjoyed nothing like religious freedom. The small society that the missionaries had collected were, after their departure, greatly persecuted chiefly through the influence of the Catholic priests over the ignorant people, in which, however, they were too much seconded by some persons of high rank. They could only meet by stealth, and in small companies; and when assembled for worship, they were sometimes assaulted by the populace with stones and other missiles. On one occasion, a number of them were seized by the police, and carried to prison, and on being brought before the chief judge, they were prohibited by him, in the name of the president, from meeting together. "No one," said he, "can hinder you from worshipping God as you please; but let every one abide at home; for as often as you are found assembled you shall be put in prison ; and if you unhappily persist, I have received orders to disperse you everywhere." Several wished to reply, but he refused to hear them, saying, "It is not from me ; it is not my fault ; these are orders given to me." There is reason to apprehend that these were the orders of President Boyer. Yet the poor people continued to meet. In 1834, John Tindall was sent to Hayti ; other missionaries followed, and settled at Port-au-Prince, Cape Haytien and Samand. Their congregations were generally small, and they had no great encouragement in their labors. There was reason to believe that numbers saw the absurdities of the Romish church, but ignorance, superstition, and vice maintained their dominion over the great mass of the population. Notwithstanding the unsettled state of affairs, arising from changes in the government and war with the Spanish part of the island, the principle of religious toleration has made marked progress. In 1853, the number of church members in connexion with the mission in this island amounted to 429.

Other missions.—Besides the missions already noticed, the Methodists established others in St. Christophers, Nevis, Grenada, St. Bartholomew, St. Thomas, St. Martins, Anguilla, Montserrat, Tobago, and Honduras, the present state of which will be seen in the tabular view.

In 1853, the African, Creole, and Asiatic church members in connection with the Wesleyan missions in the West Indies, amounted to over 48,000 souls ; and other general results of the mission will be seen in the tabular view.

Though in the preceding account of particular missions we have given a few illustrations of the nature and difficulties of missionary labor in the West Indies in the days of slavery, we shall here add, in conclusion, a remark or two of general application to the whole of these missions. It was a great disadvantage to the negroes, that the Lord's day was assigned them by their masters to cultivate the grounds allowed them in lieu of provisions, and that the regular market throughout the West Indies was on that sacred day, when the chief towns exhibited all the noise and bustle of petty commerce. After breakfast, on one Sabbath, a driver or overseer accompanied the slaves to the negro fields, where they spent the Sabbath toiling all day under a burning sun. On the following Lord's day, they went to market to sell the produce of their grounds and to purchase such articles as they were not allowed by their masters, and they closed the day in drinking, dancing, and debauchery. Such was a Sabbath in the West Indies. The Christian slaves had to perform the same work as the others, unless, as in some cases, their masters allowed them the Saturdays for that purpose. They went to market in the forenoon, and from thence to the chapel. It was no uncommon thing to see the chapel yard covered with baskets, while their owners were attending wor-together like the beasts of the field, without any ceremony. Some lived together many years; others soon parted, and each chose a new mate. Promiscuous intercourse was common, and the planters, when they made the attempt, found themselves utterly unable to break it. Marriage, however, was uniformly introduced by the Methodist missionaries among the converts; but with respect to this they had many difficulties to encounter. They were frequently at a loss to know which was the proper husband or wife. A female, for instance, wished to become a member of the society; but the man with whom she lived was not the first to whom she had been united. She had lived with many others, and the person with whom she was originally connected had in like manner had many more women since he left her; and perhaps was living at that time with one by whom he had children. Sometimes the missionaries were content with an engagement on the part of the woman that she would abide with the man with whom she lived when she joined the society. At other times, they acted to the best of their judgment in selecting the person whom they thought most proper.

Though we have given several instances of the hostility of the white inhabitants of the West Indies to the labors of the Methodists, it would be an act of great injustice both to the planters and to the missionaries, did we neglect to mention, that such feelings were by no means universal. In some of the colonies, there were not only no persecuting laws, but they were greatly encouraged, both by the local government and by the owners of the slaves. Even in those islands where they met with persecution, they had many friends among the planters and others of the white inhabitants. Some built chapels on their estates, others subscribed handsomely to their erection in the neighborhood. There was scarcely a place of worship of any size in the West Indies, in the building of which the gentlemen of the island did not assist by their contributions, or in some other form. Subscriptions of £10, £20, £50, and £100 for such purposes, indicate both the rank in life, and the sentiments of the contributors. Even in Jamaica, where the reputed dark and dangerous fanaticism of the Methodists was detected with more than ordinary sagacity, the most liberal assistance was afforded. In other islands, planters, merchants, members of colonial assemblies, presidents, chief-judges, governors, not only subscribed to the erection of chapels, but in some instances paid regular stipends to the missionaries, as a remuneration for their services in instructing their slaves. In several of the islands indeed the proprietors of estates, and other inhabitants, were so fully satisfied with the conduct of the missionaries, and so sensible of the political as well as moral and religious advantages resulting from their labors, that they defrayed entirely the ordinary expenses of the mission. Since the abolition of slavery, the views of the white people in the West Indies in reference to the Methodist missionaries have been greatly changed; and it is probably now matter of wonder to many, that any hostility should ever have been manifested to so zealous, laborious, and useful a body of men.—Marsden's Missionary Narrative. Brown's History of Missions; Jackson's Centenary of Methodism; Duncan's Mission to Jamaica; Memorials of Miss. Labor in W. Indies, by Moister.—REV. W. BUTLER.

AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.—Jamaica.—The mission to Jamaica is occupied mainly with labor in behalf of the emancipated colored people of Jamaica. It was commenced by five Congregational ministers, who sailed from New York in the fall of 1839. They went to Jamaica with the expectation of receiving a plain support from the emancipated people themselves; but in this they were disappointed, and as there was then no missionary society in the United States that could undertake the support of a mission there, they were reduced to circumstances of distressing privation. A committee was formed of gentlemen residing in New York and New England, called the West India Missionary Committee, who received and forwarded contributions for this mission, but without undertaking its support. In 1847 the mission was transferred to the American Missionary Association, under whose care it remains. In 1843, the missionaries formed a Congregational Association, under the name of the "Jamaica Congregational Association;" and the mission is now known in the island as the "American Congregational Mission."

For the purpose of leading the people to take more interest in the education of their children, and to accustom them to responsibility in the conduct of the schools, the missionaries formed a voluntary school association in 1852. Two of the directors of each school are chosen from among the people of the station, and associated with the missionaries and teachers in the general management of the school. With the results of this plan, after two years' trial, the teachers are well pleased.—REV. G. WHIPPLE.

MORAVIAN MISSIONS.—Danish W. I. Islands.

—The first Moravian missionaries to the West Indies, were Leonhard Dober, "the potter," and David Nitschmann "the carpenter." Their attention was first directed to this field by a negro, who stated that he had a sister in the island of St. Thomas, who, with many of her enslaved companions, desired to be instructed in the way of salvation, and earnestly implored the God of heaven to send some one who was capable of giving them religious instruction. In the hope of being of some service to these benighted people, these young men, laymen, of the occupations above named, set out from Herrnhut, in Denmark, with only six dollars each in his pocket, and arrived at St. Thomas on the 13th of December, 1732. The next year two companies, one consisting of 18 and the other of 11 persons, sailed from Europe, many of whom fell victims to the insalubrity of the climate. In 1736, three persons were baptized. In 1738 a negro named Mingo was baptized, and became a zealous assistant. Through his preaching an awakening took place over the whole island. But the planters opposed the work, and persecuted and imprisoned the missionaries. Count Zinzendorf, however, who unexpectedly arrived in the island, procured their liberation. In 1741, 90 persons were baptized at a plantation called New Herrnhut. Princess plantation, in the island of St. Croix, became a permanent station in 1751. A church was erected in Friedensthal, St. Croix, in 1755, and this became the principal station in the Danish islands. The place was destroyed by a hurricane in 1772. Bethany, in the island of St. Jan, was occupied as a station in 1754; and in 1782, Emmaus, in the same island, became a station. Friedensfield, in St. Croix, became a missionary settlement in 1805. In 1832, a centenary jubilee was held, and the important and encouraging fact was reported, that during that period 37,000 souls had been baptized in the Danish islands. The year 1848 was rendered memorable by the insurrection of slaves in St. Croix, and by the emancipation of the negroes in all the Danish isles.

In the three Danish islands, St. Thomas, St. Croix, and St. Jan, there are at the present time 8 stations, 35 laborers, 9,398 converts, of whom 2,892 are communicants.

Jamaica.—The Moravian brethren commenced a mission in this island in 1754, encouraged by several of the planters, who presented them an estate called Carmel. In one year the Sabbath congregation numbered 700 persons, and 26 had been baptized. In 1804, fifty years from the date of the mission, the brethren observe: "Though we cannot exult in an abundant in-gathering of souls, which these fifty years have produced, or even over our present prospects, yet we have sufficient cause of gratitude to the Lord for having preserved a seed in Jamaica. From the beginning of this mission to the present time, 938 negroes have been baptized."

In 1824, a serious insurrection broke out in the island; and in 1831, another still more general and bloody. To this last outbreak the slaves were provoked, say the missionaries, "by inhuman treatment, instigated also by hearing of the sympathy which their lot had excited in England and its parliament." Much hatred was excited against the missions, and several churches of different denominations were broken up. In 1834, a system of emancipation was commenced, but complete liberty was not granted till 1838. "From that time," say the brethren, "our mission in Jamaica has prospered greatly. Our six churches were over-crowded. At the church in Fairfield, which contains 800 sittings, above 2,000 persons sought admittance. It was therefore necessary to keep two meetings, either at the same time or in succession. The schools were equally over-crowded. The souls under our care numbered 8,000. New preaching places were established, and many school-houses were erected." In 1842, an institution for training native teachers was established. In 1850, the souls under the care of the mission at the several stations, was estimated at 13,000. 25 elementary schools were in active operation, under the superintendence of the missionaries.

The Moravian Church Miscellany for May, 1851, contains a review of the Jamaica mission, representing it as comprising 13 stations, at the west end of the island, each station consisting of various buildings—a church, a school-house, and a dwelling-house, with out-offices. With each station a congregation is connected, living within a circle, the diameter of which is, in most cases, about 20 miles. Besides the principal stations, there are 17 school-houses and out station schools, making the number of churches 13, and of schools 30. The number of negroes in connexion with these churches amounted, at the above date, to 13,388, young and old. Many white families also regularly attended the churches. These statements are not essentially modified by any later returns.

Antigua.—The brethren's mission was commenced in this island in 1756. It originated with the missionaries at St. Thomas, and the first missionary was from that place. Little interest was excited in the minds of the negroes, however, till 1761, when a piece of ground was purchased in the town of St. John's, and a place of worship was erected for the negroes. In 1772, a religious awakening spread over the island. A desire for religious instruction was increased among the slaves, and in 1775 the attendants on public worship numbered 2,000, and from 10 to 20 were baptized almost every month. The converts were subject to many temptations and troubles, such as famine, sickness, persecution, depredations, and the excitements consequent upon the taking of the island by the French; yet the cause was firm and progressive, so that after the restoration of peace, in 1783, 60 adults were received into the church at St. John's, in one day, and in a year 700 were added to the congregations. The missionaries preached on different plantations, and one native assistant built a house of worship at his own expense, to seat 400 persons. Many of the planters saw that the effects of the Gospel upon the slaves was highly beneficial, and when any of them were refractory, they sent them to the missionaries for reproof, instead of administering corporeal punishment. But others were decidedly hostile, and would punish their slaves severely for attending on the means of grace. One negro was compelled to give his own wife fifty lashes, because she had sought the protection of the local authorities. At another time, an aged female negro was unmercifully whipped and put in irons, from hatred to her religion, and the next day she was chained to two negroes, and dragged towards the field to work, but died on the way. Amidst these persecutions the church in Antigua resembled the burning bush. In spite of opposition, the word of the Lord continued to run and be glorified, and the two congregations, in 1788, numbered more than 6,000; and so many new doors were opened for preaching the Gospel, that the missionaries were thankful to find useful assistants in many of the converts, who visited the sick, gave advice, and ministered in many ways, though they were not employed in preaching.

In 1796, a third station was formed; the names of the three stations being St. John's, Grace Hill, and Grace Bay. In 1810, they commenced a school on the Lancasterian plan, at St. John's, with 80 scholars, which soon increased to 700, who made surprising progress in learning. In 1812, owing to the dryness of the season and the war with America, provisions became dear and scarce, and famine and disease prevailed, which carried off more than 200 of the congregation at St. John's. In 1817, the brethren commenced a fourth station, at a place called Newfield, for which the colonial government presented them with ten acres of land, £1,000 towards the erection of buildings, and an annual grant of £300 for their support. Two other stations were added, Cedar Hall, and Mount Joy, and large congregations were collected. In 1823, they celebrated the 50th anniversary of the opening of the church at St. John's, when it appeared that there had been baptized and received into the church in that time, 16,099 negroes, young and old. Among a people so ignorant and oppressed, however, some allowance must be made for spurious conversions. In 1826, the mission in Antigua was strengthened by the arrival of several brethren from Europe. The number of slaves receiving instruction at this period, was 14,823. Bible and missionary societies were formed among the negroes in 1832; and in 1834, unconditional emancipation was proclaimed in the island, the negroes being considered sufficiently advanced in knowledge and intelligence to render such a measure safe and proper. In 1838, Lebanon, the sixth station, was begun, and 1839, Gracefield was commenced in the north. A training school was opened at Cedar Hall, in 1847, but the buildings were destroyed by a hurricane the next year. They have been rebuilt, and the institution is in a flourishing condition. There are not so many under the instruction of the missionaries in Antigua at the present time as there were a few years ago, owing chiefly, as is supposed, to the increase of churches of other denominations; still the number as last reported, amounted to about 8,000.

St. Kitt's.—A mission was begun in this island in 1777, at Basseterre. In a year or two a general interest was awakened among the negroes, which continued, with some interruptions, so that in 1790 the Gospel was preached on upwards of 50 plantations. In 1800 the number of converts was estimated at about 2,000. A second station, Bethesda, was formed in 1820; and in 1832 a third was begun at Bethel. From this time the activity of other missionary societies increased, and many who had attended the Moravian meetings, fell off, and joined congregations nearer and more convenient. Estridge, a fourth station, was commenced in 1845.

Barbadoes.—The Brethren entered upon a mission in this island in 1765. The first convert was baptized in 1768; but there has been no such general desire for the word of God as in many of the other West India islands. Two stations were established, one at Sharon, in 1794, and one at Mount Tabor, in 1826. In 1831, both these stations were destroyed by a hurricane, and upwards of 4,000 souls perished in the island. These stations were rebuilt in 1832, when the congregations numbered about 1100. A congregation was established at Bridgetown in 1836, and another at Clifton Hill, in 1841, making four stations, which are still occupied with a good degree of success.

Tobago.—The Moravians have had a mission in this island since 1787. At several different times it has been suspended, but resumed again, and it still exists, as one of the many proofs of the blessing of God on missionary perseverance. There are two stations, Montgomery and Moriah.

Dutch Guiana.—Into this field two of the Brethren entered in 1733. One of their leading objects was to carry the Gospel to the Arawacks, a numerous Indian tribe in that part of Surinam called Rio de Berbice. Their first station was at Pilgerhut, on the river Wironje, a tributary of the Berbice. At the end of ten years the mission was favored with the presence and labors of Theophilus Solomon Schumann, called "the gifted apostle of the Arawacks." By his great talents and "wonderful combination of wisdom and firmness," he was enabled, under God, to triumph over the opposition of the whites, and 300 converts crowned his labors. But in 1757 difficulties of every description, among which were famine and epidemics, thickened around, and almost dispersed this little flock. By removals they sought a more peaceful abode, and much might be related of the heroic perseverance of the Moravian brethren in these primeval forests. In 1760 Schumann was called from his labors on earth. The work was continued by other missionaries, though amid appalling difficulties and discouragements. Station after station was invaded and burnt by the Bush Negroes, and the converts dispersed, and finally, in 1808, the mission among the South American Indians, after existing 70 years, was brought to a close.

A mission among the negro slaves in Surinam, was commenced in 1735, at Parimaribo as head-quarters. The missionaries went out with licenses for several trades, by which they supported themselves. The first convert in Parimaribo was baptized in 1776, and the first church was erected in 1778. From 1799 to 1816 the colony was a scene of frequent wars between the Dutch and the English, but the mission was at no time entirely interrupted. In 1821 the "Harmony of the Gospels," was translated into Negro-English, and was heartily welcomed by those who were able to read. In 1828 the brethren opened a new church in Parimaribo, with a congregation of 2,260. The most respected inhabitants formed a society, which still renders valuable assistance to the mission. In 1830 Berg en Dal, on the Surinam, 90 miles from Parimaribo, was opened as a preaching place. During this year the British and Foreign Bible Society printed the Negro-English New Testament for the Surinam mission. It had previously existed only in manuscript. Several new stations have been formed, but the largest and most important is still at Parimaribo, where the congregation, in 1850, numbered 5,500 souls. The other negroes under the care of the mission are scattered over several hundred plantations. The Brethren have also a mission among the Bush, or Free Negroes, on the upper Surinam, a country which can be reached only by dangerous voyages in small canoes up the streams, the navigation of which is rendered extremely perilous by cataracts. The heat is extreme, and the climate fatal to most Europeans. Into this region two of the Brethren penetrated in 1760. One of them died in two months, the other labored 12 years, and was the means of bringing a few souls to accept the Gospel invitation. New Bambey, a station some miles lower down the river, was established in 1785, for a company of 20 negroes. Considerable desire was manifested for several years in the interior of the country, to hear the Gospel, but sickness and death among the missionaries proved a great hindrance to their labors. In 1813 the congregation in New Bambey numbered 50, but there was little vitality among them, and the field was relinquished; it was afterwards resumed, but owing to the death of missionaries, was given up again in 1848.

ENGLISH GENERAL BAPTISTS.—Jamaica.—The Baptists entered upon their mission in Jamaica in 1814. The first station was at Falmouth, where a school was opened, and preaching commenced on the Sabbath, attended by both negroes and white people. Two more missionaries arrived the next year, and settled at Kingston. Encouraged by early indications of success, the society pressed forward its work, increasing the number of laborers and forming new stations, till, at the annual meeting of the missionaries in Falmouth, in April, 1831, the following tabular statement was presented :

The mission continued to prosper, and the churches had at no time been in a better condition than when the act of emancipation was carried into effect, in 1838. Yet, those who were unfriendly to this act, and wished to make its results appear to the worst advantage, raised numerous reports against the mis sionaries, and sought in every way to embarrass their operations. This led Sir Lionel Smith to make some explicit statements in their defence. In reply to an address from the Baptist brethren, he said, "On my assuming the government of this colony, I strongly expressed my reliance on the whole body of missionaries, in their high integrity of purpose, and in their loyal principles. You more than realized all the benefits I expected from your ministry, by raising the negroes from the mental degradation of slavery to the cheering obligations of Christianity, and they were thus taught that patient endurance of evil, which has so materially contributed to the general tranquillity. Even with the aid of a vicious and well paid press, both in England and Jamaica, the enemies of your religion have never dared go to the proof of their audacious accusations against you." After alluding to the peaceful working of emancipation, and the disappointment of those who had predicted violence and blood, the governor added, "The admirable conduct of the peasantry in such a crisis, has constituted a proud triumph to the cause of religion; and those who contributed to enlighten them in their moral duties, through persecutions, insults, and dangers, have deserved the regard and esteem of the good and the just in all Christian countries." This was said after one year of freedom had passed away. The returns made from the respective mission churches in 1839, evinced that the work of God continued to advance in an encouraging degree. A nett increase of 2,617 members had taken place during the preceding year, and the whole number of members was 21,337. There were also over 20,000 inquirers. A large increase was reported in the number of pupils receiving instruction in the schools. The day-schools contained 5,413, the evening-schools 577, and 10,117 were taught on the Sabbath, making a total of 16,117 scholars. As a further proof of the rapid growth of those habits and feelings which are the best security for the social welfare of a community, the missionaries had solemnized 1,942 marriages during the year. In 1841, the number of church members had increased to 27,706. At the association of the Baptist mission churches, held in Kingston, January, 1842, the ministers unanimously resolved, as an appropriate commemoration at once of the day of freedom and the jubilee of the mission, to detach themselves from the funds of the parent society after the first of August ensuing. From this period, the churches in Jamaica, although continued with no less efficiency than before, are not formally reported as mission churches.

Bahamas.—A mission to the Bahama Islands was commenced by the General Baptists in 1834. The missionaries established themselves at New Providence, and in two years they had extended their labors to Andros Island, Eleuthera, Exuma, Rum Key, Crooked Island, Fortune's Island, and Turk's Island. Connected with the churches at these places there were 490 members, 217 having been added during the preceding year. This field has been steadily and perseveringly cultivated, and has yielded much precious fruit. In 1850, Mr. Littlewood wrote, "We have six native agents, assisted by their wives, exclusive of 140 Sabbath-school teachers. Their work is divided between 45 churches, 1,475 members, 3,045 attendants on public worship, and 1,226 scholars, the fruit of whose labors is evidenced in the steady accession to our churches, and in the increased knowledge and piety of the people." Mr. Littlewood, speaking of his field of labor, says: "Imagine an expanse of water spread out before you some 500 miles, studded with sea-girt isles, varying from 100 miles by 40, to bare rocks of 100 yards in circumference. Amidst these islands I am continually navigating, where the ocean is frequently as smooth as a mirror, or as often lashed into a foam by the tempest." The members of these churches are represented as, for the most part, very poor, but as humble and consistent Christians.

Trinidad.—In 1842 the attention of the Society was directed to this island, only about one-tenth of whose 80,000 inhabitants are white people. Mr. Cowen, the first missionary, described the people as in an awful state of destitution and spiritual ignorance, and nothing to encourage missionary operations except the existing necessity. In 1846 the Secretary of the Society visited Trinidad, at which time the number of evangelical ministers on the island was eight, and the attendance upon day-schools about one in twenty. The great body of the people were Roman Catholics; and, by popery and slavery combined, the energy of the people had been destroyed, and the finer features of the negro character nearly obliterated. The Secretary says, "We have two groups of stations in Trinidad, one of which is in and around the port of Spain, the other about 20 miles to the south, in and around the Savanna Grande. Since 1843 two small chapels of wood have been built near the port of Spain, in one of which a school of 90 scholars is taught. Another chapel has been built about three miles distant, close to the sea, in the midst of a considerable population. About 20 miles north of the port of Spain, Mr. Cowen has three stations, where he labors with much self-denial." In 1850 the missionary wrote with expressions of grief: "What with rum-drinking, superstition, and something like paganism, the cause of the Lord Jesus makes little progress in Trinidad." He added, however, that increased attention was being paid to the cause of education; that thousands of religious tracts were in circulation, and that during the preceding year more than a thousand copies of the Scriptures had been distributed. The number of communicants, as last reported, was 80 ; schools, 8 ; teachers, 12 ; scholars, 181 ; all under the superintendence of one missionary.

Honduras.—This island has been the scene of missionary operations by the English Baptists since 1822 ; but their labors have been quite restricted, and no very full reports of a recent date have been received. The largest number of communicants reported at any one time was 132 ; schools, 9 ; scholars, 227.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—This Society commenced a mission in the island of Antigua in 1815, another in Jamaica in 1826, and one in Trinidad in 1836. Later still, a good work has been begun and carried on in British Guiana. In Jamaica, as last reported, the Society had five stations, viz., Siloah, Prattville, Chichester, Rural Hill, and Church Hill. At Siloah the house of worship, which was adapted to seat 850 persons, was crowded with a congregation of about 1,000. The communicants numbered 312, and there were 114 candidates. In two schools there were 218 scholars. The Prattville station had 279 communicants ; one day-school, with 138 children, and one Sunday-school, with 230 scholars. At Chichester there was a congregation of 450, of whom 105 were church-members, and 39 candidates. Of the other two stations no definite account is given. Little, if anything, is at present done by the Society in Antigua and Trinidad. In British Guiana considerable attention has been paid to schools, and though the number of scholars is not large, their proficiency is remarkable. The highest class read the Old and New Testaments, and study general and church history, and geography, besides learning hymns, catechism, and portions of Scripture.

SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL.—This Society has missions in Barbadoes, Grenada, Tobago, and British Guiana. In Barbadoes they commenced operations as early as 1818, and they have now eight or nine stations, and as many missionaries. Codrington College, an important institution of this Society, has been in operation since 1829, and has supplied the West Indian Church with upwards of sixty clergymen. In Grenada the Society has but one missionary ; also one in Tobago. In Essequibo, Pomeroon, and Demarara, belonging to British Guiana, there are five or six missionaries.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The London Missionary Society commenced a mission in Jamaica in 1834 ; and at later periods it has established missions in Demerara and Berbice. The latest reports received are to 1851, when the Society had in Jamaica 12 chapels or stations, 8 missionaries, and over 800 communicants. In Demarara there were 7 chapels, 5 missionaries, 4 teachers, 1,000 communicants, and 550 scholars. In all, 19 missionaries, 4,000 communicants, and 3,000 scholars.

UNITED SCOTCH PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—

This Church has taken charge of the stations till lately maintained by the Scottish Missionary Society. They are in Jamaica and at the following places, viz., Hampden, Lucca, Port Maria, Cornwall, Carron Hall, Green Island, Brownsville, and Rose Hill. Their statistics are not given.—Rev. E. D. MOORE.

BAPTIST FREE MISSION SOCIETY.—This Society, which is organized on anti-slavery principles, and has its seat of operations in Utica, N. Y., has had a mission for a number of years in successful operation in Hayti ; with 1 missionary, 3 female assistants, 1 native pastor, and 4 native teachers.

WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—Methodism has often been complimented as being “essentially missionary in its character.” This is true in a higher sense than is generally understood. Indeed, the very origin of the system can be traced to a high and devoted missionary spirit. The founder of Methodism was a missionary before he was an evangelical Methodist, having gone forth in 1735 in the service of the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, as a missionary to the North American Indians. His subsequent conversion to God was accomplished through the honored instrumentality of a Moravian missionary, Peter Bohler, then on his way to his field of labor among the heathen. And almost prophetic were the words of Wesley, when parted from this devoted missionary, who had been to him a father in the Gospel : “O what a work hath God begun since his coming into England ! Such an one as shall never come to an end till heaven and earth pass away.” For over fifty-two years from that time as an itinerant preacher he nobly acted up to the spirit of his chosen motto : “The World is my Parish.” During this period, such “full proof of his ministry” did he make, that he generally delivered two, and frequently, three or four sermons every day ; and traveled about 4,500 miles every year, chiefly on horseback. And so wonderfully did God own his great missionary plans and efforts, that, at his death, the work had spread through all parts of Great Britain and Ireland (where there were 300 itinerants, 1,000 local preachers, and 80,000 members, in the societies,) and also into the Isle of Wight, and the Isle of Man, and the Channel Islands, through the United States, the West Indies, Canada, and Newfoundland.

We might almost say that Mr. Wesley's missionary spirit was hereditary. His father, Rev. Samuel Wesley, felt deeply for the heathen, and about the beginning of the eighteenth century we find him in correspondence with one of the English prelates, projecting a mission to Hindostan on a magnificent scale, and even offering himself to take a part in it as a missionary. Mrs. Susannah Wesley, also, the gifted mother of John Wesley, shared the missionary ardor of her husband. During Mr. Wesley's absence in London, attending the Convocation, she read the journals of the missionaries sent out by the Danish Society to Tranquebar; and so powerful was the effect produced upon her mind, that she gave herself anew in covenant to God, and resolved in future to be more devoted to his service. She began to labor systematically with her children, and then with her husband's parishioners, assembling them together on the Sabbath evenings, during the long months of her husband's absence, and giving them religious instruction; and pleading, in justification of this unusual step for her as a woman, the example of the Tranquebar missionaries. Much good was accomplished by her efforts, and she imbued her children with her own spirit; and perhaps it may be seen in the light of eternity, that the missionary ardor of the followers of Wesley owes much to the mother of the founder of Methodism.

The Contingent Fund, instituted by Mr. John Wesley as early as 1756, was designed by him to be the means of sustaining the home missions of Methodism in Great Britain and Ireland. But the work soon began to spread beyond the ability of a home mission agency to manage. One step after another led the Methodists onward until they reached the pagan world; and it soon became apparent that a foreign missionary organization was needed to take charge of the spreading work of God.

The first mission beyond the limits of Great Britain, undertaken by the early Methodists, was that to the North American colonies. In the minutes for 1769, we find Mr. Wesley asking in the Conference, "Who are willing to go to America as missionaries?" Two brethren immediately rose and offered themselves, Richard Boardman and Joseph Pilmoor. But there was no foreign missionary fund; and Mr. Wesley proposed that they should take up a collection among themselves, and £70 were contributed on the spot. This was the first Methodist missionary collection ever made; and as the whole number of preachers at that time was but 110, and only about half of these usually attended Conference, this collection would probably average nearly $7 each from this company of poor itinerants. Of this sum £20 was appropriated to pay the passage of the missionaries, and the remainder was given them to assist in the erection of the first Methodist meeting-house in America. Other missionaries were sent out afterwards, but in a short time this portion of the work assumed the independent position of the Methodist E. Church; and being able to provide for her own necessities, ceased to be regarded as a mission of the parent community.

But the missionary spirit which Mr. Wesley had evoked, soon called into existence operations too extensive for the superintendence of one man, even of Mr. Wesley's versatile powers; and in this emergency, God sent to his aid Rev. Dr. Coke. The friendship between these men began Aug. 13, 1776; and after traveling through the home work of Methodism, and visiting America to organize the Methodist Episcopal Church, in 1784, Dr. C. became General Superintendent of Methodist missions. He traveled extensively through Great Britain, making collections for their support, soliciting subscriptions from wealthy individuals, wherever he could gain access, and selecting suitable men for the work. He also maintained a regular correspondence with the missionaries. From the time of Mr. Wesley's death, in 1791, to the year 1811, under his active and vigilant superintendence, the missionaries among the Africans in the West Indies, and those in British North America, were increased from 21 to 43, besides 11 employed in the Irish mission among the neglected papists; and the members in society in these foreign stations were increased from 6,525 to 13,382. After the Conference of 1786, Dr. Coke sailed in company with three brethren for Halifax; but Providence drove the vessel to Antigua. He distributed the missionaries among the islands, and thus began the Wesleyan missions to the West Indies. He returned to England, and spent the next 18 months in visiting the principal towns, begging for the missions with unabated zeal; and at the close of the Conference of 1788, he sailed again with another detachment of missionaries for other islands among the West Indies. He again returned home, and having sent out several more missionaries, he once more started with another band of devoted men for the West Indies, in October, 1790. As the missions multiplied abroad, the Conference in England relieved Dr. Coke of a part of his labor, by establishing an annual missionary collection in all their chapels, to support this growing and blessed work.

In the next ten years the Doctor paid four more visits to America, to extend and strengthen the work already begun. At the Conference of 1813, though then in his 67th year, he expressed an earnest desire to proceed to the East Indies to establish a mission there. Eighteen times had he crossed the Atlantic for missionary purposes; yet his godly ardor was unabated. Some of his brethren attempted to dissuade him from his purpose; but, after hearing their arguments, he burst into tears, and exclaimed, "If you will not let me go, you will break my heart!" His brethren withdrew their opposition; and, accompanied by seven missionaries, Dr. Coke embarked for the east in December, 1813. But on the 3d of May following, his spirit suddenly returned to God: he was found dead in his cabin. Thus ended the life and labors of this estimable man, whose name will ever be remembered in honorable association with the history of the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

The Wesleyan Home Missions may be considered to have commenced when Mr. Wesley instituted "the Contingent Fund" for their support in 1756, 98 years ago. The Foreign Missions of Methodism were commenced by Mr. Wesley in 1769, when he sent missionaries to America. In the year 1784 he planted a mission in the Isle of Jersey; and in 1785 he sent out seven missionaries to establish missions in Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and in the Island of Antigua. The next year he sent additional help to these missions, and also occupied Guernsey. In 1787 he sent missionaries to St. Vincent's, St. Christopher's, and St. Eustatius, and also strengthened the mission in the Norman Isles. In 1788 he appointed five more missionaries for the West Indies. The work continued to spread, and in 1789 Dominica, Barbadoes, Saba, Tortola, and Santa Cruz were added to the list of Wesleyan missions. Mr. Wesley sent out two more missionaries the next year to the West Indies, and he added Jamaica to the list of stations, and also appointed a committee of nine preachers to take the management of those missions. This closed Mr. Wesley's connection with the early missions of Methodism. A few months after this Conference he was called to his reward. The statistics of the Wesleyan Foreign Missions at the Conference before his death were as follows: The fields occupied were the Norman Isles, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, and the West Indies. The number of missionaries was 23, and of members 5848; of whom 498 were French, 350 were mulattoes, and 4377 were negroes. The same year that witnessed the death of Wesley, witnessed also the death of the first missionary who fell in the service of this society. Robert Cambell died of putrid fever in the Island of St. Vincent's. Upon Dr. Coke now devolved the management of the Wesleyan missions. To assist him, however, the Conference appointed a committee of finance and advice, consisting of all the ministers of the connection resident for the time being in London, and by them all missionaries sent out were to be examined, and all accounts to be submitted to their inspection, and correspondence to be maintained with them. This Conference sent out three more missionaries to the West Indies, and also projected a mission in France, William Mahy being appointed to this latter service the next year.

In the "Minutes of the Conference" of 1792 we first find Africa on the list of the Wesleyan missionary stations, Sierra Leone being the part occupied.

The Conference of 1793 established a general collection to be made in all their congregations for the support of the missions. During the next five or six years, notwithstanding the commotions throughout their connection on account of some questions of discipline, as well as the disturbed condition of the political world, Dr. Coke and the Conference continued their care of the missions already planted, and gave them what enlargement they could. In the minutes for 1796 we find the names of A. Murdoch and W. Patten set down as missionaries to the Foulah country in Africa, to which service they were solemnly set apart by the Conference. In 1799 the Rev. G. Whitfield was appointed treasurer for the Foreign Missions; and Gibraltar was added to the list of stations. In the minutes for that year occurs the following entry: "We in the fullest manner take these missions under our own care, and consider Dr. Coke as our agent." The Conference also requested Dr. C. to draw up a statement of the work of God carried on by their missions, for circulation, and took additional steps to give greater efficiency to their missionary work. At the next Conference a body of rules was compiled for the regulation of the Foreign Missions; and authority was given to Dr. Coke to send a missionary to Gibraltar, and another to Madras. In 1804 Mr. Hawkshaw was sent to Demerara, in South America. At this time the number of members in the Foreign Missions was 15,846. The first missionary secretary (Mr. Entwistle) was appointed this year, Dr. Coke being general superintendent, and Mr. Lomas treasurer, each of these officers being amenable to the Missionary Committee, consisting of all the London preachers; so that the whole apparatus necessary for the guidance of the missions took form as the necessity arose.

In 1813 the Conference yielded to Dr. Coke's solicitations for the establishment of a mission in the East. Of the seven missionaries appointed for Asia and South Africa, it was intended that three of them should be stationed at Ceylon, one at Java, one at the Cape of Good Hope, and the others to be placed where Dr. Coke might think best and as Providence opened the way. The result will be seen in the history of the Ceylon mission.

The Conference of 1814 strongly recommended "the immediate establishment of a Methodist Missionary Society in every district where it had not already been done. They also appointed two secretaries for the Foreign Missions, in connection with the General Missionary Committee in London, and designated eight additional missionaries, three to Newfoundland, two to Demarara, one to Canada, and two to Australia. The missionary income was ascertained as having amounted this year to £12,177.

At Dr. Coke's death, there was no sufficient organization to direct the operations of the different missions, and to provide the means of their support and extension. And, when all of a sudden they found themselves deprived of his services, the preachers and people awoke from their supineness and keenly felt the necessity of some combined effort to maintain the ground that had been gained.

In this state of anxious inquiry, the Rev. Geo. Morley, then superintendent of the Leeds circuit, suggested the formation of a missionary society in that town. This was done; and a new impulse was thus given to the work throughout the connection. Other places, in swift succession, followed the example of Leeds, till the Methodist congregations, from the Land's End to the Tweed, caught the sacred flame. Collectors offered their services in all directions; the hearts of the people were everywhere impressed and opened to the state of the heathen, and the communication of authentic missionary intelligence; and money was from year to year poured into the sacred treasury beyond all former precedent. At the same time missionaries have continued willingly to offer themselves even for the most hazardous and difficult stations; and doors of entrance are almost every year opened in the most unexpected quarters.

The Wesleyan Missionaries, ministers of the connexion, are 454 in number. They are assisted by catechists, local preachers, assistants, superintendents of schools, schoolmasters and schoolmistresses, artizans, &c.; of whom 698 are employed at a moderate salary, and 8,494 afford their services gratuitously. These missionaries and their assistants are preaching the Gospel, and communicating instruction by schools and otherwise, in 35 different languages: In Europe in the Irish, Welsh, French, Italian, Spanish, German, and Swedish; in Africa, in the Akra, Yoruba, Grebo, Mandingo, Namaqua, Kaffre, Dutch, Sesuto, and Sechuana; in Asia, in the Tamil, Portuguese, Singalese, Dutch, Canarese, Sanscrit, Bengalese, Kassia, Teloogoo, and Chinese; in Australia and Polynesia they use the Maori, the Tongan, and the Feejeean; and in America they employ the Spanish, Chippewayan, Mohawk, Ojibwa, Oneida and Muncey languages. Six or seven of these are used through the medium of interpreters; but the rest have all been mastered by the missionaries, and are the medium of instruction. Many of them have been for the first time reduced to a written form by the missionaries, who have compiled grammars and dictionaries; and into them all the Holy Scriptures are translated, and have been placed in the hands of the people.

In addition to over 1,700 day and Sunday-schools, and several farm and industrial-schools, the Wesleyan Missionary Society sustains a few Normal institutions and some seminaries, where a superior education is imparted. These are situated at Colombo, Jaffna, Auckland, Tonga, Mount Coke, and Westmoreland.—Theological institutions, for training a native ministry, are in very efficient operation at Tonga, Sierra Leone, Macarthy's Island, Jaffna, Auckland, Graham's Town, and the Feejee Islands. The number of students last year was about 100.

The Society's missionary printing establishments are doing a noble work. They are located at Bangalore, (India,) Kaffraria, D'Urban, Plaatburg and Graham's Town, (Africa,) Jaffna, (Ceylon,) and the Tonga and Feejee Islands.

"The Field" in which the Wesleyan missionaries are employed, as already shown, is emphatically "THE WORLD."

Results.—These have already been stated; but they will appear more distinctly in the following summary, as given in the report for 1853:

No. of Circuits,	361
Chapels,	1,099
Other preaching places,	1,887
Missionaries and Assistants,	465
Subordinate paid agents,	698
Do., unpaid,	3,494
Full and accredited church members,	108,286
Sabbath-schools,	868
Sabbath scholars,	54,737

Day scholars,	42,172
Attendants on public worship,	362,347; of whom 149,802 are Anglo-Saxons, and 212,545 are of other races. Of the church members in these missions, 32,070 are British and Irish; 1,815 are German, French, Swiss, and Spanish; 1,711, Asiatic; 4,046, Australian; 8,971, Polynesian; 53,831, African and Creole; and 1,980 N. A. Indians.

But, besides what appears in these statistics, the Wesleyan missions have set off mature and large portions of their work in independent positions, which no longer appear in the reports as missions.

Income.—We present below the income of the society in periods of four years, with the annual average of each:

From 1814 to 1817.....	£50,760	average	£12,440
" 1818 " 1821.....	114,358	"	28,589
" 1822 " 1825.....	143,283	"	35,820
" 1826 " 1829.....	206,256	"	51,564
" 1830 " 1833.....	216,658	"	54,164
" 1834 " 1837.....	316,781	"	63,942
" 1838 " 1841.....	384,644	"	96,161
" 1842 " 1845.....	422,810	"	105,702
" 1846 " 1849.....	442,090	"	110,522
" 1850 " 1853.....	424,390	"	106,097
1854.....	114,498

Total in 41 years, £2,896,528

This exhibits a regular growth of the missionary fund, increasing at every period, from £12,000 to £106,000, and from £12,177 in 1814, to £114,498 in 1854.—Jackson's Centenary of Methodism; Alder's Wesleyan Missions; Coke's Life; Minutes of Annual Conferences; Notices and Reports.—REV. WITCHCRAFT: "The practices of witches; sorcery; enchantments; intercourse with the devil; power more than natural."—

Webster. "A supernatural power, which persons were formerly supposed to obtain possession of, by entering into a compact with the devil."—Buck. "The pretended or supposed possession of supernatural power, in consequence of an alleged compact made with the devil; the object of which was either to procure advantages to the persons thus endowed, or their friends, or to do evil to their enemies.

That persons supposed to be possessed of supernatural endowments, in consequence of a compact made with Satan, or who pretended to such endowments, have existed, is an opinion that has more or less obtained in every age."—Edinburgh Encyclopedia.

There certainly can be no question of the fact that persons have existed who were supposed to possess, or who pretended to possess, such powers. Whether the witchcraft forbidden in the Bible was real or pretended, is a question on which learned men are not agreed. The writer last quoted, says: "Before the Christian era, and at that time, the arch-enemy of mankind was, undoubtedly, for wise purposes, allowed powers, and held a visible intercourse with our species, which have long been denied him." But, whether the witches and wizards denounced in Scripture, were real or pretended, their strict prohibition will appear to have been equally wise and necessary, when we consider what terrible consequences have always and everywhere followed the delusion. It is important, however, to observe with this writer, that "the modern witch is a considerably different personage from any we read of in the Bible." The ancient witches seem to have been somewhat similar to our modern fortune-tellers, for "they made great gain by their divination;" and we may add, also, like our modern "clairvoyants" and "spiritual mediums," and the African fetishmen also, instead of the innocent persons whom they accuse of witchcraft. Witchcraft was universally believed in Europe till the sixteenth century, and even maintained its ground with tolerable firmness till the seventeenth. The latest witchcraft phrensy was in New England, in 1662, when the execution of witches became a calamity more dreadful than the sword or pestilence. The following description of the supposed character of the modern witch is given by the writer, in the Edinburgh Encyclopedia: "This compact (with the devil) was not reckoned valid, until it had been written out with blood taken from the vein of the person who thus resigned his life to the service of Satan. The individual who in this way became a witch, gave up to him soul and body, and at death he necessarily went to the regions of horror and despair. The devil, on his side, guaranteed that the persons who thus sold themselves to him, should want for nothing they desired in this world; that they should be avenged upon their enemies; that they should have the privilege of inflicting disease on whomsoever they wished; and that, in short, their power of doing evil should be very great, if not unlimited. To accomplish this purpose, a familiar spirit, or gnome was given them by Satan, which was ready to attend them at a call, and was entirely subservient to their will. The witches could assume any shape they chose, and transport themselves through the air with unspeakable rapidity, on a broomstick, or nutshell, or any such article, for any purpose, particularly to attend meetings of witches, at which the devil himself always presided."

The reader need not be reminded how unscriptural and absurd is the idea of the possession of such power by any human being; but it is easy to see how the belief in the exercise of such power by persons regarded as witches, should produce the terrible effects described in the witchcraft excitements of the 16th century; or that a similar idea, in the mind of an ignorant and superstitious heathen, should hold him in such terrible bondage as that described by missionaries and tourists. But it is a noticeable fact, that the belief in witchcraft has always disappeared with the progress of civilization, education, and true religion.

The belief in witchcraft, however, is not confined to barbarous tribes. Hindostan, which lays some claim to civilization and learning, is overrun by professors of those mystical incantations, called Mantras, and of the occult sciences generally. The greater part of the cross accidents in life are attributed to this cause. For the first twelve months, a Hindoo mother carefully conceals her child, lest the evil eye should fall upon it. A highly respectable Hindoo landholder at Sangor, named Baboo Bight, refused to sell one of these men a piece of land; whereupon, the man vowed to conjure the Baboo's life away in a year. He fixed himself on a plain near the Baboo's land, and every night kept up his incantations, the fire blazing away in his earthen pot. After some time, the Baboo became ill, his appetite being gone, and he having become restless and fever ish. He affected to treat the man's incantations with contempt; but they were evidently uppermost in his mind. A low, destructive fever insinuated itself into his system, and, before the twelve months were ended, he died,—evidently the result of a superstitious fear.

The terrible influence of the belief in witchcraft, among the natives of Southern and Western Africa, are thus described by Rev. John Leighton Wilson, formerly a missionary of the American Board at Gaboon, now one of the Secretaries of the Presbyterian Board; and the reader will observe how the African idea of the power of witches corresponds with the foregoing description of the opinions, which formerly prevailed in both Old and New England:

"This idea, or belief, is of such long standing, of such constant recurrence, and so intimately interwoven with all their actions, their projects, their reasonings, and their speculations, that it seems to form an essential part both of their mental and moral constitution. It ascribes to those supposed to possess this mysterious and hateful art, power not only over the health and lives, but over the property and fortunes of all around them. Every event in life, if adverse or calamitous, is ascribed to this malignant agency. Sickness, no matter what its type or how contracted, the loss of property, no matter by what means, or under what circumstances of mismanagement, the disappointment of cherished hopes, however extravagant or unreasonable they may have been; the loss of friends by death; are indiscriminately ascribed to some one who is supposed to exercise this mysterious power. A death seldom occurs in one of their villages, which is not atoned for by the life of some one else. Other feelings than those of heartfelt sorrow are awakened by the sound of the death drum. It is the voice of the accuser that sends a thrill of concern to every heart. No one is exempt from the suspicion of having caused that death. To fly from the scene of anticipated danger, is a virtual confession of the charge of guilt. Uprightness of character and benevolence of heart afford no shield. The intimacy of friendship and the endearment of kindred ties, are alike unavailing. Suspicion may fasten upon the son as the cause of his father's death, or upon the mother as the destroyer of her own offspring. How the inhabitants of Africa can have any repose at all, under such a system, is a matter of surprise to all who are familiar with their superstitious creed."

WORLD: We have furnished ample means in this volume for ascertaining the religious condition of the world. We give the following general survey, which presents an approximation to the world's population, and the proportion of different religions, and an enumeration of Protestant missionaries and their converts, as near as it can be obtained from missionary reports.

POPULATION.

Asia, including Pacific Isles (see Asia)...	752,806,493
Africa (Encyclopedia Britannica).....	100,000,000
Europe (see Europe).....	262,300,000
America (Encyclopedia Britannica).....	52,800,000
	<hr/> 1,167,906,493

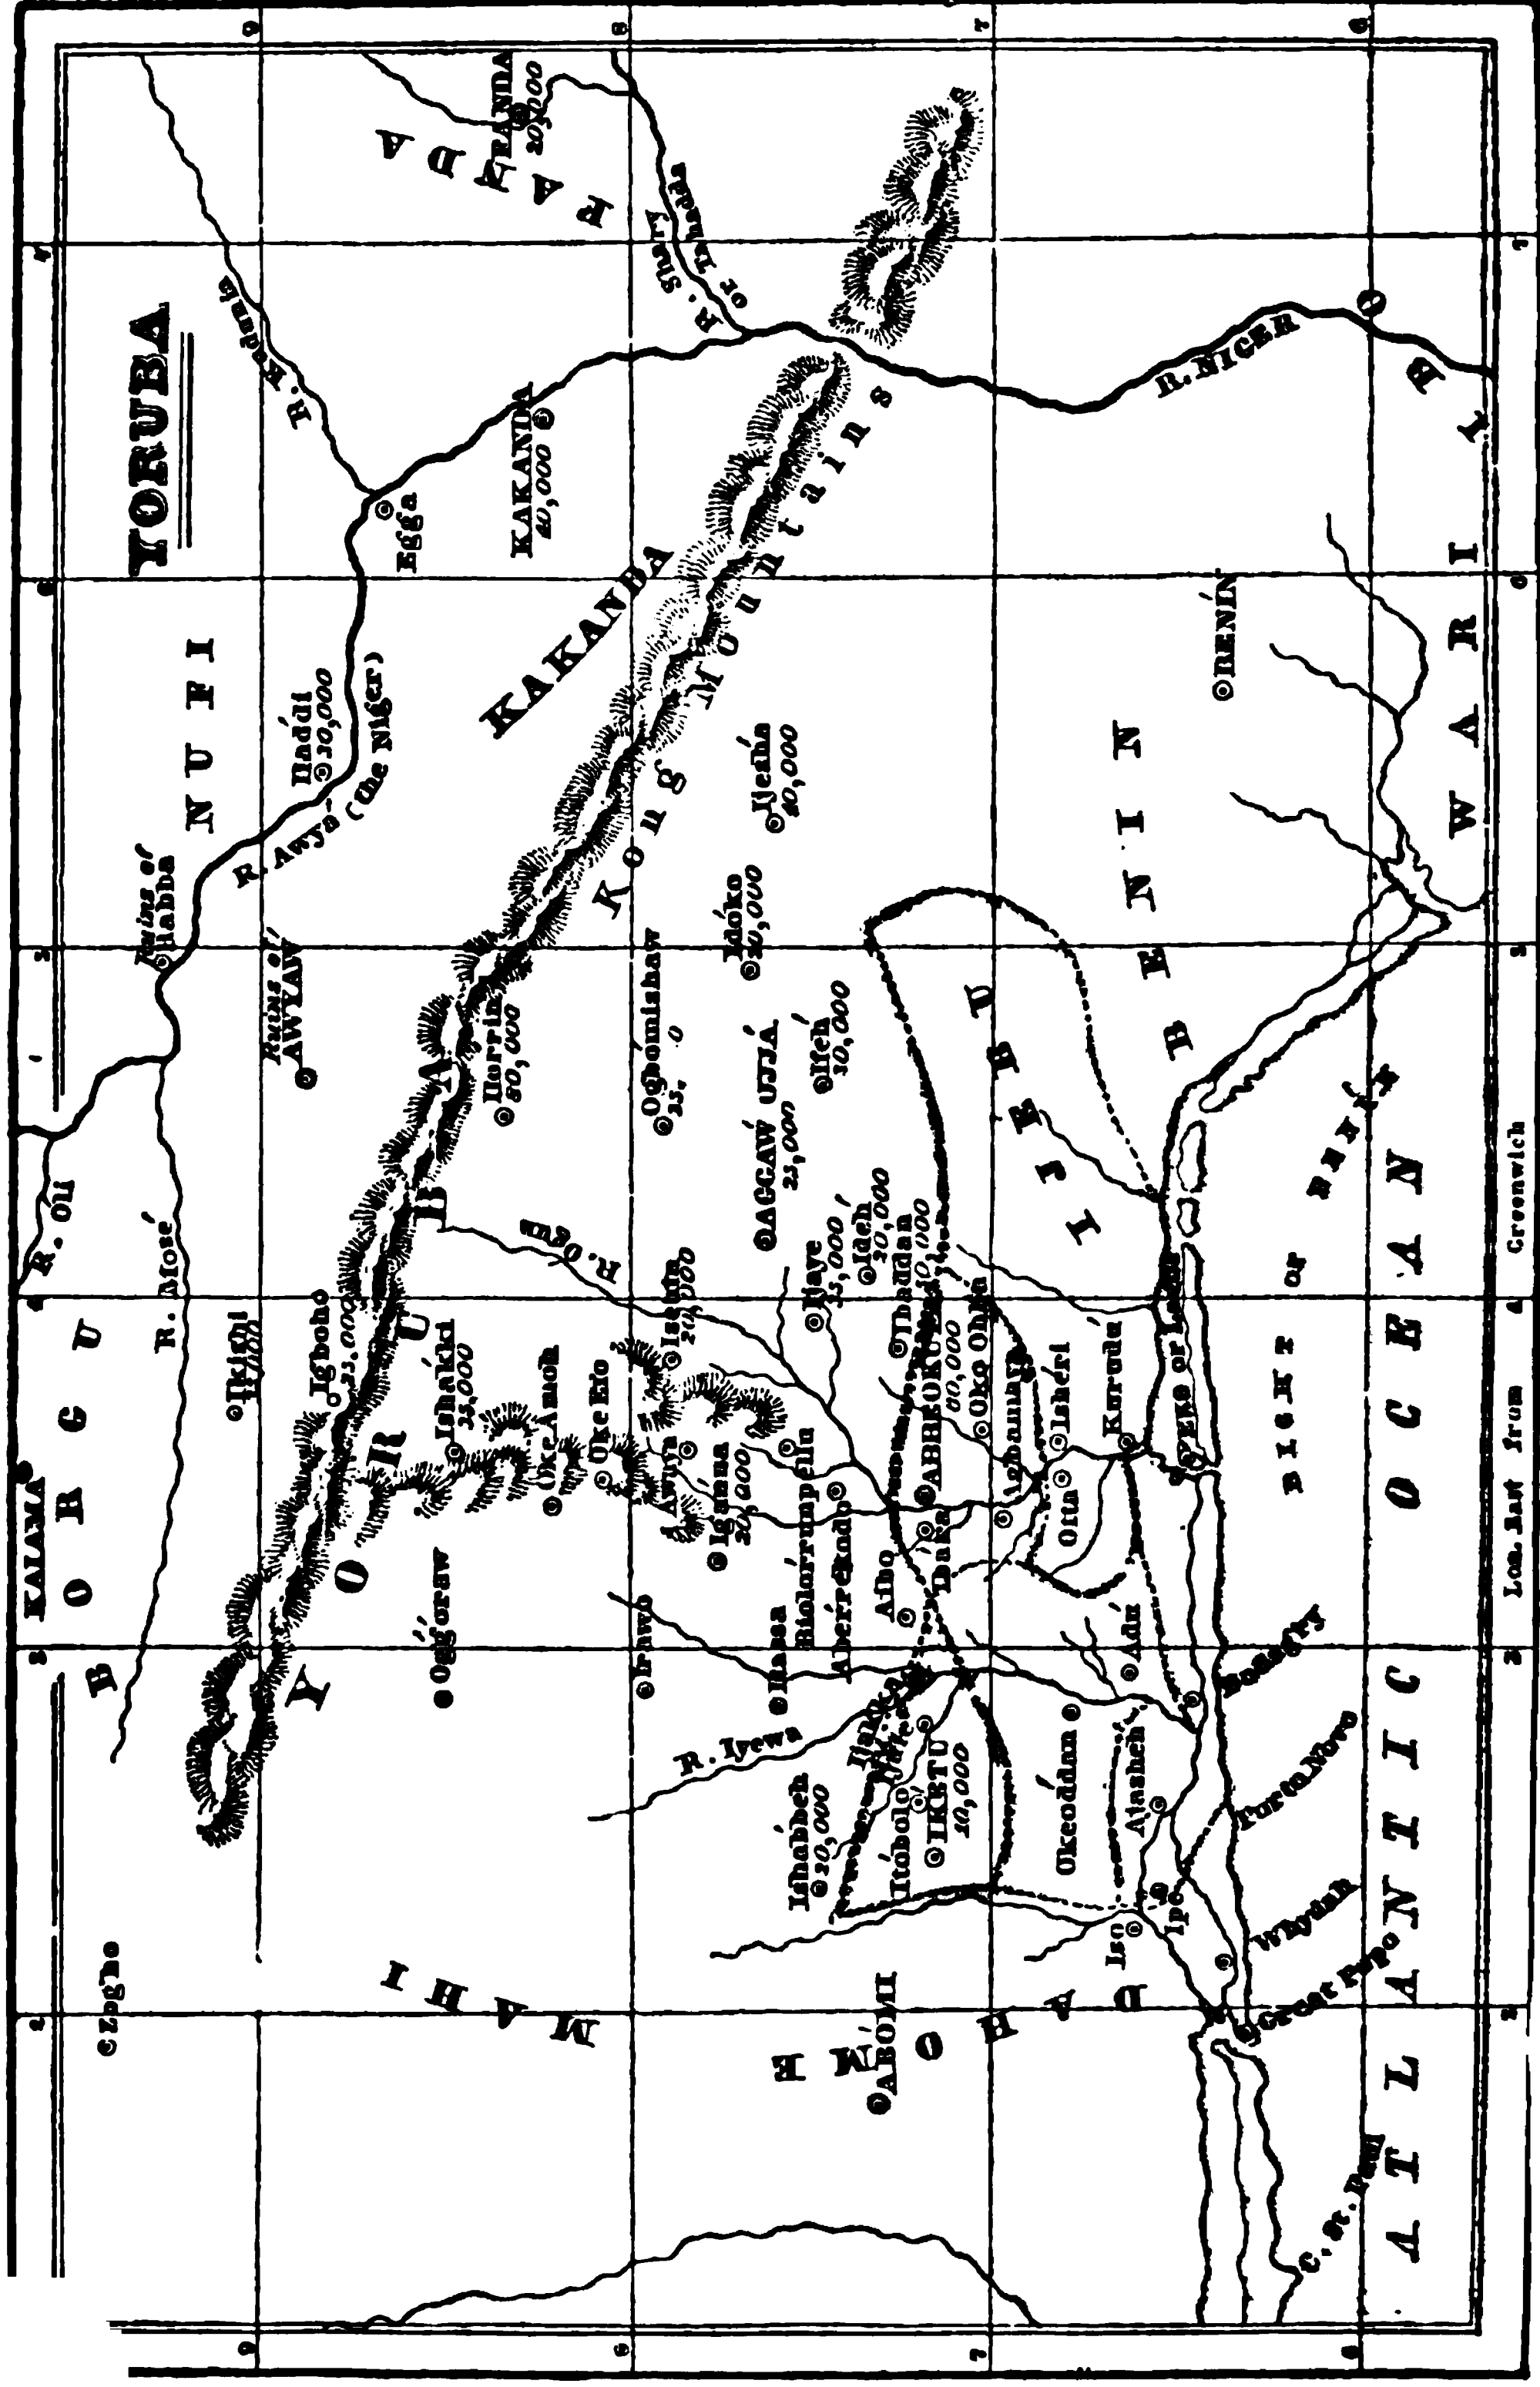

All attempts, however, to ascertain the population of the globe, are based to a great extent upon conjecture, as comparatively a small portion of it has been determined by actual census. *Balbi makes the total population of the earth 736,700,000; but, according to later opinions, based on better acquaintance with China, he underrates that kingdom about 200 millions. It is probable, however, as we intimated in the article on Asia, that the above estimate of that continent is too high; and, comparing all the estimates we have seen, we are inclined to regard that which puts the population of the globe, in round numbers, at one thousand millions, as probably near the truth. The following estimate, with reference to religious profession, has been based upon that number:

Christians.....	200,000,000
Jews.....	14,000,000
Mohammedans.....	140,000,000
Heathen Idolaters.....	646,000,000
	<hr/> 1,000,000,000

The following table will show something of what has been done during the last half century, for the evangelization of this vast multitude:

COUNTRIES.	Missionaries.	Members of Mission Churches.	Number in Mission Schools.	Nominal Converts from Heathenism.
Asia.....	577	28,372	84,168	122,000
Africa.....	513	27,241	31,547	50,000
Pacific Islands.....	150	49,729	45,186	200,000
West Indies.....	256	92,494	25,513	1,200,000
North America..	177	13,558	4,331
Totals.....	1,673	211,389	190,745	1,572,000

This statement, though far from being complete, exhibits a band of over 1,600 missionaries, the results of whose labors show over 200,000 members of mission churches, with nearly the same number of scholars in Christian schools, and a nominally Christian population of not less than a million and a half, all redeemed from heathenism in half a century. But this gives but a very imperfect view of the work accomplished. The foundations have been laid deep and broad, for a rapid advancement in the next 50 years. These missionaries are scattered throughout the world. They have established Christian institutions; reduced barbarous languages to writing; established printing-presses; and translated and printed the Scriptures in almost every language under heaven. Idolatry, Islamism, Romanism, and every false religion, are trembling to their foundations. And, whoever lives to the end of this century, will see the wonderful works of God in the earth.

WUDALEY: Forty miles north of Ahmednuggur, in Hindostan,—became a station of the American Board in 1845.

WUPPERTHAL: A station and a mission colony of the Rhenish Missionary Society, in South Africa, near Clanwilliam.

YAVILLE: A Karen village in the province of Tavoy, Burmah; an out-station of the Tavoy Mission of the American Baptist Union.

YORUBA, or YARRIBA: The Yoruba country is situated some distance inland from the Bight of Benin, between Dohomey on the west, and the River Niger, or Quorra, on the east and north-east, extending far into the interior. This territory once formed one of the most powerful kingdoms in Western Africa, composed of a large number of provinces, having their separate governments, and owning a sort of allegiance to one king. But, about the year 1817 or 1818, a civil war broke out, originating in a quarrel in the market, between persons of different tribes, about a cowrie's worth of pepper, in consequence of which man rose against man, town against town, tribe against tribe, the slave-trade helping it on; till, in a little more than 30 years, the country which travelers described as everywhere richly and carefully cultivated, was turned into a barren wilderness, and the people, previously agricultural and trading, mild in their manners, and hospitable to traders, became brutal and ferocious, from constant war, revengeful, thirsting for blood, and ready to barter their fellow-men for gold. From the broken fragments of 145 towns of this kingdom, chiefly of the Egba province, destroyed about 1825, has arisen the city of Abbeokuta, the location of the Yoruba mission of the Church Missionary Society. This city is situated on the bank of the river Ogun, in latitude $7^{\circ} 8'$, about 60 miles from Lagos. It stands in the midst of an immense plain, on the two highest of several detached hills, which ascend gradually on the N. E., and terminate in a bold and perpendicular bluff on the N. and S. W., being surmounted by masses of smooth gray granite. On the sloping sides, and around the bases of these two hills, enclosed within a wall and ditch of about 15 miles in length, are the dwellings of 100,000 inhabitants. The fugitives from the desolated villages fled to this spot, then a wilderness, making the great rock Olumo their resting-place, till at length the forests were cleared away, the town arose; and in 1829, they were joined by Sodeke, a man of great parts, who was chosen their ruler. The town was called Abbeokuta, from "Abbe," under, and "Okuta," a rock, from its situation. But the people of the various towns united at Abbeokuta, still have each their governor, their judge, their captains of various grades, and their court-house, forming a sort of federal government. But since the death of Sodeke, they have had no general ruler.

Every town in the Yoruba country has its market, where trade is carried on in the various productions of the country. The people are chiefly agricultural, and they cultivate their fields with care and neatness. But they have made considerable advances in the useful arts, having their blacksmiths, tanners and curriers, saddlers, shoemakers, rope-makers, potters, carpenters, architects, tailors, &c.

Religion.—The religion of the Yorubans is a Polytheism, and they believe largely in demonology and witchcraft, divination, charms, &c. They have no correct idea of the one true God, but seek to fill up the void in their minds by creations of the imagination. Deities, endless in variety, are conjured up, each having his own peculiar sphere of action. Thus they have gods of thunder, lightning, air, earth, rocks, trees, water, rivers, brooks, animals, &c. The chief of these are, Sango, the god of thunder, raised up by their fears, and Ifa, the god of divination, the fruit of their hopes. The worship of the former begins on Thursday night, and is kept up till Friday morning, with noise, drumming, and licentious dances.

Ifa, the god of divination, is consulted on every undertaking. Palm nuts are offered, by means of which the oracle is consulted, by a sort of lot. If the response is unfavorable, a sacrifice must be made; which puts it in the power of the priest to impose burdens on the people. If, for instance, a house is to be built, Ifa must be consulted; then the demon of the ground must be propitiated; then fetishes or charms must be brought, to keep away evil spirits; and thus the whole system becomes burdensome and oppressive.

Ifa, the country of Rakanda, bordering on the Nile, said to be the birth-place of the prophet Obbalofun, is the head-quarters of their religion. To this prophet, human sacrifices were offered on going to war. Such an offering was made at Abbeokuta, but a few years ago, and the practice still exists in other towns, though there it is done away through the influence of Christianity, Commodore

Forbes having, in 1851, induced the chiefs to sign a treaty for ever abolishing human sacrifices.

But, of all their superstitions, the Oro, (or as it is called by different tribes, the Egugun, Egun, or Mumbo-Jumbo,) exercises the most powerful influence upon the people. Although the Yorubans have no distinct ideas of a future state, yet they appear to believe in the immortality of the soul. It is their universal practice to pray to the spirits of their deceased fathers. The Egun is the supposed spirit of a dead man, representing different parties deceased, and called up for different purposes. The part is acted by a man in masquerade, clad in the most grotesque manner. The spirit is supposed to dwell in a sacred grove, called Igballo, in which there is a priest; and whoever wishes to raise the spirit, goes into this grove, and after various mummeries and incantations, the Egun makes his appearance.

The system of Oro is intimately connected with the government as well as religion. It is a secret society, bound together by solemn oaths, into which no woman is allowed to enter; and if she witnesses its mysteries, either by accident or design, she is instantly put to death. By this means the women are kept in subjection. When Egun passes through the streets, or Oro takes possession of the town, the women run to the most obscure places, and hide their faces till it has passed. Through the influence of Oro, also, the whole machinery of the government is carried on, and in its name laws are passed, and their penalties executed; and in the latter case, the Oro is said to have taken the culprit and eaten him up, and no questions are asked. Mr. Hinderen describes an execution of this kind, the offender being one of the wives of the king of Ibadan, in which about 100 of these Eguns, after dancing around the chief's house, playing with the woman's head, boiled it, and mixed portions of it with their supper, and then carried the polished skull about town several days, the whole ceremony lasting a week.

Population.—It would be impossible to ascertain the numbers of the Yoruba people; but there yet remain many large and populous towns, which have escaped the general devastation. The Church Missionary Society, in their report for 1852, enumerate four towns, within two or three days of Abbeokuta, with an aggregate of 200,000 inhabitants, and to the eastward, the territory of the Ijebus, containing 160,000; and beyond these, many more, to all of which the door is open for the entrance of the Gospel, which we may hope is destined, at no distant day, to put an end to these dark and cruel superstitions. All these tribes speak the same language, which will facilitate missionary operations. Many of them have embraced Mohammedanism, which shows that they are not strongly entrenched in their superstitions. For an account of the Yoruba missions, see Africa Western.

ZOHARITES: A sect of the Jews, who reject the Talmud and the authority of the rabbies, and follow the book Zohar. They are sprung from one Shabbathai Levi, who in the middle of the 17th century appeared in Smyrna, as the Messiah. In Germany and Poland they are called Hasidim or "pietists." In Turkey they go by the name of Dunmehs or "converts," because they make an outward profession of Islamism, though they secretly cherish the Jewish faith, and practice Jewish rites. These latter are most numerous in Thessalonica, where the missionaries of the A. B. C. F. M. have their attention directed to them, and hope that their conversion may be the door to that of the Mussulmans. Their doctrines, founded upon the Kabbala and the book Zohar, are mystical and somewhat allied to Gnosticism. They profess faith in the Trinity, and some of them acknowledge Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah, in a sense.—REV. E. M. DODD.

ZULUS: A tribe in South Africa, inhabiting an extensive territory in the vicinity of Port Natal. The country of the Zulus is pre-eminent for the beauty of its landscapes, the fertility of its soil, and the healthiness of its climate. The mountains, not large, are rather tabular than conical in shape; and when viewed from the sea, they rise, table above table, as they recede in the distance, having the summit and the sides, with the intervening plains, covered with verdant groves, or thick shrubbery, or large fields of green grass. The whole picture is diversified, with here and there a river, or a dark and deep ravine, with fields of Indian corn, or gardens of indigenous grain and fruit.

Climate.—The climate is one of the most salubrious and agreeable in the world. In the summer it is of course warm. In the winter it is occasionally cool enough to make a fire agreeable. But for the most of the year the climate is such that one could hardly wish it otherwise.

The People.—In 1847, the natives within the colony were estimated at from 80,000 to 100,000, and they were continually increasing. The whole number of the tribe is not known, but it must be very large.

Physical Appearance.—The corporeal and phrenological appearance of the natives is, in many respects, highly interesting. The degraded condition and the employments of the women are, indeed, unfavorable to their reaching and preserving a proper stature and form. Still, many of these, as well as the men, are very regular in their features, symmetrical in form, of a full chest and commanding stature. The men stand, walk or run very erect, and they have for the most part a high forehead, and an intelligent and expressive countenance. A few feathers upon the head; a profusion of beads upon the neck and arms, and sometimes upon other parts of the body ; a small piece of the skin of some animal about the loins ; and, perhaps, a brass ring upon the wrist and a strap covered with hair about the ankles, constitute as much wearing apparel as most of the natives are in the habit of using.

Dwellings.—Their houses are simple, small and rude ; hemispherical in shape, having a diameter at the base of some eight or ten feet ; being in height, at the centre and apex, only four or five feet ; having but one aperture, and that at the base, about two feet high, and made to answer for doors, windows and chimney.

Language.—The language of the Zulus appears to be very simple, and yet highly philosophical in its structure ; and, with the exception of a few clicks, mellifluous and euphonic.

Moral Character.—Polygamy is practiced here to a very great extent. The principal restraint upon it seems to be the number of cattle that a man can acquire to purchase his wives. The marriageable daughter is counted by the father as so many cattle, and disposed of, not on the principle of affection or preference, but to the highest bidder. From this system come many evils ; so that an utter disregard of all the principles of true fidelity among those who are married, and of virtue among those who are not, is as frequent as it is surprising and sinful. It is one of the chief obstacles against which the Gospel has to contend. Lying and deception are as common as the truth. Cases of stealing from each other are frequent. Murder is occasionally committed, and creates but little excitement. Dancing and singing impure songs are universal. Drinking intoxicating beer, taking snuff, and filthy conversation, are daily indulged by all. Almost every thing relating to their manner of life is very filthy, and tends to debase and degrade.

Redeeming Qualities—Desire of Improvement.—They are a brave and spirited, though not a revengeful people. None of their number have ever been kidnapped and reduced to slavery. Perhaps no nation in South Africa has ever exhibited so much skill in military affairs, and so much desire to rule as Chaka and Dingaan and their people ; and the natives around Port Natal are their immediate descendants.

They are a social people, fond of company and conversation. When a woman begins to harvest, she calls all her neighbors to help her.

In many things they exhibit skill, particularly in making baskets and mats, shields and spears. And, with a little instruction, they will turn their hands to a variety of useful employments, to which they are unaccustomed. They are an industrious people. It is not an uncommon thing for a single wife to raise for her husband some 50 or 60 bushels of corn in a year.—Missionary Herald for 1847, pp. 399 to 403 ; Annual Report A. B. C. F. M. 1846, p. 87, and 1850, p. 93. For Mission, see South Africa.

APPENDIX.

RESULTS OF MISSIONARY LABOR AMONG THE INDIANS—LETTER FROM REV. MR. BYINGTON.
STOCKBRIDGE, CHOCTAW NATION, {
June 20, 1854. }

MY DEAR BROTHER—You say in your letter of Jan. 1 : “ I should like to receive from you a letter conveying your impressions of the present state and future prospects of the missionary work among the Indians.” I must confine myself principally to the Choctaws, to whom I was sent by the American Board in September, 1820. My impressions are favorable in regard to our missionary work, especially if laborers of suitable qualifications occupy the field. The blessing of God, I have hoped, would attend our exertions here. I should prefer to give you a few leading facts, rather than to offer bare opinions. The character of the facts I wish to present will show you the state of this nation (1) when existing without the Gospel ; (2) after having come to its knowledge. I wish to put honor on the Gospel of our Saviour, whenever it can properly be done.

I. The state of this nation without the Gospel.—This embraces the whole period of their existence, so far as we know, till within the memory of many now living. (1) They were without God, and had no forms of religious worship, with reference to the true God, or any false God. They were ignorant of the God of the Bible. We had no false system of religion to oppose. (2) They had various superstitions, as a belief in witches, conjurors, rain-makers, “ doctors,” ghosts, fairies, and the like. They had a belief, to some extent, in an evil spirit or being, and a good one. But all this was dim indeed. (3) The value and immortality of the soul were new subjects to them. Many said, “ When I die that is the end of me.” How true it is, that God only can instruct us about himself as a Spirit, and about ourselves. (4) The nation were ignorant of many things useful to them in this life. How could it be otherwise ? A little tribe, hemmed in at home, for ages, through fear of hostile neighbors ; so much so, that we find but few words in their language borrowed from other tribes. They had no books, no history, no science, no laws, nothing in writing. A few traditions existed among them. Put your soul in just their position, and what would it be ? Put your body there also. (5) They had many wrong usages, such as that women must perform all the hard labor, that polygamy was right, that children could inherit nothing from their father or mother, that it was a disgrace for a warrior to labor in the field, and right to destroy their own infants. (6) They were not only a nation of idle warriors, but of drunkards. Only one man was named to the early missionary who would not get drunk. Men gloried in being drunk as a proof of manhood. (7) They were poor indeed, at their homes, in all respects. It was rare to see a man who wore shoes, pantaloons, or a hat. It was rare to see a house with a bed, table, or chairs, or to find at any place good farming or mechanic tools, a good house or farm. Formerly there were no fences. (8) They had no literature, but a branding-iron for calves and colts, and pieces of cane slit up and tied in bundles, used in calling assemblies. Each piece numbered a sleep. One was to be drawn out and thrown away on each morning, till there was but one, which marked the day of meeting. The chiefs could do nothing more in calling councils. They had songs at dances, and for the sick. However, the words which were sung were few. (9) The murderer was executed without a trial. He and his friends looked for none. He made no attempt to escape. He would not disgrace himself or family by being a coward on such an occasion. He dressed and adorned himself, painting his face and breast, singing, dancing, and whooping, to show his bravery, and would point to the place where the ball should enter his heart. He was not sorry he had killed a man. Nor were the warriors of his family sorry, if he only died like a brave. His grave was dug, and he lay down in it to see if it would fit his body. (10) They were exposed to diseases, such as the measles and small pox, and knew not how to treat them. They were wasting away. Many were killed as witches, being accused of causing death by their arts. (11) They had no regular form of government, no written constitution or laws. The chief's brave called councils, which often proved to be times and places of great drunkenness.

I will stop here, and ask from what region, above or below, is any ray of light seen beaming on these benighted men? It is not necessary to say there was then no Sabbath, no church, no Christian school, and no followers of the Saviour, among all the Choctaws at that time. One colored man, a native of Africa, who professed to be a disciple of the Lord, was found after a while by the missionaries. Now, here is one of the bays in the great Dead Sea which sin has formed on earth. We entered it with the Bible. I must now speak of the nation in its state,

II. After having come to a knowledge of the Bible.—These evils have been gradually passing away, not entirely; many still remain, and there is much for us to do, that we may bear onward, to a better consummation, the blessings already received, as well as gain those which are still promised. The improvements made are, (1) The nation now knows the only living and true God. He is acknowledged in various ways, in their General Council, in their courts, as well as in schools, families and churches, and in regard to his Sabbath. (2) Their cruel and base superstitions are passing away. They have formed laws on these subjects. (3) The soul of man, its worth, its nature, are now widely known. (4) Knowledge has greatly increased, through the schools, books, newspapers, the post-office, and the direct instructions of the different missionaries and other agencies. (5) The warriors have gone to work. They clear land and fence it, and cultivate the same with horses and oxen. This is a new era for the women, who still help in the field and in other places. It is now a disgrace to lead an indolent life. Marriage between one man and one woman is regulated by law. The descent of property is secured to children. Infanticide is punished. (6) The nation, as you know, have lived under the provisions of what is called the "Maine law" for about 30 years. (7) The comforts of life have increased a hundred fold, in food and raiment, house and home. A legal fence must be ten rails high. (8) They have a large number of books in their own tongue, and many men and women can read and write well in the English language. They have educated chiefs, judges, and ministers of the Gospel. (9) For murder and other crimes there are special legal enactments. Trial by jury is the right of such persons. (10) They also have acquired much knowledge about diseases and their most hopeful and approved remedies, and such as are known to Americans. "Indian" doctoring was no better than Indian farming, when they planted corn without a fence, and without regarding "rows." (11) They have a regular written constitution, and a national legislative body which enacts laws. There is a judiciary and an executive body. They have large provisions for the education of their sons and daughters, as the reports in the Missionary Rooms will abundantly show. We have now nine ministers in our Indian Presbytery, and 13 churches under its care. The members amount to 1,275, and the contributions from these churches, as reported at the last meeting of Presbytery, amounted during a period of about 20 months, to $2,431. The Methodist, the Baptist, and the Cumberland Presbyterian brethren all have churches in this nation, and are all doing good in their various fields of labor. You must make your own inferences from these facts, of what the blessed Gospel may be hoped to accomplish, even when preached by very imperfect men to "Indians."—Enough is said to show what a people we found when we brought the Gospel here, and what is the nature of its influence on the red man's heart and life. These facts I deem worthy of record, that the infidel may be silent till he can exhibit an example of greater and better success, through other books in which he believes, that political men may not attempt to legislate the Indian from the earth, because he will not become wise, and that the Church may go on in this blessed work, till it is finished on earth, and the fruits gathered in heaven.

Ever yours,

CYRUS B. WATSON
